
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

GoogleTM books

<https://books.google.com>

This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

GoogleTM books

<https://books.google.com>

THE LIBRARY OF

ACCESSION.	CLASS
32872	BOOK	050 8A12

8-1

The Academy and Literature

JANUARY—JUNE
1904

VOLUME LXVI

PUBLISHING OFFICE: 9, EAST HARDING STREET, E.C.
1904

32872

CONTENTS OF VOLUME LXVI

REVIEWS

	PAGE
Abbott's (Lyman) "Henry Ward Beecher"	12
Abel's (Carl) "Aegyptisch-Indoeuropäische Sprachverwandtschaft"	13
Acheson's (Arthur) "Shakespeare and the Rival Poet"	13
"Acton, Lord, Letters of, to Mary, Daughter of the Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone"	347
Acton's (Lord) "The Cambridge Modern History"	118
"Adams, William: An Old English Potter," edited by W. Turner	543
Addison's (Julia de Wolf) "The Art of the Pitti Palace, Florence," &c.	245
"Ad Metrem," Poems by John Gray	405
"Adonais," by Percy Bysshe Shelley	245
"Adventures on the Roof of the World," by Mrs. Aubrey Le Blond	274
"Aegyptisch-Indoeuropäische Sprachverwandtschaft," by Carl Abel	13
"Afghan War, The Second," by Col. H. B. Hanna	686
"Africa: From South to North through Marotseland," by Maj. A. St. H. Gibbons	610
"Africa, South, The War in," translated by Col. W. H. H. Waters	348
——— "A History of," by H. A. Bryden	454
"Agamemnon of Æschylus, The," translated by E. Thring	611
"Age of Ivory," by H. H. Chamberlin	72
Aho's (Juhani) "Pour Ma Finlande"	14
Ainger's (A. C.) "A First Latin-English Dictionary"	52
Ainsworth's (Harrison) "The Tower of London"	274
"Alceas of Euripides," edited by A. J. Tate	52
"Alceyeh, Old Time, Kingsway, and Neighbourhood," by C. Gordon	80
Alken's (Henry) "The National Sports of Great Britain"	101
——— "The Analysis of the Hunting Field"	101
Allan's (Sir William) "Songs of Love and Labour"	99
Allen's (G. S.) Edition of "The Didache"	52
"Allgemeine Deutsche Biographie," Vol. XLVIII.	452
"Almanach des Gourmands"	147
"America, Greater," by A. R. Colquhoun	519
——— in Literature," by George Woodberry	13
——— North, The Great North-West and the Great Lake Region of," by Paul Fountain	145
Anders's (H. R. D.) "Shakespeare's Books"	188
Anderson's (Sir Robert) "Pseudo-Criticism"	492
André's (Eugène) "A Naturalist in the Guianas"	376
"Angel of Misfortune, The: A Fairy Tale," by N. W. Pai	544
"Angler's Autobiography, An," by Frederic M. Halford	121
"Animals, The Natural History of," by Prof. J. R. Ainsworth Davis	521
"Anthology, A Seventeenth-Century"	404
——— An Eighteenth-Century"	404
"Antwerp: An Historical Sketch," by Wilfrid C. Robinson	483
Arber's (Prof.) "English Garner: Elizabethan Sonnets"	652
"Architecture, English," by T. Dinham Atkinson	492
"Army, English, Lists and Commission Registers, 1661-1714," by C. Dalton	378
"Arnold, Matthew," by G. W. E. Russell	296
"Art, Little Books on" (Methuen)	228
"Artist and Engraver, The"	132
"As the Sparks Fly Upward: Poems and Ballads," by Dora S. Shorter	69
"Asia, Central, and Tibet," by Sven Hedin	124
"Ask Mama"	524
"Astolat Oakleaf Classics, The"	379
Atkinson's (T. Dinham) "English Architecture"	492
Austen's (Jane) "Pride and Prejudice"	274
"Autobiography, An," by Herbert Spencer	447
——— of a Thief, The"	422
"Autocrat of the Breakfast Table, The"	148
Bahr's (Hermann) "Der Meister"	175
Bain's (Alexander) "Autobiography"	602
Baldensperger's (Fernand) "Goethe en France," &c.	401
Balfour's (Marie C.) "Memoirs of Mlle. Des Echerolles"	124
"Balkans from Within, The," by Reginald Wyon	376
"Balzano, La Jeunesse de," by G. Hanotaux and G. Vicaire	166

REVIEWS—continued

	PAGE
Bancroft's (Mrs. George) "Letters from England"	654
Barbeau's (A.) "Une Ville d'Eaux Anglaise au XVIII ^e Siècle"	248
Bardwell's (Mrs. F. A.) "The Book of Town and Window Gardening"	170
Barry's (Dr. William) "Newman"	424
Bateson's (Mary) "Medieval England: 1066-1350"	96
"Beattie and His Friends," by Margaret Forbes	430
"Beaumont and Fletcher, The Works of," (Variorum Edition) (Mermaid Series)	609
Beecher, Henry Ward," by Lyman Abbott	12
Beerbohm's (Max) "The Poet's Corner"	513
Bell's (Mrs. Arthur) "Lives and Legends of the English Bishops and Kings," &c.	96
Benson's (A. C.) "Rossetti"	397
——— "Alfred Tennyson"	131
Bergesio's (Georges) "Carmen Sylva"	195
"Berlioz, Hector, et la Société de son Temps," by Julien Tiersot	70
Bernard's (J. H.) "St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin"	124
Beveridge's (Albert J.) "The Russian Advance"	120
"Bible Characters and Scripture Handbooks, the Temple Series of"	219
——— Society, The Story of the," by W. Canton	297
Biddulph's (Gen. Sir Robert) "Lord Cardwell at the War Office"	450
Blackie's "Illustrated Latin Series"	53
Blair's (Matthew) "The Paisley Shawl and the Men who Produced It"	167
Blond's (Mrs. Aubrey Le) "Adventures on the Roof of the World"	274
Blunt's (Lady Anne) Translation of "The Seven Golden Odes of Pagan Arabia"	72
"Boeotia, A Modern," by Deborah Primrose	685
"Boer War, Some Lessons of the," by Col. C. D. Pilcher	73
Bogg's (Edmund) "Two Thousand Miles in Wharfedale"	273
"Books Condemned to be Burnt," by J. Anson Farrer	658
Bowen's (Chas. Inniss) "The Wandering Jew: A Poem"	147
Bradley's (A. G.) "Canada in the Twentieth Century"	7
Brande's (George) "Main Currents in Nineteenth-Century Literature"	540
"Bridgman, Laura," by Maud Howe and Florence Howe Hall	685
"Broeken, Henry: His Travels and Adventures," &c., by W. J. De La Mare	348
"Browne, Sir Thomas, The Works of," edited by Charles Sayle	658, 687
"Browning, Robert," by Edward Dowden	271
——— The Poetical Works of"	686
"Browning's Essay on Shelley"	99
"Bryan's Dictionary of Painters and Engravers," Vol. III.	615
Bryden's (H. A.) "A History of South Africa"	454
Buckle's (H. T.) "Introduction to the History of Civilisation in England"	299
Bunyan's (John) "The Pilgrim's Progress"	8, 195, 493
Burne-Jones's (Sir Philip) "Dollars and Democracy"	564
"Burns, The Poems of"	427
"Burns's Passionate Pilgrimage," &c., by David Lowe	96
Burton's (William) "A History and Description of English Earthenware and Stoneware"	608
Caird's (E.) "The Evolution of Theology in the Greek Philosophers"	166
"Calendar of Lyrics in 1904, A"	101
Calvert's (Albert F.) "Impressions of Spain"	169
"Cambridge Modern History, The," planned by Lord Acton	118
"Campbell, Thomas, Poems of"	568
Campbell's (F. W. Groves) "San Francisco and Other Poems"	146
"Canada in the Twentieth Century," by A. G. Bradley	7
"Canada, The Fight for," by Maj. William Wood	487
"Canterbury, Historical Memorials of," by Dean Stanley	545
Canton's (William) "The Story of the Bible Society"	297
"Captain of the Guard, The"	686
"Cardwell, Lord, at the War Office," by Gen. Sir Robt. Biddulph	450

REVIEWS—continued

	PAGE
"Carlyle, Thomas, New Letters of," edited, &c., by Alexander Carlyle	448
Carlyle's "Essays"	148
Carman's (Bliss) "Songs of the Sea Children"	611
——— "The Kinship of Nature"	214
"Carmen Sylva," by Georges Bergesio	195
Carroll's (Rev. J. S.) "The Exiles of Eternity"	10
"Castles in the Air," by Dr. C. W. Stubbs	72
"Cathedrals, Notes on the"	403
"Cattle Raid of Cualnre, The," translated by L. Winifred Faraday	298
Caxton's (William) "The Chevalier Geoffroy de la Tour Landry"	493
"Caxtons, The," by Lord Lytton	148
Cazamian's (Louis) "Le Roman Social en Angleterre (1850-1850)"	213
"Cervantes, Miguel de, The Complete Works of"	170
"Chafing Dish, The Cult of the," by Frank Schlosser	658
Chamberlin's (H. H.) "Age of Ivory"	72
Chapman, George, The Plays of"	637
"Charity, Supervision and Education in," by Dr. J. R. Brackett	58
"Chats on English China," by Arthur Hayden	377
Chaucer's "The Man of Law's Tale," &c.	568
"China Martyrs of 1900, The," compiled and edited by R. C. Forsyth	589
"Chinese Quotations, A Manual of," by J. H. Stewart Lockhart	399
"Christ from Without and Within, The," by Rev. H. W. Clark	567
"Christianity, The Beginnings of," by Paul Werle	683
"Church of St. Mary the Virgin, Oxford, The," by Rev. H. L. Thompson	191
"Civil War, The True History of the," by Guy Carleton Lee	124
"Civilisation in England, Introduction to the History of," by H. T. Buckle	290
Clapperton's (Jane Hume) "A Vision of the Future"	615
Clark's (Rev. Henry W.) "The Christ from Without and Within"	567
Clausen's (George) "Six Lectures on Painting"	552
Clinch's (George) "The Isle of Wight"	568
Coleman's (John) "Fifty Years of an Actor's Life"	592
"Coleridge's Aids to Reflection"	379
Collins's (J. Churton) "Studies in Shakespeare"	158
Colquhoun's (A. R.) "Greater America"	519
Colville's (Mrs. Arthur) "Duchess Sarah"	243
Combes de l'Estrade's (Le Vte.) "Les Monarchies de l'Empire Allemande"	427
"Complent Angler of Isaak Walton and Charles Cotton, The"	124
"Confession and Absolution," by T. W. Drury	100
"Confessions of an English Opium-eater," by De Quincey	274
——— St. Augustine, The"	274
"Confucius, The Odes of," rendered into Verse by L. Cranmer Byng	274
——— Sayings of"	434
"Conspiracy under the Terror, A," by Paul Gaulot	426
"Cook, The Single-handed," by Mrs. C. S. Peel	658
Cook's (Theodore) "The Water-colour Drawings of J. M. W. Turner, R.A., in the National Gallery"	9
Cooper's (Fenimore) "The Pathfinder"	148
Corbett's (Julian S.) "England in the Mediterranean"	269
"Coridon's Song, and Other Verses"	249
Corkran's (Henriette) "Oddities, Others, and I"	614
"Cornish Ballads and Other Poems," by R. S. Hawker	452
Cornish's (C. J.) "Sir William Henry Flower, K.C.B., &c."	450
"Costume in America, Two Centuries of," by Alice Morse Earle	122
"Cotton, Charles, Poems by," chosen and edited by J. R. Tutin	72
"Cowley, Abraham, Essays by"	148
"Cowper, William, The Correspondence of," arranged by Thomas Wright	420
Craigie's (Mrs.) "The Science of Life"	682
Cranes (Walter) and Day's (Lewis F.) "Moot Points"	21
Crawford's (Oswald) "The Sin of Prince Eladane"	144
"Cruikshank's Water Colours," by Joseph Greco	214
"Crumbs of Fancy," by Lotte	452

REVIEWS—continued

	PAGE
Cullen's (John) "Poems and Idylls" . . .	99
"Cup, The," by Lord Tennyson . . .	124
"Cupid and Psyche and Other Tales from the Golden Age of Apuleius" . . .	686
"Dalhousie, The Life of the Marquis of," by Sir W. Lee-Werner . . .	449
Dalton's (Chas.) "English Army Lists and Commission Registers 1661-1714" . . .	378
"Dante Society Lectures" . . .	586
"Dante, Studies in," by Dr. E. Moore . . .	423
Dante's "The New Life" . . .	148
"Dark Ages, The," by W. P. Ker . . .	637
"Das Heimatsfest," by Gus Frousen . . .	19
"David Copperfield," by Charles Dickens . . .	274
Davidson's (A. B.) "Old Testament Prophecy" . . .	97
— "Waiting upon God" . . .	123
— (A. M. Campbell) "Present-day Japan" . . .	523
Davis's (Prof. J. R. Ainsworth) "The Natural History of Animals" . . .	521
Dawson's (A. J.) "Things Seen in Morocco" . . .	541
Décour's (Felix) "Correspondance de George Sand et d'Alfred de Musset" . . .	685
"De Coverley, Sir Roger" . . .	455
"Dédale, Le," by Paul Hervieu . . .	144
Deecke's (Prof. W.) "Italy" . . .	682
"Defence of Guenevere and Other Poems, The," by W. Morris . . .	568
Defoe's "Journal of the Plague Year" . . .	637
"Dekker, Thomas" (Mermaid Series) . . .	352
Dekker's (Thomas) "The Gull's Hornbook" . . .	568
De La Mare's (W. J.) "Henry Brocken" . . .	348
"Delancy, Thomas," by Dr. Richard Sievers . . .	248
De Quincey's "Confessions of an English Opium Eater" . . .	274
"Der Kampf der Weltanschauungen im 19. Jahrhundert," by D. W. Schmidt . . .	147
"Der Meister," by Hermann Bahr . . .	175
"Der Ursprung des Harlekin," by Dr. Otto Driesen . . .	401
Deschamps's (Gaston) "La Vie et les Livres" . . .	13
"De Vigny, Alfred, Œuvres Complètes de" . . .	73
Devonshire's (Mrs. R. L.) "Life and Letters of H. Taine, 1853-1870" . . .	634
Dickens's (Charles) "David Copperfield" . . .	274
— "Great Expectations" . . .	249
— and "Hard Times" . . .	52
"Didache, The," edited by G. C. Allen . . .	14
"Die Grenzen der Geschichte," by Friedrich Grotte . . .	588
Direks's (Rudolf) "Auguste Rodin" . . .	89
"Divine Vision and Other Poems," by A. E. Dobell's (Bertram) "Rosemary and Pansies" . . .	399
"Dollars and Democracy," by Sir Philip Burne-Jones . . .	564
"Donatello" (Grevel's Series of Monographs on Artists) . . .	178
Doncicieux's (George) "Le Romanodéro Populaire de la France" . . .	270
Dorner's (Dr. A.) "Grundprobleme der Religionsphilosophie: Acht Vorträge" . . .	110
"Double Garden, The," by Maurice Maeterlinck . . .	634
Douglas's (Sir George) "The Life of Major-General Wauchope" . . .	611
Douse's (T. Le Marchant) "Examination of the Northumberland Manuscript" . . .	272
Dowden's (Edward) "Robert Browning" . . .	271
"Drama, Attio, Studies from," by E. G. Harman . . .	491
"Dreams that were not all Dreams," by J. A. Johnstone . . .	585
Dreyfus's (F.) "Un Philanthrope d'Autrefois" . . .	402
Driesen's (Dr. Otto) "Der Ursprung des Harlekin" . . .	401
Drummond's (James) "An Inquiry into the Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel" . . .	98
Drury's (T. W.) "Confession and Absolution" . . .	100
"Dryden, John," edited by George Saintsbury . . .	147
"Duchess Sarah," by Mrs. Arthur Colville . . .	243
Duff's (Rt. Hon. Sir M. E. Grant) "Notes from a Diary" . . .	489
Dunlop's (G. A.) "In Lonely Dreaming" . . .	611
Dunn's (Sara H.) "The Land of the Rosary" . . .	524
— (The late Henry Treffry) "Recollections of Dante Gabriel Rossetti and His Circle" . . .	69
"Dutch Republic, The Rise of the," by Motley . . .	658
Dutt's (W. A.) "Suffolk" . . .	219
"Dynasts, The: A Drama of the Napoleonic Wars," by Thos. Hardy . . .	95
Earle's (Alice Moree) "Two Centuries of Costume in America" . . .	122
— (John) "Micro-cosmographie, &c." by W. Burton . . .	349
"Earthenware and Stoneware, English, A History and Description of," by W. Burton . . .	608
"Echerolles, Mlle. des, Memoirs of," translated by Marie C. Balfour . . .	124
Edwards's (Chilperic) "The Hammurabi Code and the Sinaitic Legislation" . . .	403
— (J. Harrington) "God and Music" . . .	274
"Effeullements," by Hélène de Zuyten de Nyevelt . . .	219
Egan's (Pierce) "The Life of an Actor" . . .	379
"Eikon Basilike," edited by E. Almack . . .	404
"Elegy, An," by Vivian Locke Ellis . . .	544
"Elizabeth, Queen, The Courtships of," by Martin Hume . . .	492
"Elizabethan Critical Essays," edited by G. Gregory Smith . . .	518

REVIEWS—continued

	PAGE
"Elizabethan Lyrics: A Study," by John Erskine . . .	272
— Poems—Longer and "Shorter" (an English Garner) . . .	167
— Sonnets, Introduction by Sidney Lee . . .	652
Ellesmere (Francis, the First Earl of), "Personal Reminiscences of the Duke of Wellington" . . .	68
Ellis's (Vivian Locke) "An Elegy" . . .	544
Emanuel's (F. L.) "The Illustrators of Montmartre" . . .	588
"Emerson Treasury, An" . . .	101
"Emerson's Essays" . . .	352
"Emmet, Robert," by Louise Imogen Guiney . . .	352
Engel's (Eduard) "Shakespeare-Rätsel" . . .	67
"England in the Mediterranean," by Julian S. Corbett . . .	269
"England, Medieval: 1066-1350," by Miss Mary Bateson . . .	96
— Modern, A History of," by Herbert Paul . . .	143
"Englische Schauspieler und Englisches Schauspiel zur Zeit Shakespeares in Deutschland," by Dr. E. Hers . . .	188
English (School Books) . . .	55
"English Literature and Society in the Eighteenth Century," by Leslie Stephen . . .	216
Ensor's (R. C.) "Modern Poems" . . .	72
"Erasmus, Desiderius, Concerning the Aim of Education," by W. Harrison Woodward . . .	523
Ernest-Charles's (J.) "Les Samedis Littéraires" . . .	523
Erskine's (John) "The Elizabethan Lyric: A Study" . . .	272
— "Essai sur le Règne de l'Empereur Aurélien," by Léon Homo . . .	375
"Eton in 1829-1830," edited by Dr. Edmond Warre . . .	52
"Europe, Modern, Foundations of," by Emil Reich . . .	374
"European History, Lectures on," by William Stubbs . . .	540
— Thought in the Nineteenth Century, A History of . . .	58
"Evelyn, John, The Diary of" . . .	195
"Exiles of Eternity, The," by the Rev. J. S. Carroll . . .	10
"Expositor, The," Vol. VIII. . .	100
"Expositor's Greek Testament, The," Vol. III. . .	168
"Face of the Night, The," by Ford M. Hueffer . . .	431
Faguet's (Emile) "Propos Littéraires" . . .	402
— "En Liasant Nietzsche" . . .	637
Falconer's (Hugh) "The Maid of Shulam" . . .	427
"Falstaff," by Jacques Richepin . . .	473
"Far Eastern Impressions," by Ernest F. G. Hatch . . .	542
Faraday's (L. Winifred) Translation of "The Cat's Raid of Cusluge" . . .	298
"Farrar, George, Sein Leben und Seine Original-Dramen," by Dr. D. Schmid . . .	402
Farrar's (Reginald) "The Life of Frederic William Farrar" . . .	520
Farrer's (James Anson) "Books Condemned to be Burnt" . . .	658
"Fatigue," by A. Mosso . . .	73
"Fifty Years of an Actor's Life," by John Coleman . . .	592
Finlayson's (Christie) "The Poet's Child" . . .	452
"Fire-Bringer, The," by W. Vaughan Moody . . .	491
"Fishing Holidays," by Stephen Gwynn . . .	401
"FitzGerald, Edward, The Life of," by Thomas Wright . . .	118
FitzGerald's "Omar Khayyam" . . .	274
— (Edward) "Miscellanies" and "Six Dramas of Calderon" . . .	589
"Fits-Warner, Fulk, The History of" . . .	568
"Flora and Sylva" . . .	170
"Flower, Sir William Henry," by C. J. Cornish . . .	450
Forbes's (Margaret) "Beattie and His Friends" . . .	420
Ford's (G. Stanton) "Hanover and Prussia, 1795-1803" . . .	217
Forayth's (R. C.) "The China Martyrs of 1900" . . .	589
Fountain's (Paul) "The Great North-West and the Great Lake Region of North America" . . .	145
French (School Books) . . .	53
"French Noblesse of the Eighteenth Century, The," translated by Mrs. Colquhoun Grant . . .	612
"Freneau, Philip, The Poems of," edited by Fred Lewis Pattee . . .	11
Frensen's (Gustav) "Das Heimatsfest" . . .	19
Friedensburg's (Walter) "Archiv für Reformationsgeschichte" . . .	124
"From a Cloister," by Elizabeth Gibson . . .	491
— Venetian Balcony," by Lady Lindsay . . .	72
"Fronde Caducée," by Montagu Lomax . . .	99
Fulda's (Ludwig) "Schiller und die neue Generation, ein Vortrag" . . .	216
Fulleylove's (John) "Oxford" . . .	10
"Furniss, Harry, at Home" . . .	681
"Gardening, Town and Window, The Book of," by Mrs. F. A. Bardwell . . .	210
Gardner's (Edmund G.) "Siena" . . .	179
Garnett's (Lucy M. J.) "Turkish Life in Town and Country" . . .	147
Garvie's (Alfred E.) "The Gospel for To-Day" . . .	523

REVIEWS—continued

	PAGE
Gaskell's (Lady Catherine Milnes) "Old Shropshire Life" . . .	244
"Gates of Silence," by Robert Loveman . . .	72
Gaulot's (Paul) "A Conspiracy under the Terror, &c." . . .	426
Gasquet's (Abbot) "English Monastic Life" . . .	632
Gausson's (Alice C. C.) "A Later Pepys" . . .	680
"Gazelles, and Other Poems, The," by T. Sturge Moore . . .	350
Gazier's (A.) "Melanges de Littérature et d'Histoire" . . .	73
Geikie's (Sir Archibald) "Scottish Reminiscences" . . .	398
Geography (School Books) . . .	56
Gerard's (John) "The Old Riddle and the Newest Answer" . . .	424
German (School Books) . . .	53
"German, Translations from the," by J. Goodfellow . . .	425
"Geschichte Russlands unter Kaiser Nikolaus I.," by T. Schieman . . .	398
Gibbons' (Major A. St. H.) "Africa: From South to North through Marotoland" . . .	610
Gibson's (Elizabeth) "From a Cloister" . . .	491
Gleig's (the late George Robert) "Personal Reminiscences of the First Duke of Wellington" . . .	563
"Glow-worm Flames," by Agnese Lawrie-Walker . . .	350
"God and Music," by J. Harrington Edwards . . .	274
"Gods and Fighting Men," arranged and put into English by Lady Gregory . . .	192
"Goethe en France," by Fernand Baldensperger . . .	401
"Goethe's Lyrik," by Berthold Litzmann . . .	13
Goldberger's (H.) "Die Niebelungen" . . .	100
"Goldsmith's 'Vicar of Wakefield,' Entstehungsgeschichte von," by B. Neundorff . . .	248
Gomme's (G. Laurence) "English Topography" . . .	655
Goodfellow's (J.) "Translations from the German" . . .	425
"Goodwin's (Gordon) 'British Mezzotinters'" . . .	518
Gore-Booth's (Eva) "Unseen Kings" . . .	245
Gordon's (Gen. I. B.) "Reminiscences of the Civil War" . . .	296
— (Charles) "Old Time Aldwyck, Kingsway, and Neighbourhood" . . .	80
"Gospel for To-day, The," by A. E. Garvie . . .	523
"Gospel, The Fourth, An Inquiry into the Character, &c., of," by J. Drummond . . .	98
"Gospels of the Sundays and Festivals," by Rev. C. J. Ryan . . .	612
Gosse's (Edmund) "Jeremy Taylor" . . .	119
Gottl's (Friedrich) "Die Grenzen der Geschichte" . . .	14
Goudie's (Gilbert) "The Celtic and Scandinavian Antiquities of Shetland" . . .	388
"Grammar of the Dialect of Adlington, A," by A. Hargreaves . . .	73
"Grant, Charles, The Life of," by Henry Morris . . .	182
Gray's (Louis H.) Translation of "The Hundred Love-Songs of Kamal-Ad-din of Isfahan" . . .	11
— (John) "Ad Matrem" . . .	425
"Great Masters" . . .	385
"Souls at Prayer," by Mrs. M. W. Tilston . . .	568
Greek (School Books) . . .	52
"Greek Antiquities," by Prof. Maisch . . .	52
"Greeks, Ancient, Stories of the," by Charles D. Shaw . . .	185
Grant's (Mrs. Colquhoun) Translation of "The French Noblesse of the Eighteenth Century" . . .	612
Green's (John Richard) "Stray Studies" . . .	58
Gregory's (Lady) "Gods and Fighting Men" . . .	192
"Grosstadtlyrik," by Heinz Möller . . .	170
"Grundprobleme der Religionsphilosophie: Acht Vorträge," by Dr. A. Dorner . . .	110
Guide Books . . .	672
"Guide to the Best Historical Novels and Tales," by Jonathan Nield . . .	352
"Guido and Veronica and Other Poems," by Kaufmann C. Spiers . . .	99
"Gull's Hornbook, The," by Thomas Dekker . . .	568
Gwynn's (Stephen) "Fishing Holidays" . . .	401
"Hades: The Grave in Hades, &c.," by S. F. Pells . . .	274
"Hakluyt's Voyages," Vols. V. and VI. . .	636
Halford's (Frederic M.) "An Angler's Autobiography" . . .	121
Hamilton's (Angus) "Korea" . . .	94
Hammond's (B. E.) "Outlines of Comparative Politics" . . .	301
"Hammurabi Code and the Sinaitic Legislation," by C. Edwards . . .	403
Hancock's (H. Irving) "Japanese Physical Training" . . .	246
"Handbuch der Klassischen Altertumswissenschaft," by Dr. Iwan von Müller . . .	195
Hanna's (Col. H. B.) "The Second Afghan War" . . .	686
Hanotiaux's (Gabriel) and Vicaire's (Georges) "La Jeunesse de Balzac" . . .	166
"Hanover and Prussia, 1795-1803," by G. Stanton Ford . . .	217
Happgood's (Hutchins) "The Autobiography of a Thief" . . .	422
Hardy's (Thomas) "The Dynasts: A Drama of the Napoleonic Wars" . . .	95
Hargreaves's (A.) "A Grammar of the Dialect of Adlington" . . .	73
Harman's (Edward George) "Studies from Attio Drama" . . .	491

REVIEWS—continued

	PAGE
"Harry Lorrequer," by Charles Lever...	148
Hartmann's (Sadakichi) "Japanese Art"...	543
Hatch's (Ernest F. G.) "Far Eastern Impressions"...	542
Hawker's (R. S.) "Cornish Ballads and Other Poems"...	452
Hayden's (Arthur) "Chats on English China"...	377
Hedin's (Sven) "Central Asia and Tibet"...	124
Hemstreet's (Charles) "Literary New York, Its Landmarks, &c."...	300
"Herbert of Cherburg, Lord, The Life of"...	658
"Herbs, The Book of," by Lady Rosalind Northcote	72
Hervieu's (Paul) "Le Dédale"...	144
Herr's (Dr. E.) "Englisches Schauspiel und Englisches Schauspiel zur Zeit Shakespeares in Deutschland"...	168
"Highlands The Literature of the," by Magnus Maclean	217
Hill's (Constance) "Juniper Hall"...	213
— (G. Birkbeck) "Letters Written by a Grandfather"...	169
Hime's (Lt.-Col. H. W. L.) "Gunpowder and Ammunition"...	615
Hind's (C. Lewis) "Adventures Among Pictures"...	423
"Hippolytus of Euripides, The," translated by Gilbert Murray	611
"Histoire des Littératures Comparées," by Frédéric Loliée	565
History (School Books)	56
"History of Twenty-five Years, The," by Sir Spencer Walpole	294
Hobbes's (Thomas) "Leviathan"...	249
Hodgson's (W. Earl) "Trout Fishing"...	297
Hogg's (T. J.) "Shelley at Oxford"...	378
Holtzmann's (Oscar) "The Life of Jesus"...	451
Home's (Gordon) "Yorkshire"...	519
"Homeric Hymns, The," edited by T. W. Allen and E. E. Sikes	451
Homo's (Léon) "Essai sur la Règne de l'Empereur Aurélien" (270-275)	375
"Horace for English Readers," by E. C. Wickham	11
Horton's (R. F.) "St. John: A Poem"...	452
Hoskyns's (C. W.) "Talpa; or, The Chronicles of a Clay Farm"...	170
"House of Quiet, The; An Autobiography," by J. T.	165
Howard's (Newman) "Savonarola, a City's Tragedy"...	147
Howe's (Maud) and Hall's (Florence Howe) "Laura Bridgman"...	685
Hueffer's (Ford M.) "The Face of the Night"...	491
Hughes's (C. G.) "The Praise of Shakespeare"...	635
— (C.) Edition of "Shakespeare's Europe"...	7
Hume's (Martin) "The Courtships of Queen Elizabeth"...	492
"Hutchinson, Colonel, Memoirs of the Life of," written by his Widow, Lucy	171
Hutchinson's (H. G.) "The New Forest"...	584
— (William G.) "Songs of the Vine"...	70
Hyde's (Douglas) "Songs Ascribed to Raftery"...	120
"Idées Vivantes," by Camille Maclair	121
"In Lonely Dreaming," by G. A. Dunlop	611
"Inferno, The Dread: Notes for Beginners on the Study of Dante"...	403
"Influence of the Pre-Reformation Church on Scottish Place-Names," by J. M. MacKinlay	426
Ingram's (John K.) "Practical Morals, A Treatise on Universal Education"...	219
— (John H.) "Christopher Marlowe and His Associates"...	652
Isaacson's (Rev. C. S.) "Roads to Christ"...	524
"Isle of Wight, The," by George Clinch	568
"Israel, Ancient, Politics and Religion in," by Rev. J. C. Todd	171
"Italy," by Prof. W. Deecke	682
"Italy, Hill Towns of," by Egerton R. Williams	143
"Ivan le Terrible," by K. Waliszewski	215
Jackson's (F. Hamilton) "Mural Painting"...	302
"Japan, Impressions of," by George H. Rittner	194
— Present-Day," by A. M. Campbell Davidson	523
"Japanese Art," by Sadakichi Hartmann	543
— Physical Training," by H. Irving Hancock	246
Jekyll's (Gertrude) "Old West Surrey"...	517
Jellinghaus's (Dr. H.) "Ossians Lebeausan-chauung"...	73
"Jesus of Nazareth, The Truth About," by Philip Sidney	171
"Jesus, The Life of," by Oscar Holtzmann	451
"John the Baptist, A Drama," from the Latin of George Buchanan	350
Johnson's Dr. Calendar for 1904"...	101
Johnson's (Edwin) "The Rise of English Culture"...	246
Johnstone's (R. M.) "Napoleon: A Short Biography"...	589
— (J. A.) "Dreams that were not All Dreams"...	585
Jowett's (Prof.) translation of "The Four Socratic Dialogues of Plato"...	52
"Judicial Dictionary, The," by F. Stroud	194
Jülicher's (Adolf) "An Introduction to the New Testament"...	298

REVIEWS—continued

	PAGE
"Juniper Hall," by Constance Hill...	213
"Kafir, The Essential," by Dudley Kidd	374
"Kamal-Ad-din of Isfahan, The Hundred Love-Songs of," translated from the Persian by Louis H. Gray	11
"Keats' Eve of St. Agnes"...	427
"Kelly's Post Office London Directory, 1904"...	5
Kennedy's (Rev. H. A.) "St. Paul's Conceptions of the Last Things"...	568
Kerr's (W. P.) "The Dark Ages"...	657
Kerr's (John) "Other Memories: Old and New"...	588
Kidd's (Dudley) "The Essential Kafir"...	374
"Kings and Queens I have Known," by Helen Vacaresco	492
"King's Letters: From the Days of Alfred to the Coming of the Tudors"...	101
"Kinship of Nature, The," by Bliss Carman	214
Kitchin's (G. W.) "Ruskin in Oxford, and Other Studies"...	189
Knackfuss's (H.) "Rubens"...	405
"Knight's Tale of Palamon and Arcite, The," done into Modern English by Rev. Prof. Walter W. Skeat	245
Knowlson's (T. Sharper) "Leo Tolstoy"...	360
"Korea," by Angus Hamilton	94
"La Bruyère," by Paul Morillot	397
"La Guerre de Sept Ans, Histoire Diplomatique et Militaire"...	493
"La Langue Anglaise sans Maître," by C. A. Thimim	195
"Lamb's Essays"...	352
"Land and Sea Pieces," by Arthur E. J. Legge	611
— of the Rosary, The," by Sara H. Dunn	524
"Lander, Walter Savage, The Shorter Works of"...	545
Latin (School Books)	52
"Latin Authors, Selections from"...	52
"Latin-English Dictionary, A First," by A. C. Ainger	52
"Latin Reader, A First," by K. P. Wilson	52
"La Venus des Aveugles," by Renée Vivien	147
Lawrie-Walker's (Agnese) "Glow-worm Flames"...	350
"Leaves from an Indian Jungle," &c.	403
Lee's (Sidney) "Stratford-on-Avon"...	494
— (Guy Carlton) "The True History of the Civil War"...	124
Lee-Warner's (Sir William) "The Life of the Marquis of Dalhousie, K.T."...	449
Legge's (Arthur E. J.) "Land and Sea Pieces"...	611
"L'Emigré par Sénac de Meilhan"...	97
"Le Romanesque Populaire de la France," by George Doncieux	270
"Les Dernières Années de la Louisiane Française," by the Baron de Villiers du Terrage	190
Les Monarchies de l'Empire Allemande," by the Vte. Combes de l'Étrade	427
"Les Samedis Littéraires," by J. Ernest Charles	523
"Les Tendresses Premières," by Emile Verhaeren	491
"Letters from England," by Mrs. George Bancroft	654
— Written by a Grandfather," by G. Birkbeck Hill	169
"L'Europe et la Revolution Française," by Albert Sorel	421
Lever's (Charles) "Harry Lorrequer"...	148
"Leviathan," by Thomas Hobbes	249
"Liber Studiorum," by J. M. W. Turner	567
Lindsay's (Lady) "From a Venetian Balcony"...	72
Litzmann's (Berthold) "Goethe's Lyrik"...	13
"Lives and Legends of the English Bishops and Kings," &c., by Mrs. Arthur Bell	96
Lockhart's (J. H. Stewart) "A Manual of Chinese Quotations"...	399
— "Life of Sir Walter Scott"...	658
Locock's (C. D.) "An Examination of the Shelley Manuscripts in the Bodleian Library"...	68
Loliée's (Frédéric) "Histoire des Littératures Comparées"...	565
Lomax's (Montagu) "Froudes Caduce"...	99
"London, The Story of," by Henry B. Wheatley	655
Longfellow's (H. W.) "The Building of the Ship"...	195
"Lope de Vega, The Life of (1562-1635)," by Hugo A. Rennert	609
"Lost Paradise, and Other Poems, The," by John Tattersall	147
"Lovell, Richard, Poems of"...	427
Loveman's (Robert) "Gates of Silence"...	72
Lowe's (David) "Burns' Passionate Pilgrimage," &c.	96
Lucas's (St. John) "Poems"...	425
— (E. V.) "Highways and Byways in Sussex"...	190
"Lyric Bough, The," by Clinton Scollard	425
Lytton's (Lord) "The Caxtons"...	148
Macbean's (L.) "The Story of Pet Marjorie"...	100
Maconald's (Greville) "The Tree in the Midst"...	524
Macfie's (R. C.) "New Poems"...	248
"Macht," by T. Wiegand	19
MacKinnlay's (J. Murray) "Influence of the Pre-Reformation Church on Scottish Place-Names"...	426
Maclean's (Magnus) "The Literature of the Highlands"...	217

REVIEWS—continued

	PAGE
Maeterlinck's (Maurice) "The Double Garden"...	634
— "Monna Vanna"...	218
"Maid of Shulam, The," by Hugh Falconer...	427
"Main Currents in Nineteenth Century Literature," by George Braudes	540
Maish's (Prof.) "Greek Antiquities"...	52
"Mangan, James Clarence, The Prose Writings of"...	568
Mangan's (James Clarence) "Select Poems"...	494
Mantzius's (Dr. Carl) "A History of Theatrical Art"...	252
"Marjorie, Pet, The Story of," by L. Macbean	100
"Marlowe, Christopher, and His Associates," by John H. Ingram	652
"Marriage Service, The"...	427
"Marsh-Country Rambles," by Herbert W. Tompkins	263
"Marvell, Andrew, The Poems and Some Satires of"...	219
"Masque of May Morning, A," by W. Graham Robertson	523
Masse's (H. J. L. J.) "Pewter Plate"...	243
Mathematics (School Books)	53
Mathew's (A. H.) "A True Historical Relation of the Conversion of Sir Tobie Matthew"...	217
Maclair's (Camille) "Idées Vivantes"...	121
Maurer's (Theodore) "Princesse Avril"...	219
Maurice's (Major-Gen. Sir J. F.) Edition of "The Diary of Sir John Moore"...	294
"May, Phil, in Australia"...	686
McCall's (P. J.) "Pulse of the Bards, Songs and Ballads"...	491
McCarthy's (M. J. F.) "Rome in Ireland"...	586
McDonald's (Rev. Walter) "The Principles of Moral Science"...	98
Mead's (W. E.) Edition of "The Squyr of Lowe Degre"...	611
"Mélanges de Littérature et d'Histoire," par A. Gasier	73
"Men and Manners of the Third Republic," by Albert D. Vandam	490
Menpes' (Mortimer) "Venice"...	614
— "Whistler as I knew Him"...	633
Mermaid Series: "Thomas Dekker"...	352
— "Beaumont and Fletcher"...	455
— "The Plays of George Chapman"...	637
Merr's (John Theodore) "A History of European Thought in the Nineteenth Century"...	58
Methuen's "Little Books on Art"...	228, 282, 385, 411, 552
"Mezzotinters, British," by Gordon Goodwin	518
"Michelangelo" (Bell's Miniature Series of Painters)	178
"Micro Cosmographie," &c., by John Earle	349
"Midshipman Easy"...	686
"Mississippi, The Opening of the," by F. A. Ogg	403
"Modern Poems," by R. C. Ensor	72
Moller's (Heinz) "Grosstadtlyrik"...	170
"Monastic Life, English," by Abbot Gasquet	632
"Monna Vanna," by M. Maeterlinck	218
"Montmartre, The Illustrators of," by F. L. Emanuel	588
Moody's (W. Vaughan) "The Fire-Bringer"...	491
"Moore, Sir John, The Diary of," edited by Major-Gen. Sir J. F. Maurice	294
Moore's (T. Sturge) "The Gazelles, and Other Poems"...	350
— (William) "New Poems"...	399
— (Edward) "Studies in Dante"...	423
"Moorish Empire in Europe, History of the," by S. P. Scott	487
"Moot Points," by Walter Crane and Lewis F. Day	21
"Moral Science, The Principles of," by the Rev. Walter McDonald	98
"Morals, Practical, A Treatise on Universal Education," by John K. Ingram	219
Morillot's (Paul) "La Bruyère"...	397
"Morocco, Things Seen in," by A. J. Dawson	541
"Morris, Sir Lewis, Poems by"...	545
Morris's (Henry) "The Life of Charles Grant"...	192
— (Rev. W. Meredith) "British Violin-Makers, Classical and Modern"...	165
— (William) "The Defence of Guenevere and Other Poems"...	568
Mosso's (A.) "Fatigue"...	73
Motley's "Rise of the Dutch Republic"...	658
Mudie-Smith's (Richard) "The Religious Life of London"...	145
Müller's (Dr. Iwan von) "Handbuch der Klassischen Altertumswissenschaft"...	195
Munster's (The Countess of) "My Memories"...	454
"Mural Painting," by F. Hamilton Jackson	352
Murray's (Gilbert) Translation of "The Hippolytus of Euripides"...	611
"Mutter Landstrasse," by Wilhelm Schmidt-Bonn	225
"Napoleon: A Short Biography," by R. M. Johnstone	589
"Naturalist in the Guianas, A," by Eugene André	376
Neuendorff's (B.) "Entstehungsgeschichte von Goldsmith's 'Vicar of Wakefield'"...	248
"New Forest, The," by H. G. Hutchinson...	584

REVIEWS—continued

	PAGE
"New Forest, The," by Mrs. Willingham	448
Rawnsley	448
"New Land: Four Years in the Arctic Regions," by Otto Sverdrup	422
"Newman," by Dr. William Barry	424
Newman's "Apologia Pro Vita Sua"	379
Newmarch's (Mrs. Rosa) "Henry I. Wood"	254
"New York, Literary, Its Landmarks," &c., by C. Hemstreet	300
Nicholson's (J. Shield) "Elements of Political Economy"	8
"Niebelungs, The," from the German of Friedrich Hebbel	100
Nield's (Jonathan) "A Guide to the Best Historical Novels and Tales"	352
"Nietzsche, En Lisant," by Emile Faguet	637
"Noctes Ambrosianae," Reprint of Northcote's (Lady Rosalind) "The Book of Herbs"	72
"Northumberland Manuscript, The. Examination of," by T. Le Marchant Douse	272
"Notes from a Diary," by Lt. Hon. Sir M. E. Grant Duff	489
"Novalis: Essai sur l'idéalisme Romantique en Allemagne," by E. Spéulé	213
"Oddities, Others, and I," by Henriette Corkran	614
"Odyssey of Homer, in English Verse, The," by A. S. Way	350
Ogg's (F. A.) "The Opening of the Mississippi"	403
"Omar Khayyam," by FitzGerald	274
Ordish's (T. Fairman) "Shakespeare's London"	454
"Ossians Lebensanschauung," by Dr. H. Jellinghaus	73
"Other Memories: Old and New," by John Kerr	588
"Oxford," painted by John Fulleylove, R.I.	10
Pai's (N. Wishwanath) "The Angel of Misfortune: A Fairy Tale"	544
"Painting, Six Lectures on," by George Clausen	552
"Paisley Shawl and the Men who Produced It, The," by Matthew Blair	167
"Pascal, Blaise, The Thoughts of"	455
Paterson's (A. B.) "Rio Grande's Last Race, and Other Verses"	147
Pattee's (Fred Lewis) Edition of "The Poems of Philip Freneau"	11
Paul's (Herbert) "A History of Modern England," Vols. I. and II.	143
— Edition of "Letters of Lord Acton to Mary, Daughter of the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone"	347
— (Sir James Balfour) "The Scots Peerage"	520
Paupé's (Adolphe) "Histoire des Œuvres de Stendhal"	195
Peel's (Mrs. C. S.) "The Single-handed Cook"	658
Pella's (S. F.) "Hades: The Grave in Hades," &c.	274
"Pepys, A Later," edited by Alice C. C. Gausen	680
"Pewter Plate," by H. J. L. J. Massé	243
Philips, Katherine, "Selected Poems"	425
"Philomelodies and Shards of Song"	425
"Pickering, Anna Maria Wilhelmina, Memoirs of"	68
Picton's (J. Allanson) "The Religion of the Universe"	563
"Pictures, Adventures Among," by C. Lewis Hind	423
Pilcher's (Col. T. D.) "Some Lessons of the Boer War"	73
"Pilgrim's Progress, The," by John Bunyan	8, 195, 493
"Pitti Palace, Florence, The Art of the," by Julia de Wolf Addison	245
"Plato, The Four Socratic Dialogues of," Translated by Prof. Jowett	52
"Plantus, the Trinummus," edited by H. C. Nutting	53
"Poe's, Edgar Allan, Tales"	249
"Poems," by St. John Lucas	425
— Rachel Annand Taylor	399
— W. E. Walkerline	452
— New, by William Moore	399
— and Idylls, by John Cullen	99
— of Power, by Ella Wheeler Wilcox	147
"Poet's Child, The," by Christie Finlayson	452
— Corner: A Book of Verse for Children	589
"Political Economy, Elements of," by J. Shield Nicholson	8
"Politics, Comparative, Outlines of," by B. E. Hammond	301
Postgate's (J. P.) "Selections from Tibullus"	52
"Pour Ma Finlande," by Juliani Aho	14
"Prade and its Masterpieces, The," by C. S. Ricketts	562
"Prayer, Thoughts on," by the Bishop of Ripon	589
"Prelude, The," by Wordsworth	274
"Pride and Prejudice," by Jane Austen	274
"Priest, The Young," by Herbert Cardinal Vaughan	521
Primrose's (Deborah) "A Modern Boetia"	685
"Princesse Avril," by Théodore Maurer	219

REVIEWS—continued

	PAGE
"Pro Patria," by Prof. A. E. Sonnenschein	52
"Propos Littéraires," by Emile Faguet	402
"Psalm, The Titles of the," by J. W. Thirlie	295
"Pseudo-Criticism," by Sir Robert Anderson	432
"Public Schools Year-Book, The"	195
"Pulse of the Bards, Songs and Ballads," by P. J. McCall	491
"Punjab in Peace and War, The," by S. S. Thorburn	522
Pyle's (Howard) "The Story of King Arthur and his Knights"	169
"Queen of Tears, A," by W. H. Wilkins	170
Quill's "Vieux Echos d'une Eternelle Chanson (L'Astrée)"	95
"Rafferty, Songs Ascribed to," by Douglas Hyde	120
"Ragusa, The Republic of," by Luigi Villari	656
Ramsay's (Prof. G. G.) "The Annals of Tacitus"	399
Ranchhodass's (Ratanlal) "English and Indian Law of Torts"	122
"Rapid Review, The"	189
Rawnsley's (Canon) Translation of "Sacrum Commercium"	524
— (Mrs. Willingham) "The New Forest"	448
"Reformationsgeschichte, Archiv für," by Walter Friedensburg	124
Reich's (Emil) "Foundations of Modern Europe"	374
— "Success Among Nations"	584
"Religion of the Universe, The," by J. Allanson Picton	563
"Religious Life of London, The," by Richard Mudie-Smith	145
"Reminiscences of the Civil War," by Gen. J. B. Gordon	296
Rennert's (Hugo Albert) "The Life of Lope de Vega (1562-1635)"	609
"Reresby, Sir John, Memoirs and Travels of"	352
Ricketts's (C. S.) "The Prado and its Masterpieces"	562
"Riddle, The Old, and the Newest Answer," by John Gerrard	424
"Rio Grande's Last Race," &c., by A. B. Paterson	147
"Rise of English Culture, The," by Edwin Johnson	246
Rittner's (George H.) "Impressions of Japan"	194
"Riviera Nature Notes"	13
"Roads to Christ," by Rev. C. S. Isaacson	524
Robertson's (W. Graham) "A Masque of May Morning"	523
Robinson's (Wilfrid C.) "Antwerp: An Historical Sketch"	489
"Rodin, Auguste," by Rudolf Dircks	588
Rogers's (B. B.) Edition of "The Thesomorphiazusae of Aristophanes"	52
"Roman Social en Angleterre, Le 1830-1850," by Louis Cazamian	213
"Rome," by C. G. Ellaby	352
— in Ireland, by M. J. F. McCarthy	586
Rosedale's (Rev. H. G.) "St. Francis of Assisi according to Brother Thomas of Celano"	564
"Rosemary and Pansies," by Bertram Dobell	399
"Rossotti," by Arthur C. Benson	397
— Dante Gabriel, and his Circle, Recollections of, by the late Henry Treffry Dunn	69
"Royal Academy Pictures"	607
"Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, The"	589
"Rubens," by H. Knackfuss	403
"Ruskin in Oxford, and Other Studies," by G. W. Kitchin	189
Ruskin's "Lectures on Art"	404
— "Sesame and Lilies" and "The Crown of Wild Olive"	248
— "The Ethics of the Dust"	545
Russell's (G. W. E.) "Matthew Arnold"	296
"Russian Advance, The," by Albert J. Beveridge	120
— Self-Taught, by C. A. Thimm and J. Marshall	148
"Russo-Chinese Empire, A," by Alexandre Ular	685
Ryan's (Rev. O. J.) "The Gospels of the Sundays and Festivals"	612
"Sacrum Commercium," translated by Canon Rawnsley	524
"St. Francis of Assisi according to Brother Thomas of Celano," by Rev. H. D. Rosedale	564
"St. John: A Poem," by R. F. Horton	452
"St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin," by J. H. Bernard	124
"St. Paul's Conceptions of the Last Things," by Rev. H. A. A. Kennedy	568
"San Francesco and Other Poems," by F. W. Groves Campbell	146
"Sand, George, et Alfred de Musset, Correspondance de," by Felix Decori	685
"Savonarola, A City's Tragedy," by Newman Howard	147
Schlemann's (Theodor) "Geschichte Russlands unter Kaiser Nikolaus I."	398
"Schiller und die neue Generation, ein Vortrag," by Ludwig Fulda	216
Schlosser's (Frank) "The Cult of the Chafing Dish"	658

REVIEWS—continued

	PAGE
Schmid's (Dr. D.) "George Farquhar, Sein Leben und Seine Original-Dramen"	402
Schmidt's (D. Wilh.) "Der Kampf der Weltanschauungen im 19. Jahrhundert"	147
Schmidt-Bonn's (Wilhelm) "Mutter Landstrasse"	225
Schofield's (A. T.) "Unconscious Therapeutics," &c.	615
— (E. Percy) "Sidelights: Poems, Chiefly Local"	452
School Books	52
"Schoolmasters' Year-Book and Directory, The"	58
Science (School Books)	54
"Science of Life, The," by Mrs. Craigie	682
Scollard's (Clinton) "The Lyrio Bough"	425
"Scots Peerage, The," edited by Sir James Balfour Paul	520
"Scott, Sir Walter, The Life of," by Lockhart	658
Scott's (Lady John) "Songs and Verses"	491
— (S. H.) "A Westmorland Village"	653
— (S. P.) "History of the Moorish Empire in Europe"	487
— (Sir Walter) "The Lady of the Lake"	637
— "Marmion"	637
"Scottish Reminiscences," by Sir Archibald Geikie	398
"Seasons with the Poets, The: An Anthology," by Ida Woodward	14
"Seven Golden Odes of Pagan Arabia, The," translated by Lady Anne Blunt	72
"Shakespeare and the Rival Poet," by Arthur Acheson	13
— Studies in, by J. Churton Collins	188
— The "Hamstead"	349
— "The Little Quarto," "All's Well that Ends Well," and "The Winter's Tale"	455
— "The Little Quarto," "King Henry IV."	545
— "The Little Quarto," "King Richard II., and "Twelfth Night"	352
— The Praise of, compiled by C. G. Hughes	635
"Shakespeare-Rätsel," by Eduard Engel	67
"Shakespeare's Books," by H. R. D. Anders	188
— Europe, edited by C. Hughes	7
— London, by T. Fairman	454
— Ordish	427
— Othello	427
— Plays, The First Folio of, A Handbook and Index to the Speaking Characters in, by A. Russell Smith	652
— Sonnets	404
Shand's (Alexander Innes) "Old Time Travel"	67
"Shelley at Oxford," by Thos. J. Hogg	378
— Manuscripts in the Bodleian Library, An Examination of the, by C. D. Locock	68
Shelley's (Percy Bysshe) "Adonais"	245
"Shetland, The Celtic and Scandinavian Antiquities of," by Gilbert Goudie	388
Shorter's (Dora Sigerson) "As the Sparks Fly Upward: Poems and Ballads"	69
"Shropshire Life, Old," by Lady Catherine Gaskell	244
Sichel's (Walter) "Israel: A Study in Personality and Ideas"	375
"Sidelights: Poems, Chiefly Local," by E. Percy Schofield	452
Sidney's (Philip) "The Truth about Jesus of Nazareth"	171
"Siena," by Edmund G. Gardner	219
Sievers's (Dr. Richard) "Thomas Deloney"	248
"Sin of Prince Eladane, The," by Oswald Crawford	144
"Slave in History, The," by William Stevens	567
Smith's (A. Russell) "A Handbook and Index to Speaking Characters in the First Folio of Shakespeare's Plays"	652
— (G. Gregory) "Elizabethan Critical Essays"	518
Snell's (F. J.) "Early Associations of Archbishop Temple"	488
"Songs and Verses," by Lady John Scott	491
— New: A Lyric Selection, by A. E.	399
— of the Sea-Children, by Bliss Carman	611
— of Love and Labour, by Sir William Allan	99
— of the Vine, selected and edited by W. G. Hutchison	70
Sonnenschein's (Prof. E. A.) "Pro Patria"	52
"Sonnets from the Portuguese"	427
Sorell's (Albert) "L'Europe et la Révolution Française"	421
"Spain, Impressions of," by A. F. Calvert	169
"Spectator in London, The"	455
Spencer's (Herbert) "An Autobiography"	447
Spéulé's (E.) "Novalis: Essai sur l'idéalisme Romantique en Allemagne"	213
"Spenser's Faery Queen"	195
Spier's (Kaufmann C.) "Guido and Veronica and Other Poems"	99
"Sponge's, Mr., Sporting Tour"	195
"Squy of Lowe Degre, The," edited by W. E. Mead	611
"Start in Life Series, The"	59

REVIEWS—continued

	PAGE
"Stendhal, Histoire des Œuvres de," by Adolphe Paupe	195
Step's (Edward) "Wayside and Woodland Trees"	636
Stephen's (Leslie) "English Literature and Society in the Eighteenth Century"	216
Stevens's (William) "The Slave in History"	567
"Story of King Arthur and his Knights, The," by Howard Pyle	169
"Stratford-on-Avon," by Sidney Lee	494
"Stray Studies," by John Richard Green	58
Stroud's (F.) "The Judicial Dictionary"	194
Stryienski's (Casimir) and Brentano's (F. F.) "L'Emigré par Senao de Méilhan"	97
Stubbs's (Dr. C. W.) "Castles in the Air"	72
Stubbs's (William) "Lectures on European History"	540
"Success Among Nations," by Dr. Emil Reich	584
"Suffolk," by W. A. Dutt	219
"Surrey, Old West," by Gertrude Jekyll	517
"Sussex, Highways and Byways in," by E. V. Lucas	190
Sverdrup's (Otto) "New Land: Four Years in the Arctic Regions"	422
"Sweet Hours," by Carmen Sylva	544
Swinburne, Algernon Charles, The Poems of	680
Sylva's (Carmen) "Sweet Hours"	544
Tacitus, The Annals of, by Prof. G. G. Ramsay	399
"Taine, H., Sa Vie et sa Correspondance," Tome II	490
Life and Letters of, translated by Mrs. L. Devonshire	634
"Talpa; or, The Chronicles of a Clay Farm," by C. W. Hoskyns	170
Tatler's (John) "The Lost Paradise and Other Poems"	147
Taylor, Jeremy, by Edmund Gosse	119
Taylor's (Rachel Annand) "Poems"	399
"Temple, Archbishop, Early Associations of," by F. J. Snell	488
Tennyson, Alfred, by A. C. Benson	191
An Introduction to the Poems of, by Henry Van Dyke	243
The Best of British Poetry	352
Tennyson's (Lord) "The Cup"	124
Poems	274
"Testament, Greek"	586
Old Prophecy, by A. B. Davidson	97
The New, An Introduction to, by Adolf Jülicher	298
Theatrical Art, A History of, by Dr. Carl Mantzius	252
Theology (School Books)	56
"Theology in the Greek Philosophers, The Evolution of," by E. Caird	166
Therapeutics, Unconscious, by A. T. Schofield	615
"Thesophorizusae of Aristophanes, The," edited by B. B. Rogers	52
Thimm's (C. A.) and Marshall's (J.) "Russian Self-Taught"	148
"La Langue Anglaise sans Maitre"	195
Thirlie's (J. W.) "The Titles of the Psalms"	295
Thompson's (Rev. H. L.) "The Church of St. Mary the Virgin, Oxford"	191
Thornburn's (S. S.) "The Punjab in Peace and War"	522
Thring's (E.) Translation of "The Agamemnon of Æschylus"	611
Tibullus, Selections from, edited by J. P. Postgate	52
Tiersot's (Julien) "Hector Berlioz et la Société de son Temps"	70
Tilston's (Mrs. M. W.) "Great Souls at Prayer"	568
Todd's (Rev. J. C.) "Politics and Religion in Ancient Israel"	171
"Tolstoy, Leo," by T. Sharper Knowlson	300
Tompkins's (Herbert W.) "Marsh-Country Rambles"	269
"Stratford-on-Avon"	672
"Topography, English," edited by G. Laurence Gomme	655
"Torts, English and Indian Law of," by Ratanlal Ranchhodas	122
"Tower of London, The," by Harrison Ainsworth	274
Toynbee's (Mrs. Paget) "The Letters of Horace Walpole," &c.	11
"Travel, Old Time," by Alexander Innes Shand	67
"Tree in the Midst, The," by Greville MacDonald	524
"Trout Fishing," by W. Earl Hodgson	297
"Turkish Life in Town and Country," by Lucy M. J. Garnett	147
Turner, J. M. W., The Water-Colour Drawings of in the National Gallery, by Theodora Cook	9
"Turner" (Methuen's "Little Books on Art")	385
Turner's (William) "William Adams: An Old English Potter"	543
(J. M. W.) "Liber Studiorum"	567
"Twelve Drawings by Will Mein, Illustrating a Fragment," by D. L. A. Jephson	308
"Typee," by Herman Melville	404

REVIEWS—continued

	PAGE
Ular's (Alexandre) "A Russo-Chinese Empire"	685
"Un Philanthrope d'Autrefois," by F. Dreyfus	402
"Une Ville d'Eaux Anglaise au XVIII ^e Siècle," by A. Barbeau	248
"Unseen Kings," by Eva Gore-Booth	245
Vacaresco's (Hélène) "Kings and Queens I have Known"	492
Vanbrugh's, Sir John, The Best Plays of	545
Vandam's (Albert) "Men and Manners of the Third Republic"	490
Vaughan, Henry, The Poems of	455
Vaughan's (Herbert Cardinal) "The Young Priest"	521
"Venice," by Mortimer Menpes	614
Verhaeren's (Emile) "Les Tendresses Premières"	491
"Versatile Professor, A," edited by G. Cecil White	72
"Verses," by Ruth Young	245
by Frank Watts	611
"Vie et les Livres, La," by Gaston Deschamps	13
"Vieux Echos d'une Eternelle Chanson," by Quill	95
Villari's (Luigi) "The Republic of Ragusa"	656
Villiers du Terrage's (Baron Marc de) "Les Dernières Armées de la Louisiane Française"	190
"Violin-Makers, British, Classical, and Modern," by Rev. W. M. Morris	165
"Virgil's Æneid," Book I, edited by H. Kynaston	52
"Vision of the Future, A," by Jane Hume Clapperton	615
Vivien's (Renée) "La Vénus des Avenches"	147
Waddington's (R.) "La Guerre de Sept Ans, Histoire Diplomatique et Militaire"	493
"Waiting upon God"	123
Wallisewski's (K.) "Ivan le Terrible"	215
Walkerderine's (W. E.) "Poems"	452
"Walpole, Horace, The Letters of," arranged and edited by Mrs. Paget Toynbee	11
Sir Horace, Letters of, by C. B. Lucas	493
Walpole's (Sir Spencer) "The History of Twenty-five Years"	294
"Wandering Jew, The, A Poem," by Chas. Inniss Bowen	147
Waters's (Col. W. H. H.) Translation of "The War in South Africa"	348
Watson's (William) "Wordsworth's Grave"	350
Watts's (Frank) Verses	611
"Wanchope, Major-General, The Life of," by Sir George Douglas	611
"Wayside and Woodland Trees," by Edward Step	636
"Wellington, The Duke of, Personal Reminiscences of," by Francis, first Earl of Ellesmere	68
The First Duke of, Personal Reminiscences of, by the late George Robert Gleig	563
Wernle's (Paul) "The Beginnings of Christianity"	683
"Wesley, John, on Preaching"	658
"Westmorland Village, A," by S. H. Scott	653
"Wharfedale, Two Thousand Miles in," by Edmund Bogg	273
Wheatley's (Henry B.) "The Story of London as I Knew Him," by Mortimer Menpes	633
White's (G. Cecil) "A Versatile Professor"	72
Whitman's (Walt) "Leaves of Grass"	686
"Whole's Who in America"	29
Wickham's (E. C.) "Horace for English Readers"	11
Wiegand's (T.) "Macht"	19
Wilcox's (Ella Wheeler) "Poems of Power"	147
Wilkins's (W. H.) "A Queen of Tears"	170
Williams's (Egerton R.) "Hill Towns of Italy"	143
Wilson's (K. P.) "A First Latin Reader"	52
"Wolfe, Charles, The Poems of"	72
"Wood, Henry J.," by Mrs. Rosa Newmarch	254
Wood's (Maj. William) "The Fight for Canada"	487
Woodberry's (George E.) "America in Literature"	13
Woodward's (Ida) "The Seasons with the Poets: An Anthology"	14
(W. Harrison) "Desiderius Erasmus concerning the Aim and Method of Education"	523
"Wordsworth's Grave," by William Watson	350
Poems, edited by W. Knight	637
Prelude	274
Wright's (Thomas) "The Correspondence of William Cowper"	40
The Life of Edward Fitzgerald	118
Wyon's (Reginald) "The Balkans from Within"	376
Yent's Plays	383
"Yorkshire," by Gordon Home	519
Young's (Ruth) "Verses"	245
Zuyten de Nyevelt's (Hélène de) "Effeuillements"	219

FICTION

	PAGE
"Adam Bede," by George Eliot	589
Adams's (Arthur H.) "Tussock Land"	425
"Admirable Tinker, Child of the World, The," by Edgar Jepson	492
"Adria, A Tale of Venice," by A. Nelson Hood	453
"After Dark," by Wilkie Collins	524
"American Prisoner, The," by Eden Phillpotts	247
"Angelo Bastiani," by Lionel Cust	671
"Angels and Devils and Man," by Winifred Graham	218
"Antipodians, The," by Mayne Lindsay	672
Appleton's (G. W.) "The Lady in Sables"	672
"Apprentice, The," by Maud Stepney Rawson	683
Askew's (Alice and Claude) "The Shulamite"	400
Astins's (George S.) "Reaping the Whirlwind"	99
Atherton's (Gertrude) "Rulers of Kings"	453
Barr's (Amelia E.) "Thyra Varriek"	193
Barrington's (Michael) "The King's Fool"	453
"Bats at Twilight," by Helen M. Boulton	522
Becke's (Louis) "Chinkie's Flat"	247
"Belchamber," by H. O. Sturges	492
Bennett's (Arnold) "A Great Man"	656
"Bindweed, The," by Nellie K. Blissett	566
"Blake, William, The Prophetic Books of: Jerusalem," edited by E. R. D. MacLagen and A. G. B. Russell	42
Blissett's (Nellie K.) "The Bindweed"	566
Bodkin's (M. McD.) "Patsey the Omadaun"	300
Bohn's (Eric) "How Hartman Won"	71
Bonner's (Geraldine) "To-morrow's Tangle"	247
"Boss, The," by Alfred Henry Lewis	146
Boulton's (Helen M.) "Bats at Twilight"	522
Boyd's (Mrs.) "The Man in the Wood"	168
"Brazen Calf, The," by James L. Ford	613
"Brothers," by H. Annesley Vachell	168
Bryant's (Emily M.) "Over Stony Ways"	272
Bullock's (F. Shan) "The Red Leaguers"	229
Burgin's (G. B.) "The Land of Silence"	545
"Shutters of Silence"	193
Burnham's (Clara Louise) "Jewel"	524
Burrow's (George) "Lavengro"	566
(Charles Kennett) "The Yeoman Archer"	522
"Bush Honey-moon, A," by Laura M. Palmer	491
Calderon's (George) "Dwala"	71
Cameron's (Mrs. Lovett) "Remembrance"	123
"Canadian Girl, A," by Lt.-Col. Andrew Haggard	146
"Captain's Daughter, The," by Gwendolen Overton	656
"Capt'n Eri," by Joseph C. Lincoln	194
"Cardinal's Pawn, The," by K. L. Montgomery	545
Carleton's (W.) "Willy Reilly"	521
Castle's (Agnes and Egerton) "Incomparable Bellairs"	377
"Castles in Kensington," by Reginald Turner	377
"Celebrity at Home, The," by Violet Hunt	351
Chesterton's (G. K.) "The Napoleon of Notting Hill"	70
"Children of the Tenements," by Jacob A. Rilla	247
"Chinkie's Flat," by Louis Becke	146
"Circle in the Square, The," by Baldwin Sears	636
Clare's (Austin) "Court Cards"	99
Clayton's (Joseph) "John Blanksett's Business"	684
Cleeve's (Lucas) "The Foolkiller"	672
Clouston's (J. Storer) "Garmiscath"	140
Cobban's (J. McLaren) "The Iron Hand"	524
Collins's (Wilkie) "After Dark"	425
Colmore's (G.) "A Ladder of Tears"	193
"Comedy of Conscience, A," by S. Weir Mitchell	672
Cooper's (R. H.) "Lord and Lady Aston"	636
"Court Cards," by Austin Clare	522
"Court of Scharissas, The," by H. Sheringham and N. Meakin	522
"Crainquebille, Putois, Riquet et Plusieurs Autres Récits Profitables," by Anatole France	636
Crawford's (Oswald) "The Ways of the Millionaire"	169
Crockett's (S. R.) "Strong Mac"	300
Cust's (Lionel) "Angelo Bastiani"	671
Dahl's (Hermann) "Der Gottliche"	426
"Das Schlafende Heer," by Clara Viebig	545
Dearmer's (Mabel) "The Orangery"	273
"Deliverance, The," by Ellen Glasgow	71
"Denise de Montmidy," by Georg Freiherr von Ompteda	71
"Der Gottliche," by Hermann Dahl	377
"Despoiler, The," by Edmund Mitchell	522
"Die Letzte Strophe," by Irma Goeringer	71
"Die Sehnsüchtige," by Gertrud Franke-Schivelbein	194
"Die Vom Niederrhein," by Rudolf Herzog	544
"Dorothea," by Maarten Maartens	656
Dougall's (L.) "The Earthly Purgatory"	672
Druzy's (Major W. P.) "The Peradventures of Private Pagett"	39
"Dule Tree of Cassilis, The," by William Robertson	545
Duncan's (Norman) "The Way of the Sea"	454
(Sara Jeannette) "The Imperialist"	491
"Dwala," by George Calderon	656
"Earthly Purgatory, The," by L. Dougall	193
"Elizabeth in Rügen, The Adventures of"	566
"England's Elizabeth," by Judge Parry	566

FICTION—continued

Enking's (Ottomar) "Familie P. C. Behm"	123
Ealer's (E. Rentoul) "The Trackless Way"	71
"Facing the Future, or the Parting of the Ways," by Robert Thynne	273
"Faith of Men, The," by Jack London	587
"Familie P. C. Behm," by Ottomar Enking	123
Fisher's (Caroline) "One London Season"	426
"Foolkiller, The," by Lucas Cleeve	684
"For Faith and Navarre," by May Wynne	656
Forbes's (Lady Helen) "His Eminence"	194
Ford's (James L.) "The Brazen Calf"	168
Forman's (Justus Miles) "Monsigny"	123
"Fort Amity," by A. T. Quiller-Couch	635
France's (Anatole) "Crainquebille, Putois, Riquet et Plusieurs Autres Recits Profrables"	636
"Frank Fairleigh," by Gertrud	637
Frank-Schievelbein's (Gertrud) "Die Sehnsichtigen"	71
"French Wife, The," by Katharine Tynan	299
Frith's (Walter) "The Tutor's Love Story"	400
"Gage of Red and White, The," by Graham Hope	377
Gallon's (Tom) "Jarwick, the Prodigal"	218
"Garmiscath," by J. Storer Clouston	672
Gifford's (Evelyn) "Provenzano the Proud"	588
"Gift, The," by S. Macnaughtan	521
Glasgow's (Ellen) "The Deliverance"	273
"God in the Garden, The," by Kettle Howard	671
Goeringer's (Irma) "Die Letzte Strophe"	522
Gordon's (Samuel) "Unto Each Man His Own"	400
Graham's (Winifred) "Angels and Devils and Man"	218
"Great Man, A," by Arnold Bennett	656
"Great Proconsul, The," by Sydney C. Grier	684
Grier's (Sydney C.) "The Great Proconsul"	684
Haggard's (Lt.-Col. Andrew) "A Canadian Girl"	123
(R. Rider) "Stella Fregelius"	218
Hales's (A. G.) "The Watcher on the Tower"	401
Harland's (Henry) "My Friend Prospero"	146
Harriman's (K. Edwin) "The Homebuilders"	656
Harry's (Myriam) "La Conquête de Jérusalem"	299
"Hawthorne's, Nathaniel, Tales,"	545
Romances,"	124, 219, 589
Herszog's (Rudolf) "Die Vom Niederrhein"	194
Hewlett's (Maurice) "The Queen's Quair"	684
"His Eminence," by Lady Helen Forbes	194
"His Little World," by Samuel Merwin	168
Hobbes's (John Oliver) "The Vineyard"	350
"Homebuilders, The," by Karl Edwin Harriman	656
Hood's (A. Nelson) "Adria, A Tale of Venice"	453
Hope's (Graham) "The Gage of Red and White"	377
"How Hartman Won," by Eric Bohn	71
Howard's (Kettle) "The God in the Garden"	671
Hunt's (Violet) "The Celebrity at Home"	377
"I,"	613
"Incomparable Bellairs," by Agnes and Egerton Castle	521
"Index to the Periodicals, The"	64
"Interloper, The," by Violet Jacob	351
"Iron Hand, The," by J. MacLaren Cobban	146
"Isabel Brodriek," by Alice Jones	672
Jacob's (Violet) "The Interloper"	351
"Jarwick the Prodigal," by Tom Gallon	218
Jepson's (Edgar) "The Admirable Tinker, Child of the World"	492
"Jewel," by Clara Louise Burnham	193
"John Blanksett's Business," by Joseph Clayton	99
Johnston's (Mary) "Sir Mortimer"	566
Jones's (Alice) "Isabel Brodriek"	672
King's (Basil) "The Steps of Honour"	636
"Kingdom of Twilight, The," by Forrest Reid	587
"L'Apprentissage de Valérie," by J. M. Mermin	71
"La Conquête de Jérusalem," by Myriam Harry	299
"La Vie Amoureuse de François Barbazanges," by Marcelle Tinayre	426
"Ladder of Tears, A," by G. Colmore	425
"Lady in Sables, The," by G. W. Appleton	672
"Lance-in-Reest," by L. A. Talbot	453
"Land of Silence, The," by G. B. Burgin	299
"Lavengro," by George Burrow	524
"Le Chemin de la Gloire," by Georges Ohnet	247
"Le Docteur Harambur," by J. H. Rosny	684
"Le Marquis de Valcor," by Daniel Leueur	684
"Le Secrétaire de Madame la Duchesse," by Léon de Tineau	218
Leueur's (Daniel) "Le Marquis de Valcor"	684
"Letters Which Never Reached Him, The"	587
Lewis's (Alfred Henry) "The Boss"	146
Lincoln's (Joseph C.) "Capt'n Eri"	656
Lindsay's (Mayne) "The Antipodeans"	672
London's (Jack) "The Faith of Men"	587
"Lord and Lady Aston," by E. H. Cooper	672
"Love the Fiddler," by Lloyd Osbourne	71
Lucas's (St. John) "The Vintage of Dreams"	70
Maarten's (Maarten) "Dorothea"	544
MacFall's (Haldane) "The Masterfolk"	39
MacLagan's (E. R. D.) and Russell's (A. G. B.) "The Prophetic Books of William Blake: Jerusalem"	42
Macnaughtan's (S.) "The Gift"	521
"Magnetic North, The," by Elizabeth Robins	350
"Magnus Sinclair," by Howard Pease	614
Mallock's (W. H.) "The Veil of the Temple"	613
"Man in the Wood, The," by Mrs. Boyd	425

FICTION—continued

"Masqueraders, The," by "Rita"	545
"Masterfolk, The," by Haldane MacFall	39
Maud's (Constance Elizabeth) "My French Friends"	655
Melville's (Herman) "Omoo"	568
Merrin's (J. M.) "L'Apprentissage de Valérie"	71
Merriman's (Henry Seton) "Tomaso's Fortune"	521
Merwin's (Samuel) "His Little World"	168
Mitchell's (Edmund) "The Despoilers"	377
(S. Weir) "A Comedy of Conscience"	193
"Monsigny," by Justus Miles Forman	123
Montgomery's (K. L.) "The Cardinal's Pawn"	194
"Morcar," by Thomas Scott	39
Murray's (David Christie) "V. C.: A Chronicle of Castle Barfield"	247
"My French Friends," by Constance Elizabeth Maud	655
"My Friend Prospero," by Henry Harland	146
"Myra of the Pines," by Herman K. Viole	218
"Napoleon of Notting Hill, The," by G. K. Chesterton	351
North's (Theophila) "Twelve Trifles, Cheerful and Tearful"	193
"Nyria," by Mrs. Campbell Praed	635
Ogden's (G. W.) "Tennessee Todd"	194
Ohnet's (Georges) "Le Chemin de la Gloire"	247
"Olivo Latham," by E. L. Voynich	613
"Omoo," by Herman Melville	568
Ompstead's (Georg, Freiherr von) "Denise de Montmidi"	71
"One London Season," by Caroline Fisher	426
"Orangery, The," by Mabel Dearmer	545
Osbourne's (Lloyd) "Love the Fiddler"	71
"Over Stony Ways," by Emily M. Bryant	168
Overton's (Gwendolen) "The Captain's Daughter"	146
"Pa Gladden," by Elizabeth Cherry Waltz	273
Palmer-Archer's (Laura M.) "A Bush Honey-moon"	522
Parry's (Judge) "England's Elizabeth"	566
"Patsey the Omadann," by M. McD. Bodkin	300
Pease's (Howard) "Magnus Sinclair"	614
Pemberton's (Max) "Red Morn"	193
Penny's (F. E.) "The Sanyasi"	400
"Peradventures of Private Pagett, The," by Major W. P. Drury	672
Philpotts' (Eden) "The American Prisoner"	247
"Phæbe in Fetters," by Mrs. Baillie Reynolds	193
Pickering's (Percival) "Toy Gods"	99
Playne's (C. E.) "The Romance of a Lonely Woman"	672
Praed's (Mrs. Campbell) "Nyria"	635
"Promotion of the Admiral, The," by Morley Roberts	658
"Provenzano the Proud," by Evelyn Gifford	588
Pryce's (Richard) "The Successor"	453
"Queen's Quair, The," by Maurice Hewlett	684
Quiller-Couch's (A. T.) "Fort Amity"	635
Rawson's (Maud Stepmey) "The Apprentice"	683
"Reaping the Whirlwind," by George S. Austins	99
"Red-Keggers, The," by Eugene Thwing	672
"Red Leaguers, The," by Shan F. Bullock	272
"Red Morn," by Max Pemberton	193
Reid's (Forrest) "The Kingdom of Twilight"	587
"Remembrance," by Mrs. Lovett Cameron	71
Reynolds's (Mrs. Baillie) "Phæbe in Fetters"	193
Rita's (Jacob) "Children of the Tenements"	70
"Rita," "The Masqueraders"	545
Roberts's (Morley) "The Promotion of the Admiral"	658
Robertson's (William) "The Dule Tree of Cassillis"	39
Robins's (Elizabeth) "The Magnetic North"	350
Robinson's (B. Fletcher) "The Trail of the Dead"	169
"Romance of a Lonely Woman, The," by C. E. Playne	672
Rosny's (J. H.) "Le Docteur Harambur"	684
"Sanyasi, The," by F. E. Penny	400
Scott's (Thomas) "Morcar"	39
Sears's (Baldwin) "The Circle in the Square"	146
Sheringham's (Hugh) and Meakin's (Nevill) "The Court of Sacharissa"	522
"Shulamite, The," by Alice and Claude Askew	400
"Shutters of Silence," by G. B. Burgin	299
"Sly-Boots," by John Strange Winter	71
"Stella Fregelius," by R. Rider Haggard	218
"Steps of Honour, The," by Basil King	636
"Strong Mac," by S. R. Crockett	300
Sturgis's (H. O.) "Belchamber"	492
"Successor, The," by Richard Pryce	453
Sutcliffe's (Halliwell) "Through Sorrow's Gate"	99
Talbot's (L. A.) "Lance-in-Reest"	453
"Tennessee Todd," by G. W. Ogden	194
"Through Sorrow's Gate," by Halliwell Sutcliffe	99
Thwing's (Eugene) "The Red-Keggers"	672
Thynne's (Robert) "Facing the Future, or the Parting of the Ways"	273
"Thyra Varrick," by Amelia E. Barr	193
Tinayre's (Marcelle) "La Vie Amoureuse de François Barbazanges"	426
Tineau's (Léon de) "Le Secrétaire de Madame la Duchesse"	218
"Tom Brown"	568
"Tomaso's Fortune," by H. Seton Merriman	521
"To-morrow's Tangle," by Geraldine Bonner	247
"Toy Gods," by Percival Pickering	99
"Trackless Way, The," by E. Rentoul Ealer	71

FICTION—continued

"Trail of the Dead, The," by B. Fletcher Robinson	169
"Triumph of Mrs. St. George, The," by Percy White	300
Turner's (Reginald) "Castles in Kensington"	377
"Tussock Land," by Arthur H. Adams	425
"Tutor's Love Story, The," by Walter Frith	400
"Twelve Trifles, Cheerful and Tearful," by Theophila North	193
Tynan's (Katherine) "The French Wife"	299
"Unto Each Man His Own," by Samuel Gordon	400
"V. C.: A Chronicle of Castle Barfield," by David Christie Murray	247
Vachell's (H. Annesley) "Brothers"	613
"Veil of the Temple, The," by W. H. Mallock	613
Viebig's (Clara) "Das Schlafende Heer"	426
Viole's (Herman K.) "Myra of the Pines"	218
"Vineyard, The," by John Oliver Hobbes	350
"Vintage of Dreams, The," by St. John Lucas	70
Voynich's (E. L.) "Olivo Latham"	613
Waltz's (Elizabeth Cherry) "Pa Gladden"	273
"Watcher on the Tower, The," by A. G. Hales	401
"Way of the Sea, The," by Norman Duncan	545
"Ways of the Millionaire, The," by Oswald Crawford	169
Weekes's (A. R.) "Yarborough the Premier"	566
White's (Percy) "The Triumph of Mrs. St. George"	300
"Willy Reilly," by W. Carleton	545
Winter's (John Strange) "Sly-Boots"	71
Wynne's (May) "For Faith and Navarre"	656
"Yarborough the Premier," by A. R. Weekes	566
"Yeoman, The," by Charles Kennett Burrow	566

CORRESPONDENCE

Acton, Lord	501
African Books, A Catalogue of	23
"An Infinite Capacity for Taking Pains"	532, 575
"And"	388, 477
Bacon and Shakespeare	133, 181, 204
Barrie, J. M., and R. L. Stevenson	181
Bed Books	23
Biographies, Standard, The Library of	476
"Birth of Love, The"	388
Birth Rates, Declining	553
Blundell's	531
Byron's Seaweed	230
Counsel of Perfection, The	362
Classes, English	575
Classic-Romantic	181
Clough and Tennyson	133, 205
Criticism, Scientific Literary	553
Cruikshank	257, 310
Dante	81
Death, The Thought of	595
E. G. O.'s Wants	643
Electricity, Fiction and	181
Endings, Happy	47
Error Corrected ("Burlington Magazine")	133
"Errors, Vulgar"	362, 388, 531
"Evil, Radical Moral"	531
Explanation, An ("Judicial Dictionary")	259
Fiction and Electricity	181
Field, A New (Africa)	23
"Fitz"	157
Flies, Wet, and Dry Flies	388
"Ge," The Teutonic Prefix	532
Genius, The Insanity of	312
"Geometry of Position"	436
Girton College, Cambridge	664
Gissing, George	46
God, The Living Mantle of	363, 436
Gorki, Maxim, and the Stage Society	231, 259
"Grammar"	575
"Greek, The Passing of"	23, 47
Happy Endings	47
"Infinite Capacity for Taking Pains, An"	532, 575
Kant's Ethical Principle	501
Keats's Grecian Urn	23, 81, 108, 133
"Kelmescott Press" (a correction)	205
Lamb, Charles, The Date of His Birth	47, 81
"Literary Estimates"	664
Literature, English, Teaching	531
"Moral Evil"	362
"and Science"	575, 622
Mantle of God, The Living	363, 426
Master of the Temple, the Late (Canon Ainger)	282
Monna Vanna	257
Morality and Emotion	476, 553
Morley's ("Gladstone")	532
Odyssæy, The	109
"Of"	436, 501, 596, 622, 643
Poets in School	231
Portuguese, Sonnets from the	157, 181, 258
"Prado Gallery, The"	622
Psychological Mystery, A	230, 256, 285, 310
R.A., The Sadness of the	552
"Radical Moral Evil"	531
Ragged School Union and Shaftesbury Society	205
"Readers, All-Round"	204, 258, 312, 363, 387
Science—Explanatory	477
Secret Drawers	664
"Shakespeare and Bacon"	133, 181, 204
"and Jane Austen"	258, 285
"at Oxford"	552
Memorial	229, 256, 282, 310
Shakespeare's Books	622
"Measure for Measure"	257, 285

CORRESPONDENCE—continued

	PAGE
Shelley: Victor and Cazire ...	157, 181, 258
Sonnets from the Portuguese ...	596, 664
Space ...	532
Spencer's Musical Criticism ...	46
"Statesmen, The Styles of" ...	532
Stephen, The late Sir Leslie ...	362
Style ...	531
Teaching English Literature ...	282
Temple, The late Master of the ...	157, 181, 230, 256, 285
Tolstoi and the Babies ...	205, 231, 257
University Extension ...	436
"Ursprung des Harlekin" ...	362, 388, 531
"Vulgar Errors" ...	501, 575
"What Makes Her" ...	285
Yellow Races, The ...

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL

Ainger, Canon, The Bibliography of 164, 187, 212
—'s (Canon) "Letters of Charles Lamb" 679
Amory's "John Bunce," Reprint of ... 607
"Anti-Jacobin, The," Reprints of Selections from ... 268, 346
Arnold, Matthew, Books on ... 142, 292
— A Phrase of ... 419, 486
— Sir Edwin, A List of his Successive Publications ... 371
"Authors, English, A Dictionary of" ... 268
"Autobiography of Lord Herbert of Cherbury, The," Reprints of ... 631
Autographs, Collections of ... 631
"Aylwin," Editions of ... 346
Bancroft's (Mrs. George) "Letters from England, 1846-1849" ... 516
Beattie, Biographies of ... 242
Beaumont and Fletcher, Editions of the Plays of ... 346
"Benyowsky, Count de, Memoirs and Travels of" ... 117
"Biographies, Little"—Goethe, Canning, and Lord Beaconsfield ... 66
— Library of Standard ... 396
Bloomfield, Robert, Editions of the Works of ... 485
Blundell, Mrs., The Works of ... 66
"Boys' Classics" ... 446
Brighten, Stanzas on ... 163
Brightwen, Mrs. Elisa, The Works of ... 30
Brown, Mr. Vincent, The Publications of ... 164
Burbridge's Poetry ... 142
Burghley, Lord, A Biography of ... 516
Burney's (Miss F.) "Evelina," Reprint of 268
Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy," Editions of ... 268
Butler's (Samuel) "Essays on Life, Art, and Science" ... 651
Byron, Lord, Editions of the Work of ... 242
Calverley's "Verses, Translations, and Fly-leaves," Editions of ... 679
Campbell, Thomas, Editions of the Poems of 396
Canton, Mr. William, A Mal-quotation of ... 163
Christmas Anthologies ... 30
Cobbe, Miss Frances Power, The Publications of ... 419
Coleman, Mr. John, The Works of ... 419
Coleridge's "Friend," and "Aids to Reflection," Reprints of ... 268
— "Table Talk," Editions of ... 346
Collins, Mr. Mortimer, The Verse of ... 187, 212
Copyright in Titles ... 396
Cowley, Abraham, Reprint of the Essays of 66
Crashaw, Richard, Editions of the Works of 346
"D'Arblay's, Madame, Diary and Letters," Editions of ... 66
"Defence of Poesy, The," by Sir Philip Sidney, Editions of ... 631
Defoe's "Journal of the Plague Year," Editions of ... 560
"Dictionary of English Authors, A" ... 268
Drinking Songs ... 92
Duff, Sir M. Grant, His "Chestnuts" in "Notes from a Diary" ... 486
Egan's (Pierce) "Life of an Actor," Editions of ... 268
"England's Elizabeth," The Story and Play entitled ... 560
Feltham's "Resolves, Divine, Moral, Political," Editions of ... 346
Fielding's (Miss) "David Simple," Editions of ... 539
Fitzgerald, Mr. E. M., The Career of ... 187
"Fitzgerald, Edward, Miscellanies of," Editions of ... 583
Giassing, Mr. George, A List of his successive Publications ... 30
Glebe, Rev. G. R., The Works of ... 164
"Golden Treasury," Series of the ... 187
Half-Forgotten Books, Messrs. Routledge's ... 293, 485
Halkett, Mr. G. R. and Mr. William Archer, Their Attack on the Acting of Henry Irving in 1877 ... 163
Hawthorne, Nathaniel, Reprints of his Works 678
Hazlitt's "Spirit of the Age," Editions of ... 560
Healy's (Chris) "Confessions of a Journalist" ... 539
"Heart's Desire," Use of the Title ... 212
Henley, Mr., The Notes of his Edition of Byron's Works ... 293
Hood, Thomas, Memoirs of ... 651
Horne's "New Spirit of the Age," ... 560
Howells, Mr. W. D., The Works of ... 582
Hudson, Mr. W. H., The Work of ... 6
Hugo, Victor, English Translations of his Dramas ... 142
Hutchinson's "Library of Standard Biographies" ... 396

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL—continued

	PAGE
Hutton, The late Mr. Lawrence, Some Works of ... 651
"Infelicia," The Authorship of ... 30
Jokai, Maurus, English Translations of the Works of ... 539
Jonson, Ben, Editions of the Works of ... 117
Kingsley, Charles, Editions of the Works of 92
Kipling's "Departmental Ballads and other Verses," Editions of ... 6, 607
Knox, Mrs. Isa Craig, The Works of ... 6
"Lamb, Charles, Letters of," Editions of ... 679
Landor, Editions of the Works of ... 396
Latham's (Edward), "A Dictionary of Names, Nicknames, and Surnames of Persons, Places, and Things" ... 607
Literature, English, A Catalogue of ... 92
Locker's (Frederick) "London Lyrics," Reprints and New Editions of ... 6
Longfellow's Translation of "The Divine Comedy," Editions of ... 30
"Luxury of Grief," The Origin of the phrase 187
Lynch, Miss Hannah, The Works of ... 92
Mallock, Mr., The Works of ... 446
Marston, Mr. Edward, The Works of ... 651
Marzials, Theo, The Poetry of ... 30
Massey, Mr. Gerald, The Works of ... 560
Melville's "Omoo" and "Typee," Editions of 187
Milton's Poems, Editions of ... 446, 516
Morley, The late Henry, His Reproductions of English Classics ... 631
Morris's "Defence of Guinevere," Editions of 346
Myers, Ernest, The Collected Poems of ... 30, 212
Newman's "Apologia," Editions of ... 268
Nield's (Jonathan) "Guide to the Best Historical Novels and Tales" ... 293
"Noctes Ambrosianae," An Abridgment of ... 679
Orinda's Poems, Editions of ... 396
Parry's (Judge) "England's Elizabeth" ... 560
Pascal's "Pensées," Editions of ... 346
Plutarch, Editions of ... 583
"Poets and the Poetry of the Century, The" ... 560
Poets, The Small, Editions of the Works of "Polo, Marco, The Voyages and Travels of," Editions of ... 631
Prowse, Mr. R. O., Works by ... 560
Quotation, The Adaptation of well-known Verse for purposes of ... 163
Reference-Books ... 607
Roberts, Mr. O. G. D., The Works of ... 66
Rogers, Samuel, Reminiscences and Table Talk of, by Messrs. Brimley Johnson and G. H. Powell ... 5
Roscoe, William Caldwell, Re-issues of the Works of ... 142
Rossetti, Mr. A. C. Benson's Memoir of ... 419
— Miss, The "Complete Poetical Works" of ... 66, 117
Rossetti's (Dante) "Early Italian Poets" ... 346
Routledge's Half-Forgotten Books ... 293, 485
Ruskin, "Library Edition" of "The Stones of Venice" ... 267
— "Sesame and Lilies," and "The Crown of Wild Olive," Editions of 242
Smiles, Dr., Editions of the Works of ... 446
"Songs of the Vine" ... 92
"Spirit of the Age, The," Reprint of ... 446
Stage, The, and Literature ... 651
Stanley's (Dean) "Historical Memorials of Canterbury," Editions of ... 539
Stephen, Sir Leslie, A Chronological List of his Works ... 212
Stirling, Mrs. Fanny, Memoirs of ... 293
Swinburne, A. C., Bibliographies of ... 486
— Mr., The Collected Edition of his Poems ... 117, 516
Swinburne's "The Heptalogia," Enlarged Reproduction of ... 539
— Criticisms of the Work of ... 539
Taine's Works, English Versions of ... 607
Thackeray Letters, The ("Century") ... 242
Titles, Copyright in ... 396
Turner's "Liber Studiorum," Editions of 242, 560
"Two Gentlemen of Verona," Recent issues of the Play ... 371
"Vine, Songs of the" ... 92
Walpole, Horace, Selections from the Letters of ... 396
"Ward, Artemus, His Book," Editions of ... 419
Watts-Dunton's (Theodore) "Aylwin," Editions of ... 346
Whitman, Walt, Editions of the Works of ... 583
Withers, George, The Poems of, Editions of 516
Wordsworth, The Poems of, Prof. Knight's Edition of ... 516
Wraxall, Sir Nathaniel, The Memoirs of ... 242
Yeats, Mr. W. B., The Plays of ... 371

DRAMATIC NOTES

Pages 18, 41, 77, 104, 128, 152, 174, 199, 223, 252, 278, 304, 357, 383, 409, 431, 471, 498, 528, 549, 571, 592, 619, 640, 661, 690
"Andersen, Little Hans" ... 18, 42
"Arm of the Law, The" ... 223
"Bride and Bridegroom, The" ... 549
"Broken Soil" ... 384
"Candida" ... 528
"Captain Dieppe" ... 224
Chevalier, Mr. Albert, The Performances of 662
"Cynthia" ... 571
"Darling of the Gods, The" ... 18
"David Garrick" ... 661
"Decadence" ... 224
"Der Einsame Weg" ... 224
"Drummer" ... 105
"Duke of Killcrankie, The" ... 129

DRAMATIC NOTES—continued

	PAGE
"Edge of the Storm, The" ...	640
"Everyman" ...	409
"Flute of Pan, The" ...	432, 498
"Frère Jacques" ...	175
German Plays, Some: "Das Heimatsfeste" and "Macht" ...	19
"Hans Andersen, Little" ...	18, 42
"Harlequin and the Fairy's Dilemma" ...	549
"Hippolytus" ...	619
"Ib and Little Christina" ...	104
"Ina" ...	571
Irish Plays ...	384
"Jail Bird, The" ...	200
"Joseph Entangled" ...	128
"Lady Flirt" ...	620
"Last of the Dandies, The," Mr. Tree's Revival of ...	641
"Legend of the Lazy Gardener, The" ...	105
"Les Bienfaiteurs" ...	152
"Lettie" ...	104
"Love in a Cottage" ...	153
"Madame Sherry" ...	42
"Man of Honour, A" ...	223
"Man Who Was, The" ...	641
"Marriage of Convenience, A" ...	384
"Masque of the City Arms, The" (Glasgow School of Art) ...	19
"Miss Elizabeth's Prisoner" ...	472
Musical Comedy ...	690
"My Lady of Rosedale" ...	199
"Op of Me Thumb" ...	304, 499
"Orchid, The" ...	104
"Professor's Love Story, The" ...	41
"Queen's Romance, A" ...	159
"Rich Mrs. Repton, The" ...	498
"Riders to the Sea" ...	384
Robertson, Mr. T. W., The Plays of ...	661
"Romeo and Juliet" ...	224
"Rosenmontag" ...	357
"Saturday to Monday" ...	472
"Sergeant Brue" ...	691
"Shadow of the Glen, The" ...	384
Shakespeare League, The British Empire ...	278
Shakespeare's Bust in Stratford Church ...	431
"Snowdrop" ...	42
"Soul's Tragedy, A" (The Stage Society) ...	304
Stage Society, The, Performances by ...	304
"Sunday" ...	431
"Swift and Vanessa" ...	77
Theatre, A Repertoire, Scheme for ...	174, 304
"Two Gentlemen of Verona, The" ...	471
"Way of the World, The" ...	472
"Wheat King, The" ...	498

MUSICAL NOTES

Pages 19, 43, 78, 105, 130, 154, 176, 201, 225, 253, 279, 305, 358, 386, 412, 434, 475, 499, 528, 550, 572, 593, 621, 642, 662, 692
Æolian Hall, The, The Opening Concert at ...	130
"Amorelle" ...	226
Bach's "St. John" Passion Music, Performances of ...	226
Ballad Concert (Mr. P. H. Williams' setting of Goldsmith's "Mad Dog") ...	280
Broadwood Concerts ...	79, 177
Choral Singing, Provincial ...	475
"Cingalee, The" ...	280
Crystal Palace, The ...	662
"Darling of the Guards, The" ...	253
"Die Meistersinger," The Performance of, under Dr. Richter ...	621
"Don Quixote," Operas founded on ...	435
Elgar Festival, The ...	305, 358
Finckowsky's "Overture Anti-solenelle, 1903" ...	226
Foster, Miss Muriel, Concert of ...	201
"Helene" ...	692
Joachim Diamond Jubilee Celebration, The ...	550
Quartet Concerts ...	528
Keymer, Sybil, The Talent of ...	663
Kruse Festival, The ...	412, 434, 529
Landi, Mme. Camilla, Recital of ...	662
"Le Nozze," Performances of ...	621
London Symphony Orchestra, The First Concert of ...	642
"Messiah, The" (Royal Choral Society) ...	44
Opera at Drury Lane ...	642
— Covent Garden ...	642
Orchestra, The London Symphony, First Concert of ...	642
Queen's Hall Orchestra, The ...	386
Richter, The Performances of ...	692
"Sinfonia Domestica" ...	358, 435
"Spencer, Herbert, The Autobiography of," Musical References in ...	499
Symphony Concert (The Work of Mr. Percy Pitt) ...	201
— (Queen's Hall) ...	593
Szalit, Miss Paula, The Playing of ...	154
"Tannhäuser," Performances of ...	621
Ternina, The Singing of ...	572
Williams, Mr. P. H., His Setting of Goldsmith's "Mad Dog" ...	280
"Zarathustra," Criticisms of ...	176

ART NOTES

Pages—21, 44, 79, 106, 131, 155, 177, 202, 227, 255, 280, 307, 359, 385, 411, 433, 473, 500, 530, 551, 573, 595, 620, 642, 663, 691
Abbey, Mr. Edwin, Drawings of (Leicester Galleries) ...	178, 202
Academy, The Royal (Elections of Honour to) 156
— (Exhibition of Old Masters) ...	44
I. 530—II. 551—III. 573—IV. ...	594

ART NOTES—continued

	PAGE
Academy, The Royal (The Black-and-White Room)	663
Agnew's Galleries (Exhibition of Works by the Great English Masters of Water-colour)	227
Allen, Mr. T. W., Landscapes by (Modern Gallery)	227
Art Club, The New English, Exhibition of	433
The '91, Exhibition of (Alpine Club)	500
Ball, Mr. Wilfrid, Collection of Water-colours by (Fine Art Society)	227
Beardsley, Aubrey, Studies by	178
Catalogue of his Drawings	80, 256
Birkenruth, Mr., A Show of Pastels and Water-colours by (Carfax Gallery)	308
Black-and-White Room at the Royal Academy, The	663
Bookplates, An Exhibition of	691
Brooks, Mr. Jamyn, Portraits of the King and Queen by	178
Bulteel Collection of Coloured Engravings, The, Sale of (Christie's)	203
Burne-Jones, A Collection of Prints and Drawings by (Leicester Galleries)	474
Clausen, Mr., His Lectures on Painting	131
Collier, "Tom," The Work of (Leicester Galleries)	45
Colour-prints on Glass (Leicester Galleries)	45
Colthurst, Miss, Paintings by (Woodbury Galleries)	255
Dudley Gallery, The (Landscapes)	45
Earl's Court, The Italians at	642
Eckhardt, Oscar, Exhibition of the last work of (Mr. John Baillie's Gallery)	202
Eyck, Hubert and John van, The Altar-piece by, at Ghent	385
Fantini-Latour, Exhibition of the Lithographs of (Dutch Gallery)	227
Fine Art Society, The (Religious Pictures)	359
Forrest, Mr., Exhibition of Work by (Dutch Gallery)	500
Goethem, Mr. Edouard van, Paintings by (Hanover Gallery)	360
Gould, Mr. A., Carruthers, The Work of (Doré Gallery)	228
Goupil Gallery, The, Collection of Pictures by well-known Artists	282
Harrison, Clifford, Water-colours and Pen-and-ink Drawings by (Graves' Galleries)	282
Irish Painters at the Guildhall	620
Italians at Earl's Court, The	642
"Japan," The Colour Prints of (Langham Series)	178
Jerningham's, Mr. Charles Edward, Collection of Old Views of St. James's Park	173
Jourdain's Water-colours (Hanover Gallery)	360
Kensington, South, Museum, Recent Additions to	45
Landscape Painters, Show of the Work of (Dudley Gallery)	45
Leicester Galleries, The, Show of Colour-prints on Glass	45
Macdonald, Miss Biddy, Show of Paintings by (Woodbury Galleries)	255
Manson, Mr. James Bolivar, His Water-colours of "Old Paris"	282
McLean's Gallery, Show at	501
Menpes, Mr. Mortimer, Water-colours by (Leicester Galleries)	307
Miniaturists, The Society of, Annual Show of (Institute Galleries)	361
Monod, Lucien, Crayon Drawings by (Dowdeswell Galleries)	434
Moore, Henry and Albert, Works by (Woodbury Gallery)	361
New Gallery, The, Exhibition of	474
Nicholson, Mr. William, Water-colour Drawings of Oxford by (Stafford Gallery)	227
Old Masters, Exhibition of (Royal Academy)	44
Painter-Engravers and Engravers, The Royal Society of, Exhibition	228
Pastel Society's Winter Show, The	203
Pewter Plate, An Exhibition of	255
Photo-engraving and Lithography, The London County Council School of	45
Pratt, Mr. Joseph, Engravings by (Vicars Bros.' Galleries)	501
Priestman, Mr. Bertram, Landscape by (Goupil Gallery)	500
Pringle, The Misses Mary and Lydia, Work by (Modern Gallery)	361
Reed, Mr. E. T., An Exhibition of Drawings by (Leicester Galleries)	280
Robinson, Mr. Cayley, Paintings by (Mr. John Baillie's Galleries)	473
Rodin, Monsieur, and the International Society of Sculptors, Painters, and Gravers	106
Royal Academy, The (Exhibition of Old Masters)	44
I. 530, II. 551, III. 573, IV. 594
The Black-and-White Room	663
Royal Institute of Painters in Water-colours (Works by Mr. Dudley Hardy, Mr. Lee Hankey, Mr. Tom Browne, Mr. Clifford, Mr. Cecil Hunt, and Miss Hagarty)	361
Sandys, Frederick, The Work of (Leicester Galleries)	202
Shannon, Mr. Haslewood, Lithographs by (Mr. John Baillie's Galleries)	22
Shoosmith, Mr., Water-colours of Old Towns by	474

ART NOTES—continued

	PAGE
Smith, Miss Pamela Colman, Designs by ("The Green Sheaf")	307
Strang's, Mr. William, Portrait of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain (Carfax Gallery)	22
Suffolk Street Galleries (Works by Rex Vicat Cole, Carlton Moore Park, William Kneen, Mr. Ferguson, and Tom Browne)	360
Swan's, Mr. John, "Drawings and Sketches of Wild Beasts" (Fine Arts)	434
Thaulaw, Fritz, Landscapes by (Tooth's Gallery)	501
Thompson, Miss Margaret, Water-colour Drawings by (Stafford Gallery)	227
Tissot, Illustrations from the Bible drawn by Townshend Heirlooms, The, Sale of, at Christie's	307
Training of an Artist, The—I.	691
Tyndale, Mr., Water-colours by (Dowdeswell's Galleries)	308
Varley, Mr. John, Water-colours by (Hanover Gallery)	501
Verestchagin, The Work of	500
Vigers, Mr., Exhibition of Paintings by (Ryder Gallery)	501
Water-colours by the Great English Masters (Agnew's Galleries)	227
Water-colour Society, The Old, Centenary Show of	433
Water-colours, The Royal Institute of Painters in	361
Watts' "Physical Energy" (Royal Academy)	501
Westminster School of Art, The, Annual Exhibition of	643
Whitechapel Art Gallery, The, Arts of the Netherlands	412
Women's International Art Club, The, Exhibition of (Grafton Galleries)	132
Wood, Mr. Derwent, The Work of	132

OBITUARY

Arnold, Sir Edwin	369
Gérôme, Jean Léon	107
Hardie, Mr. Robert Gordon	107
Jackson, Mr. Mason	27
Jokai, Maurus	537
Lynch, Miss Hannah	65
Powell, Professor York	537
Salmon, Dr.	128
Stephen, Sir Leslie	221
Strong, Mr. S. Arthur	211
Temple, The Master of the	163
Verestchagin	500

SUPPLEMENTS

Comic Note, The (by Mrs. Craigie)	83
Educational	49 60
Spring Announcements	315 338
Tourist	667 674

ARTICLES

Alembroth	547
Art, 1903	36
Athenum Losses and Gains, 1903	15
Biography, 1903	31
Blue-Stocking, A The Centenary of (Charlotte Lennox)	102
Children, The Teaching of	51
Comic Note, The (Mrs. Craigie's Address to the O.P. Club)	83
Craigie's, Mr. Gordon, School of Theatrical Art	276
Dante and Goya, The Art of Portraiture	457
"Darling of the Gods, The" (Mr. Beerbohm Tree)	17
Drama, 1903	38
Drastic Discursion, A (Poetry)	380
East, The Far (Books about China, Japan, Russia, and Korea)	93
Egomot 17, 40, 75, 102, 127, 151, 172, 197, 221, 251, 275, 302, 354, 380, 405, 429, 465, 496, 526, 547, 575, 591, 618, 639, 660, 688	669
"Every Man His Own Hakluyt"	34
Fiction, 1903	669
Hakluyt, Every Man His Own	466
Hamlet's Grave, At	32
Historical Literature, English, 1903	16
Holidays	355
Irish Literary Revival, The	150
Kelmscott Press, The	173
Kempie, Thomas A. A Monument to Law Courts, Literature in the, 1903	36
Lennox, Charlotte, The Centenary of	102
LETTERS FROM A SILENT STUDY:—
VIII. On Musical Comedies and the State	15
IX. On Proper Pride	149
X. On the Nursery Label	172
XI. On the Neighbour's Burden	197
XII. On the Romantic Style	250
XIII. On Intellectual Society	275
XIV. On Leap Year	302
XV. On Art by the Inch	354
XVI. On the Self Sufficient	406
XVII. On Vexations	688
Music, 1903	37
Novel, The Tip-Topographical	670
PERSONALITIES:—
Conrad, Joseph	198
Davies, H. H.	497
Gissing, George	40
Mack, Louise	617
Marguerite, Paul and Victor	407
Nau, J. A.	75
Tchéhov, Anton	40
Turner, Ethel	617

ARTICLES—continued

	PAGE
Poetry, 1903	33
The Failure of the World to Appreciate	380
Portraiture, The Art of, Dante and Goya	457
Salad in Literature, The	126
SCIENCE:—
Atoms and Evolution	151
Birth of Love, The	356
Causation and Shakespeare	470
Its Debt to the Dead	76
Its Latest Ally (Japan)	174
Japan and Christianity	382
Japanese, The Future of the	198
Individual versus the Race	548
Living Mantle of God, The	277
Man the Erect	430
Marriage, Multiplication and Morals	527
Memory, The Ways of	251
Not without Hope	303
Shout with the Crowd, A	496
Space	570
Tolstoi and the Babies	127
Truth, The Love of	103
Wasting the World's Time	408
Yellow Peril, or Promise, The	222
Shakespeare, Was he a Better Playwright than Poet?	470
Shakespeare's London, Itinerary of a Rambler through	460
Shakespeareana: The Tempest, III.	526
SPENCER, HERBERT, THE WORK OF:—
I. His Conception of Philosophy	591
II. His Conception of Religion	618
III. His Conception of Science	639
IV. His Conception of Toleration	660
V. The Unknowable (I)	689
Spring Publishing Season, The	317
Stephen, Sir Leslie	221
Teaching of Children, The	51
Theology, 1903	33
Tip-topographical Novel, The	670
TRAINS OF THOUGHT:—
I. Thinking	381
II. Philosophy and Humanitatimty	429
III. Backstairs	495
IV. English Classes	525
V. The Poor Public	563
VI. Writers and Readers	590
Tree, Mr. Beerbohm, at Rehearsal ("The Darling of the Gods")	17
University Extension	108, 132, 156, 203, 229

LITERARY NOTES

Pages 3, 27, 63, 89, 115, 139, 161, 185, 209, 239, 265, 291, 343, 369, 393, 417, 443, 483, 513, 537, 557, 581, 605, 629, 649, 677.

CHESS

Pages 308, 361, 387, 413, 435, 476, 531, 574, 622, 692.

ILLUSTRATIONS

BOOK ILLUSTRATIONS:—
"Adam Bede"	614
"Angelo Bastiani"	671
"Balkans from Within, The"	376
"Beaconsfield"	649
"Chats on English China"	378
"English Earthenware and Stoneware"	608
"English Monastic Life"	632
"Far Eastern Impressions"	543
"Fifty Years of an Actor's Life"	593
"Furness, Harry, at Home"	681
"God in the Garden, The"	670
"London, The Story of"	653
"Montmartre, The Illustrators of"	587
"Morocco, Things Seen in"	541
"Mural Painting" (Portrait of Lucretia Tornabuoni)	345
"Napoleon of Notting Hill, The"	351
"Pa Gladden"	271
"Pepys, A Later" (The Hon. Miss Monek-ton)	679
"Republic of Ragusa, The"	655
"Rodin, Auguste"	585
"Shakespeare, The Henry Irving"	460
"Vineyard, The"	347
PORTRAITS:—
Bancroft, Sir Squire, 224.
Barrymore, Miss Ethel, 573.
Becke, Mr. Louis, 66.
Beeching, Canon H. C., 6.
Brieux, M. Eugene, 139.
Capes, Mr. Bernard Edward Joseph, 63.
Castle, Mr. Egerton, 369.
Chesteron, Mr. G. K., 537.
Clifford, Mrs. W. K., 3.
Cosway, Mrs., 227.
Davies, Mr. H. H., 497.
DeLand, Mrs. Margaret, 291.
France, M. Anatole, 30.
Garnett, Dr. Richard, 265.
Gasquet, The Right Rev. Abbot, 92.
Gibbons, Major A. St. H., 605.
Grant, Captain M. H., 581.
Gwynn, Mr. Stephen, 629.
Hamilton, Mr. Cosmo, 115.
Hornung, Mr. Ernest William, 89.
Irving, Sir Henry, 200, 515.
Jefferson, Mr. Joseph, 409.
Joachim, Dr., 550.
Johnston, Miss Mary, 241.
Maartens, Maarten, 513.
Mack, Miss Louise (Mrs. Creed), 617.
Macready, W. C., 595.
Mahan, Captain, 559.
Marguerite, M. Paul, 393.
Marguerite, M. Victor, 395.
Maugham, Mr. William Somerset, 161.
Menpes, Miss Dorothy, 417.
Moore, Miss Eva, 385.
Moore, Mr. Frankfort, 677.
Orchardson, R.A., Mr. W. Q., 307.
Parker, Sir Gilbert, 483.
Shakespeare, The Bust of in Stratford-on-Avon Church, 432.
Shakespeare, A

ILLUSTRATIONS—continued

Composite Portrait of, 27. Shakespeare, From "A Life of William Shakespeare," by Sidney Lee, 443. Shorter, Mrs. Clement, 557. Sothern, Mr. E. H., as Hamlet, 557. Steel, Mrs. Flora Annie, 543. Stephen, Sir Leslie, 212. Swift, Mr. Benjamin, 185. Terry, Miss Ellen, 279. Trees, Mr. Beer-bohm, at Rehensal, 17. Turner, Miss Ethel (Mrs. Curlew), 617.
Bacon's, Francis, Tree in Gray's Inn Gardens	466
Beaconsfield's, Lord, Tomb	649
Blackmore Memorial Window in Exeter Cathedral	485
Flagons, Church, Three Types of	243
Gordon's Bible	293
Hamlet's Grave	468
Kelmscott Press (Facsimile page of "The Story of the Glittering Plain")	150
The, The First Home of	104
Kempis, St. Thomas à, Monument to, at Zwolle	173
Lawrens, Jean-Paul, Bust of	585
Play-Bill of 1777, A Manchester	365
SHAKESPEARE'S LONDON:—77, 129, 153, 445, 460, 462, 464, 471, 528,	641
Shakespeare Memorial, The Elsinore	239
Suggested Site for	209

"ACADEMY" QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

- "Apuleius," 24, 109. Anthology, Patriotic, 24. Acting Rights, 24, 48. "Alhambra Organ, The," 24. Andrea Ferrara, 48, 82, 110. "Aldus," 109. Ambrose Austin, 134. "An-Heires," 182. Animals and God, 182. Aurora Leigh, 206. Kempis, Thomas, 206. Atlantis, The New, 260. Accent Marks, 286. 314. "Adventures of Don Bellianis, The," 390, 438, 502. Anglo-Saxon Riddle, An, 390. "Anthony Rowley," 438. An Appeal from the Shades, 414. Authors Wanted, 576. Amwell House, 597. "All the Russias," 623. "At Home," 623. "Air Bites Shrewdly, The," 644.
- "Bonhomme, Le Petit," 24, 48. "Baby," 48, 82, 110, 232. "Barnfield, Richard," 232, 286. "Beaucaire, Monsieur," 24, 48, 182. Bowing, 232. Bible Translators, 312. Bawbee, 312, 564, 390, 414, 478, 534. Badges of Language and Sweden, 390. Burlington House, 390, 478. Bellairs, 414, 438, 478. Bacon, 436, 478. "Bullo Coal," 554, 577, 626, 646. "Bellianis, Don, The Adventures of," 390, 438, 502. "Blacksmith Tartar, The," 576. Boethius, Canonisation of, 576. "Brook," 597, 646. Burleigh and Leicester, 597. Birds, Floating Sleeping, 623. Barnfield's Sonnets, 623, 646. "Benoit Malon," 623. "Beau Ideal," 665. Byron-Chatcaubriand, 694.
- "Card, Queer," 24. "Christmas Box," 48, 82, 110. Clough and Tennyson, 82. Cromwell's Statue, 109, 158. Comma, 134. Caligula, 134, 158. "Counting-Out" Verse, 134, 158, 206, 260, 286, 534, 577. Classic-Romantic, 158, 182. Church Windows, 182, 206, 232, 314, 414. Carlyle, Lines by, 206, 260, Charade, An Old, 206, 232, 260, 314. Corea, 260. Cause, A Lost, 260, 314. "Cute, A Pair of White," 286. "Club Law," 286, 364. "Cots-wold Lions," 286, 314, 364. Corner Columns, 286, 314. "Cock and Bull Story," 286, 314, 364, 390. Churches, Round, 286, 364. "Childs (Childers)," 312. Casabianca, 312, 364. Cole-ridge, 312, 364, 390. Copper in Flintshire, 312. Curson, Mary, 364. Critics, Newspaper, 364. "Constellation, The," 438. Coleridge, 477, 533. "Church, Like A," 502, 533, 554. "Christian Year, The," 502, 577. Coincidences, 502, 533, 554. Case is Altered, The, 554, 577. "Corners, Three," 576, 597, 665. "Cocqueigries," 623, 646. "Come Quiet Night," &c., 623, 665. "Chalk Sunday," 623. Cockatrice, The, 694.
- "Devil, The," 24. "Donisarius of Padua," 48. Date, Enigmatic, of "Fasciculus temporum," 109, 232, 260, 314. Dawkins, W., Pedigree and Genealogy of, 109, 134. "Dog-berry," 158, 182, 206. Dedications, 182, 206. "Devine" or "Devigne"? 182. Daisies, 206. Dickens's, Charles, Namea, 232. Dog, The Tail and the, 286. Davenant's "Dream," 312. Devil's Hoof, The, 312, 390, 414. Dis- counts, 364, 438. "Dukery" or "Dukeries," 414. "Dianna of the Crossways," 477, 533, 534, 576. "Dearest, I have no Hero's Face," &c., 533. "Deuce," 576, 626. D'Annunzio, Gabriele, 576, 626, 665. Duvent, Major, and Israel Lyon, 576. Drawers, Secret, 597. Disselago, 597, 626, 646.
- "Encyclopaedia Britannica" in Japan, The, 109. "Education Consists," &c., 477. Ellison's "Mad Moments," 477. Epitaph, An Old, 502, 534, 554, 646. "Edith, Queen," 533, 665. "Eye of the Soul," 533. Ellesmere, 694. "Enough to make a Cat Laugh," 554. Exor- cising Flowers, 554.
- Fathers and Sons," 24. "Foundations, The Book of the," 82, 109. "Ferrara, Andrea," 48, 82, 110. Father of his Country, 82, 110. "Fasciculus temporum," Enigmatic Date of, 109, 232, 260, 314. "Farewell! May no Thought pierce Thy Breast," &c., 182, 206. Finger Nails, 206, 626. Figs—Prophet, 260,

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS—continued

286. Fynets, 260, 286, 314, 364, 390, 414, 438, 534, 577, 626, 665. Flintshire, Copper in, 312. Flodden Field, 414. French Who's Who, A, 414. Fogs, London, 438. Feinagle, 554, 577, 597. "Flinging the Stocking," 597, 646. French, Sixteenth-Century, 644, 694. Fyfield Elm, The, 694.
- "Gregorarius," 24, 48. "Glastonbury," 134. Godfathers, Literary, 134. Greenland's Ice Mountains, 260, 286, 314. Gissing's "The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft," 158, 182, 260. Gage, Sir Henry, Death of, 158. Ger- man "V" and "W," 158. Guido Gorres, 158. Glassbury Thorn, 182, 206. Gypsy Experiences, 232. Gipsy Lore Society, 260. Gloucester Saying, A, 286, 314, 364. "God's Ichor," &c., 312, 438. Gytrash, 312, 390. Genius, 438, 478, 502, 534, 554. Goldsmith, Oliver, 477. "Good-bye," 502, 534, 554. "Goose-quill and the Angel Gabriel, A," 554, 576, 626. "God Save the King," 554, 577, 646. "Green Grave," 576, 598, 626, 646. German Wit, 623. "God Save the Mark," 665. Grief, Luxury of, 694. "Gammoma," 694.
- "Habakkuk," 24, 48, 82. Heart Came into My Mouth, My, 48, 82. Henry VI.'s Cook, 82, 110. "House that Jack Built, The," 82, 110. "Hell, Lords of," 109, 134, 182. "Humphrey Hour," 134, 158, 182. Hen's Chicken, White, 158. "His Soul is at One," &c., 206. "Hymen's Praeulidia," 260, 314. Hermit King- dom, The, 260. "He Nothing Common Did," &c., 312, 364, 390, 414. "Hiawatha's Photo- graphing," 312, 364. "He has Bought His Eternity," &c., 414, 438. Harding Street, 438. "Hope against Hope," 502, 534, 554. Hamlet's Grave, 553. "Heaven Save the Mark," 554, 646. "Historical Dictionary of Ideas," 576, 626. Henry III., 576. "Hunting the Wren," 576, 598, 644, 646, 665. Holman Hunt, 576. "Hamlet," 665.
- "I loved—Oh no!" &c., 232, 260. Insect, Physiology of, 286. "It is their Nature to," 478. "Ivanhoe," Scenes in, 502. Ideas, Historical Dictionary of, 576, 626.
- Japan, The "Encyclopaedia Britannica" in, 109. "Joseph Scaligeri Opus de emendatione Temporum," 109. Japan on the Stage, 109. Jessamy Bride, The, 205, 232, 260. Jessie, 232, 286, 314, 390.
- "Kicksaw," 48, 82, 110. Kempis, Thomas à, 206. Kipling's "In Spring Time," 260. Kathleen in Houlihan, 502. Kimbolton Castle, 644, 694.
- Liszt, Abbe, 24, 48. "Lords of Hell," 109, 134, 182. "Lion and the Unicorn Fighting for the Crown, The," 82, 110. Lee Priory, 109, 158. "Lyart Veteran heard the Word of God, The," &c., 109. Love, Marital, 134. Literary Godfathers, 134. "Lambkins," 182, 232, 260, 314. Lent, Sundays in, 260, 286, 314. "Lord, Let the House of a Brute, &c., The," 232, 260. Lost Cause, A, 260, 314. Lucas Boys, 364. London Fogs, 438. Languedoc and Sweden, Badges of, 390. Liddell and Scott, 665. "Love's Half-death," 623. "Long will They Wait," &c., 623. "La Yache Enragée," 623. Luxury of Grief, 694.
- "Laced Story, A," 694.
- "Monsieur, Beaucaire," 24, 48, 182. "Mal- brouk," 48, 82, 110, 134. "Man in the Street, The," 82, 109. "Mardy, Mandy," 82, 109. "Music at the Close," 109, 134. Mother-in-Law, 232, 260, 286, 534. Monu- mental Texts, 158. Massachussetts, 182. Masterlinckina, 232. "Memorabilia Can- tabrigiae," 260, 314. "Margaret W—" 390. "Memorable Lady, The," 414. Marie Antoinette's Pearls, 438. Mirren, St., 554. "Marble Air," 576, 597, 626, 646. "Monks of Ely," 533, 554, 577. Marmalade, 597, 665. "Malon, Benoit," 623. "Mortal Coil," 576, 597, 626, 644. "Monna Vanna," 644. "Man- pygmon," 644. "Many Voices Spoke," &c., 694.
- Nailbourne, 48, 110. Novels, Three-Volume, 109. "Not fit to hold the Candle to Him," 134, 158, 182, 206. "Nobs Old," 158. Nursery Rhyme, Old, 260, 314, 438. Nuts, 312, 390, 414. Newspaper Critics, 364. Numismatic, 390. Numbers, London Street, 438. Newdigate, The, 438, 534. Nebuchadnezzar's Band, 576, 626.
- "Other-guess," "Othergates," 48, 82, 110. "Olives," 82. "Ox with the Crumpled Horn, The," 109, 158, 232. "Old Nobs," 158. "Ohne Phosphor Kein Gedanke," 134, 158, 260, 364. Oil on Troubled Waters, 312, 390. Opera Plots, 438, 478, 534. "Once more We are Complete," &c., 414. "O what shall the Man of Sin Do," &c., 477. Oswyn, Powys, 477. "Oh! Merry Sang the Monks of Ely," &c., 533, 554, 577. Oyeters, 533, 577. Oak-tree, The, 576. O'Doherty, Sir Morgan, 597, 646. "Our very Fears," &c., 623, 646. "Overcome South," 644. "Oh tell Me whence Love cometh?" 665.
- Patriotic Anthology, 24. "Petit Bonhomme, Le," 24, 48. "Palaces, The Two and Thirty," 82. Proverbs, 109, 134. "Panatone," 109, 134, 182. Pedigree and Genealogy, 109, 134. "Paris vaut bien une messe," 109, 134. Proserpina, 134, 158, 206. Popes' Names, 134, 182. Poe, Edgar Allan, 158. Parlia-

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS—continued

- ment Field, 158. "Poor Robin," 182. "Pericles," 286. Poe, Poem attributed to, 259. Prophet—Figs, 260, 286. "Para- celsus," 312. "Polisman," 364. "Philo- mot," 438, 478. Pearl, Marie Antoinette's, 438. Powys Oswyn, 477. Pseudonyma, Fe- male, 502, 533, 554. "Peter of Barnet," 502. "Pilgrim" and "Palmer," 532. Pronouns, Indefinite, 533, 576, 597. Presses, Celebrated, 576. "Plus je Connais les Hommes," &c., 576. "Pretty Fanny's Way," "Pin- Round," 623, 694. Physical Culture, 665. "Pony," 694.
- "Queer Card," 24. "Queen Edith," 533, 665. "Rome, King of," 24, 48. "Round Robin," 24. "Russelas," 109, 134. Rabalais, 134. "Rud- yards cease from Kipling, &c., When the," 134. Rhyme, Origin of, 158, 182, 206. Ro- mantic Classic," 158, 182. "Runaways," 182, 232, 554. Rhyme, Old Nursery, 260, 314, 438. Renan and the Bible, 312. "Ring-a- ding-ding," 260, 314. Russian Novelists, 364. Riddle, An Anglo-Saxon, 390. "Revenous à nos Montons," 390, 438, 478, 534. "Rowley, Anthony," 438. "Republic, The New," 533, 554, 577. Rhymes, Ingenious, 554, 577, 598, 646. Rio Grande, 554. "Russias, All the," 623.
- "Shakespeare and the Musical Glasses," 24. "So Long," 110, 554, 577, 626, 646. "Sign- boards," 24. "Saints, Lives of the," 48, 82, 110. Shakespeare's knowledge of Red or Coloured Snow, 82. Scott's, Sir Walter, Grammar, 82, 109, 134. Seafield, Frank, 158, 182. Seeliger, 158. Silurist, 182, 206. "Spring in England," 206, 232, 260. Shake- speare as Lawyer, 232. Shakespeare, Trans- lations of, 259, 314. Squire and the Apple- pie, The, 232, 260. Slav Folklore, 260. Shakespeare Queries, 286, 314. "Squares, To Break," 286, 390. Shelley and Volney, 312. "Silly Billy," 312. Stevenson's Music, 312. Sleep, Sound, 364, 414. Scotland and Ire- land, 390, 438, 478, 502, 598, 626. Shades, An Appeal from the, 414. "Spiral," the Memorable Lady, &c., 414. Scorpe, 414, 438. Stop-watches, 438. Street Numbers, London, 438. Ship, An Old, 438. "Sight, Taking a," 438, 502, 534. Shakespeare's Ignorance, 477. Shakespeare's Sonnets, 478, 502, 533. Shakespeare's Jubilee, 502, 554, 577. Spoon, A Long, 502, 534, 554. Steven- son's Epitaph, 502, 533, 554, 577. Sonnet, The Earliest, 502, 533, 577. Shakespearean Bibliography, 533. Shakespearean Plays, Origin of, 533, 554, 577. Shakespeare in Opera, 553, 623, 626. Shakespeare's Songs, 553, 597. "Shuffled Off this Mortal Coil," 576, 597, 626, 644. "Shred Pie," 576, 598, 626. Spratt, 553, 597. Sabbatical Year, 553. Shakespeare, Lines about, 532, 554. Shake- speare and Marlow, 597, 644. "Stocking, Flinging the," 597, 646. Secret Drawers, 597. Shakespeare's London, 644, 665, 694. Socia- list, Lines on a, 644. Shakespeare, Six- teenth-Century French, Doctors, "Perfec- tion" or "Infection," Carnegie Generosity, 623, 644. Shakespeare's Unacted Plays, 665. "Solitary," The, 623. 665. Shakespeare (Note), 694. "Story, A Laced," 694.
- SHAKESPEAREANA: "The Tempest," 553. "Most versus Least," 553. The Name, 623. Shake- speare's Treatment of His "Originals," 645. "Thurrock," 48, 110. Texts, Monumental, 158. Ten in England, 110, 182. Terpander's Bird, 182, 206. "Though the Day be never so long," &c., 206, 232, 260, 286. "Tickle me, Baby," 232, 260, 286. Transvaal Volkslied, 232. Titles, Book, 259. "Thou art the Voice," &c., 260, 286. "Taffy was a Welsh- man," 260. Tennyson, 232, 260. "Tears, Wipe the," 286, 312, 364. Tail and the Dog, The, 286. "Twenty Thousand Rufians," 364, 414. Type Derivations, 364, 414, 478. "Tickhill, God help it," 414, 438, 478, 502, 534, 646. "Taking a Sight," 438, 502, 534. "Top, To Sleep as Sound as a," 438. "Think Long," 477, 502, 533. "Tushery," 502, 533, 554, 577, 646, 694. Taylor, Baron, 554, 577, 598. "Taming of the Shrew, The," 597, 626, 644. "Tracts for the Times," 623. "Tansy," 694. "Two Lovely Black Eyes," 623, 646. Tuesday an Unlucky Day, 665.
- Upcott, William, 48, 82, 110. Unrhymed Verse, 206.
- "Vincent of Beauvais," 109. "Vanity Fair," 109, 158. Violets, 390, 438, 534. "Veiled Queen," 576, 626. "Vache Enragée, La," 623, 646, 665.
- "Wilcox," 48. "Waltham Disguises, Worse than," 48, 82, 110. Washington, George, 82, 110. Waterloo, 134. Weigh—Way, 158, 182. White Hen's Chicken, 158. Wind on the Stage, 158, 182. Wade, General, 182, 206. "Without Me Divided," &c., 206. Welsh Triads, 232. Wesley, Hetty, 259, 314. "Wipe the Tears," 286, 312, 364. Wainwright, T. G., 364, 414, 478. Winchester Slang, 364, 478. Ward, Catherine, 414. "With Cheerful Heart," &c., 414. "Who's Who," French, 414. Watches, Stop, 438. Wales, Guide, Books to, 533. Widow in "The Spectator," 597. "Want-way," 644, 665. "Wee Willie Winkie," 623, 694. Women Inventors, 623. "Yule," Origin of the Word, 24, 48, 82.

"THE TIMES" LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

A Special Literary Supplement is published with The Times on Friday. This Supplement is an impartial and authoritative organ of literary criticism and a comprehensive and trustworthy medium of literary intelligence. It can be had with The Times of Friday alone.

Subscriptions, inclusive of postage, for The Times of Friday :—

	3 Months.	6 Months.	12 Months.
Inland ...	3s. 3d.	6s. 6d.	13s. 0d.
Foreign ...	4s. 4d.	8s. 8d.	17s. 4d.

CONTENTS OF FRIDAY, JAN. 1, 1904.

Literature.

Mr. Herbert Spencer.
The Valet's Tragedy and other Studies.
Etoniana.
Some Recent German Literature.

Correspondence.

Crashaw's Christmas Poems.

Annual Index.

"THE TIMES" LITERARY SUPPLEMENT is also sold with the Mail, or

"THE TIMES" WEEKLY EDITION, upon payment of an additional penny.

Address THE PUBLISHER, The Times,
Printing House Square, London, E.C.

The NINETEENTH CENTURY & AFTER

For JANUARY, 1904,
COMMENCES A NEW VOLUME, and contains Contributions by

SIR ROBERT GIFFEN, K.C.B.
"INEFFECTUAL PREFERENCES."
BENJAMIN KIDD. "THE LARGER BASIS OF COLONIAL PREFERENCE."
DEMETRIUS C. BOULGER.
"THE 'YELLOW PERIL' BOGEY."
THE RIGHT REV. THE LORD BISHOP OF ST. ASAPH.
"EDUCATIONAL CONCORDATS."
D. C. LATHBURY (Editor of "The Pilot").
"HOW LONG WILL THE EDUCATION ACT LAST?"
THE Right Hon. Sir ALGERNON WEST,
G.O.B. (Chairman, Theatres Committee, L.C.C.).
"SOME NOTES AS TO LONDON THEATRES PAST AND PRESENT."
PRINCESS KROPOTKIN. "LENDING LIBRARIES AND CHEAP BOOKS."
ANTONIA ZIMMERN, B.Sc. "THE NEW DISCOVERIES IN ELECTRICITY."
ERNEST RHYS.
"A KNIGHT OF THE SANGREAL."

LONDON: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & Co. (Ltd.).

W. S. BARCLAY.
"LIFE IN TIERRA DEL FUEGO."
R. B. MARSTON (Editor of "The Fishing
Gazette"). "THE INCREASE OF FISH-DESTROYING BIRDS AND SEALS."
SIR ROBERT ANDERSON, K.C.B., LL.D.
"THE HOME OFFICE SCHEME FOR 'PRO-FESSIONAL CRIMINALS.'"
DR. ARABELLA KENEALY.
"THE CURSE OF CORSETS."
HERBERT A. GILES (Professor of Chinese at Cambridge). "JADE."
OSWALD P. LAW.
W. T. GILL. } "A WHITE
AUSTRALIA :
WHAT IT MEANS."
SIR WEMYSS REID (1) } "LAST EDWARD DICEY, C.B. (2) } MONTH."

Now Ready, post free 4d.

"THE BUILDER" NEW YEAR'S NUMBER.

CONTENTS:

ILLUSTRATIONS OF OLD PARIS, from a fine
drawing by the late H. W. Brewer; Council Chamber, Ducal Palace, Venice; Doorway in a Genoese House and Grotto in Cortile, Palazzo Podesta, Genoa, by A. C. Conrads; Illustrations of Old London, from old prints; Detail of Royal College of Science, by Aston Webb, R.A.; the Danaides, fountain in the Salon Exhibition, by Jean Hughes, Sculptor; the Orleans Railway Station, Paris; Empire Furniture at the British Embassy, Paris; an Architectural Translation, by the Editor; R.C. Cathedral Interior; Decorative Picture, "Charity." Also the Commencement of a New Series of Articles (Student's Column) on "Archea," with other interesting and instructive matter, both literary and artistic.

London:

The Publisher of "The Builder," Catherine St., W.O.

THE FAUNA OF BRITISH INDIA, including Ceylon and Burma. Published under the Authority of the Secretary of State for India in Council. Edited by W. T. BLANFORD. Medium 8vo, with numerous Illustrations.

MAMMALIA. 1 vol. £1.—FISHES. 2 vols. £1 each.
—BIRDS. Vol. I. £1; Vols. II.—IV. 15s. each.—REP-
TILIA and BATRACHIA. 1 vol. £1.—MOTHS.
4 vols. £1 each.—HYMENOPTERA. Vols. I and II.
£1 each.—ARACHNIDA. 1 vol. 10s.—RHYNOCHOTA.
Vol. I. £1; Vol. II, pt. 1, 10s.

London: Taylor & Francis, Red Lion Court, Fleet
Street. Calcutta and Simla: Thacker, Spink & Co.
Bombay: Thacker & Co., Ltd. Burma: Myles Standish
& Co., Rangoon. Berlin: Friedländer & Sohn, Carl-strasse, 11.

PRICE HALF-A-CROWN.

MONTHLY.

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

January, 1904.

HERBERT SPENCER.

THE FANTASTIC FALLACY OF AN EMPIRE
BUILDER: A CHALLENGE TO MR. CHAMBER-
LAIN. By LEONARD M. BURRELL.
THE FISCAL QUESTION AND ITS SURROUND-
INGS. By E. B. HUSBAND.
IS ENGLAND LIVING ON HER CAPITAL? By
W. M. LIGHTBODY.
PASSIVE RESISTANCE. By F. W. H. REED.
THE LAND OF MAZZINI AND GARIBOLDI. By KARL BLIND.

London: R. BRIMLEY JOHNSON, 4, Adam Street, Adelphi, W.C.

ESOTERIO LAW. By T. BATY.
BYZANTINE GREECE. By WM. MILLER.
THE SOCIAL SIDE OF IRISH CHARACTER. By ROBERT M. SILLARD.
WOMEN AND THE SWEATING SYSTEM. By
PRISCILLA E. MOULDER.
FROM GOETHE'S "WILHELM MEISTER." By WILLIAM FREDERICK HARVEY.
INDEPENDENT SECTION: LETTER RE MR.
CHAMBERLAIN. By J. MALCOLM LYON.
CONTEMPORARY LITERATURE.

NOW READY

THE (JANUARY) INDEPENDENT REVIEW

Price 2s. 6d. net.

CONTENTS.

LAND MONOPOLY: The Appeal to History.
LAND REFORM versus PRO-TECTION. CHARLES TREVELYAN,
M.P.
A RIDE IN MONASTIR. H.
W. NEVINSON.
ERNEST VON KOERBER.
THE AUSTRIAN PREMIER.
FRANCIS J. HIRST.
MOTORING. G. LOWES DICKIN-
SON.
"THE MEANEST OF GREEK TRAGEDIES." GILBERT MURRAY.
CANADA and the EMPIRE.
Hon. GEORGE PEEL.
NATIVE LABOUR in SOUTH AFRICA. Rev. J. S. MOFFAT.
PROTECTION AND THE WOOL TRADE. J. H. CLAPHAM.
MR. BURDEN. Chaps. V. and VI.
HILAIRE BELLOC.
A CATHOLIC REVOLU-TIONARY. A. L. LILLEY.
OTHER REVIEWS.

At all Booksellers' and Railway Bookstalls.

London:

T. FISHER UNWIN, E.C.

NOW READY.

Volume Two. Number Two.

THE HIBBERT JOURNAL

A Quarterly Review of Religion,
Theology, and Philosophy.

Price 2/6 per number, net. 10/- per annum, post free.

Principal Contents of Number Two:

Progressive Catholicism and High Church
Absolution. By H. C. CORRANCE.
The Alleged Indifference of Laymen to Religion.

I. Sir OLIVER LODGE, D.Sc., F.R.S., Principal of the University of Birmingham.

II. Sir EDWARD RUSSELL.

III. J. H. MUIREHEAD, M.A., Professor of Philosophy in the University of Birmingham.

IV. THE EDITOR.

The Gods as Embodiments of the Race Memory.
By EDWARD CARPENTER.

The Evidence of Design in the Elements and Structure of the Cosmos. By W. PEPPERRELL
MONTAGU, Ph.D., Lecturer in Philosophy in Columbia University, New York.

The New Point of View in Theology. By Rev.
J. H. BEEBITZ, M.A., Vice-Principal of Lichfield
Theological College.

Sacrificial Communion in Greek Religion. By LEWIS R. FARNELL, M.A., D.Litt., Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford.

The Johannine Problem. II. Direct Internal Evidence. By B. W. BACON, M.A., D.D., Professor of New Testament Criticism and Exegesis in Yale University.

Zoroastrianism and Primitive Christianity.
II. By the Rev. JAS. MOFFATT, M.A., D.D.

Some Theological Aspects of the Iconoclastic Controversy. By Miss ALICE GARDNER, Lecturer in Newnham College, Cambridge.

Discussions by Prof. H. GOODWIN SMITH, M.A.,
LL.D., Rev. Canon T. K. CHRYNE D.Litt., D.D., Rev.
A. R. WHATELY, M.A., and PHILIP SENEY; also a number of signed Reviews and a Bibliography of Recent Books and Articles.

Prospectus post free upon application.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta St., London, W.C.

Mr. RIDER HAGGARD'S GREAT NEW STORY

ENTITLED—

The Brethren

A Romance of the Crusades,

SEE

CASSELL'S MAGAZINE

For January.

PRICE 6d.

So great was the demand for the December Number in which this story was commenced, that the immense edition was exhausted, and owing to the nature of the coloured and other illustrations which the issue contained it was found impracticable to reprint it. In order that everyone may have an opportunity of reading "The Brethren" in its entirety, the publishers have inserted in the JANUARY Number a reprint of the first portion of Mr. Rider Haggard's story.

NOW ON SALE AT ALL BOOKSELLERS AND THE RAILWAY BOOKSTALLS.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY.

A Church History in 1 Vol., crown 8vo, 640 pp., 6s. net. A HANDBOOK OF CHURCH HISTORY.

From the Apostolic Era to the Dawn of the Reformation.

By SAMUEL G. GREEN, D.D.,

Author of "A Handbook of Old Testament Hebrew," &c. With full Dates, Chronological Tables and Index.

The Times says:—"It is a capable and lucid narrative, which seems to succeed in treating a history which covers fourteen and a half centuries in not too sketchy a manner, and which is not intent on establishing any partisan doctrine."

Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, burnished edges, 6s.

THY HEART'S DESIRE.

A Book of Family Prayers and Scripture Readings for the Mornings and Evenings of Three Months.

. For special presentation this work can be had in two extra styles: Paste grain, limp round corners, gilt roll, gilt edges, 9s. net; by post, 9s. 4d. Paste grain, yapp, gilt edges, 10s. 6d. net; by post, 10s. 10d.

The Daily News says:—"They are beautifully worded petitions."

With a Photogravure Portrait, crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

LIGHT AND LIFE.

Sermons Preached in Ferme Park Chapel, London.

By the Rev. CHARLES BROWN.

The Expository Times says:—"The R.T.S. has never published a better volume of sermons than this."

EIGHTH EDITION, COMPLETING 16,000 COPIES. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. Also in handsome binding for presentation. Padded paste grain, gilt line, round corners, gilt edges, gold roll, 6s. net.

THOUGHTS FOR THE SUNDAYS of the YEAR.

By the BISHOP OF DURHAM.

The Guardian says:—"Devout readers will find here 'refreshment' to their hearts and souls in many varieties of spiritual experience."

Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net (by post 6s. 4d.).
THIRD EDITION.

THE STORY OF SOME ENGLISH SHIRES.

By BISHOP CREIGHTON.

The following Shires are included in this Volume:—Cambridge, Cheshire, Cumberland, Derby, Durham, Gloucester, Hereford, Huntingdon, Lancashire, Leicester, Northampton, Northumberland, Shropshire, Stafford, Warwick, Westmoreland, Worcester, Yorkshire.

The Athenaeum says:—"Fine scholarship, adequate knowledge, and an easy style of writing are rarely combined. All these qualities were conspicuous in the late Dr. Creighton's work, and we therefore welcome this re-issue."

JUST READY, large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

THOMAS WAKEFIELD,

Missionary and Geographical Pioneer in East Equatorial Africa.

By E. S. WAKEFIELD.

With a Portrait and 8 other Illustrations.

Mr. Wakefield was in a real sense one of the great African pioneer missionaries, and in addition to the Evangelistic service to which he had consecrated his life, he was enabled to do much in the great fields of African geography, botany, ethnology, and folk-lore.

4, Bouverie Street, London, E.C.

MACMILLAN & Co.'s LIST.

THE LIFE OF W. E. GLADSTONE. By JOHN MORLEY.

With Portraits. In Three Volumes, 8vo, 42s. net.

THE CRANFORD SERIES. NEW VOLUME.

EVELINA. By FANNY BURNBY. With an Introduction by AUSTIN DOBSON, and Illustrations by HUGH THOMSON. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, gilt edges, 6s. Also with uncut edges, paper label, 6s.

VOLS. III. and IV. NOW READY.

A HISTORY OF ENGLISH POETRY.

By W. J. COURTHOPE, C.B., M.A., D.Litt., LL.D. Vols. III. and IV. 8vo, 10s. net each.

. Previously published, Vols. I. and II. 10s. net each. SPEAKER.—"Cannot be read or reviewed without great respect not only for the author's learning, but for his temperance and common sense. He is never a partisan, never writes for effect, and never says more than he means. He has a great command of facts, and his book is filled with them, but not so as to clog the current of his discourse or to obscure his general views."

By LORD AVEBURY.

ESSAYS and ADDRESSES, 1900-1903.

8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

ACADEMY.—"There is a great deal that is of interest and value."

OLD QUEBEC: The Fortress of New France. By Sir GILBERT PARKER and C. G. BRYAN. With Portraits, Illustrations, and Maps. 8vo, 15s. net.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"This fascinating book. An important contribution to the literature of Canada for which we are grateful to the authors."

GIORDANO BRUNO. By J. LEWIS MCINTYRE, M.A., D.Sc. With Photogravure Plate. 8vo, 10s. net.

SPEAKER.—"A very useful and well-executed piece of work."

THE EVERSELEY SERIES.—New Volumes. Globe 8vo, 4s. net each.

HISTORICAL STUDIES.

By JOHN RICHARD GREEN.

STRAY STUDIES. Second Series.

By JOHN RICHARD GREEN.

January Numbers Now Ready.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.

Price 1s. Annual Subscription, post free, 12s.

TEMPLE BAR.

Price 1s. Annual Subscription, post free, 12s.

. Also ready Volume CXXVIII., July-Dec., 7s. 6d.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE. ILLUSTRATED.

Price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, post free, 16s.

The JANUARY Number contains:—THE LATEST NEWS FROM LHASA. A Narrative of Personal Adventure in Tibet. By Rev. EKAI KAWAGUCHI. Illustrated.

THACKERAY'S FRIENDSHIP WITH AN AMERICAN FAMILY.—III. Unpublished Letters and Drawings. By W. M. THACKERAY.

THE SEA-WOLF.—I. By JACK LONDON, Author of "The Call of the Wild."

OUR FRIEND, THE DOG. By MAURICE MAETERLINCK.

And Numerous Other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

. Also ready Volume LXVI., May-Oct., 10s. 6d.

ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE FOR CHILDREN.

ST. NICHOLAS.

Price 1s. Annual Subscription, post free, 12s.

The JANUARY Number contains:—THE SIGNS OF OLD LONDON.—II. By JULIAN K. COLFORD.

CHASED BY WOLVES. A True Story. By J. H. ROCKWELL.

A COMEDY IN WAX. Serial Story. By B. L. FAHJEON.

And numerous other Stories for the Young.

MACMILLAN & Co., Limited, London.

The Academy and Literature

No. 1652. Established 1869. London: 2 January 1904.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17/6 a year.]

Literary Notes

AN announcement is made this week with regard to "Academy" Questions and Answers of a plan which it is hoped will give pleasure to the many who have already shown their appreciation of that feature. Prize Competitions as a rule are only interesting by reason of the prizes offered, but I hope that apart from the prizes the competition will in this instance be interesting in itself.

Now that Christmas is a thing of the past bookmen and booksellers are eagerly turning their thoughts to the promise of spring. That we shall have many books there is no shadow of doubt, but on the whole it appears very doubtful if the next few months will give birth to as many interesting volumes as came forth during the past autumn. If Mr. Herbert Spencer's autobiography is granted to us we may count on at any rate one intellectual treat.

MISS EMILY LAWLESS' volume on Maria Edgeworth for the "English Men of Letters" series, which should prove very good reading, has been delayed owing to the ill-health of the writer. No one knows Irish history and literature better than the author of "Hurrish," from whose pen we have received only too little work. Miss Edgeworth is one of the most interesting figures in the literary history of Ireland, her letters providing most charming reading. She is too often looked upon as the author of old-fashioned books for the young, whereas in truth she owned a splendid gift of humour and was the first to write of Irish life with truth and insight. We do not read sufficient in this country of Irish fiction of the right kind. Carleton, Miss Edgeworth, the Banims, and one or two others—not Lover or Lever—help far more to a better understanding of Irish history than do all the historians.

THERE are two remarkable points in the recently closed sale of "The Encyclopædia Britannica" by The Times to which remarkably little attention has been paid. It is often a matter of complaint that the reading public has been so debauched by cheap and often trashy publications that its literary palate craves for stimulants rather than for nourishment; yet more than forty thousand purchasers have been found for an expensive and even to the serious-minded a hardly appetising work. I do not know what proportion of these thousands purchased the "Britannica" for cash, but of those who bought it on the instalment system it is a striking testimony to British business integrity that an inappreciable percentage only have failed to meet their engagements and that more often through inability than lack of honesty.

THE TIMES sale has been carried on purely by means of advertisement, but in the United States the "Britannica" has been most freely sold through the medium of canvassers, there called "book agents," a persistent, pushing class.

Mrs. W. K. CLIFFORD

[Photo. Booker and Sulltean, Chancery Lane.]

This system of sale, which has seldom succeeded in this country, is the mainstay of many publishing houses in America: big books of all kinds, magazines and journals are all pushed by its aid, and the book agent is a feature of American life.

ARE the Americans more interested than we are in literary news and criticism? It would almost seem so, judging by the large number of admirable literary monthlies published in the United States. Many of them of course are issued by publishing houses in their own interest, but are none the less literary, well written, and excellently illustrated. Over here literary monthlies are practically non-existent, though the "Bookman" and the "Book Monthly" are brilliant exceptions. Is there not room for a well-edited, well-written, and well-illustrated magazine of literature?

"THACKERAY AS AN ARTIST" in the January "Connoisseur," by Mr. Lewis Melville, is rather disappointing, being merely a record and not a criticism. There is room for a serious discussion of Thackeray's merits and demerits as an artist. Should we be the poorer if he had never drawn a line? Possibly no page would have been missing from the history of art, but certainly we should have missed much innocent entertainment and should have lacked a most interesting pictorial comment on Thackeray's works. To me the novelist's drawings for his novels seem not only to help us grasp fully the meaning of the letterpress, but also afford the best guide for the use of future illustrators. Of Thackeray as an art critic it is difficult, if not wrong, to speak highly; if there was heart in a picture it pleased Thackeray and there was an end on't; though he owned also a certain eye for colour and execution. The drawings of the "Bandit's Revenge" reproduced in Mr. Melville's paper are merely funniments.

MR. ANDREW LANG is making fun of Literary Intelligence, and were all literary notes and news such as he describes them to be, then no one but would laugh with him. But Mr. Lang of all people should remember that with the majority of writers authorship is a means of livelihood, and that therefore news as to the work upon which writers are engaged is valued news to those working in the same or similar fields. For example, were Mr. A. L. announced to be at work upon a monograph on the Log-rolling myth, this fact would deter others from writing upon the same subject, and of course induce them to hand over to him whatever material they might have collected. Jestings aside, literary news may save infinite pains being wasted by duplication of books upon the same subject, and is also useful to publishers to prevent them issuing like books at the same moment. Even such a note as "Mr. Edward Jones hopes to have his new novel finished by the end of the month" is not without interest to friends or admirers of Mr. Jones. I for one should be delighted to read that Mr. A. L. had nearly completed a new volume of essays or that Mr. — had a new story nearly completed.

MR. ANDREW LANG also gives us, at that justly popular house "The Sign of the Ship," capital entertainment in the form of an examination paper "Humour Up-to-date," provided him by an intimate friend, whose name it would be wicked to divulge. The following is one of the questions: who shall say that the new humourists are not first-class joking men?

1. John Banyan, author of "The Pilgrim's Progress," took his name from the circumstance that his father's smithy was under a spreading banyan tree (p. 82).

Would it not be equally funny to say that "The Pilgrim's Progress" was by Bunyon, an ally of Mr. Richard Cobden in his crusade against the Corn Laws? Would either remark be worthy of Corne Tooke?

Who shall say that our humour is not light and instructive?

I HOLD no brief either for Miss Marie Corelli or Mr. Flower, but it does appear that the amenities of literature are dead. Miss Corelli is either wrong or right, but her case is not disproved by heaping abuse upon her; she may be as genuinely convinced that she is right as her opponents are convinced that she is wrong, but she is not put out of court by being sneered at and abused. Is it altogether manly to write of a woman as some have permitted themselves to do? Whether Miss Corelli has or has not provoked these attacks upon her I do not pretend to judge, but however bitterly opposed I might be to her views on any subject I think it would be better for the cause I supported if argument were used and not abuse. Whether she be right or wrong the case against her is made no stronger by throwing mud.

"CORNHILL" of this month contains an interesting paper by the late Sir John Robinson on "Charles Dickens and The Guild of Literature and Art." It is quite in keeping to be told of Dickens that "as chairman he was as precise and accurate as possible." The article is only too short. From the article on Theodore Hook, by Lord St. Cyres, I quote, as affording food for commentators:—

Damsels of Marybone, decked out in articles
Borrowed of brokers for shillings and pence;
The eye of vulgarity anything smart tickles,
Sluts love a ride at another's expense.
So swarming like loaches
In ten hackney coaches
They make their approaches
And pull at the bell;
And then they flaunt brave in,
Preceded by Craven
And smart and new-shaven
Topographical Gell.

Verdant green-grocers, all mounted on jackasses
(Lately named Guildfords, in honour of Fred),
Sweet nymphs of Billingsgate, tipsy as Bacchuses,
Rolled in like porpoises hand over head.
A rout of sham sailors
Escaped from their gaolers,
And sea-bred as tailors
From Shropshire or Wilts;
Mark Oldi's smile and Hers
Greeting, as Highlanders,
Half a score Mile-Enders
Shivering in kilts.

Mr. Andrew Lang, master of mysteries, writes upon Kaspar Hauser in the same magazine.

In the "Pall Mall" Brontë enthusiasts will read with interest Mr. William Sharp's "The Brontë Country"; the illustrations are of exceeding interest.

In his introduction to the selection from Browning's poems in the "National Library" (Cassell) Mr. Arthur D. Innes writes very sanely of the poet's occasional obscurity:—

For, though real obscurities exist—sometimes because the thought is unexpected, and it takes time to adjust the mind to it; sometimes because the meaning turns on an allusion which the poet never suspected of being recondite; sometimes because the connecting step between two notions has been jumped as superfluous or obvious; sometimes from sheer compression of phraseology—it is quite an error to suppose that the obscurity is either habitual or wilful.

This sums up the situation exactly, though it does not touch upon the arguable point—whether Browning was a born poet or merely impelled by his tastes to adopt poetry as the medium in which he should say his say. Whatever may be the case as to this, it remains almost certain that Browning will always appeal but to the few; he did not sing for the many, who look to the poet to say well what they have often thought but could not utter.

THE death of Mr. George Gissing on Monday, the 28th December, means a great personal loss to his friends and a great literary loss to lovers of serious fiction. Mr. Gissing made no bid for popularity, but set himself sternly to work to paint life as he saw it, producing studies in grey and black, for the world was to him a sad, rather hopeless dwelling-place. "Demos," "The Nether World," "New Grub Street" and the other tales are all in the same key, dislike almost and distrust of men, women and their ways. In strange contrast, Mr. Gissing wrote by far the best criticism upon the works of Charles Dickens, prince of optimists. "The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft" if not avowedly, were surely in essence autobiographical. Mr. Gissing was born in 1857, educated at Owen's College, Manchester, and published his first work, "The Unclassed," in 1884.

If unfortunately there is war between Japan and Russia, British publishers will be directly affected in two ways. Doubtless the export of books from this country to Japan would be seriously checked, while on the other hand there would be a greatly increased demand at home for works dealing with Japan. Of such there are many, in fact few countries have been written of so well and so much, at any rate in recent years. Japan apparently has the gift of inspiring not only admiration, but the ability to convey by means of pen and ink her "atmosphere" to those who have never visited her shores.

AN edition of "The Swiss Family Robinson" in words of one syllable is promised! Well, that work is not a classic as literature, long years as it has been a nursery favourite. But why words of one syllable? Youngsters unable to understand the book as it is will hardly comprehend its incidents even when narrated in the smallest possible words. The task of translation into words of one syllable cannot have been easy—in fact, I should say impossible if the story has not been reduced as well.

THE letter "A New Field," printed in this week's issue, certainly draws attention to an interesting subject. Incidentally it raises the question whether literary work can be stimulated from the outside? If South Africa and the other colonies are to produce a literature entirely their own it must grow from within, and will, judging from history, grow slowly. America has not shaken off the impress of English letters, our Colonies have hardly endeavoured to do so, and only the future can prove whether there will be a general English Literature of English speaking people, or whether there will be various literatures, homogeneous, living, home-grown and home-centred, belonging to various races but written in one speech.

A DECISION of practical importance to the publishing world has recently been pronounced by the United States Treasury Department. The American Copyright Act provides that "books," which in America is an even more comprehensive word than it is with us, must be printed from type set within the limits of the United States, or from plates made therefrom. It is, however, not stated that they must be actually printed in the United States, and the Treasury Department has now ruled that, although printed abroad, they may be imported into the United States if the type was originally set up there. The conditions of actual manufacture in America are very onerous in many cases, and the fact that it is not absolutely essential is important. It is certainly curious that the point has never been taken before.

THE Harleian Society has just issued to its Members of the Register Section for 1903 the second volume of "The Registers of St. Vedast and St. Michael le Quern, London," edited by Willoughby A. Littledale, Esq., M.A., F.S.A. Those now issued consist of the Marriages and Burials from 1558 to 1837, and they form a substantial volume of 440 pages, including an ample Index. The second volume of the "Lincolnshire Pedigrees," G to O, making nearly 400 pages, has also been recently issued to Members.

IN view of the possible contingency of a war between Japan and Russia the "Sphere" newspaper has already despatched an artist to Japan. This is Mr. I. Sheldon Williams, who has previously won considerable distinction as an artist abroad and made a series of admirable drawings for the "Sphere" of the Indian Durbar.

"KELLY'S POST OFFICE LONDON DIRECTORY, 1904," is with us, imposing, big, and useful as ever. Had one time how many curious and interesting facts might be culled from its pages. Charles Lamb would not count it a book, but it certainly is a "human document." What a boon would be a Kelly of the year—say—1600!

FORTHCOMING BOOKS, ETC.

CANON LESTER'S "The Destiny of Man," the outcome of many years mission work in this country and India, will be published by Messrs. Wells, Gardner, Darton & Co. this month.—Mr. John Long will also publish this month the following new six shilling novels: "Remembrance," by Mrs. Lovett Cameron; "Sly Boots," by John Strange Winter; "Devastation," by Mrs. Coulson Kernahan; "Nurse Charlotte," by L. T. Meade; "Four Red Roses," by Sarah Tytler; "The Iron Hand," by James Maclaren Cobban; "Delphine," by Curtis Yorke; "In Steel and Leather," by R. H. Forster; "A Canadian Girl," by Lieut.-Col. Andrew Haggard; "Toy Gods," by Percival Pickering; "Slaves of Passion," by Helen Bayliss; "Entrapped," by Alice M. Diehl; "Countess Ida," by Fred Whishaw; "A Criminal Cræsus," by George Griffith; and in five shilling form, Guy Boothby's latest "The Lady of the Island" with twelve illustrations by A. T. Smith.—A new volume of verse entitled "Poems and Idylls," by J. Cullen, is announced for immediate publication by Mr. Elliot Stock.—An illustrated Life of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain is to be issued immediately by the Caxton Publishing Company. The author is Mr. Louis Creswicke. The Life will contain a valuable collection of political portraits of Mr. Chamberlain's contemporaries.—Mrs. R. C. Witt, whose article in the "Nineteenth Century" on the Flemish pictures exhibited in the spring at Bruges attracted attention, has been continuing her study of this much-neglected School of Art; and will publish immediately with Messrs. Bell and Sons a handbook on the German and Flemish pictures in the National Gallery. Some years ago we remember Dr. Cosmo Monkhouse did a similar work for some of the Italian pictures, and there have been several books dealing with the English paintings; but the development of the German and Flemish schools has hitherto awaited an exponent. As a handbook to the Flemish rooms in the Gallery it should prove acceptable; it will be well illustrated, and will contain the latest investigation and the most authoritative attributions.—Maeterlinck's Monna Vanna and a volume of essays by the same writer are to be published by Mr. George Allen.—The entire edition of the late Sir William Allan's "Songs of Love and Labour" was destroyed in the fire at Messrs. Leighton, Son, and Hodge; it is now being reprinted and will be issued very shortly.

Bibliographical

IN "Reminiscences and Table Talk of Samuel Rogers," Messrs. Brimley Johnson and G. H. Powell, as publisher and compiler, have turned out an interesting volume. This could hardly fail to be the case, seeing that they have herein given us much of the cream of two notable books—the "Table Talk" of Rogers published in 1856, and his "Recollections," issued in 1859. We have here much excellent anecdote, many bright jeux d'esprit, and also some suggestive statement and comment, which can be recommended to the persons of literary taste to whom they are not known already. The case of the literary student is different. Him I would exhort to go, not to Mr. Powell's compilation, but to the two original books. In these Mr. Powell found, he says, "a good deal which, though possibly welcomed by the friends and contemporaries of Rogers, would be," he thinks, "of little interest to the reader of to-day." That is a matter of opinion. Personally, I think Mr. Powell has made much too free with his editorial pencil. It seems to me, too, that, if the material in the two books was to be re-cast, it should have been arranged on some intelligible system. As it is, it is by no means easy, in perusing this volume, to make out when it is Rogers, or somebody else, who is speaking. Who is the "me" in the top line of page 262? It is Alexander Dyce, but Mr. Powell does not say so. The "Porsoniana" (which, by the way, have nothing whatever to do with Rogers) are, in fact, introduced without any editorial explanation whatever. The same thing occurs in regard to the reported talk of Wellington (page 229). Mr. Powell cannot, in truth, be congratulated upon his skill or tact as editor.

Much, of course, has been said during the last few days about the Ode on Burns which gave the late Mrs. Isa Craig Knox her vogue, and is likely to secure for her a niche in the Temple of Fame. The ode belongs to the year 1859; but three years before that she had published her first volume of poems. Her second, "Duchess Agnes: Odes and Idylls," came out in 1864; her third, "Songs of Consolation," in 1874. She had edited, in 1863, a book of "Poems: an Offering to Lancashire." "Duchess Agnes" was a three-act drama in verse, and had its merits, which were not, however, sufficiently striking to make it live. Mrs. Knox did something in the way of prose fiction, her "Esther West" appearing in 1870, and being reprinted so recently as 1884. Her "Tales on the Parables" (1872 and 1877) were also very popular. Her "Little Folks' History of England," first published in 1872, went into its thirtieth thousand in 1899. Perhaps the best of her lyric pieces is that entitled "Thames."

Many, no doubt, will be glad to hear that Mr. Kipling's "Departmental Ballads and Other Verses" are to be issued in a size and style uniform with that of his other verse-volumes, as published by Methuens. The first edition of the "Ballads" came out at Lahore, and it was, I fancy, in the third edition, published by Thacker & Co. at Calcutta, that they were first introduced to the English public. This was in 1888, and in 1890 came the fourth edition, "with additional poems," which was printed in London, though still bearing the name of Thacker on the title-page. The sixth came out in the following year; the ninth and tenth (both illustrated) in 1897 and 1898 respectively. The edition of 1899 bore the imprint of Messrs. Newnes. In the same year New York distinguished itself by bringing forth a facsimile of the first (Lahore) edition. Here was hero-worship indeed.

In THE ACADEMY of December 19, 1903, I gave a list of ten English editions of Frederick Locker's "London Lyrics," copied from a list made by the author himself. A well-known bibliographer, writing to me on the subject, will have it that the editions of the "Lyrics" issued between 1857 and 1885 were not ten, but eleven, in number. There were editions, he says (and he possesses a copy of each of them), in 1857, 1862, 1865, 1868, 1870, 1872, 1874, 1876, 1878, 1881, and 1885. Now the edition of 1881 does not figure in Mr. Locker's list; and it does not do so, I suspect, for the reason that (as my correspondent himself admits) the 1881 edition was only a cheap reprint of its predecessor. A reprint, I think, should not be described as an edition, which, to be worthy of that name, ought to have something distinctive about it. A reprint should rank as an "impression." A "new edition" should differ in some way from its predecessors.

CANON H. C. BEECHING

[Photo. Booker and Sullivan, Chancery Lane.]

There were three other issues of the "Lyrics" (than those mentioned) in Mr. Locker's life-time—in 1889, 1891 and 1893—making thirteen in all. Of the "Lyrics" its author appears to have made at least six private distributions, in forms differing from the public issues in some way—in 1868, 1872, 1874, 1876, 1881 and 1882. In the case of the 1868 distribution, twenty copies were on large paper, with Cruikshank's etching, "The Pixies were the Wags"; of the remainder, some had the etching, some had not; while in a very few the etching was coloured. In the 1874 distribution Doyle's illustrations of the 1865 volume were separately inserted—which was also done in the case of the distribution of 1876. With regard to that of 1881, my correspondent says that it contained Caldecott's frontispiece in two states—in one the girl has a feather in her hat, in the other she has not. In my own copy the frontispiece is in one state only—that with the feather.

The novel, "Green Mansions: a Romance of the Tropical Forest," which Messrs. Duckworth will publish at the end of this month, is, it would seem, the work of the Mr. W. H. Hudson who wrote "El Ombu," "Nature in Downland," and so forth—not of the other Mr. W. H. Hudson, of whom I wrote the other day. So the publishers say, and they ought to know. "For intense poetical feeling and haunting charm," a paragraph tells us, "Green Mansions" is "perhaps the most original and spiritual of all Mr. Hudson's writings." By quoting that, I hope to propitiate Mr. Samuel Waddington, who writes to say that my reference to this Mr. Hudson's "books on natural history, and birds in particular" "seems inadequate." Mr. Waddington thinks that "No one who has read 'Idle Days in Patagonia' or 'The Naturalist in La Plata' can doubt that, as a master of prose style, Mr. Hudson is almost, if not altogether, worthy to rank with the late Robert Louis Stevenson."

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews

The Dominion

CANADA IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY. By A. G. Bradley.
(Constable. 16s. net.)

A STUDY of Canada done by an impartial hand was greatly needed, and it has been done at last, and well done. Years ago, when I first read in "Macmillan's" Mr. Bradley's articles on the first colonisation of Canada, I was convinced by the thoroughness of his method, by the sincerity of his mind, by the sound scholarship upon which his comments were founded. These first impressions have been justified by prolonged experience, and here we have a book on a land which I know well, worthy of a permanent place in the social history of a young nation. It is more than a diary of travel, or a series of impressions; very subtly, and without preachment, it shows the relations between the things that are and the things that were. It links cause and effect, it sees behind the unfinished and the crude the eloquence and the dignity of the noble history of two suffering peoples; for the hurt to the French amour propre by conquest, and the hurt to British pride by that defeat which sent sixty thousand of them exiles into Upper Canada from the American colonies, their homes and property confiscated, lie beneath the passionate devotion which Canadians of both races feel towards the great Dominion; accounts for the steady and somewhat grim force with which they have persevered towards this prosperous day. It is because Mr. Bradley knows completely that he writes completely, that his judgments are weighty, and that he convinces those who have travelled the same path. There is no attempt in the long description and analysis to startle or to charm, there are no purple patches, and yet the book commands the attention as surely as it satisfies the mind which likes colour and form as well as fact. The book has appeared at an opportune time, and it cannot fail of political effect, though there are no politics in its pages. But so much is said by those who should know better, sometimes by those high in authority, which is injuriously inaccurate, that this record cannot fail to be a corrective of serious errors in statement and opinion. If I could I would put this volume in the hands of every public man in the Empire, of every merchant and manufacturer, of every intending settler. This seems high praise, but it is no more than justice, and because it is good that the peoples of the Empire should understand each other better, it is good also that such careful work as this should be valued according to its real place in Imperial literature.

The book covers a wide field, and the observations it contains are minute without being wearisome or redundant. Accurate analysis of the great eastern cities, Toronto and Montreal, and of the conditions under which the people live is set forth in language at once simple and distinguished, and no Canadian could so effectively have used the golden measure of judgment. Mr. Bradley has the independence of thought to present the truth as it appears to him, and the people of the Dominion can take no exception to his facts or to his manner of presenting them. Truths of vital character are given in terms calculated to impress and not to irritate. How better could the case of French Canadians be put than in the following sentences?—

One does not expect from so self-centred a people any enthusiasm for our Imperial ventures. At the same time many French Canadians have said to me, and hundreds have said it elsewhere and written it over and over again, that if Canada were attacked by the United States the Province of Quebec would be the last to yield.

Thrusts he gives too, but with so urbane a manner that the truth gets home and leaves no hurt behind, and the thrust is accompanied generally by a dig at the Old Land, which achieves a contrast flattering to the Canadian and easily convincing. Solid, informing and genuine, every page exhibits a wide knowledge of Canada. A great service would have been done the Empire if the book had been written years ago. As it is, here is a reliable compendium, an illuminating study, written by a distinguished historical student in a distinguished manner and worthy of wide consideration.

GILBERT PARKER.

Fynes Moryson

SHAKESPEARE'S EUROPE: UNPUBLISHED CHAPTERS OF FYNES MORYSON'S ITINERARY. Being a survey of the condition of Europe at the end of the Sixteenth Century. Edited by C. Hughes. (Sherratt and Hughes. 15s. net.)

MR. HUGHES has placed students under no small obligations to him by printing for the first time this interesting narrative of travel by an adventurous contemporary of Shakespeare. Fynes Moryson, a fellow of Peterhouse, Cambridge, devoted the six years, 1591-1597, to an extended tour through the Continent of Europe, travelling as far as Jerusalem. On the outward journey he spent a winter at Leipsic, a summer at Heidelberg, some weeks in Copenhagen and Cracow, and many months in Padua, Venice, Florence, Denmark and France. Before he finally returned home, the islands of the Greek Archipelago came within the scope of his survey, and he made a long sojourn in Constantinople.

In later life Moryson spent three years on a record of his observations, but his manuscript grew to such bulky dimensions, that with a consideration very rare in authors he destroyed it and engaged on a briefer narrative of his experiences. But even the epitome was designed on a generous scale, and Moryson was not encouraged to publish more than a portion of it in his lifetime. Three of the four completed parts of his Itinerary appeared in 1617; a fourth part was ready for the press nine years later; but it remained in manuscript until Mr. Hughes took it in hand in the past year.

The newly published contribution to Moryson's Itinerary mainly deals with the political constitutions of European states. But Moryson writes with a vivacity, bred of personal knowledge, on themes which are not always in themselves of first-rate interest. More attractive is the light that he throws on the affairs of his own country. His notes on English life and society were, he tells us, intended to form part of an exhaustive "treatise of England," with which he went no further. The fragments which survive in the newly printed "Itinerary" are of great value to the Elizabethan scholar. His account of what he calls "the singularities" of his countrymen is admirable reading.

After defending Englishmen from the imputation of being inhospitable and insolent in their treatment of foreign visitors, he points out that they are more addicted to pleasure than any other nation in the world. The love of the theatre was developed to a like extent nowhere else, and English actors "excel all others in the world." His testimony to the popularity of travelling companies of English actors on the continent of Europe is of peculiar importance. Actors passed, Moryson says, into the Netherlands, and into Germany, and their performances there were attended by vast crowds. The foreign auditors were quite ignorant of the English language, but were attracted by the English players' action or gesticulation. Merchants at fairs, Moryson says, "bragged more to have seen the English actors than of the good markets they made." The sports of hunting and hawking were also pursued in England with an enthusiasm that was unknown to the continent. In fact, there was no kind of amusement, from rope dancing to morris dancing, nor any species of rustic merriment, such as maypoles or harvest homes, which enjoyed more favour than in England. At the same time gambling was practised at home to a perilous extent which was not endured elsewhere.

Mr. Hughes' mode of editing is adequate, though in some points it is capable of improvement. He has supplied in his introduction some new and useful information about Moryson, which is a valuable supplement to my own article in the Dictionary of National Biography. But it is to be regretted that Mr. Hughes has failed to supply a full and detailed list of contents or a general index. These defects diminish the utility of his book as a work of reference.

SIDNEY LEE.

The Valley of the Shadow of Ugliness

THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS. By John Bunyan. Illustrated with 25 drawings on wood by George Cruikshank. (Oxford University Press. 25s. net.)

ALTHOUGH, so far as printing and format are concerned, this edition of the ever new allegory is all that can be desired, I, as a good Cruikshankian, must own to a feeling of profound disappointment. Emphatically these illustrations are not, as the preliminary announcements led us to suppose, "fine examples of the artist's work," except in one instance, that of "Vanity Fair," nor are they "thoroughly appropriate to Bunyan's text." It is stultifying to Cruikshank to make the first statement, it is insulting to Bunyan to make the second. To take the last point first. Wherein does a good illustration consist? A good illustration elucidates—in other words, throws light upon—the text, adding nothing to it that is incongruous but bringing out points which more essentially appeal to the sense of vision. And wherein do these illustrations satisfy or fall short of these requirements? Surely a glance will show us. Look at Apollyon on the frontispiece. He is as forcible-feeble as his prototype is forcible-strong. He is surely out of a pantomime. He is as incongruous with the text as we find him incongruous with himself as delineated opposite page 57. And here is a point which surely must have weighed with those who were well advised forty years ago not to publish these illustrations. Cruikshank has not only failed to assimilate or get into sympathy with his text, but he has in more than one instance actually committed the unforgivable sin of contradicting himself. We need only draw attention to the designs already mentioned and the two of Christian and Mercy at the Wicket Gate opposite pages 26 and 177 to emphasise the fact. In these latter the contradictions are almost beyond belief. But it is not only, indeed not chiefly, the carelessness of the work that renders it valueless, but the total absence of concord with the grandeur and tenderness of Bunyan's great conception. Where the author thunders, the artist pops off some very poor fireworks. Where the author makes his characters sublime, the artist has only succeeded in making them ridiculous. So this publication is unfair to Bunyan and not less unfair to Cruikshank if, as may be hoped, his better judgment concurred with those who originally decided not to publish his designs. For he could be, and was when the mood was on him, a great illustrator. Look at his "Grimm," his "Jack Sheppard," his unsurpassable "Lord Bateman," his hundred delightful etched plates. Had these wood-engravings—indeed, had half of their number—been of the quality of that entitled "Vanity Fair" there would have been some excuse for enshrining them in what is a really beautiful casket, but since the most ardent Cruikshankian would not accord even to that illustration first-rate honours, and would consign twenty out of the twenty-five to his very worst period, the venture cannot be looked upon as anything but a work of supererogation.

I am conscious that I have spoken somewhat strongly of a publication which, apart from the illustrations, does the publisher the greatest credit, but this plain speaking is the outcome of very keen disappointment and a jealous regard for the reputation of a great and original artist. I know there are many who decry Cruikshank as trivial and vulgar, but these are of that unhappy class which always looks for the worst in great men, not the best. Judge a man by his failures and who shall hold up his head? And I cannot but record my protest against the practice which is abroad of resurrecting that which the past has rightly done its best to consign to deserved oblivion. We have had it in the case of a great philosopher who was indiscreet enough to leave behind him the manuscript of a callow novel. We have had it lately in the case of a great poet who had taken every reasonable precaution to purge his poems of their dross. And we have it now in the case of a great original artist who, whatever his limitations, whatever his foolish foibles and weaknesses, yet deserves so far as his finest achievement is concerned, to be ranked little short of the best of English book-illustrators. And who, with these designs (barring the "Vanity Fair" and perhaps two others) before him, and with no previous knowledge of the "great George's" work, would believe that such could conceivably be the case?

GEORGE SOMES LAYARD.

"Pol. Econ."

ELEMENTS OF POLITICAL ECONOMY. By J. Shield Nicholson, M.A., D.Sc. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)

A NEW handbook to economics was greatly needed. Fawcett's Manual suffers in more ways than one: it is at best a summary, a réchauffé of another man's book, it is wanting in logical closeness, it has never been brought down to date. Walker's "Political Economy" leapt into popularity, but scarcely stands the test of usage. It is no disparagement of it to say that it is throughout American in its atmosphere and in its perspective, its style is faulty, and the additions which the writer claimed to have made to economic theory, in the chapters on Profits and Wages, have hardly survived criticism. Professor Marshall's "Economics of Industry," ideal as it is in many ways, is limited to a part of the subject. The way then lay clear for Professor Nicholson, and teachers have been anxiously awaiting the publication of his "Elements" to supply the handbook they needed. It were idle to say that he has wholly succeeded in doing so, and, in truth, the writer of an "Elements" has formidable difficulties to face. It requires a great nicety of judgment to hit the mean between a condescension in imparting knowledge which offends ignorance and an assumption of familiarity which baffles the beginner. Readers of Professor Nicholson's "Principles" do not need to be told how lucid is his statement, how clear his judgment, and how well balanced, and every student of economics must be grateful to him for combining these qualities with so much practical knowledge and analytical power. But the "Elements" lacks that sense of proportion which is always a teacher's aim; but which so often eludes him. The exact perception of what a pupil knows and what he does not know, the instinctive power of measuring how much he can profitably absorb, or of realising the point at which instruction will cease to strengthen his faculties and weaken or confuse him: all this, which it is the life-work of most of us teachers to acquire, must be the stock-in-trade of the writer of a handbook. And so the question suggests itself whether it is easier to write the small work before the large, or vice versa. Each course has difficulties of its own, and Professor Nicholson seems sometimes to assume a familiarity on the part of the readers of the "Elements" with the processes of the "Principles," and to give results which are hardly intelligible without the steps by which they are attained. Take the following passage as an example, on the harmonies of labour and capital:—

Lastly, there is the method of coöperation, in which, in its full development, the workers provide both the capital and the business management. Coöperation has had an immense success in trade as distinguished from production in the narrow sense. But although recently there has been some increase of coöperative production, the aggregate amount in the industrial world is of little importance. The great difficulty seems to be in the management. There is a natural reluctance to give either sufficient powers or sufficient wages to the manager (page 197).

Surely a beginner would be dreadfully puzzled by the above, although to one who is familiar with the subject it would be difficult to put the point more concisely or more plainly. Professor Nicholson has already used the word coöperation in a simpler sense when speaking of the division of labour, and there is nothing to show that there is a change of meaning. To assume that coöperative production is the provision by the workers of capital and business management is hardly fair after Walker's convincing analysis. To do no more than hint at the existence of the vast system of coöperative distribution is to lose all hold upon proportion, and to neglect an admirable example of the working of certain forces. No doubt the Rochdale Pioneers have been the enfants gâtes of previous economists, but still coöperators deserve something more than a word in passing. It is one thing to impress a result by a well-framed epigram, it is quite another to train the mind by the exhibition of a carefully considered and well-ordered logical process, and Professor Nicholson does not always distinguish between the two. It is the primary duty of the author of a "Principles" to convince, but the writer of an "Elements" may be content if he has awakened and stimulated interest. Nor does the order and arrangement of the "Elements" enlist our sympathy. Surely it is far better to abandon Mills's plan of beginning with production and working on to exchange. Archbishop Whately was right, and Professor Marshall follows him in beginning with the actual concrete phenomena of value, the price of bread, the wages of labour, the rent of land, and working outwards. Such an arrangement appeals at once to the practical and (within certain limits) scientific mind of the ordinary student.

A review of the "Elements" is no place for a criticism of the views put forward in the "Principles." The economic world—and of late it has seen a vast alien immigration—owes a debt to Professor Nicholson on many points. His revival of the Wages Fund in an intelligible and reasonable form, his views on socialism, his sturdy orthodoxy as to foreign trade, all these and much more compelled our admiration, nor do we give it grudgingly. But is it one thing to write a "Principles," and another to write an "Elements," non omnia possumus omnes. An ideal handbook is yet to seek, though Professor Nicholson has given us much that must figure in it.

L. R. PHELPS.

The Great Impressionist

THE WATER-COLOUR DRAWINGS OF J. M. W. TURNER, R.A., IN THE NATIONAL GALLERY. With descriptive text by Theodore A. Cook. (Cassell. 63s. net.)

ONE of the handsomest of sumptuous books is this reproduction in colours of some fifty-eight of Turner's masterpieces. To be able to scan at leisure in one's own room reproductions that repeat, as nearly as it seems possible for human skill to do it, the mystery and glory of colouring that was this man's sublime achievement, is next best to possessing the precious things themselves. The three-colour process is, I take it, the means employed; and the makers of the blocks and Mr. Edwin Bale, R.I., are to be congratulated on their work. The colour and the large handling and purity of tone in the fine "Dartmouth" are marvellously caught—its liquid atmosphere beautifully rendered. The subtle tenderness of the tones in "Okehampton Castle," conveying the rich sense of colour that makes this water-colour drawing the superb thing it is, is translated with astounding effect. The "Kirkstall Abbey" is a particularly beautiful piece of colour-reproduction. And the superb "Norham Castle," one of Turner's most exquisite masterpieces, is rendered with surprising verisimilitude. And with the French series the engravers have been equally successful, the "The Tower of Francis I. at Havre" is given with a perfection that makes the very paper seem toned. The tender greys of the "Tidal Wave" drawing, and its dainty touch are absolutely true as far as memory serves one, as are the rich harmonies of the "Steam-tug coming down from Villequier." The atmosphere and beauty of technique in "Pont de l'Arche" and of "The Post Road from Vernon to Mantes" are a severe test on colour-printing; but the resulting blocks are as fine as any in the series. The glorious purple-blue "Mantes" is wonderfully rendered. To possess this book is to possess three or four dozen pictures that are well worth framing; they bring repute to everyone concerned in their making. The effect of water-colour throughout is wholly successful.

Mr. Theodore Cook contributes the letterpress which, instead of being the dull affair that we usually associate with that word in most artistic books, is vastly interesting, at any rate in its first half, as showing considerable dissatisfaction with accepted definitions of the word art. Indeed, Mr. Cook comes very near to discovering the meaning of the word, but he cannot shake off its confusion with beauty.

He starts with the necessity to define the word art—remarking, be it noted, that "we can to-day approach the enquiry with less excuse for prejudice than many of our greater predecessors"; and proceeds to the very sane decision that a definition of art must apply to all art and every branch of art. He makes one hope that he has seized the truth when he, almost at the beginning, quotes Durer's saying from "The Banquet for Young Painters," that "the art of Painting is made for the eyes, for the sight is the noblest sense of man." The italics are mine. Indeed, he goes so near realising that art is the expression of emotion, that it is a pity he confuses his view by surrendering to, or fearing to break from, the old patter about beauty. The moment he confuses art and beauty he is lost, or, at least, "fobbed." Landscape, he says, "is necessarily an attempt to create beauty. That attempt is the aim of all art." Well, it is nothing of the kind. Indeed, that is the serious drawback to the statement. Landscape is an attempt to transmit a mood of nature. Our author realises this a little later on when he forgets about beauty: "the landscape painter is powerless if he does not evoke sympathy with his own mood." That is very nearly the truth. But this beauty fallacy dogs his feet: "Art has invariably aimed at the revelation of beauty." Well, it has not. Shakespeare is the greatest artist of the world, but he did not aim at beauty as the ultimate thing—he aimed at creating emotion. Indeed, the great failures in art are due to the painter's mistaking beauty for art. The fact is, of course, that beauty is only one of the emotions. Ugliness is quite as legitimate an emotion in art, as Velasquez and Rembrandt well knew—and as every writer of tragedy, or death, or tears, or violence well knows. And in his heart, he occasionally has the courage to throw the incubus of this Greek fallacy off his back; for we find him saying later on that art is "the appeal to the senses." Yet he fears to prove it. "Art is rather spiritual than material," he says. Certainly it is, but it is not quite the full statement—what he should say is that it is emotional. There is nothing naughty or immoral in the recognition. It is so—there is an end of it. And it is abundantly clear that Mr. Cook has only to rid himself of the beauty obsession to find out what is art; for he recognises even now the fact that art is not nature, but selects from nature—that art does not record the facts of nature, but uses them only as symbols and tools to express moods and emotions. It is all in that: not a copy of a place, but “the mood of nature.” His sneer at anecdote is stupid. Anecdote may be expressed in art if turned into the terms of emotion. Hogarth was absolutely anecdotal; so was Chaucer. Anecdote may be harmful, or it may be of service. Like all else, it depends on its use.

And as a last word of praise, I can only add that Mr. Cook's treatment of Turner's biography is almost ideal in its spirit and key.

HALDANE MACFALL.

The Grey City

OXFORD. Painted by John Fulleylove, R.I. Described by Edward Thomas. (Black. 20s. net.)

As a painted record of Oxford this book is a signal failure, as a written picture it is a striking success. Too commonly with “art” volumes the text is considered to be so subsidiary to the illustrations that little care is given to producing good work, but this publication is a singular exception to the rule, so much so, that the publishers would do well to issue the letterpress apart from the pictures.

Mr. Fulleylove knows Oxford intimately and it is difficult to account for the fact that for Oxford's colouring he apparently has no feeling whatever; to him Oxford is painted red, whereas every lover of the city knows that its uniform is grey, faced with green in the summer time and with scarlet in the autumn. It is not necessary to criticise the drawings one by one, but among the most striking failures may be named “The University Church of St. Mary,” “Grove Street,” “All Soul's College and The High Street,” “Parsons' Pleasure,” “The Torn Quadrangle, Christ Church,” “The River Isis,” and “High Street Looking East,” and among the partially successful, “Torn Tower” (to which title is added “Christ Church College”!), “Magdalen Tower and Bridge,” “Christ Church—Peckwater Quadrangle,” and “Queen's College from Logic Lane.” Mr. Fulleylove has absolutely failed to do justice either to Oxford or himself.

For the written matter we have little but praise; Mr. Thomas has very nearly caught the atmosphere of Oxford and of Varsity life, a difficult task indeed. He errs in being a thought too precious, too whimsical, the full-bodied flavour of Undergraduate life has escaped him. In page after page he gives us delightful sketches of Oxford men and of Oxford manners, past and present, dons and undergraduates, out-door life and sedentary. Those who know not Oxford may learn much concerning it and acquire a taste of its delights from this volume; those of us who were of it can renew old acquaintances and retaste old joys. No place in the world, perhaps, lays so firm a hand upon our hearts and it is a great pleasure to read the lines of a writer who, on the whole, knows and understands the grey city. We may be permitted a short quotation in justification of our praise and in justice to Mr. Thomas: “In Oxford, nothing is the creation of one man or one year. Every college and church and garden is the work of centuries of men and time. Many a stone reveals an octave of colour that is the composition of a long age. The founder of a college laid his plans; in part, perhaps, he fixed them in stone. His successors continued the work, and without haste, without contempt of the future or ignorance of the past, helped the building to ascend into complete beauty by means of its old and imperfect selves.”

Mr. Thomas is not on every occasion accurate, but he is always interesting and sometimes quite delightful.

Dante's Inferno

THE EXILES OF ETERNITY. By the Rev. J. S. Carroll, M.A. (Hodder and Stoughton. 7s. 6d. net.)

THE chief merit of Mr. Carroll's exposition of the Inferno is that he brings out in it the meaning and significance of its arrangement and structure. The imagery and the material setting of the poem, its reminiscence of mediæval callousness, Dante's occasional demonic seizures—his ubiquitous as Dr. Moore aptly names it—lose, however, all their terrors when prosaically explained. So numerous and cheap are translations of the Inferno, so sound and exhaustive the English commentaries, that it is difficult to think of anything else which could be done to smooth the beginner's first descent along the dolorous way. After reading this book the beginner is recommended to go straight to Dante in a good prose translation and to look up his difficulties in some authoritative edition of the comedy. We have space only for a few annotations and criticisms.

“When a man climb a hill so that his right foot is always the lower, he must be rounding it towards the right” (page 13). Has Mr. Carroll ever tried this way of ascending a hill and bearing to the right? On page 71 Dante's relegation of unbaptized children to the limbo of virtuous pagans is spoken of as merciful, because there the children “suffer no pain even of loss.” Why put them there at all, especially as Bernard, who is made the confessor of the creed, would most certainly have disavowed it?—see Wicksteed's note to his Paradiso.

The note on page 114 stating that “Auri sacra” fames may be translated “hallowed hunger of gold” is without significance as it stands. The point is, of course, if you do so translate Dante's translation of this phrase, what does it mean, and secondly, are you free to translate “reggi” by “drivest”?

On pages lxii. hell is referred to as though it had been made by Lucifer's fall: “The vast subterranean hollow thus formed (italics ours) was utilised as the eternal prison of the finally impenitent. This would make hell an afterthought, an effect of the angelic revolt and not a co-temporary with the first things created—an idea foreign to mediæval scholasticism.

We gather the conviction in reading Mr. Carroll's pages that he is quite obsessed with the purely moral aspect of the Inferno and seems to forget that Dante as well as moralist is both artist and man—a creature of his own times; essentially mediæval in his occasional lapses into pitilessness towards those guilty of crimes quite alien to his own nature and just as pitiful and humane in his treatment of offences to which passionate and sensitive natures yield a too ready response. In Circle Two where the carnal are troubled, he drops as one dead; but—to take a single instance—in Ptolomæa he acts with deliberate cruelty, as if anxious to mimic the crime of treachery therein punished, and passes into the next circle with the complacent observation—

Ed io non gli ele apersi
Et Cortesia fu in lui esser villano.

Mr. Carroll sees little in this act deserving of censure and gives to it an ethical interpretation.

Why does the author omit to acknowledge his indebtedness to two books of which he makes very full use: Rickaby's translation of parts of the “Summa” of Thomas Aquinas and Selfe and Wicksteed's translations from Villam's Chronicle?

The English reader ought to have his attention drawn to these two valuable books. Mr. Carroll always gives the reference to the original texts leaving the reader to infer—however unintentionally on his part—that the translations are his own. Perhaps this omission will not disfigure the next edition.

F. KETTLE.

The Champagne of History

THE LETTERS OF HORACE WALPOLE, FOURTH EARL OF ORFORD. Chronologically arranged and edited with Notes and Indices by Mrs. Paget Toynbee. In sixteen volumes, with Portraits and Facsimiles. Vols. I. to IV. (Clarendon Press. Each, 6s.)

OUR last extended reference to Horace Walpole was in connection with Sir Spencer Walpole's little volume of thirty unpublished letters issued by Messrs. Longmans early in 1902. That book is now the last entry in the bibliography of the Letters prefixed to Mrs. Paget Toynbee's long-expected and monumental edition. In all, thirteen collections of Walpole's Letters have been published, twelve of which poured their contents into Peter Cunningham's nine-volume edition, first issued in 1857 and enlarged in 1891. The present sixteen-volume edition, of which the first four volumes are before us, is the latest and greatest attempt to gather up and correctly present the immense epistolary memoirs which for more than fifty years flowed from Horace Walpole's pen. Whereas Cunningham's edition contains 2,654 letters representing 95 correspondents, Mrs. Toynbee will print 3,061 letters, representing 150 correspondents. Of the 407 letters not in Cunningham 111 are now printed for the first time.

These figures far exceed any that can be given concerning our other great letter-writers: Gray, Cowper, Byron, Lamb, FitzGerald, and others. The largest collection of letters edited in recent years, that of Byron's, contains little more than a third of the number of letters written by Walpole. But these men wrote in the intimacies of friendship, with a corresponding expenditure of feeling; Walpole wrote to build up memoirs in the manner of Saint Simon, and cynicism is ever a longer stayer than emotion.

Mrs. Toynbee gives a clear and interesting account of her stewardship. Her aim, of course, has been to collect as many letters as possible, and to verify the text of as many letters as possible. In neither case has she met with all the success she deserves. There are some of Walpole's letters at Holland House which the Earl of Ilchester withholds. Repeated inquiries in England and America have failed to reveal the originals of many interesting letters to Walpole's more scattered correspondents, and in other cases access to originals has been impracticable. Nevertheless, a very considerable number of letters have been collated by their originals, often with curious results. The letters to Sir Horace Mann (823 in number) are printed from the original MS. in the possession of Earl Waldegrave at Chewton Priory. These "originals," however, are really Horace Walpole's own copies of the true originals which he had received back from Sir Horace Mann, and it is known that they are not in all respects true copies. Walpole carefully suppressed certain passages. Yet the world nearly supped full on his audacities, for his secretary Kirkgate made unauthorised copies of the suppressed passages. On his death these came into the hands of Mrs. Damer, Walpole's executrix, and proof exists that they were destroyed by her in December, 1810.

Suppression, however, has not ended here. Mrs. Toynbee was surprised to discover that Cunningham had omitted many passages without any indication of his deletions. The passages he discarded are mostly unfit for publication, though others are of a harmless character. The latter, and eleven complete letters which Cunningham left out altogether, have now been restored. This is but one example of Mrs. Toynbee's adventures among Horace Walpole's amazingly voluminous and scattered correspondence. In the case of thirty-four letters to Hannah More, Mrs. Toynbee had particular cause to regret not being able to see the originals of more than five, for of those which passed through her hands several had been tampered with considerably, even to the extent of the insertion—in Hannah's own saintly hand—of words and phrases which Walpole never wrote!

It is interesting to observe how Walpole's letters are scattered through the stately homes of England. Besides Earl Waldegrave's great collection, there are letters of extreme interest (but there is a wonderful equality of interest in all that Walpole wrote to his friends) in the possession of Viscount Cobham, Sir Villiers Lister, Sir William Anson, Sir John Fenn, Sir William Hamilton, the Duke of Bedford, the Earls of Carlisle and Mount Edgcumbe, Sir Spencer Walpole, and—among many others—Mr. Vernon Watney, the present occupant of the house in Berkeley Square with which Walpole was so pleased and in which he died.

Since our space on this occasion will permit of little more than a description of the externals of this great edition, let us add that it is in all respects admirably equipped. The task of finding any given letter has been made very easy indeed, and the last volume will consist entirely of indices and other helps. Each volume contains four photogravure reproductions of portraits, many of which are of a rare interest. An admirable feature is a reprint in the first volume of Horace Walpole's "Short Notes of My Life," continued by the editor from the year 1779 at which point he left off.

From time to time, as the remaining volumes arrive, we shall endeavour to touch on those qualities of Walpole's singular mind which, in this age of hurry and brevities, make the reissue of his letters in sixteen octavo volumes a delight, and every letter added a triumph. We congratulate editor and publishers on the auspicious launch of a most important undertaking.

Poetry

THE HUNDRED LOVE-SONGS OF KAMAL-AD-DIN OF ISFAHAN. Now First Translated from the Persian by Louis H. Gray and Done into English Verse by Ethel Watts Mumford. (David Nutt.)

THE POEMS OF PHILIP FRENEAU: POET OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION. Edited by Fred Lewis Pattee Vol. II. (Princeton, N.J.: The University Library. $3 net.)

HORACE FOR ENGLISH READERS Being a Translation of the Poems of Quintus Horatius Flaccus into English Prose. By E. C. Wickham, D.D., Dean of Lincoln. (Oxford: Clarendon Press. 3s. 6d. net.)

YET another Persian poet follows in the triumphant wake of FitzGerald's much-FitzGeraldized Omar; and (almost equally of course) it is a love-poet. Love and pessimism are the only themes (apart from the Rule-Britannia strain, which you cannot look for in a mere Persian) that the present enlightened day will hearken to in poetry. When the two are conjoined, as in this case, what could you wish for more? Kamal-Ad-din was a Persian of between the twelfth and thirteenth century, who complimented potentates in verse, wrote rubaiyat to his mistress' eyebrow, and was tortured to death by the Tartars when Octai Khan conquered Persia. His neighbours hid their valuables in his well, and a Tartar soldier accidentally discovered that wells may have at bottom something more precious to a Tartar than Truth. They tortured poor Kamal to make his disclose further treasure, and having none to disclose, he died. But he made a couple of rubaiyat in dying, which must have greatly consoled him for the little Oriental accident.

The poems (rubaiyat—let us not forget the now blessed word!) are of course addressed to a vendible lady, or ladies—most Oriental, as most classical, erotic poetry is. They are preceded by a preface extolling this species of passion as the fine flower of love; the writer apparently rather envying that blissful individual, the lover of the Lady with the Camellias. But the poems? Well the poems, even in translation, unexpectedly show a decided power. Miss (or Mrs.) Mumford's verse is too languid, too rigidly conformable to rule, with too little vital pulsation, and her execution generally partakes of the same too fluent character. But it does to a large extent enable us to feel the breath of poetry in the original, and for this she deserves undoubted praise. There is passion, there is tenderness, there is beauty of imagery, all of no mean order; and for these things the joint translators must share praise with the original, since a thing of this kind is virtually an English poem based on a foreign source. One can understand and believe that Kamal is a Persian poet of a tender fervour and abundant fancy, but—it is not a second Fitzgerald, nor like to take any permanent place in our literature, as the best poetic translations have done.

You have never heard of Philip Freneau? That, reader, can only be ascribed to your British prejudice, your dread of Freedom, your aversion to reading the Tyrtaeus of your own overthrow. For here is the second of two bulky volumes, a third yet to appear, containing his collected poems. Moreover, they have been hailed with gratulation by the free American press, unshackled by our tyrannical bondage. Here, cries a literary organ, is "the real Father of American Poetry, who at last seems to be coming to his own." Undoubtedly, says a great newspaper, "the first true poet born upon our continent." Says another: "The earliest notable American Poet." A third acclaims "this master of satirical verse and versified polemic." There is one singular neglect. Nobody seems to have discovered him to be some very great man all over again—the American Byron, or Milton, for example.

Well, reader, not to keep you in too painful a suspense, this is probably the last, as it is the first, you will hear of Philip Freneau. We are not educated up to him yet. It requires too revolutionary a readjustment of ideas; and we are conservative. For if Freneau was the first true poet born on the American continent, then it must follow, as the night the day, that Poe, and Emerson, and Longfellow are bastards. If he must be placed on the family-tree of American poetry, we should conceive him to have been the Grandfather of American poetry—if not the Great-great-grandfather. One of his chief poems is alleged to be the "British Prison-Ship." It is a stilted piece of patriotism after the school of Pope—sometimes actually ludicrous in its empty mouthings. And this antiquated pomposity is his general style. Cornwallis, "arch-butcher of the times"—

Rov'd uncontroul'd this wasted country o'er,
Strew'd plains with dead, and bath'd his jaws with gore.

To us this is indeed "notable," but not exactly for poetry. And if Freneau be indeed coming to his own, we prefer to believe that "his own" are the American papers. Of literary Americans we have a very different opinion.

In reviewing a recent verse-rendering of Horace's great fellow-poet, we urged the futility of wasting scholarly abilities on metrical translations of the classics—a supremely difficult task which exacts the power of the poet far more than the acquirements of the scholar. Gladly, therefore, we welcome a scholarly and able translator who has chosen the better path, and that in the case of the poet who most provokes Anglo-Saxon nature to the impossible emprise of poetic version. From the beginning of things down to Gladstone, it has been the received foible of men with cultivation and leisure—or cultivation without leisure—to slander Horace in verse. Few, very few, have had sanity or self-restraint to take the possible way of prose; few, and they have not been remarkable. Which suggests an ignored truth—that even the prose rendering of a poet is no such easy matter. In old days, when Latin was the common tongue of cultured Europe, every Greek classic as a matter of course was rendered into Latin prose; and this, as Dean Wickham suggests, is the proper parallel, which is happily becoming adopted in the matter of English prose versions of English classics. How fine, how even classic, such things may be without the Homeric translations of Mr. Andrew Lang and his colleagues.

A fine prose translation (as Dean Wickham again says) appeals to two classes. Firstly, the man whose Latin has grown rusty, but who still has genial memories of his early Horace. Secondly, the man who has no Latin, yet is interested in what he can learn of writers sealed to him save through the medium of translation. As classic education grows rarer, this class grows less rare—indeed, is now very common. There are a surprising number of quite literary men who stand in this position. To such men of taste a metrical libel on the great Roman lyric poet is no boon. If they desire to gain some conception of him through an English poetic transfusion, the imitations of Pope and one or two of Swift's are infinitely better for them than any metrical translation of the Epistles and Satires. Pope is not Horace. He is vastly more brilliant, witty and pointed; quite to seek in the Horatian urbanity, amenity and conversational ease. But he gives a much truer notion of the Roman than does the versified mediocrity miscalled "translation." While the lyrics no poet has ever successfully suggested, or will suggest.

The best thing for the lover of letters who has no Latin is some such prose rendering as this: faithful, scholarly, well-turned, and idiomatic. We do not say that the Dean does for Horace what Mr. Lang and his fellows did for Homer: it may be questioned, indeed, whether such a feat were possible. The lyrics, in particular, turning wholly on the very deftest felicity of phrase and diction, provide an infinitely harder task than the rapid narrative energy of Homer. But the thing is well done; and with a little imagination one may conceive that here is the substance of poetry. For those who have ever read the original, of course, the suggestion will be much greater. The Jam pauca aratro, for instance, reads much better in this terse and cultured prose than in any versified dilution. It is at least dignified and restrained. This indeed, to our mind, is the best and most useful version of Horace which has yet appeared; and the Dean deserves congratulation on his labours.

Short Notices

HENRY WARD BEECHER. By Lyman Abbott. (Hodder and Stoughton. 7s. 6d.) Mr. Abbott writes as Beecher's successor in the pastorate of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, and as one who owes to that brave old man the formation of his spiritual life. Beecher's life has been told, in a volume which is mainly autobiographical, by his wife and son; in this book his friend, as he says in his preface, seeks to interpret that life as the life of one "who has probably done more to change directly the religious life and indirectly the theological thought of America than any preacher since Jonathan Edwards." It was in the revulsion from the hopeless Calvinism left to their descendants by the Pilgrim Fathers, and from the rationalistic developments of it which in America were the best fruit of the eighteenth century, that Beecher played his part of spokesman and prophet. To us in England he is principally the knight of Emancipation. Such was the character in which, amid a storm of abuse and insult, and in contempt of open threats of violent handling, he made his bow to the rough public of English manufacturing towns. "Christ," he said once, "is my manifest God," and in the strength of that hero-worship he passed through the fire, not here alone, but among his own people by whom now his name is held in benediction. Mr. Abbott tells his story with such spirit and excellent taste as hold the attention and may well gain the sympathy even of the indifferent.

RIVIERA NATURE NOTES. (Bernard Quaritch.) This very handsome and valuable book is a popular account of the chief animals and plants of the Riviera and Maritime Alps. But it is "popular" only in the sense that it is readable and written in popular fashion. As the only book dealing with this particular subject, it should be also equipped with the characters that give a book a serious value, and this it fortunately has. The volume has the advantage of some hundreds of photographs, taken with the skill which nearly all books of this kind nowadays display. The anonymous author has really used what he calls "the scanty leisure of a hard-worked schoolmaster" to excellent purpose. We present our congratulations to his pupils, and for their sakes are almost inclined to wish his leisure scantier. Daily evidence accumulates of the ridiculous fashion in which the study of nature is being pursued and taught in many quarters, and of the utter barrenness of result which issues from it. We might quote at any length from the various pages, but perhaps as interesting as anything else to the readers of THE ACADEMY will be a little bit of not too familiar etymology. The word "zest," in the sense of "relish," has nothing to do with "zeal"—though to pursue a thing with zest conveys the same idea as pursuing it with zeal—but comes from "zeste," a little slice of orange-peel. But the French use the word quite differently. They apply it to something worthless, thus: "Je n'en donnerais pas un zeste"—I would not give two pins for it!

AMERICA IN LITERATURE. By George E. Woodberry. (London and New York: Harper. 5s.) This is scarcely a history of American literature, it is rather, as the title implies, a review and appreciation of America's position in relation to Anglo-Saxon literature as a whole, if we might not say in relation to world-literature. Professor Woodberry is a genuine man of letters, and his style is a cultivated style; though we could wish away certain prominent Americanisms, such as "belongs with," "back of," and the like. His method is to summarise the course of American letters in chapters on the Beginnings, the Knickerbocker Era, the Literary Age of Boston, the South, and the West; then to review the total achievement, and finish with a chapter on Results and Conditions. He is at once more cultured and more dispassionate, more broad in his views than most Americans writing on their national literature. Some beloved fallacies he perpetuates. Of course he will have America a young country with a young literature. But he not only recognises that its literature in its total outcome is a very small thing; he boldly says that America has no national literature. It is true. The impulse, as he says, proceeds from the north-east and grows weaker as its spreads south and west. The "great American author" is still to seek, and still fondly believed in. Truth is, America is not one, but many peoples, far more so than England just after the Norman Conquest; and unlike that England, they are all old peoples. The Anglo-Saxons who have written its best books are the off-shoot of an old people, and carry on an old tradition of letters. He truly says that this tradition is not merely English but cosmopolitan. There has been but one great upheaval in the States; and in this peaceful progression he finds a main cause for the poverty of their letters. But truth is their writers have been a small cultured class, leisurely casting eclectic roots into the past of many literatures, as he confesses, rather than deriving from the present of any; and this preoccupation with the past is itself characteristic of a decadent literature. How shall national literature come from writers who are eclectically browsing on the letters of every nation under heaven? Eclecticism never yet had racial sap in its veins; one must narrow to gain force. But we think Professor Woodberry might have claimed for Emerson a place beside the greatest writers of English prose; not, as he does, a secondary place. It is decidedly a good, though not specially original book.

SHAKESPEARE AND THE RIVAL POET. By Arthur Acheson. (London and New York: John Lane. 5s. net.) Mr. Acheson in this volume has done something to add probability to the late Professor Minto's conjecture that the rival poet of Shakespeare's Sonnets was George Chapman. He attempts to show that the original arrangement of the Sonnets requires to be rectified. Shakespeare's young patron in the Sonnets was, as Mr. Lee believes, Southampton; and the date of the earliest Sonnets is 1593 or early in 1594. In "Troilus and Cressida" Shakespeare renews his attack on Chapman. Such are the chief alleged results of this study. Mr. Acheson has really worked, and his book is not without value. He has a confidence in his own conjectures, his own "proofs," which Providence kindly vouchsafe, to a theorist in order that it may get work out of him, but which, it must be confessed, Providence does not find it necessary to bestow in a like degree upon those who disinterestedly examine the theory.

GOETHE'S LYRIK. ERLÄUTERUNGEN NACH KÜNSTLERISCHEN GESICHTSPUNKTEN. Ein Versuch. Von Berthold Litzmann. (Berlin: Fleischel. 3m. 50pf.) Litzmann, who is professor of the history of literature at the University of Bonn, attempts in this book to analyse from the artistic side Goethe's lyrical genius. In fact he acts as aesthetic guide to readers and students of Goethe's purely lyrical poems. Whether it is not better to come to the enjoyment of fine poetry without the aid of an intermediary we will not discuss now, but if such a one is desired Litzmann makes, it must be confessed, an ideal cicerone. He has incidentally things to say in general criticism of Goethe's work that have a very real value. He observes most justly that Goethe is the born lyricist just as Schiller is the born dramatist. Goethe's artistic personality is so strong and so all-embracing that whatever form he elects to use, be it epic or dramatic, it is at once clear that the work is that of a giant; but even so, we find that the epic and the drama invariably rest, with him, on a lyrical basis. In his autobiography he has told us that he regards his poetry as a sort of general confession, called into being through the need of changing into a picture or a poem things that gave him joy or pain, or in any way caused him emotion. Thus, every poem has, more or less, some connection with an event in his life, or with a particular mood or state of feeling. Perhaps the most interesting of the lyrics from this point of view are those inspired by Frau von Stein, like "Harzreise im Winter" and "Ueber allen Gipfeln." As we said above, if there is call for such categorical interpretation Litzmann's book supplies it in the best possible way.

DR. A. PETERMANN'S MITTHEILUNGEN AUS JUSTUS PERTHES' GEOGRAPHISCHEN ANSTALT. Herausgegeben von Prof. Dr. A. Supan. Vol. 49, No. XI. (Gotha: Perthes. 2m.) The study of geography is treated with greater respect in Germany than in this country. The monthly periodical before us is devoted to its interests and invariably contains articles full of information. This number includes papers on the vegetation of the Samoan Islands, and on the Jewish colonies and settlements in Palestine, an excellent map of Count Wickenburg's travels in East Africa, 1897-8, 1901-2, besides short notices of the more important recent works concerning geography published in every country of Europe and in America. We notice that a large number of such works hail from Russia. The periodical thus affords the best obtainable survey of what is being done in geography and kindred subjects throughout the world.

ÄGYPTISCH-INDOEUROPAISCHE SPRACHVERWANDSCHAFT. Von Carl Abel. Zweit-Vermehrte Auflage. (Berlin: Luckhardt.) Dr. Abel here republishes, with additions, his little treatise on the connection between Egyptian hieroglyphics and Indo-European languages that attracted so much attention from Egyptologists on its first appearance. Professor Maspéro, of Paris, and Professor Ziemer, of Berlin, highly praise Abel's work, and assert that if Dr. Abel's conclusions are correct, there can be little doubt that a very close connection exists between the two language groups. The subject is treated here, it should be observed, from a purely technical and philological standpoint.

LA VIE ET LES LIVRES. Sixième Série avec un index général des noms cités dans les six volumes. Par Gaston Deschamps. (Colin. 3fr. 50.) In this series of volumes, M. Deschamps has sought to show how historical events and contemporary tendencies of thought and taste and action influence the subjects treated by men of letters. Thus, looking at random through the series, such headings as "The War of 1870 and Literature," "Society and the Contemporary Novel," "The Feminists," "Three Stages in the Career of Anatole France" indicate the scope of the criticism. The latest volume deals with three subjects only: "Le Cycle de Napoléon—Le Cycle de la Guerre—L'exotisme Colonial et pittoresque." The first criticises books like Chuquet's "Jeunesse de Napoléon" (1897-99), Masson's "Joséphine de Beauharnais" (1899), "L'Impératrice Marie-Louise" (1902), the "Memoirs of the General Baron de Dedem de Gelder" (1900), and a large number of lately issued works on Waterloo. In view of the Kaiser's late utterances these might be worth his perusal. M. Deschamps sums up Waterloo thus: "Il y a des moments où l'histoire est plus superbe que la légende. Tout est grand dans cette aventure. Le génie malheureux du grand homme n'est pas plus sublime que l'héroïsme des humbles qui le suivent et qui le défendent. Il est impossible que tant de force morale ait été dépensée en vain. Cette journée de Waterloo, où la mauvaise fortune ajouta je ne sais quelle beauté triste à la magnificence d'un effort surhumain fait honneur à l'humanité." The war cycle criticises a number of books that have for subject either the actual war of 1870 or its results. Among them are "Le Désastre" of Paul et Victor Margueritte, a group of books about Alsace and Lorraine, both German and French of which the most popular is René Bazin's fine novel, "Les Oberlé," now in its forty-third edition. The third part is consecrated to books that tell of lands beyond Europe, of India, of Chili and Bolivia, of Australia and New Zealand, of Africa, of Java, of China and Japan. M. Deschamps deplores the fact that France has no novelist like Rider Haggard, like Kipling, like Olive Schreiner, and thinks if French novelists travelled more it would add not only to the gaiety of literature but would be also to the interest of the country. Bourget in some degree, Loti in a greater degree, are travellers and give forth their experiences in their books, and to those authors must be added one less known to fame but who writes books of a most charming "exotisme"—Myriam Harry. Her "Petites Épouses" and "Passages de Bédouins" breathe sincere human feeling: they tell of women's tears, of infants' wailing, and prove how all hearts, however they may differ otherwise, are united by suffering. The highest possible praise is given to Loti's "Les derniers jours de Pékin." M. Deschamps believes that it is history, and will be read when voluminous treatises on ethnography and sociology have disappeared.

POUR MA FINLANDE! Par Juhani Aho. Avec un essai sur la littérature finlandaise par René Puaux. (Lausanne: Georges Bridel et Cie. Paris: Librairie Fischbacher. 3fr.) That note of abject misery of soul, of futile effort to throw off the yoke of the oppressor, which is ever present in modern Finnish literature, fills the pages of this book with a monotony of sadness which helps one to realise the utter hopelessness of the struggle of the Finns for freedom and independence. Juhani Aho is a young Finn of fervent patriotism and some literary gifts. The pieces collected in this volume are mere thumbnail sketches in the form of political parables, in which the Czar figures as a carrion crow, a wicked old baron, or a raging flood, and is contrasted with poor Finland in the guise of a flight of swallows, a decrepit old man, or a mill built on a rock. All of which is very interesting and rather touching as typifying the Finnish sentiment towards Russia, but it may be questioned whether political ends are best served by harrowing, if poetical, journalistic squibs. The introduction by M. René Puaux on the literature of Finland is thoroughly well done, and gives a succinct account of its historic saga, its fascinating folklore and its most prominent writers.

DIE GRENZEN DER GESCHICHTE. Von Friedrich Gottl. (Leipzig: Duncker and Humblot. 3m.) Gottl's pamphlet is a plea for the emancipation of the study of history from the methods employed in the study of natural science. He argues that there is a fundamental difference between the two kinds of knowledge, and an absolute lack of connection between their results. For example, roughly speaking, geology has nothing to do with history; the discovery of tombs and domestic implements may help the political economist in determining what the every-day life of ancient peoples was like, but it can do little for the real historian. Gottl's method of discussion is somewhat technical, but it is careful and detailed. His pamphlet has more interest perhaps for the professor and the student than for the general reader.

THE SEASONS WITH THE POETS: AN ANTHOLOGY. Arranged by Ida Woodward. (Elkin Mathews. 5s. net.) Dedicated to Mr. Thomas Hardy, four of whose poems are included in this well-chosen anthology; among other names may be noted those of Mrs. Meynell, Mr. Austin Dobson, Dr. Garnett, Dora Sigerson, in addition to the usual world-worn names to be expected. The compiler has done her work with taste and tact, and has been admirably supported by her publishers in the matters of binding, paper and print. A pretty book outside and inside.

New Books Received

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL

- Davidson, D.D. (A. B.), The late, edited by J. A. Paterson, D.D., Waiting upon God.....(Clark) 6/0
The Expositor's Greek Testament, Vol. III., edited by the Rev. W. Robertson Nicoll, M.A.....(Hodder and Stoughton) 28/0
The Expositor, edited by the Rev. W. Robertson Nicoll, M.A., LL.D., Sixth Series, Vol. VIII.....(Hodder and Stoughton) 7/6
Sidney (Philip), The Truth about Jesus of Nazareth.....(Stewart) 2/6
Barnicoat, LL.D. (Rev. O. R.), Old Testament History.....(Dent)
Menzies, D.D. (Rev. Allan), The Religions of India.....(")

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES

- Lindsay (Lady), From a Venetian Balcony.....(Kegan Paul) net 2/6
Loverman (Robert), The Gates of Silence with Interludes of Song (Knickerbocker Press)
Chamberlin (Henry Harmon), The Age of Ivory.....(Badger, Boston)
Ensor (R. O. K.), Modern Poems.....(Brimley Johnson) net 2/6
Hutchinson (William G.), Songs of the Vine.....(A. H. Bullen) net 3/6
Falkner (O. Litton), Introductory Memoir by, The Poems of Charles Wolfe (A. H. Bullen) net 3/6
Stubbs, D.D. (Charles William), Dean of Ely; Castle in the Air and other Poems Old and New.....(Dent) net 3/6
A Collection of Freemasons' Songs.....(Brown, Langham) net 2/6

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY

- Pickering, F.R.S. (Spencer), edited by, Memoirs of Anna Maria Wilhelmina Pickering.....(Hodder and Stoughton) net 16/0
Abbott (Lyman), Henry Ward Beecher.....(") 7/8
Douglas (James), Robert Browning.....(") net 1/0
Gilbert, LL.D. (Sir John T.), History of Dublin.....(Dollard, Dublin)

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY

- McDonald, D.D. (Rev. Walter), The Principles of Moral Science (Browne and Nolan)

ART

- Gallatin (A. E.), Aubrey Beardsley's Drawings, a Catalogue and a List of Criticisms.....(Elkin Mathews) net 20/0
The Greyfriar, a Chronicle in Black and White, Vol. 4, by Carthusians (Greyfriar, Godalming) 1/6 Magazine of Art, January.....

EDUCATIONAL

- Rogers, M.A. (Benjamin Bickley), The Thesmophoriaeuae of Aristophanes. The Greek Text revised, with free translation into English verse. (Bell) 7/6
Poole, M.A. (W. Mansfield), A French and German Picture Vocabulary (Murray) 3/6
Hargreaves (Alexander), A Grammar of the Dialect of Adlington (Lancashire) (Carl Winter, Heidelberg)
St. Mark, the Revised Version, edited by Sir A. F. Hort, Bart., M.A. (Cambridge) net 1/6
Corinthians, Second Epistle, edited by A. Plummer, M.A., D.D. (Cambridge) net 1/6
Kohlrach (F.), Das Jahr 1813, edited by J. W. Cartmell, M.A. (Cambridge)
Greek Testament for Schools and Colleges: Corinthians, Second Epistle, edited by A. Plummer, M.A., D.D. (Cambridge)
Bygott (John) and Jones (A. J. Lawford), The King's English and How to Write It.....(Jarrold) 1/6
Kynaston, D.D. (Herbert), edited by, Virgil's Enid, Book I.....(Dent) 1/4
Marshall (John), edited by, Caesar's Gallic War, Books IV.-V.....(") 1/4 Hudson, M.A. (W. H.), Essay of Dramatic Poesie by John Dryden.....(") 1/4

MISCELLANEOUS

- Northote (Lady Rosalind), The Book of Herbs.....(Lane) net 2/6
Copyright in Canada and Newfoundland. Prepared by Thorvald Solberg (Copyright Office, Washington)
Post Office London Directory, 1904.....(Kelly's Directories, Limited) 32/0
The Schoolmasters Year-book and Directory, 1904.....(Sonnenschein) net 5/0
The Hundredth Year, the Story of the Centenary Celebrations of the Sunday School Union, 1803.....(Sunday School Union) net 2/6
Pictorial Postcards of Chester and Bournemouth, from Sketches by Leonard Fatten.....each 0/1
Pictorial Postcards of Well-known Pictures.....(Photochrom Co.)
Patience Pocket-Book (100 Games), by Mrs. Theodore Bent.....(Arrowsmith) 1/0
The Chiswick Press Calendar and Diary, 1904.....
Rural Hand-book: Incubating and Rearing Fowls, by H. Franklin (Dawbarn and Ward) net 0/6
Blair (Matthew), The Paisley Shawl and the Men who Produced It (Gardner, Paisley)
Vinton's Agricultural Almanac, 1904.....(Vinton) 0/6
Play-Pictorial Almanac Calendar.....net 1/0
Mathieson's Handbook for Investors for 1904.....(Mathieson) net 2/6
Mining Handbook Supplement, Mid-December, 1903.....(") 1/0
Who's Who in America, 1903-05.....(Marquis, Chicago)
Ferguson (Rosa), Greening's Popular Reciter and the Art of Elocution and Public Speaking.....(Greening) 1/0
The Catholic Directory, Ecclesiastical Register and Almanac for 1904 (Burns and Oates)
Sturgis (Julian), The Prime Minister's Pamphlet.....(Longmans, Green) 1/0
Geary (Caroline), Views of Life derived from Popular Proverbs.....(Drane) net 1/6
Thomas (H. S.), Britain's Wealth in Greater Britain.....(Drane) 1/0
Kingston (F. W.), John Bull and Sons, Limited.....(") 1/0

FICTION

- "The Dule Tree of Camillia," by William Robertson (Stephen and Pollock); "Idylls of Yorkshire Dales," by John Craven (Greening), 6/0; "Morcar," by Thomas Scott (Greening), 6/0; "The Rugged Way," by E. Way Elkington (Drane), 6/0.

NEW EDITIONS

- "The Old Testament," by Theophilus G. Pinches, LL.D. (S.P.C.K.), 7/6; "The Pope, the King, and the People," by the late A. M. William Arthur, edited by W. Blair Neathby, M.A. (Hodder and Stoughton), net 10/6; "The Homes and Haunts of Luther," by Dr. J. Stoughton (R.T.S.), 2/6; "A Christmas Carol and the Chimes," by Charles Dickens (Cassell); "The Vicar of Wakefield," by Oliver Goldsmith (Cassell); "Copyright in England," prepared by Thorvald Solberg (Government Printing Office, Washington); "W. Blake's Jerusalem," edited by A. G. B. Russell and E. K. D. MacLagan (A. H. Bullen), net 6/6; "Poems," by Charles Cotton (Tutin), net 2/0.

PERIODICALS

- "Ainslee's," "The Connoisseur," "Nottingham Library Bulletin," "Bible Society Monthly Reporter," "Bible Society Gleanings," "The Papyrus," "All the World," "United Service Magazine," "Pall Mall," "Cornhill," "Cassell's Magazine," "English Illustrated," "The Commonweath," "Church Monthly," "London University Gazette" Supplement, "Century Illustrated Monthly Magazine," "The Empire Review," "Macmillan's Magazine," "L'Empire Bar," "St. Nicholas," "Play-Pictorial" Christmas and New Year's Number, "Contemporary Review," "Independent Review," "Sunday Magazine," "Good Words."

Foreign

MISCELLANEOUS

- Bérard (Victor), Les Phéniciens et L'Odyssée, Vol. II.....(Colin, Paris) 25fr.
Schmidt (D. W.), Der Kampf der Weltanschauungen... (Trowitzsch, Berlin)
Le Pays de France, Bulletin de la Conférence St. Thomas-D'Aquin (Dragon, Aix-en-Provence)

NEW EDITIONS

- Petermanns (Dr. A.) Mitteilungen, Herausgegeben, von Prof. Dr. A. Supan (Justus Perthes, Gotha) 49, Band 1903

ART

- Die Meisterwerke der Königl. Gemälde-Galerie im Haag unter der Galerie der Stadt Haarlem.....(Hanfstaengl)

PERIODICALS

- "Deutsche Rundschau."

Letters from a Silent Study

[The following series of notes, more or less critical, on life have been given to me. The writer wished to tell the truth—a desire which may be regarded as a legitimate claim to any reader's consideration and indulgence.]

VIII.—On Musical Comedies and the State

I WAS reading, for the third time, some especially striking chapters in Mr. Morley's "Life of Gladstone," and I found a piece of news which offered a curious commentary on Mr. John Hare's letter to The Times on the subject of State-aided theatres. In 1830, when Gladstone was one-and-twenty, the Essay Club, founded by himself at Oxford, pronounced "the influence of the modern drama, though trifling in degree, pernicious in quality." This was the modern drama of seventy-three years ago. Mr. Hare's verdict comes to much the same thing. He deplors the standard of acting in so-called serious plays and high comedy; he fears that musical comedies will soon usurp the boards of every theatre in England. Every author of serious plays and the like must wish to agree with Mr. Hare, who is one of the few great artists—I dare not give the precise number—we possess. But he does not see that the sole reason why the public prefer the productions of Mr. George Edwardes is because the acting is so clever, the lyrics (those by Adrian Ross, for instance) are often as good as the famous stuff given in volumes of classic humour, the music is refreshing, and the whole show, from start to finish, is alive, national, and, as an entertainment, unique in Europe. For half-a-guinea, I can see at the New Gaiety some brilliant low comedy impersonations, some charming dancing, and some highly accomplished young actresses. I can hear witty songs written by educated writers; I am given some delicious fooling in the dialogue, and as much plot as I want—a pleasant diagram, in fact, of the British character. For half-a-guinea I can also see, at another kind of theatre, one or two artists abominably depressed—I cannot say, supported by some inaudible recruits (or persons who have no right to be on any stage) working their ineffective way through some tedious piece without form and void, about nothing on earth. There is no one-star system yet in the casting of musical plays: the sterilizing word literature has not yet been applied to musical plays: the gifted being who believes that he (or she) alone, talking incessantly—no matter how foolishly—ought to fill any spectator's mind with delight, has had, so far, no run for his or her backer's money, in musical plays. The "backer," I am informed, is a person who is expected to "find" (the expression has its pathos) some large sum, or sums, which will pay all the costs of a production and keep the "house full," for fifty nights at least, of people who look prosperous and never buy their seats. The legend: House full—300th performance—does not, therefore, invariably mean that the gross receipts for each week are, say, two thousand pounds. It does not mean that the author is receiving several hundreds weekly, that the manager is "rolling," that the leading man is enjoying the salary of an over-worked Lord Beaconsfield, that the leading lady earns more in one month than a Bishop in one quarter. It may mean quite often that the "backer," or the "backers," are most unhappy; that bills have been paid and nothing has prospered; it may mean, in short, that the advertised, boomed, puffed and tortured "success" has been extraordinary only as a financial loss. This fact ought to encourage Mr. Hare. The public will not be bored. It will not endure twaddle. It will not stand the wretched elocution of which he justly complains. His own is perfect. If the masses—and above all, the well-to-do and upper classes—prefer music-halls and musical comedies to the legitimate drama, it is because the legitimate drama at present is not very good and not well acted—even when it is tolerably composed. There is no false sentiment in "The Orchid": the burlesque is true to burlesque; the social and political hits which occur in the dialogue and in the songs are struck from a close observation of current manners, opinions and the like. I have said this, in other ways, before, but the actor-managers of theatres devoted to drama seldom attend performances at Daly's, the Gaiety or the Lyric. They do not know the remarkably strong attractions they have to strive against, and they do not see a fine art and a school of excellent acting—at once very direct and very subtle—developing under their noses. If a distinguished foreigner comes to England, he is taken, by a discerning guide, to the Houses of Parliament, to Ascot, to the Eton and Harrow match, to the Law Courts, to all the musical comedies of the first rank, and to every one of the music halls. He will then know this country, and understand why it is impossible to bring the English stage into touch with officialism. All the officials very rightly prefer musical comedies to any other kind of average English comedy; laws about a thing so elusive and delightful would be disastrous; the paraphernalia of committees would destroy the spontaneity of the players: an art with such charms to recommend it may have a million patrons, but one President would kill it. As for a governing body—

JOHN OLIVER HOBBES.

[Copyright 1903 by MRS. CRAIGIE in the United States of America.]

Athenæum Losses and Gains, 1903

DEATHS of distinguished men fall heavily on a club like the Athenæum. When you do not regret the friend, you miss the familiar figure or the well-known face, and even the favourite seat of some comparative obscurity seems haunted for a time by his spirit. This year there has been an unusually long death-roll, and many a man of light and leading has been removed. Among Churchmen, Archbishop Temple, an indefatigable reader of the newspapers, whose sturdy build promised prolonged years. Then went Dr. Bradley, the Dean of Westminster, the maker of Marlborough College, whose dapper little form contrasted with the Primate's. The Dean of Canterbury followed, Dr. Farrar, conspicuous by the blue ribbon in his button-hole, who used often to mount to the library, black bag in hand, to use his almost fatally facile pen. But his stores of reading and learning were immense. Besides these we have to regret Canon Rawlinson of Canterbury and Dean Stephens of Winchester.

But the death of Mr. Lecky leaves a great blank, and we shall miss the almost deprecatory side-look, and the long, flexible figure which courted caricature. Shy and reserved, he was always affable when addressed, and ready to impart his superabundant stores of information.

Among the judges are Sir John Rigby, Lord Justice of Appeal; Mr. Commissioner Kerr, who for one reason or another was much before the public, and whose personal reminiscences have lately appeared; also his namesake

Mr. W. Kerr, author of sundry legal books, but better known as having taken the best double-first on record.

There are many blanks among the men who have served the State in one capacity or another. The veteran Field-Marshal Sir John Lintorn Simmons, G.C.B.; Quintin Hogg, the philanthropic founder of the Polytechnic; Mr. Hanbury, President of the Board of Trade; Sir Juland Danvers, Government Director of Indian Railways; Sir Vincent Kennett Barington, associated with the organization of the St. John Ambulance; General Du Cane, with rare experience in criminology, who had been selected as Chairman of the Prisons' Commission; Sir Joshua Fitch, Chief-Inspector of Training Colleges, and Mr. Spring Rice, a valued official in the Treasury.

There are not a few eminent men of science: Sir G. Stokes, the great mathematician; Sir F. Abel, the chemist, expert in explosives, and Director of the Imperial Institute; Dr. Gladstone and Sir W. C. Roberts-Austen, also famous for chemical research—the latter gentleman was Assayer of the Mint—and the Rev. Professor Wiltshire, geologist.

Of civil engineers are Messrs. Barlow, Rennie, and Rendel, and last, not least, Sir Frederick Bramwell, an ex-President of the British Association, to the last a travelling attendant of all great scientific gatherings, and a noteworthy habitu   of the Club dining-room, with his benignant face and patriarchal white locks.

There has been little thinning of the ranks of well-known authors, but we miss Mr. Augustus Hare, who when he came to town from his house near Hastings was always industriously occupied in the S.W. corner of the smaller library.

We have seen the last of two Royal Academicians: Mr. Horsley, whose reminiscences appear almost simultaneously with this notice, and Mr. Wells, the portrait painter; and Mr. Pearson, antiquary and architect, has gone. Doubtless other names of some note may have been omitted, but the Marquis of Salisbury is not to be forgotten, though he was seldom to be seen in the Athen  um, save when he lunched after a Cabinet Council under the clock, and it is scarcely needful to mention Herbert Spencer.

The old order changeth, but new blood is continually being introduced. Among the nine of distinguished eminence annually elected by the Committee, are Dr. Angst, the illustrious Swiss antiquary and director of their national museum; Lord Blythwood, Sir Edward Grey, Don F. A. Gasquet, Abbot President of the English Benedictines; Dr. Robinson, the new Dean of Westminster, the patristic scholar; and Mr. Henry White, a social acquisition and the well-known Secretary of the U.S. Embassy. Likewise no fewer than five Cabinet Ministers—the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, the Secretary for the Colonies, and the Postmaster-General. I have said nothing of the new members coming in ordinary course of ballot, after a weary probation on the books of about sixteen years. Assuredly there is no other society in the world where so many lines of the higher intellectual life intersect, and no one of the privileged need complain of lack of diversity in a distinguished company.

Holidays

TEMPORARY intermissions of activity—to phrase it in dry terms—have been shown by experiment, observation, and theory necessarily to occur in the functions of all living matter. It is an aspect of that cosmic rhythm with which we are now familiar in the theory of ever-alternating evolution and dissolution.

To make holiday is therefore to be strictly in accord with the "scheme of things entire." This is the philosophical justification for such festivities as surround us at this season, but empirical and practical justification, based on sheer expediency, are also forthcoming.

The vast majority of the readers of THE ACADEMY are doubtless brain-workers. And in protest against the fatuous athleticism which is, I suppose, one consequence of our commercial success—since such cults do not arise in a hungry land—I have already dogmatised on this topic of mental work. I ventured to declare that brain-work, as such, never hurt anybody, carefully distinguishing brain-work plus foul air or carking care, from brain-work under ideal conditions. But the opportunity now arises for emphasising the truth with which experience has made most of us familiar, that temporary intermissions of activity, otherwise termed holidays, help to constitute these ideal conditions. Certain periods of brain-rest are indeed—and most fortunately—not under our control. The busiest mind must observe the rhythm of life in some respects.

We live on a rotating globe which turns "alternate cheeks" to the sun, the proximate source of all life. Hence it is that there has been developed within us the need for sleep when we have been whirled away from the sunlight. One cannot deal with this fascinating subject in a few words, though few who think at all can refrain from questioning themselves about this rhythmic cessation of consciousness and all the problems it raises. Here, at any rate, is a necessary holiday from brain-work, for consciousness itself is the fundamental brain-work which makes all else possible. Conceive of consciousness—inexplicable though it be—as brain-work, and the imperious necessity of sleep is sufficient to demonstrate that the taking of holidays is in accordance with natural law. It is interesting to speculate as to what would happen if the earth took a year, instead of a day, to rotate upon her own axis. In that case she would always turn the same face to the sun, just as the moon always turns the same face to us. How would the conscious beings that lived upon that favoured face adjust the rhythm of their lives? Adapted as we are to our environment we cannot spend three entirely sleepless nights in succession without serious risk of losing our sanity. Yet the Spencerian conceptions that are now implicit in all thought render perfectly intelligible the idea that on a globe where there was no night there might be evolved a form of consciousness that would act in a much longer rhythm—a seasonal rhythm, perhaps, as in the hibernating hedgehog, instead of a diurnal. Nor can we say whether the rapidity of our present rhythm, conditioned by the fact that the spot of earth on which we live is moving at the rate of a thousand miles an hour round the earth's centre, is not a necessary condition of a consciousness so vivid as ours.

Saying all this to show that a diurnal holidaying, at any rate, is a necessary condition of cerebral activity, I have left myself little space in which to insist on the value of other and longer rhythms superadded upon the diurnal rhythm. Yet there is no doubt that annual holiday-making, though not essential as the diurnal, is yet a wise and desirable custom. It would be possible to adduce strictly scientific evidence in favour of such annual holidays as we are now enjoying—readers if not writers! Something more than the diurnal rest is necessary. Had you told the lotos-eaters—and who has not echoed their query—"Ah, why should life all labour be?"—that after all they slept eight hours out of the twenty-four, they would have thought you trifling with them. And Tennyson, in putting those words into their mouths, was expressing the truth which all our present holiday-makers are wisely illustrating.

C. W. SALERBY.

Egomet

WHETHER or not the days of my youth were spent in vain reading I sometimes try to decide. I have little Latin and less Greek, am but a poor hand at French and of German have I none. Therefore is my reading confined to books written in the English tongue and does not that suffice for one little life? Had I endeavoured to become a Greek or Latin scholar needs must have I neglected the tongue of the land of my birth. Of the Latins and the Greeks I know sufficient for enjoyment, having quite a nodding acquaintance with Homer, Euripides, Plato, Herodotus, Aristotle, Ovid, Tacitus, Cæsar—and one or two others. Of the literatures of France and Germany I have read much in translations and about them a deal in critical histories. What then have I lost and gained by this my ignorance?

I have lost a knowledge and appreciation of the styles of various famous men of letters of the old days and of the present; but then my little knowledge has enabled me to understand their matter. As for those who own style only, I care not for them—what worth is a style without a soul? I have gained in this that I have read more than most men in the literature of my own country. Humble as is my library, if so big a name is not too pompous for so small a collection of books, there are many volumes on my shelves that I have not yet read and I sometimes ask myself if ever I shall have time so to do. Yes, I think that on the whole I may rest content with my reading being limited to one tongue and that tongue the noblest of them all. In what branch of literature can I not read of the best and highest? Poetry, fiction, history, theology, drama, philosophy, letters, criticism, biography, are there not of the best of all these in the English speech? And is not life only too short to read in this one tongue all that one would read, or even half or a quarter? Do others feel that sense of despair that enters me as often as I stand in a great library, and, looking around, realise how much there is that I would and should read and I had the years to do so?

Was it right that I should have been left as a child to read those books I delighted in rather than those which in the general opinion would have been most profitable to me? Of course the usual run of children's books were put in my way, Hans Andersen, Grimm, "Robinson Crusoe," "The Vicar of Wakefield," "Gulliver," and so forth, firm friends still all of them. What more I wanted I chose out for myself: Reade, Thackeray, Byron, Shakespeare, Bunyan, Addison, Pope, many others, most of them still friends or acquaintances. At school my teachers worked their hardest to make me dislike Gray, Macaulay, Shakespeare, Milton, Coleridge, and some others, but luckily I loved them for themselves, and no amount of lesson-work could render them distasteful. For good or ill I sought out my friends for myself, have kept and loved them, and have gained good from them.

Am I singular in all this? I doubt if any one of us all is singular in anything; we are all so dismally similar. Similar in our good ways and our bad ways. One of my bad ways is to forget to-day what I have promised to do to-morrow, to speak of ills that I know will not come to me or of good things I am sure never to receive. I make a mental note, for example, of a lonely dinner at the club on Christmas day, forgetting my old friend's standing invitation. Perhaps I live too much among books and too little among live folk. But then, that is my way, and my ways are pleasant to me.

E. G. O.

"The Darling of the Gods"

MANY people have been asking me how could Mr. Tree act a Japanese, he is too tall. Such questions are most ignorant from a theatrical point of view. Suppose one visit an artist, and looking at a picture painted on a small canvas, asks the artist how could there be people about three inches high, what would the artist say? The size of a figure has little effect on the stage. The real feeling is the most important part of the play. It was some few weeks ago I went to a Japanese restaurant with Mr. Tree and Miss Ashwell and some others. There we sat on the cushions and ate Japanese food with chop-sticks. Doubtless it has given some great inspiration to them. Mr. Tree said to me, "Now I feel myself quite Japanese." He has been as good as his word and now he acts Japanese. He makes up his face so well, it is perfect; the thick lip and heavy eyes are very characteristic.

Mr. BEERBOHM TREE AT REHEARSAL

(From a drawing by Yoshio Markino)

He has also much improved the play and given it more real Japanese feeling than the original had in America. I will mention one thing. A little boy, called Sano, snatches his father's sword and goes to front of march, this is the real Samurai spirit.

English people may say that Miss Ashwell's face is too European, but these are people who look only on Japanese prints, conventional pictures, and have not been in Japan, and so think all Japanese eyes are like the fox's; but this is not so. Miss Ashwell studied my face—and I am pure Japanese blood—so if I show my sister's photo, people could hardly tell which is Miss Ashwell and which is my sister.

I gave a few hints to the chief artistes as to gestures and manner and these were enough, they have put them all through the play very naturally, although it must be very difficult when all comes only from memory. A Japanese who did not know English could follow the story. The gesture of Princess Yo San when she is bidden to kneel by her father is quite Japanese—so much so, that seeing it the old proverb came into my mind, "The grass is blue but this is bluer." Then when Prince Kara spills the hot tea on his hand Princess Yo San wipes his hand with her sleeve, this is very Japanese. And when she could not please the Prince with her song then she fetches his sword in silence and says, "Go to-night;" it is a very simple act, but very feeling.

It is not a Japanese play, but it has much like the play "Soga Brothers' Vengeance," in which Danjuro acted as "Kudo." Mr. Tree as "Zakkuri" is very much like Danjuro as "Kudo," and Mr. Gill's martyrdom is like "Kodanji's" in the same play; while Mr. Cookson resembles Yennosuke when he played in that play. Miss Ashwell's snakey movement, which is very Japanese, is like the movement of Kikugoro, a famous actor who played so well woman part, for in Japan we have not women actors, but men who are trained from five years old. In Japanese comedy people always find a character like Mr. Rose's "Tanda-Tanji."

One word of love-making: the English love-making on stage is to my mind like "toffy"—too sticky. In Japan it is more delicate, more like "whisky-and-soda," but the love scene in the third act of this play is now perfect. Japanese have a heart like Englishmen, but religion prohibited love and that made us hypocrites.

To my Japanese mind the fifth act is the most Japanese, it shows the "bushido" or "Samurai" spirit, to live and to die for glory, although this act shows the most ancient times. Appearance is changed in Japan, but the old spirit is there. People begin to know our country better since the Japanese war with China. Those who love Japan will go to Mr. Tree's theatre and will recognise with some satisfaction many features that belong to my beloved native country, "The Darling of the Gods."

YOSHIO MARKINO.

Dramatic Notes

MR. GILBERT'S "The Mikado" has made the path no easy one for the dramatist who would write a serious play of Japanese life. This attempt has been made in "The Darling of the Gods," by David Belasco and John Luther Long, a play in four acts produced for the first time in this country by Mr. Tree on Monday evening last. The theme of the play is not essentially Japanese, reminding us at times of such different works as "Romeo and Juliet" and "La Tosca." Kara is an outlawed prince and the leader of the ten remaining Samurai who refuse to give up their swords in obedience to the edict of the emperor; the time chosen, therefore, is the parting of the ways between old and new Japan. The prince is beloved of the Princess Yo-San, who conceals him in her apartments when he is pursued by his arch-enemy, the minister Zakkuri. Complications naturally follow; Kara is captured by Zakkuri, and released, the price being Yo-San's betrayal of the hiding-place of the little band of Samurai. The outlaws are surrounded, and—Yo-San arriving too late to warn them—are slain in their endeavour to fight their way out, with the exception of Kara and two followers, who commit the "happy despatch," Yo-San also dying by her own hand. Then in a final tableau Yo-San and Kara meet 1,000 years hence (!) in the First Celestial Heaven.

SUCH in brief is the story, in which there is little that is strictly Japanese save the adornments, which are, in truth, gorgeous. From the first rising of the curtain to its final fall the stage presents a series of splendid pictures, now sombre, now brilliant; garden, glowered crowds, rocky blossoms, state halls filled with multi-coloured Zakkuri—and many fastnesses, the grim sword-room of Zakkuri—one's heart; others. But the play does not grip hold of one's heart; there is a vague sense of evil fate hanging over the lovers; there is a thrilling murder of a spy; torture is a bottom until it becomes commonplace. Yet the story is at all times strong, the plot well put together, and the characters distinct. What then is lacking? Partly, I fancy, it is that the actors were over-anxious as to their behaviour, the novel surroundings and under unusual conditions, which were overcome entirely only by Mr. Basil Gill, who acted quite greatly as Kara, and Miss Lena Ashwell who was excellent as Juliet—I mean, Yo-San; partly, I believe, it was that Mr. Tree read his part wrongly. Granted that his conception of the character of the forbidding sensualist Zakkuri was right, he achieved all that an actor could hope to do, but surely his conception was wrong. Acted as Mr. Tree acted the part, Zakkuri had about him an air fatally reminiscent of the "Mikado." Zakkuri should never indulge in playfulness; he should be stern, hard, cruel as fate, sinister and weird. Let Mr. Tree look to it.

"LITTLE HANS ANDERSEN," though as a play a little disjointed, is a very charming production. Captain Basil Hood is no doubt quite correct in taking it for granted that most of his audience know their Andersen. The children certainly seemed at no loss to follow his fascinating potpourri of stories. The acting, too, both on the part of the child actors and of their elder brethren left nothing to be desired. Master Roy Lorraine is a dear, unaffected "Little Hans," Miss Louie Pounds the sweetest and daintiest of Princesses, and Miss Hart-Dyke is an actress-dancer of the very first water—every line of her figure expressed pathetic despair and weariness. The grown-up parts were in the hands of other members of the old Savoy Company, and where all are so good to praise one, and not all, would be invidious.

THE scenery is pretty, and the music so tuneful that it will be a surprise if several of the airs are not being whistled about the streets before long. The song of the "Umbrella Man"—the song in imitation of "the House that Jack Built"—the song of the two wonderful Wooden Soldiers, who must be seen to be believed in—the Swineherd Prince's delightful "Pipe Song"—and Mr. Henry Lytton's swinging soldiers song—are only a few of many. The children must go to the Adelphi and see and hear for themselves—go and join the music of their laughter to that of the orchestra under Mr. Walter Slaughter, the composer's, magic wand.

THE "Masque of the City Arms," produced last week at the Glasgow School of Art in aid of the Scottish Artists' Benevolent Fund, was a great artistic and financial success. Few cities have armorial insignia which lend themselves so readily to pageant and tableau as do those of Glasgow, though one might hardly suspect this from the verbal blazon contained in the patent granted by the Lyon Office in 1866, which reads: "Argent, on a mount in base vert an oak tree proper, the stem at the base thereof surmounted by a salmon on its back, also proper, with a signet ring in its mouth, or; on the top of a tree a redbreast, and on the sinister fess point an ancient hand bell, both also proper." The crest shows "the half-length figure of St. Kentigern, affronté, vested and mitred, his right hand raised in the act of benediction." In popular rhyme the arms are thus described:—

Here's the bird that never flew,
Here's the tree that never grew,
Here's the bell that never rang,
Here's the fish that never swam—
That's just the dru'ken salmon.

BUT neither official blazon nor popular rhyme explains the legends upon which the arms are framed. The bird is a favourite robin of St. Serf, whom Kentigern (otherwise St. Mungo) was accused by his guilty fellow-scholars of killing, and which he restored to life. In one respect the rhyme is inaccurate, for the oak tree of the blazon "grew" from the frozen hazel twig which Kentigern caused to burst into flame and rekindle the fire which his envious fellows had extinguished while he slept. The bell that never rang was said to have been brought by the saint from Rome, where he received it from the Pope, though local antiquaries believe that St. Mungo's bell was probably made at home.

THE salmon with its ring is, however, the most romantic feature of the arms. Queen Langueth may not have sinned, but she had been imprudent, and when her husband demanded from her the ring which he had bestowed she was unable to produce it. The knight was unable to produce it, and dishonour and death were averted only by the saint, who "taking compassion on her, sent one of his people to the river to angle with a hook, directing him to bring alive the first fish he might take, which being done, the saint took from its mouth the ring and sent it to the queen, who restored it to the king, and so saved her life."

THESE miraculous events are finely adapted for the display of artistic grouping and dressing, and Mr. Newberry, with his assistants and their past and present pupils, made splendid use of their opportunities. First, the six-score participants moved in stately procession through the rooms of the school, then they presented on the stage a series of pictures, seven in number, representing these events in St. Mungo's career, with an impressive first picture of the saint preaching to the barbarians whom he found in the West. "Book," music, and dresses were all prepared by the school, and the promoters have every reason to be proud of their success.

Some German Plays

DAS HEIMATSFEST. SCHAUSPIEL IN FÜNF AKTEN. Von Gustav Frenssen. (Berlin: Grote'sche Verlagsbuchhandlung. 2m.)

MACHT. EIN SOZIALES SCHAUSPIEL IN VIER AKTEN. Von T. Wiegand. (Berlin: Fleischel. 2m.)

GUSTAV FRENSSEN, the author of the popular and most successful novel "Jörn Uhl," dedicates what we must characterise as a somewhat diffuse episode in dramatic form to the old town of Husum, in Schleswig-Holstein, at its jubilee. It is best to state at once that there is nothing dramatic about this composition except its form. Yet it is full of poetical sentiment, and not without life. The central idea is that a number of natives of the town whom circumstances have forced to spend their life in foreign lands, feel impelled to make every effort to be present at the jubilee celebration, and among them is a man who, to avoid fighting in the war of 1870, had fled over the frontier, gone to America, prospered, and made a big fortune. But of him the Fatherland will have none. "He who insults his country and his country's need, is false to his own soul. . . . Urged by home-sickness he came to the jubilee. But his home cast him out because he once betrayed her." Apart from this central idea the play is full of delightful things. Here is a conversation between a professor and a former pupil who had gone out into the great world:—

PROF. And those scenes have blotted out this little town and its school?

STUD. As completely as if I had never walked through these streets, and had never seen a Latin book.

PROF. Yet you were not here in vain. Although you do not recognise it, something remains in you of the wisdom of the ancients which shines quietly in the old books, and it teaches you to see more clearly and to judge more calmly the variegated scenes of the present time.

STUD. Cannot Christianity do that service for us?

PROF. Pagan antiquity stands like an iron monument above all strife, but Christianity is in the hands of jangling men. To one it is a bright light that falls across his path, to the other it is a mist that he never learns to see.

We must not quote more, but we heartily advise all who liked what the Germans would call the Stimmung of "Jörn Uhl" to read this little play.

"Macht" is work of a very different order. It is, vulgarly speaking, extremely up-to-date. The scene is laid in New York, and the hero is the head of the Steel Trust, the greatest "combine" the world has ever seen. The dramatist's design is to prove that by placing such enormous capitalistic power in the hands of a man of energy, strikes are rendered inevitable, and so is a system of bribery, with its destructive consequences to public life. The piece, despite what seems unpromising material, in its rapidity of action, ease of dialogue, and consistency of treatment had a genuine and deserved success on the stage, and as it is a first work, much may be safely predicted of its author. Hauptmann's "Weavers," and the second part of Björnson's "Beyond Human Strength" are the only other plays so far as we know that deal with the present day aspect of the social question. Björnson's treatment of it has always seemed to us the most successful, natural and convincing. He strikes the right note in the closing words of his drama—"One side must be the first to forgive."

Musical Notes

THE Return moved for in the House of Commons last session by Mr. Stuart-Wortley as to the State or municipal support given to opera, drama, and concerts in foreign countries, has now been issued and contains a mass of useful information on the subject. Practically every country is shown to support music or the drama in some form or another, which was, of course, known before, though the extent and method of this support are shown, as was only to be expected, to be very various—ranging from the mere grant of a site or exemption from taxation to the elaborate provision made in France, where four national theatres receive annual subsidies to the extent of nearly £60,000. The United States seems to be practically the only country of any importance—Venezuela is another—adopting substantially the same position as ourselves—namely, confining its action, in this direction, entirely to municipal effort, and that not very lavish or widespread.

BUT while it is very interesting to have these particulars of the various systems of support adopted, the Return would, of course, have been even more valuable if it had been possible to include in it much other pertinent information—as to the prices charged, the character and quality of the performances, &c., &c. Particulars under these and like heads are given in some cases, but not generally, though such matters are obviously of the first importance in arriving at any judgment concerning the value of such subsidies. What, however, the return does show conclusively is that governments nearly all the world over are more generously disposed towards music and the drama than any we have ever had in these happy isles, though this is far from assenting to the proposition that ours would wisely follow their example. Our British way has always been to manage such matters for ourselves without paternal aid or interference from the State, and much stronger evidence than any which has so far been produced would be needful in order to prove that this excellent principle would prudently be departed from.

WITH a note of barely suppressed triumph the Royal Choral Society has sent round an announcement to the effect that it has now definitely decided to produce Dr. Elgar's "The Apostles" on the 21st of April next, assisted by Miss Susan Strong, Madame Kirkby Lunn, Mr. John Coates, Mr. Ffrangcon Davies, Mr. Kennerley Rumford, and Mr. Andrew Black, and that the composer himself will conduct. At the same time it forwards a list of "works which have been performed by the Royal Choral Society," indicating that in the course of its existence it has certainly covered a considerable amount of ground, even if it is a strangely mixed list of good and bad, of masterpieces and pieces very much the reverse, which have made up its repertoire. But of course the Royal Choral Society labours under certain difficulties which though sufficiently obvious are too frequently overlooked. To put it brutally, it can only hope to pay its way by means of works either hackneyed or commonplace, for the public on which it relies will tolerate none other. On these grounds therefore the decision of the Society to produce "The Apostles" must be reckoned quite a spirited act, which is deserving accordingly of congratulation.

DOUBTLESS it would be exceedingly pleasant for music lovers to get their opera on the cheap with the help of the State, but a much loftier ideal to work for is that of national opera permanently established and paying its way without such extraneous aid. Nor is this such an unattainable goal as some seem to fancy. My own conviction is that we are already much nearer to its realisation than most are aware. Already we have a three-months opera season every year, which in certain respects is of unsurpassable excellence and yet yields handsome dividends. During the coming year we are to have in addition a season of similar length at more popular prices under the direction of Mr. Manners. Then again the prodigious popularity of musical pieces of a lighter sort, including some such as the "Duchess of Dantzic," very nearly approximating to actual opéra comique, is another sign of the times by no means to be overlooked, which should be taken in conjunction moreover with the enormous and evergrowing popularity, as exemplified at the promenade concerts and elsewhere, of the better class of music—and in particular be it noted the music of Wagner—in the concert-room.

ALL these things are warrant for the belief that given the requisite capital and the right sort of management the problem might see itself solved at any moment now, without recourse to the State or the municipality at all. Nay, who shall say that if the late Mr. D'Oyly Carte had gone the right way to work that this desirable result might not have been attained ten years ago? Again and again it has been pointed out, in these columns and elsewhere, that the amount of success which in spite of bad management actually attended Mr. Carte's ill-fated venture was, rightly interpreted, full of encouragement. Of course, he went to work on absolutely impossible lines by trying to found a home of grand opera on the strength of two operas mounted for prolonged runs. Yet the fact that "Ivanhoe" enjoyed a run of over 150 consecutive representations—far and away the longest unbroken run ever accomplished by an opera of its class—is surely enough of itself to refute the suggestion that grand opera can never hope to see itself established in London without the assistance of the taxpayer. And that was in 1891. There are some failures more significant than successes; and this emphatically was one of them. When will some manager arise to profit by Mr. Carte's experience?

So "Parsifal" has been produced in New York and the heavens have not fallen. Artistically, we are told by The Times correspondent, it was a triumph for all concerned and a refutation of German libels on American audiences:—

The audience, numbering 7,000, in the great opera-house was deeply attentive, the applause was restrained, the women wore simple gowns, and there was none of the display which usually is such a feature of opera in New York.

But none the less in this observer's judgment, "it was a justification of Richard Wagner's dying command that 'Parsifal' should not be presented save in the Festival Playhouse in his own town."

One could not forget the sky-scrapers, the elevated trains, the rush and roar of New York outside, one could not forget Frau Wagner's bitter protests, and, worst of all, one could not forget the exploitation of the production in the newspapers.

Surely, however, this is rather beside the point, since precisely the same arguments might be urged against the production of "The Messiah," the Matthew Passion, Elgar's "Apostles," and scores of other works no less and no more out of harmony with the characteristics of New York than Wagner's "Parsifal."

THAT was an excellent suggestion of a correspondent of The Times that steps should be taken during the recent season by friends of the folk song to note down, and thus to preserve, some of the beautiful old carol tunes still sung and handed down by oral tradition from Christmas to Christmas in our country districts, and it will be interesting to learn the results of any such attempts which may have been made. The literature of the carol, both musical and poetic, is full of interest. The popular belief that the carol is a purely Christian institution is, of course, erroneous—wherefore the pretty legend which ascribes its origin to St. Francis of Assisi must go the way of all myths. Just as our holly and our misletoe date from a pagan past, so our carols live on to remind us of a festival which was celebrated in the Saturnalia of the Romans, the rites of the Druids, and the Winter feasts of the Scandinavians, long before that which has just been commemorated by all the peoples of Christian faith was founded. And this helps to explain, of course, the eminently convivial strain of so many of the earlier examples. Who shall place a limit, under these circumstances, to the antiquity of some of those which, handed on from generation to generation, may still be said or sung in country places?

RECENT music to hand from various publishers comprises much of very various kinds. Mr. Alfred Lengnick, for example, sends works by Mr. Wolstenholme, the blind composer, among other things, whose facile melody accounts easily for their popularity. They are not great but they are tuneful and unpretending. So is a "Valsette" by F. G. Nicholls from the same firm. "Drei kleine Stücke," by James Lyon, are mildly reminiscent of Schumann, but beyond this quite inoffensive. Mr. Lyon is presumably a German. A "Sketch" by John E. Campbell for piano is not distinguished; a couple of pieces for violin and piano by M. Gyde—"Chanson Trieste" and "Danse Antique"—are what their titles would suggest. A "Tarantella" for the same instruments by Walter Porter is not distinguished either, but has plenty of go. A "Rondo Alla Zingarese" for two violins and piano, by J. C. Ames, is compounded of the accepted gipsy elements, but in its way is not ineffective. Of several well-written pieces by Stepan Esipoff a "Notturmo" is quite pretty, while a "Caprice Norvégien" is a graceful salon piece.

MESSES. ELKIN AND Co. send several works of interest—Miss Dora Bright's "Jungle Book" Songs, for instance, which Mr. Denis O'Sullivan sings so well. Likewise "Six Love Songs," by Mr. E. A. MacDowell, all of which are charming, while one or two are quite exquisite. Nothing less certainly is "Thy Beaming Eyes," a model of tenderness, sweetness, and grace; "Sweetheart, tell Me" is hardly less beautiful, while "O Lovely Rose" has all the fragrance of a folksong. "Amerikanische Wald Idyllen" by the same composer are distinguished by similar qualities. Mr. MacDowell's music seems to be characterised no less by its finish and refinement, than by its grace and fancy. He appears to know exactly what he can do, and does it perfectly. From Messrs. Weekes and Co. come "Songs of Love and Nature," by Ernest Austin, which are certainly an excellent "Op. 2." Mr. Austin seems to have a genuine gift of melody and a capacity of getting his effects by the slenderest means. His "Shepherd's Love Song" is admirable in this regard. Of piano pieces sent by this firm, Mr. Ehrenfechter's "Solitude" has the elements of popularity and is at least less commonplace than a "Mazurka" and a "Morceau," whose paternity Mr. James Price acknowledges. Mr. Noel Johnson's song "Were I a Mighty Monarch" is so commonplace that it ought to become immensely popular—possibly indeed it has attained this proud distinction already.

Of quite a different order are Mr. Percy Buck's "Songs of Myrtis" (Breitkopf and Härtel) in which graceful words are set to music, which, if not great, possesses at least many elements of distinction. All are good in their way, but perhaps the second and last "Lend Me Thy Wings" and "The Weary Moon" are the best of the set. A good deal has been written lately concerning the songs of Mr. Charles Willeby, and we have been bidden to understand in certain quarters that Schumann, Schubert and the rest must hang their diminished heads in the presence of his masterpieces. If "A Tuscan Day" is typical of his genius, however, the shades of those composers may regain their wonted serenity. Perchance Mr. Willeby is not responsible for the ridiculous puffs of his compositions to which I am here referring, but such essentially mediocre productions as this are certainly not calculated to render them less absurd. "No Fear!" "Sung with immense success by Mr. Leo Stormont," belongs to politics rather than to music, so need not be considered here. A couple of charming songs by Cyril Scott, "Little Lady of My Heart" and "April Love," come from Messrs. Metzler. The words are in each case by Ernest Dowson, and unlike some of Mr. Scott's later work, the songs are characterised by extreme simplicity, though they are none the less commendable on this account since with all their simplicity they are far from being commonplace.

Art Notes

ONE of the most interesting books on art that has come my way this winter is a little shilling affair, entitled "Moot Points," by Walter Crane and Lewis F. Day (Batsford). It is rich in suggestion; and it holds excellent good disputing concerning Art and Industry. But I find corroboration, even from the words of such able exponents of art and craft as those brilliant men, in what I am for ever saying in these columns—it is clear from one end of this little book to the other that the whole trouble as to what is art and what is not art is brought about by confusion as to the essential meaning of the word Art. Mr. Crane, a clear-eyed man for the definition of what he talks about, if ever there was one, immediately becomes vague and hazy when Mr. Day tries to nail him down to state the essence of the word. Mr. Day rightly twits him with saying that art is taste—which it certainly is not. Then Mr. Crane hankers after the definition that art is "nature seen through a temperament." But he says it reservedly. And, as a matter of fact, art has nothing to do with copying nature as such. Then he has a little fondness for the old Greek idea that art is beauty—which it certainly is not—indeed this idea is the widespread source of confusion between art and craft. I cannot repeat too often that art is that by which the human genius transfers emotion. The definers always go wrong because they want to include a sense of goodness in the meaning of the word art; whereas art is neither good nor bad in its essence. If Mr. Day, who clearly suspects something of the kind, and Mr. Crane, had started their friendly dispute with this definition, much of the difficulty and vagueness of their disputing would have been cleared away.

Art is the transference by an artist to his fellows of the thing felt—the human being is the only created thing that has this power, or that hungers for such knowledge. Art, I say, is the transference of the thing felt or sensed, just as speech is the transference of thought, from the human being to his fellows. Speech can only transfer thought, until, like music or colour or form or some sensation, it is used in such a way as to transfer emotion—when it, like music and painting, at once becomes art. Both Mr. Crane and Mr. Day speak of poetry as if it were verse—it has nothing to do with verse, the prose of Isaiah and Carlyle are pure poetry. The word poetry is even more "slackly" used than the word art; for poetry is art—the art of words, that is to say the transference of emotion through words, as music is the transference of emotion through sound, and painting through colour. Oratory is perhaps the most sublime of all the arts—it is certainly the most instant and powerful, for words are more full of colour and beauty and emotional appeal than sound or colour or form. Literary critics are for ever trying to limit the range of poetry, trying to exclude philosophy and science and such like from its powers; yet, as a matter of fact nothing need be excluded from true poetry that can be converted into terms of human emotion.

BUT craft—the means by which art is expressed—does strive always after the beautiful; indeed, perfection of handling or treatment must give the delight or pleasure that is the result of contemplating a beautiful thing. For this reason craftsmanship, by creating the sense of the beautiful, becomes a part of the realm of art; but until it creates such an emotion it is not art. The sense of beauty is only one of the emotions. The sense of ugliness is quite as much an emotion, but it is a base emotion—nevertheless, that which creates a sense of ugliness is quite as much a work of art as that which creates a sense of beauty.

ALL ornament has for its aim the giving of the sense of delight—is in fact in the realm of art—quite as much so as any easel picture or sculpture, or what is called “fine art.” The moment that workmanship gives a rhythmic sense of emotion, such as dignity or reverence or laughter or tears, it steps into the province of art. It is sometimes vaguely claimed that “fine art” is not produced for a useful purpose, as though some superior form of virtue lay in its material uselessness. But, as a matter of truth, the being produced for a material purpose or not has nothing to do with art. Simply because a man paints a picture on a canvas he shall not thereby of necessity be an artist; whilst a genius who shall make of the handle of some household tool a thing possessing that strange mystic rhythmic quality which arouses the sense of beauty or any other emotion in us, may create a work of art out of the handle of a spoon. The man who designs a cathedral like St. Paul’s, creating the majestic sense of devotion and of dignity that almost overwhelms one as one stands in the mighty hollow of that splendid nave, is an artist—and his greatness is in proportion to the resounding magnificence of the mighty emotion he evokes.

If Mr. Crane and Mr. Day would recognise this essential meaning of the word art, their differences would soon be obliterated. When a man simply wants his walls covered with paper, or his floors with carpets, he only requires a tradesman to deal with; but the moment he wants his wall-paper or his carpet to give out a sense of beauty, or of any other emotion of pleasure or dignity or such like, the tradesman is baffled and must find an artist to do the work for him. In so far as Mr. Day maintains that the artist is bound to do his work within the limits of his medium he is right; but Mr. Crane is absolutely right when he contends that the limits of such material needs should be the only limits imposed upon the artist, and that it is then for the artist to lead public taste, not for public taste to debauch the powers of the artist. And Mr. Crane will find his instincts strengthened by solid reason; for “material use” and “commercial value” disappear utterly from an artist’s limits when it is realised that, however an artist may starve for his art, art at any rate has nothing to do with usefulness or commercial profit or any such factor, but is a great human craving like religion and hunger and thirst—a human need. Everyone interested in art should buy this little book. There is more than one rich phrase that shows ripe thinking: “Art is not play”—“A demand for congenial work is a very different thing to a pretension to be exempt from all but pleasure”—“Labour may be devoted to a bad end”—“Industry is not necessarily a virtue”—“No man can do good work unless he take a keen interest in it”—“There is a lot of vicious industry going on, and the world suffers more from this than from idleness”—“The puritan thinks it good for us to do what we don’t like; therefore to take pleasure in one’s work must be little short of sinful.”

At Mr. John Baillie’s galleries in Hereford Street, Bayswater, is to be seen a show of Mr. Hazlewood Shannon’s lithographs that display this fine artist’s remarkable powers at their best. There is a completeness, a beauty of craft, and a comprehension of the limits and of the range of the medium which are very masterly. The poetic sense is most pronounced; and the beauty of the technique is in nothing more telling than in the sense of colour and movement and atmosphere. Mr. Hazlewood Shannon touches no subject and no medium to which he does not bring distinction.

INDEED, Mr. Baillie’s galleries are the most artistic in town; and the lover of artistic things should never pass his doors, even though he walk so far away from the beaten track where yawn the ordinary dealer’s show-rooms. Mr. Baillie promises us some interesting exhibitions—Philip Connard’s paintings, water-colours by Bellingham Smith, and a show of the work of a poet in colour—Cayley Robinson.

MR. GEORGE CLAUSEN, A.R.A., the newly-elected Professor of Painting at the Royal Academy, has chosen most interesting subjects for his lectures this month, beginning with “Some Early Painters,” with addresses on “Titian, Rembrandt, and Velasquez,” on “Landscape,” and on “Open-air Painting and Impressionism,” which ought to draw full houses. All exhibitors at the summer show are, of course, entitled to attend the course. And the students, I fancy, will go to the lectures with an eagerness a little more marked than during the reign of the last professor.

THE New Gallery, which announced the last day of the Exhibition of the Society of Portrait Painters on Boxing Day, becomes the harassing possession of the Selecting and Hanging Committee of the International Society for awhile; indeed, the great show will soon be upon us. The new president, Monsieur Rodin, will be entertained by the society at dinner at the Café Royal on Tuesday, the 12th of January, when a distinguished company will be brought together to meet him and give the great sculptor a hearty welcome to his new office.

MR. CARFAX showed for a few hours at his gallery in Ryder Street, St. James’s, the remarkably fine portrait, in black and red chalk, executed by Mr. William Strang from Mr. Joseph Chamberlain in one hour, before Mr. Strang left for America to complete a number of portrait commissions oversea. It was a fine piece of work; and Mr. Strang’s eloquent line and strong feeling for character suffered but little from what must have been a frantically rapid piece of work under trying conditions.

I HAVE received a prospectus from two talented men, Messrs. Augustus John and William Orpen, to say that they open an art school in Chelsea, at the Rossetti studios, on January 11. I need scarcely say that any youngster who desires to walk the thorny, fascinating path of art would not go amiss if he decided to put his ‘prentice hand under the control of so keen an artist as Mr. Orpen or his comrade.

THERE are vague rumours that a Society of Sculptors is going to try and form itself. But so far, there has only been hurrying to and fro.

WHEN an early Millias sells at fifteen guineas at open auction, and that auction at Christie’s, it is time to hesitate about “putting on the market” works by the pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood.

FEARS have been expressed that by abolishing the Private View, the International Society of Sculptors

Painters and Gravers may drive collectors and amateurs from the New Gallery on the opening of their exhibition in January. So far, however, is this from the intention of the Council of the Society that they have arranged for a number of ladies and gentlemen interested in the Society and its work to visit the Gallery on Saturday, January 9, Varnishing Day, and they have therefore inaugurated, or rather revived, the Varnishing Day of the past, at which artists and patrons met in the Galleries.

Correspondence

Bed Books

SIR,—As a subscriber to your much-to-be-desired paper, may I answer "Egomet" as to the delight of reading in bed? I cannot be a solitary exception among women, and I confess I have indulged in it all my life, since I could read at five years old. Frightened by a fiend, in the shape of a nurse, I took refuge as a small imaginative child, from terrifying wakefulness and hideous dreams, in Hans Andersen, Dickens, Thackeray, Scott, Fenimore Cooper, Norse Tales, and two volumes entitled "A Critical Review of German Poetry." With a most sensuous appreciation of the comforts prized by "Egomet," and the charm of firelight flickering across a picturesque bedroom, has always been joined the blessed sense of the company of most potent physicians to heal and enchant body and mind, as I grew older and learnt there were rough ways to be trodden at times, as who does not? All "Egomet's" friends people my bookshelves, and many more.

In these days, when women are supposed to seek opiates for the slightest reason, I am glad to think that through years of more or less insomnia I have found strength and healing from this habit of reading in bed.

When the fire blackens and falls and dawn brings the greyness that is eerie even in summer, poet and essayist or vivid writers of human documents worthy to be read (imaginary or otherwise) have fought the influences of "the night that covered me," giving "the unconquerable soul" for which Henley thanked "whatever Gods there be." In Indian jungles, and on house tops under the stars, wonderful moonlit Eastern nights have been peopled by the characters in books known and loved from childhood.

Through many years of the wandering existence of a soldier's wife, I supplemented a formal education by the wider knowledge learned from books. Society is not conducive to much learning, but often were met men and women who consciously or unconsciously suggested new fields of thought, and then came the night and the counsel and companionship of books to help one follow up the clue to them.

A husband who is wise and a lover of books has indulged this habit when he might so easily have condemned it, and thereby we have much in common and are comrades in thought.—Yours, &c.,

A WOMAN AND A LOVER OF BOOKS.

Keats's Grecian Urn

SIR,—If your correspondent L. P. Patten will take the trouble to go to the British Museum and examine the Parthenon frieze, especially slab No. 2 of the N. side and Nos. 40 and 47 of the S. side, he will find the reason of Keats's expression; and will also, I hope, be somewhat less certain as to the ignorance both of Keats and of Greek sculptors.

Mr. Patten's assertion that this poem is greatly overrated reminds me of du Maurier's immortal Prigby: "I confess I don't care for Mozart; he's too tuney for me." "Dear me!" says the innocent young lady, "is that through a defective ear or through want of proper training?"—Yours, &c.,

K. DE WATTEVILLE.

SIR,—Your correspondent's, Mr. Patten's, bad angel has misled him, or he would not be picking holes in Keats, even with the aim of lending point to a passable Learic. Half an hour spent in leaning on a gate (a pleasing and profitable occupation at any time) in the neighbourhood of young cattle, and more particularly of calves recently debarred from the use of the maternal udder, would convince him that heifers spend quite a considerable share of their leisure in "lowing at the skies." It is the commonest of rural sights; feet planted well apart, tail lifting slightly, neck extended, and eyes rolled to a fixed skyward stare. Mr. Patten need not grieve about the ignorance of Keats or of Greek sculptors; as the cowboy song says: "They don't want you to grieve after them."—Yours, &c.,

A. J. DAWSON.

SIR,—The attitude of a lowing heifer is surely familiar to most of us. Keats' phrase refers to the slight lifting of the muzzle which accompanies the action. It is a beautiful instance of his close observation of nature.

"The skies" do not, of course, mean the region of the Pole Star, but somewhere nearer to the horizon.—Yours, &c.,

E. KNOX LINTON.

"The Passing of Greek"

SIR,—I have read with great interest Mr. Saleeby's article under the above heading in THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE of December 26th.

The case against compulsory Greek at the Universities is certainly a strong one. Because the student who has reached this stage of his career ought to be allowed to follow any course of reading he pleases.

All boys, however, in our public schools and those who attend grammar schools should be drilled in the rudiments of Greek. Both on account of the etymological value of the language and for the sake of the minority who are likely to develop a taste for Greek literature and who would be seriously hampered if they were ignorant of the elements of the grammar.—Yours, &c.,

H. P. WRIGHT.

A New Field

SIR,—There lies before me, as I write, the bulky catalogue of a second-hand bookseller, who makes a speciality of African books. It contains rather more than three thousand items, ranging from sixteenth-century voyages to the Cape to the most modern and ephemeral works dealing with the Boer war. A goodly array of miscellaneous information, having to do mainly with the practical side of things, and containing a vast amount of facts, carefully recorded, tabulated, indexed and illustrated.

And yet to one who knows Africa from the Cape to the Zambesi, from Beira to Port Nolloth, there is not one book among this gigantic output which conveys the real Africa: the breadth, atmosphere, largeness, intimate spirit of the vast sub-continent.

Now is the time for the uprising of a real African literature which shall truly reflect something of the illimitableness of space, the sense of freedom, the tragic fascination of the veldt, and the sheer human strenuousness of colonization. For four centuries writers have striven to convey something of this sense of exhilarating vastness, this nearness to the Creator, this aloofness from the pettiness of daily life, but with little if any success.

African poets such as Pringle have sung its praises; prose-poets such as Olive Schreiner and George Steevens have painted its intimate grandeur, its awful lonesomeness; travellers and hunters such as Baines, Andersson, Moodie, Mauth and many others have laboriously described its possibilities; historians such as Theal and Noble have compiled instructive volumes; novelists such as Rider Haggard, Mitford, Glanville and Lester have put local colour into their stories; but with the possible exception of the one work of Olive Schreiner that counts ("The Story of an African Farm") no one among this galaxy, which might be indefinitely extended, has for the briefest part of a moment, or even in one short paragraph, caught the true breath of the veldt. It cannot be done by transients, and the sojourners lack typewriters, or genius.

Some recent writers, E. F. Knight and John Buchan among them, give evidence that they are aware somehow of a subtle influence, an intimate atmosphere, which they cannot reproduce. It is, as yet, elusive, indefinable, and will-of-the-wispish. It can be felt; it can be carried six thousand miles across the ocean, but it fights shy of cold print.

Nevertheless it is quite safe to prophecy that our new, and old, African Colonies will bring forth, and that ere long, a worthy chronicler, a writer who has lived the life, and felt the fascination; who has farmed, prospected, mined, fought, hunted and starved, and loves the veldt the better for his experiences. He will find, one day, seething within him, the germ of the great African story, which will eventually precipitate itself into something very like the real thing.

Then we shall have the New Field; new groundwork for the old emotions; a new frame for the old pictures; a new language to clothe old thoughts. The material is ready to hand; ample—nay, superfluous, teeming with time-old human passion, and brimming over with the interest of the unwritten-about. The hour is here. What of the man?—Yours, &c.,

F. S.

("EGOMET," per the Editor of THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, begs to thank a kind friend for his (or her?) pretty present for cutting his books.)

"Academy" Questions & Answers

Questions and Answers for this column must be addressed to THE EDITOR, THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, 9, East Harding Street, London, E.C. The envelope to be marked in the top left-hand corner "A.Q.A." Full name and address must be sent, not necessarily for publication. Each Question or Answer must be written on a separate sheet of paper and on only one side of the paper. The Editor will not undertake the forwarding of any correspondence. Questions must be confined to matters of Literature, History, Archæology, Folk-lore, Art, Music and the Drama. The Editor reserves the right of deciding whether or not any Question or Answer is of sufficient interest to be published.

COMPETITION.

Commencing with the January 9 number, and until further notice, four prizes, of 5s. each, will be awarded weekly for the two best Questions and two best Answers contributed to "Academy" Questions and Answers."

The Editor's decision must be considered absolutely final and no correspondence whatever will be entered upon with regard to the awards. The prizes will go to those Questions and Answers which are deemed to be of the greatest general interest, and brevity in all cases will count as a merit.

The names and addresses of prize winners will not be published, but the winning Questions and Answers will be indicated by an asterisk (*).

The name and address of the booksellers where the book or books can be obtained will also be given.

Each prize-winner in the United Kingdom will be advised that a credit note has been sent to a bookseller in his (or her) immediate neighbourhood and that on demand he (or she) may choose a book or books to the value of 5s. Winners outside the United Kingdom will receive a cheque for 5s.

Non-adherence to the rules and regulations of "Questions and Answers" will imply disqualification.

No Questions or Answers received after Monday will be considered eligible for the current week's competition.

No competitor can win a prize more than once in three months.

Questions

LITERATURE

AUTHORS WANTED:—

- "The lyart veteran heard the word of God
By Cameron thundered, or by Renwick poured
In gentle stream."
- "The hardness of the heart which brings Irreverence for the dreams of youth." —W. H. C.

"APULEIUS."—In no work of reference can I find mention of the edition of the "Golden Ass of Apuleius," published in folio at Paris in 1512. Can any of your readers give me any particulars? In my copy the colophon (before the index) says "Parrhisia, anno domini 1512." And in another place it reads "Impressum Lutecie . . . anno a partu virginis millesimo quingentesimo duodecimo." Is this "a partu virginis" instead of the ordinary "A.D." common in books of that date? This edition of the "Golden Ass" is not mentioned in the Dictionnaire Bibliographique of the Abbé Ducloux and M. Brunet, published in 1802, nor can I find in Delandine any mention of Ludovicus Hornken, the publisher. Apropos of my allusion to the Dictionnaire Bibliographique, how is it that the prices of the works are given in livres and soldis? Surely in some cases the "livres" must mean the "livre d'or" of six francs value? Surely, too, at the time of the Revolution, soldis were not the current coin in Paris! And how is it that at celebrated sales, such as that of the Duc de la Vallière, M. de Galignat, &c., we see such prices given as, e.g., "270 livres, 19 soldis." Did people bid in half-pence at these sales?—K. M.

"KING OF ROME."—Is there any reliable history extant in French or English of the short-lived Duc de Reichstadt, King of Rome? Of course, the play L'Aiglon is all wrong historically.—B. J.

"HABAKKUK."—Allusion is often made by illiterate writers to Voltaire's criticism of Habakkuk, as to a prophet with such a name "being capable of anything." There seems absolutely no biblical justification for his cheap witicism, even if Voltaire made it, which I doubt. Can anybody give me chapter and verse—in Voltaire, not in the Bible?—G. R. S.

PATRIOTIC ANTHOLOGY.—Is there any anthology, old or new, dealing mainly with patriotic verse? I do not mean such a collection as Henley's "Lyra Heroica," or other works dealing with Great Britain alone, but treating generally of the spirit of patriotism, without special reference to any nationality. There are beautiful detached pieces in Italian, French, and German. Have they ever been collected?—Fabian.

DRAMA

"MONSIEUR BEAUCALRE."—In the play of that name the titular hero is introduced as the cousin of the reigning King of France, and bearing the titles of "Duke of Orléans," "Duc de Nemours," "Duc de Montpensier," "Duc de Chartres," &c., &c. Did any one man in history ever bear all those titles?—Historian (Paris).

ACTING RIGHTS.—I have the printed plays of Pinero, H. A. Jones and other modern authors. I am arranging private performances of one play by each writer in a country house, and they will probably be played later in the village hall. In the latter case a small charge will be made, the funds to go to a local charity. Is it necessary to obtain the author's permission, or to pay him any percentage on the proceeds?—Lady Teasle (Bucks).

PAINTING

"LE PETIT BONHOMME."—In French landscape art, any little figure introduced into the composition, be it man, woman or child, is known technically as le petit bonhomme. Is there any English equivalent?—Barbizon.

"FATHERS AND SONS."—There are several cases among the old masters of two painters of the same name distinguished by the suffix "Elder" and "Younger." For example: David Teniers, the Elder, and David Teniers, the Younger. Can anyone supply me with a list of these names; and were they in every case father and son?—Mahler (Berlin).

MUSIC

ABBE LISZT.—When Liszt came to London in 1886 (the year in which he died) he had not been in England for 40 years, or so it is understood. On the latter occasion, did he play anywhere in public or private? If so, where did he play and what did he play?—W. Wingfield.

"THE ALHAMBRA ORGAN."—When the Alhambra in Leicester Square was originally opened (? date) there was a magnificent organ, one of the best, if not the best hitherto built—I think, by Hills; the late Mr. William Best gave several recitals upon it. What has become of the organ in question?—Septuagenarian.

Answers

LITERATURE

"GREGOROVIVUS."—I think your correspondent "J. T. Atkinson" answers him self; I believe there are no other works of this author published in English except the "City of Rome in the Middle Ages." I think the publisher was Constable; the names of the translators, I fancy, were not given; but I write from memory and may be wrong.—K. M.

"SHAKESPEARE AND THE MUSICAL GLASSES."—See "Vicar of Wakefield"; a reference to the topics of the day in polite society. The "Musical Glasses," a performance on dinner glasses or tumblers, by several persons, each wetting forefinger and pressing it continuously over the rim, producing a musical effect thereby.—J. J.

"PICTURES, TASTES, SHAKESPEARE, AND THE MUSICAL GLASSES."—Has "J. J." never read the "Vicar of Wakefield"; or does he only ask where Goldy got this phrase? If the latter, is it not probable he was its author?—Index.

GENERAL

"ORIGIN OF THE WORD 'YULE'."—In Chambers's "Book of Days," 1864 Vol. II., page 745, the following extract may be found: "The name given by the ancient Goths and Saxons to the festival of the winter-solstice was Jul or Ful, the latter term forming, to the present day, the designation in the Scottish dialect of Christmas, and preserved also in the phrase of the 'Yule Log.' Some also explain its meaning as synonymous with of or oel, which in the ancient Gothic language denotes a 'feast,' and also the favourite liquor used on such occasion, whence our word 'ale.' But a much more probable derivation of the term in question is from the Gothic, gyl or htul, the origin of the modern word 'wheel,' and bearing the same signification. According to this very probable explanation, the Yule festival received its name from its being the turning-point of the year. A confirmation of this view is afforded by the circumstance that in the old clog almanacs a 'wheel' is the device employed for marking the season of Yule-tide." In Ash's Dictionary, 1795, Vol. II., we find "Yule" (s. from the Sax., yeהל, retained in the Scotch dialect), the time of Christmas, the fifth of August; whilst the entry under "Yule" in Chambers's "Etymological Dictionary," 1880, is "Yule," yöl, n., the old name of Christmas, which was grafted on a heathen festival, probably connected with the worship of the sun. [A.S., geol, from the root of "wheel," the sun being the shining wheel; also given as "the merry feast"—A.S., gal, merry.]—Charles R. Sanderson.

"THE DEVIL."—See "The Pedigree of the Devil," by Frederick T. Hall, F.R.A.S. Published by Trübner & Co., 1883.—J. C. H.

"SIGNBOARDS."—In reply to "Castle," the following extract is from the "History of Signboards," by Jacob Larwood and John C. Hotten (Chatto and Windus, 1884): "With regard to the Swan and Sugarloaf, which occurs amongst the trades tokens, and is still seen (as in Fetter Lane, for instance), the sugarloaf was at first added by a grocer, whose sign having gained popularity as a noted landmark, or from other causes, was imitated by rivals or juniors, particularly on account of its representing the favourite alliteration. Combinations with the sugarloaf are very common, all arising from its being the grocer's sign."—Sydney Lamb.

"ROUND ROBIN."—The only solution I can find is the following: The idea of placing the names in a circular form so that no name heads the list is French, and the term is a corruption of rond and ruban. It was first adopted by the officers of Government as a means of making known their grievances.—M. McLean Dobrée.

"QUEER CARD."—In whist, &c., when a wrong card is played, the partner says to himself, "That is a queer card," which being transferred to the player means he is a queer card to play in such a manner. Hence any eccentric person, who does not act in accordance with social rules, is a "queer card."—M. McLean Dobrée.

ANNOUNCEMENT

An announcement will be made next week of interest to all Subscribers who desire to sell or buy books.

"THE TIMES" LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

A Special Literary Supplement is published with The Times on Friday. This Supplement is an impartial and authoritative organ of literary criticism and a comprehensive and trustworthy medium of literary intelligence.

It can be had with The Times of Friday alone.

Subscriptions, inclusive of postage, for The Times of Friday:—

	3 Months.	6 Months.	12 Months.
Inland ...	3s. 3d.	6s. 6d.	13s. 0d.
Foreign ...	4s. 4d.	8s. 8d.	17s. 4d.

CONTENTS OF FRIDAY, JAN. 8, 1904

Literature.

Walpole's Letters.
The English Church under the Stuarts.
Montaigne en voyage.
Humanism.
The Waldseemüller Maps.
A Naturalist of the Reformation.
A Canadian Poet.
The Expansion of Russia—Meyers Konversations-Lexikon.

Art.

Hazlitt as Art Critic.

Drama.

New York Theatres.

"THE TIMES" LITERARY SUPPLEMENT is also sold with the Mail, or
"THE TIMES" WEEKLY EDITION, upon payment of an additional penny.

Address THE PUBLISHER, The Times,
Printing House Square, London, E.C.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN, ALBEMARLE STREET, PICCADILLY, W.

TUESDAY next, January 12, at 5 o'clock.—Professor L. O. MIALL, F.R.S., Fullerian Professor of Physiology R.I. FIRST of SIX LECTURES on THE DEVELOPMENT OF ANIMALS. One Guinea the Course.
THURSDAY, January 14, at 5 o'clock.—G. R. M. MURRAY, Esq., F.R.S. FIRST of THREE LECTURES on THE FLORA OF THE OCEAN. Half a Guinea.

FRIDAY Evening, January 15, at 9 o'clock.—The Right Hon. LORD RAYLEIGH, O.M., D.C.L., LL.D., F.R.S., on SHADOWS.

SATURDAY, January 16, at 3 o'clock.—J. A. FULLER-MAITLAND, Esq., M.A., F.S.A. FIRST of THREE LECTURES on BRITISH FOLK SONG (with Vocal Illustrations). Half a Guinea.
Subscription to all the Courses in the Season, Two Guineas.

NOW READY

A Second Impression of the JANUARY INDEPENDENT REVIEW

Price 2s. 6d. net.

CONTENTS.

LAND MONOPOLY: The Appeal to History.

LAND REFORM versus PROTECTION. CHARLES TREVELYAN, M.P.

A RIDE IN MONASTIR. H. W. NEVINSON.

ERNEST VON KOERBER, THE AUSTRIAN PREMIER. FRANCIS W. HURST.

MOTORING. G. LOWES DICKINSON.

"THE MEANEST of GREEK TRAGEDIES." GILBERT MURRAY.

CANADA and the EMPIRE. Hon. GEORGE PEEL.

NATIVE LABOUR in SOUTH AFRICA. Rev. J. S. MOFFAT.

PROTECTION AND THE WOOL TRADE. J. H. CLAPHAM.

MR. BURDEN. Chaps. V. and VI. HILAIRE BELLOC.

A CATHOLIC REVOLUTIONARY. A. L. LILLEY.

OTHER REVIEWS.

At all Booksellers' and Railway Bookstalls.

London:
T. FISHER UNWIN, E.C.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S.

Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo.

ONE SHILLING EACH.

Illustrated.

THE VALE OF LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING, A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.

THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.

THE NORFOLK BROADS.

THE ISLE OF WIGHT.

BRECON and its BEACONS.

THE WYE VALLEY.

ROSS, TINTERN, and OHPSTOW.

THE SEVERN VALLEY.

BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.

{ LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR.

{ LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON. }

ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLETH, and ABENDOVEY.

CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWY-YN-COED, SNOWDON, & FESTINIOG.

BARMOUTH, DOLOGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELL.

MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.

LLANBRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide book as this, which teaches us much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.

"It very emphatically tops them all."—Daily Graphic.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 6s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS.

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,600 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & Co.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., Ltd.,
The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers. Paris and New York: BRENTANO'S.

THE PECULIAR HISTORY OF

MARY ANN SUSAN.

BY

BERNARD
CECIL BLAKE.

Price 3s. 6d.

T. FISHER UNWIN,
LONDON.

LAUGHTER IS INEVITABLE.

PRESS OPINIONS.

Literary World.—"A work well deserving the attention of the elect, by which term we mean those who can appreciate humour."

Scotsman.—"Highly diverting reading."

Freeman's Journal.—"The author is eminently successful . . . a pleasant and healthy hour's reading."

The Outlook.—"A whimsical idea. . . . Laughter at her may be philosophically unsound, but it is inevitable."

Vanity Fair.—"A pleasant volume of letters from a decidedly amusing maiden lady."

Week's Survey.—"Mary Ann herself is a singular young woman."

Hereford Times.—"We have never read a qualiter love story."

Dundee Advertiser.—"Really clever and amusing."

PRICE HALFA-CROWN.

MONTHLY.

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW

January, 1904.

HERBERT SPENCER.

THE FANTASTIC FALLACY OF AN EMPIRE BUILDER: A CHALLENGE TO MR. CHAMBERLAIN. By LEONARD M. BURRELL.

THE FISCAL QUESTION AND ITS SURROUNDINGS. By E. B. HUSBAND.

IS ENGLAND LIVING ON HER CAPITAL? By W. M. LIGHTBODY.

PASSIVE RESISTANCE. By F. W. H. REED.

THE LAND OF MAZZINI AND GARIBALDI. By KARL BLIND.

ESOTERIO LAW. By T. BATY.

BYZANTINE GREECE. By WM. MILLER.

THE SOCIAL SIDE OF IRISH CHARACTER. By ROBERT M. SILLARD.

WOMEN AND THE SWEATING SYSTEM. By PRISCILLA E. MOULDER.

FROM GOETHE'S "WILHELM MEISTER." By WILLIAM FREDERICK HARVEY.

INDEPENDENT SECTION: LETTER RE MR. CHAMBERLAIN. By J. MALCOLM LYON.

CONTEMPORARY LITERATURE.

London: R. BRIMLEY JOHNSON, 4, Adam Street, Adelphi, W.C.

BOOKS FOR PRESENTS.

THE PASTON LETTERS, 1422-1509. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by JAMES GAIRDNER. This new LIBRARY EDITION is strictly limited to 550 copies, of which only 600 sets are for sale. The monthly issue will begin with Vol. II. on January 14. Vol. I., containing the Introduction, will be published last. A LIMITED LIBRARY EDITION, in 8 vols., demy 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 12s. 6d. net per volume. (Sold only in Sets.)

THE FOLLOWING WILL SHORTLY BE READY.

V.C.: a Chronicle of Castle Barfield and of the Crimean War. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.
THE PICAROONS: a San Francisco Night's Entertainment. By GELETT BURGESS and WILL IRWIN. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.
THE FOOLISH VIRGINS. By ALFRED SUTRO. Fcap. 8vo, picture cover, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d. January 14.
A PRODIGAL'S PROGRESS. By FRANK BARRETT. A New Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.
WANTED! By DICK DONOVAN. A New Edition. Crown 8vo, picture cloth, flat back, 2s.

JAMES ORROCK, Painter, Connoisseur, Collector. (The Story of Modern English Art.) By BYRON WEBBER. Illustrated by 97 Photogravure Plates and about 90 Half-tones. LIMITED EDITION. 2 vols. large 4to, linen gilt, price Ten Guinea net.
 "Two magnificent volumes."—Truth.
 "All the great native masters who have given real distinction to the practice of the arts are represented in a fine series of photogravure plates."—Pall Mall.

The CLOISTER and the HEARTH. By CHARLES READE. Edition de Luxe, with 16 Photogravure Plates and 84 Half-Tones by M. B. HEWERDINE. Large 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net. Other Editions of this famous story are as follows:—The ELZEVIR EDITION, in 4 vols., post 8vo, bound in buckram, with a Photogravure Frontispiece to each volume, 6s. the Set. The LIBRARY EDITION, set in bold type, crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. The ST. MARTIN'S LIBRARY EDITION, set in large type and printed on fine p-per, post 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. net; leather, gilt edges, 3s. net. The PICTURE-COVER EDITION, post 8vo, illustrated boards, 2s. The CHEAP EDITION, medium 8vo, picture cover, 6d.

LANE'S ARABIAN NIGHTS.—The THOUSAND and ONE NIGHTS, commonly called in England The ARABIAN NIGHTS' ENTERTAINMENTS. Translated from the Arabic, with Notes, by EDWARD WILLIAM LANE. Illustrated with many hundred Engravings from Designs by HARVEY. Edited by EDWARD STANLEY POOLE. 3 vols., demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. each.

SIR WALTER BESANT'S TOPOGRAPHICAL BOOKS.—Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. each.

LONDON. With 125 Illustrations.

WESTMINSTER. With an Etched Frontispiece by F. S. WALKER, R.E., and 130 Illustrations by WILLIAM PATTEN and others.

SOUTH LONDON. With an Etched Frontispiece by F. S. WALKER, R.E., and 118 Illustrations.

EAST LONDON. With an Etched Frontispiece by F. S. WALKER, R.E., and 55 Illustrations by PHIL MAY, L. RAVEN HILL, and JOSEPH PENNELL.

JERUSALEM: the City of Herod and Saladin. By WALTER BESANT and E. H. PALMAR. With Map and 11 Illustrations.

JUSTIN MCCARTHY'S HISTORICAL BOOKS.

A HISTORY OF OUR OWN TIMES, from the Accession of Queen Victoria to the General Election of 1890. LIBRARY EDITION, 4 vols., demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. each. Also a POPULAR EDITION, in 4 vols., crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. each; and the JUBILEE EDITION, with an Appendix of Events to the end of 1896, in 2 vols., large crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. each.

A HISTORY OF OUR OWN TIMES. Vol. V., from 1880 to the Diamond Jubilee. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s.; or crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

DR. GEORGE MACDONALD'S COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS. Arranged and Revised by HIMSELF. 2 vols., crown 8vo, buckram, 12s.

WORKS OF FANCY AND IMAGINATION. By Dr. George MACDONALD. 10 vols. 16mo, cloth, gilt edges, in cloth case, 21s.; or the Volumes may be had separately, in Grolier cloth, at 2s. 6d. each. Volume I. Within and Without—The Hidden Life. Vol. II. The Disciple—The Gospel Women—Book of Sonnets—Organ Songs. Vol. III. Violin Songs—Songs of the Days and Nights—A Book of Dreams—Roundside Poems—Poems for Children. Vol. IV. Parables—Ballads—Scotch Songs. Vols. V. and VI. Phantastes: a Faerie Romance. Vol. VII. The Portent. Vol. VIII. The Light Princess—The Giant's Heart—Shadows. Vol. IX. Cross Purposes—The Golden Key—The Carusoyn—Little Daylight. Vol. X. The Cruel Painter—The Woe of Rivven—The Castle—The Broken Swords—The Grey Wolf—Uncle Cornelius.

THE ST. MARTIN'S LIBRARY—Pott 8vo, cloth, 2s. net each; leather, gilt edges, 3s. net each.

VIRGINIBUS PUERISQUE, and other Papers. By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

FAMILIAR STUDIES OF MEN AND BOOKS. By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

THE PUCKET R.L.S.: Favourite Passages from STEVENSON'S Works.

NEW ARABIAN NIGHTS. By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

THE WOMAN IN WHITE. By WILKIE COLLINS.

ALL SORTS AND CONDITIONS OF MEN. By Sir WALTER BESANT.

A SHORT HISTORY OF OUR OWN TIMES. 1 vol., crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. Also a Cheap POPULAR EDITION, post 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

A HISTORY OF THE FOUR GEORGES AND OF WILLIAM THE FOURTH. By JUSTIN MCCARTHY and JUSTIN HUNTLY MCCARTHY. 4 vols., demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. each.

THE REIGN OF QUEEN ANNE. 2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. each.

REMINISCENCES. With a Portrait. 2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth, 24s.

BRET HARTE'S COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS, including "Some Later Verses." Crown 8vo, buckram, 4s. 6d.

PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY'S COMPLETE WORKS IN VERSE AND PROSE. Annotated by R. HERNE SHEPHERD. 5 vols., crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. each. (The POETICAL WORKS, in 3 vols. The PROSE WORKS, in 2 vols.)

PHIL MAY'S SKETCH-BOOK. Containing 54 Cartoons by the great Humorous Artist. Large folio, cloth, 2s. 6d.

HANDLEY CROSS; or, Mr. Jorrocks's Hunt. By Robert SURTEES. With 79 Illustrations by JOHN LEKKER. Post 8vo, cloth, 2s.

SOME POPULAR THREE-AND-SIXPENNY BOOKS.

ARTEMUS WARD'S COMPLETE WORKS. With Portrait.

ASHTON'S SOCIAL LIFE IN THE REIGN OF QUEEN ANNE. With 84 Illustrations.

BESANT'S FIFTY YEARS AGO. With 144 Illustrations.

— GASPARD DE COLIGNY. With Portrait.

— SIR RICHARD WHITTINGTON. With Frontispiece.

BILL NYE'S COMIC HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES. With 146 Illustrations.

FOX BOURNE'S STORY OF ENGLISH MERCHANTS. With 32 Illustrations.

BRAND'S POPULAR ANTIQUITIES.

BRET HARTE'S CHOICE WORKS. With 50 Illustrations.

BREWER'S DICTIONARY OF MIRACLES.

— READER'S HANDBOOK OF ALLUSIONS, REFERENCES, AND PLOTS OF NOVELS.

CHAUCER FOR CHILDREN. By Mrs. HAWES. With Coloured Plates and Woodcuts.

GEORGE COLMAN'S BROAD GRINS.

GEORGE CRUIKSHANK'S LIFE. By BLANCHARD JERROLD. With 84 Illustrations.

SIR CHARLES DILKE'S THE BRITISH EMPIRE.

AUSTIN DOBSON'S THOMAS BEWICK AND HIS PUPILS. With 95 Illustrations.

AN ENGLISHMAN IN PARIS.

THE GOLDEN TREASURY OF THOUGHT. By THEODORE TAYLOR.

REV. E. J. HARDY'S LOVE, COURTSHIP, AND MARRIAGE.

THOMAS HOOD'S CHOICE WORKS. With 200 Illustrations.

THEODORE HOOK'S CHOICE HUMOROUS WORKS.

JONES'S RINGER-RING LORD. With 300 Illustrations.

— CROWNS AND CORONATIONS. With 91 Illustrations.

A KIPLING PRIMER. By F. L. KNOWLES. With 2 Portraits.

CHARLES LAMB'S COMPLETE WORKS. With 2 Portraits and Facsimiles.

LARWOOD AND HOTTEN'S HISTORY OF SIGNBOARDS. With 94 Illustrations.

THE MACLISE GALLERY. Edited by WILLIAM BATES. With 85 Portraits.

MAX O'RELL'S HER ROYAL HIGHNESS WOMAN.

— BETWEEN OURSELVES.

— RAMBLES IN WOMANLAND.

MY FIRST BOOK. By 22 Popular Authors. Profusely Illustrated.

THE OLD DRAMATISTS: BEN JONSON (3 vols.); CHAPMAN'S WORKS (3 vols.); MARLOWE (1 vol.); MASSINGER (1 vol.).

OSBORNE'S GREATER CANADA. With Map.

POE'S CHOICE WORKS: Poetry, Stories, Essays.

ALFRED RIMMER'S RAMBLES ROUND ETON AND HARROW. With 32 Illustrations.

— ABOUT ENGLAND WITH DICKENS. With 58 Illustrations.

SHAKESPEARE THE BOY. By Dr. W. J. ROFFE. With 42 Illustrations.

SHERIDAN'S COMPLETE WORKS.

SPENSER'S FOR CHILDREN. With Coloured Plates and Woodcuts.

STRUTT'S SPORTS AND PASTIMES. With 140 Illustrations.

TEAN SWIFT'S CHOICE WORKS. With Portrait and Facsimiles.

THACKERAYANA. Illustrated.

TIMB'S CLUBS AND CLUB LIFE IN LONDON. With 41 Illustrations.

— ENGLISH ECCENTRICS AND ECCENTRICITIES. With 48 Illustrations.

TURNER'S LIFE AND CORRESPONDENCE. By WALTER THORNLEY. With 10 Illustrations.

A DICTIONARY OF WORDS, FACTS, AND PHRASES. By ELZEKIR EDWARDS.

WRIGHT'S CARICATURE HISTORY OF THE GEORGES. With 300 Illustrations.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

The Academy and Literature

No. 1653. Established 1869. London: 9 January 1904.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17/6 a year.]

Literary Notes

SEVERAL articles in this week's issue of THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE deal with the output of books during the past year, which on the whole may be said to have been chiefly distinguished for biographies. Among the chief works may be named the biographies, or autobiographies, of Mr. Gladstone, Lord Beaconsfield, Dr. Guinness Rogers, Lord Wolseley, Lord Gough, W. W. Story, Voltaire, Lord Edward Fitzgerald, Galileo, Daniel O'Connell, J. C. Horsley, R.A., Sir Francis Cowley Burnand, Charles Reade, Thackeray, Fanny Burney, Crabbe, Queen Victoria, Robert Buchanan, and several others; large and small, a varied and a goodly list.

AN announcement is made this week of a new feature which I hope will find favour with many readers of THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE (see inside back page of cover). Bookmen can often help their fellows to find an odd volume, a missing part of a magazine, or a long-sought-for and greatly desired book, and our "Books Wanted or For Sale" page will, it may be expected, prove useful and interesting.

THE portrait of Shakespeare is a composite photograph from the Chandos, Droeshout, Jansen, Stratford, Felton portraits and the Stratford bust. The photograph was the work of Mr. W. R. Furness, under the guidance of Dr. H. H. Furness and Mr. Norris. The experiment distinctly tends to prove that running through these very varied likenesses there is a striking similarity of feature.

MR. LOUIS BECKE is at present engaged on a novel of Australian life, which is to be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin early in the year. The title chosen was "The Gerrards," but "The Adventures of Brigadier Gerard" by Sir A. Conan Doyle was announced, and the question of a title has not yet been decided. It is not the practice of most writers to ask their publishers to give a title to their work, but in nearly all of Mr. Becke's books the title has been selected by Mr. Unwin. "By Reef and Palm" was Mr. Becke's suggestion for his first modest venture; "By Rock and Pool" was Mr. Unwin's suggestion for a larger volume of tales and sketches, similar in motif to those in the first named. Only in four instances has any publisher other than Mr. Unwin produced any of Becke's single or collaborated books.

Mr. John Murray issued the "Naval Pioneers of Australia," by Mr. Becke and Mr. Walter Jeffery; Messrs. Pearson "The Tapu of Barrderah," the Religious Tract Society published "Tom Wallis," and Messrs. Treherne

A COMPOSITE PORTRAIT OF SHAKESPEARE

"The Jalasco Brig." The two latter works are purely boys' books.

As Art Editor of the "Illustrated London News" for a considerable period, Mr. Mason Jackson (whose death was recently announced) was a prominent figure both in the journalistic and artistic world, and his knowledge and experience of illustrated journalism would make very attractive reading if recorded in print. He was the son of John Jackson, who, in collaboration with W. A. Chatto, produced in 1838 "A Treatise on Wood Engraving, Historical and Practical," of which a second edition appeared in 1861, and which is (we believe) the only comprehensive treatment of the subject ever published. It is, perhaps, not generally known that the cover-design by Seymour for the green wrappers of the monthly numbers of "Pickwick Papers" was engraved by Mason Jackson, and a very able piece of facsimile wood-cutting it was. Poor Seymour (it will be remembered) was the artist originally engaged to illustrate "Pickwick," but after etching seven plates he committed suicide by shooting himself with a fowling-piece. This sad event occurred on April 20, 1836, before the second number of "Pickwick" issued from the press, and it is worth noting in this connection that this artist's last effort was engraved on wood by John Jackson, to whom he delivered it on the evening of the fatal day. It was John Jackson, too, who, at this juncture, advised the publishers (Chapman and Hall) to engage the services of R. W. Buss, as successor of Seymour, the result being a failure. It is obvious that Mason Jackson must have been a very young man—in fact, only seventeen years of age—when he reproduced with the graver the cover-design by Seymour, representing (in addition to sporting trophies) our old friend Mr. Pickwick asleep on a punt and Mr. Winkle shooting, indicative of the preconceived idea that the book should be principally of a sporting character. "The drawing was not at all elaborate," as the late Mr. Jackson has told us, "being done with a pencil in clear outline. I had engraved much more difficult things, and I was not particularly interested on the subject, so that I worked on this celebrated design with no more care or attention than was necessary to produce a faithful facsimile of Seymour's lines. If I could have foreseen how world-famous it would become, no doubt I should have taken a keener interest in the matter." Neither he nor his contemporaries then living ever imagined the possibility of a copy of the first edition of "Pickwick" in the original parts, with wrappers preserved, realising in 1903 the record price of £146 in the auction room!

THE "Century" for this month is a singularly interesting number, full as this magazine ever is of fine pictures and fine writing. First of the articles must be placed the instalment of Thackeray's letters, which shed light upon the mood in which he wrote "The Newcomes." It is noticeable how often he was despondent with regard to his work; of the novel mentioned he says, "It torments me incessantly, and I wander about with it in my interior, lonely & gloomy as if a secret remorse was haunting me." There is also an informative article on "An American Palace of Art," the marvellous Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum in the Fenway, Boston, with admirable illustrations.

In the same magazine M. Maurice Maeterlinck writes on "Our Friend the Dog," with his usual charm and insight, the dog being to him the one animal that has in any real way entered into human life. Of his bull-dog Pelléas, he writes, "He was happy with the happiness which we, perhaps, shall never know, since it sprang from the smile and the approval of a life incomparably higher than his own. . . . I envied the gladness of his certainty, compared it with the destiny of man, still plunging on every side into darkness, and said to myself that the dog who meets with a good master is the happier of the two." The voice of the pessimist!

Mr. A. HALLING, the Assistant-Librarian to the University of Copenhagen, writes that Jonas Lie, to whom a reference was made in a recent number of THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, is not a Dane, but a Norwegian.

THE "Boz" Club, founded in 1900 by Mr. Percy Fitzgerald, of which Lord James of Hereford is president, is now undergoing a process of reconstruction. A committee has been appointed (with Mr. Henry F. Dickens, K.C., as chairman) for the purpose of formulating rules, which will be recommended for adoption at the next general meeting of the members. The club includes many distinguished representatives of literature, science, art, law and the drama. Mr. Henry F. Dickens has accepted the presidency of the Dickens Fellowship, which, with its various branches all over the world, now in its second year numbers over four thousand members.

It is announced that Mr. Sidney Lee will on Wednesday, January 13, address the Library Assistants Association on "Books in Relation to National Efficiency," a large and an interesting subject. It is often matter of debate among booklovers whether literature does or does not play a practical part in everyday life. It is notorious that many efficient men of business are totally ignorant of the literatures of their own and other countries, so, too, are very many men of general affairs. I am not of course referring to technical works, which scarcely come under the denomination of literature, but to poetry, philosophy, fiction, criticism, history and so forth; what influence have they upon the national efficiency? It is difficult to say what and how much; perhaps Mr. Sidney Lee will tell us, or put us on the right track for deciding the question, which is of real interest to all literary workers.

THE hundredth anniversary of Kant's death falls on February 12, 1904, and will be fitly celebrated in Königsberg. Among other ceremonies a bronze memorial tablet will be unveiled in the historic "Danziger Keller." Near at hand was the house in which the philosopher lived.

THERE comes from Berlin the first number of a new weekly periodical representing finance and economics. It is entitled "Plutus," and is edited by Georg Bernhard. His object is to bring political economy, which he considers to be the most interesting of the sciences, to the notice of the public in a way that all can understand. And certainly this number contains readable and even attractive articles on Banks, the Stock Exchange, the cotton trade, the further education of the apprentice, and the money-market.

A RATHER long extract from "Herbert Spencer: A Portrait," in this month's "Blackwood," will, I hope, be forgiven: "His life had one aim—dedication to scientific truth. All else was sacrificed to this, or rather no sacrifice was called for; all that was foreign to this supreme purpose fell off of itself. All his habits were adjusted to it. After breakfast he glanced hastily at The Times—often for long stretches, if his head were feeble, not looking at it at all; when he did read it, we may assume that it was less to study contemporary politics than to discover instances of Government bungling. Between nine and ten he was commonly to be seen in Kensington Gardens, at the Bayswater end, the head slightly bent in reflection, but not absorbed in it, and always with a frank greeting for an acquaintance. Punctually at ten he appeared at his working rooms, which he kept apart from his residence to secure himself against intrusion. There for three hours he dictated to an amanuensis or, in after years, to a shorthand-writer his letters and 'copy.' In an enfeebled state of the brain he found penmanship the hardest part of composition, and it is probable that if he had had to write his books with his own hand most of them would never have been written at all. At one he returned to lunch at his boarding-house. He had spent his first years in London in solitary lodgings, and only resigned himself to the humdrum conversation of a boarding-house on being assured by a medical friend that he would never regain his health if he continued to live by himself. The early part of the afternoon was given up to business. He superintended his own printing, book-binding, and publishing. Long before his fame was assured he had the courage to incur the additional cost of stereotyping his books, and his ultimate gains through this wise economy were great. For many years, when he was publishing his works in parts, he even supervised the issue of the successive numbers to subscribers. He then made his way to the Athenæum Club, where he was sure to find his most intimate friends, looked through the periodicals, and played a few games at billiards. Three or four evenings a week he dined out in a steadily increasing circle. If he remained at home he seldom read. Reading for half an hour after dinner, he said, would keep him awake for hours. He usually played billiards the evening through. He went early to bed, but not always to find sleep. Insomnia dogged him from middle life to old age."

"WHO'S WHO IN AMERICA" (Sampson Low) contains the names and biographies of over 14,000 more or less distinguished persons; prodigious! With some of these eminent people the editor, of what after all is an extremely valuable work of reference, seems to have had trouble. As thus, to quote from the preface: "One gentleman of distinguished ante-bellum record 'took his pen in hand,' and wrote an installment of autobiography which brought him to the Mexican War in about eight thousand words, at the end of which he cheered the recipient with the assurance that the remainder would reach him in due time. It did: in about a dozen similar installments which arrived, with great regularity, in every Monday's morning mail until the story was told." By the way, why does Madame Melba appear in the American "Who's Who"?

MR. HENRY FROWDE has printed for private circulation "A Chart of Oxford Printing, 1468-1900," with notes and illustrations, by Mr. Falconer Madan. The book exhibits the fluctuations in the output of the Clarendon Press, and of other works printed at Oxford, independent of that press. From the interesting notes I quote, "In 1605 the oldest existing English newspaper began as 'The Oxford Gazette,' the Court being then at Oxford"; "In 1675 the Bible Press began"; "1860.—The first stereotyping by the paper process: electrotyping followed in 1863." The total number of books produced up to 1900 was 19,475. But numbers do not express adequately the wonderful service rendered to English scholarship by the Clarendon Press.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS, ETC.

It is hoped that the photographic reproduction of the MS. "Aristophanis Codex Ravennas," carefully preserved at Ravenna, will be published during the present month. It will form the ninth volume of Dr. S. S. de Vries' well-known series of "Codices Graeci et Latini," published by Sijthoff, of Leiden, Holland. Dr. J. Van Leeuwen of that university will contribute an introductory chapter in Latin. The cost of the volume will be £11 5s. net. In the course of the year it is intended to issue the famous "Dioscorides Codex" preserved at Vienna. Among the manuscripts already reproduced in phototype in this series are "Plato (Codex Oxoniensis)," "Plautus (Codex Heidelbergensis)," "Homeri Ilias (Codex Venetus)," and "Tacitus (Codex Laurentianus Mediceus)." — A monthly magazine on entirely new lines would seem almost impossible, the periodical world being so crowded, but evidently it is not, for Messrs. George Newnes, Limited, announce that on the 12th instant they will publish the first number of "Technics": an organ for technical students. The contributors include such authorities as Sir W. de W. Abney and Sir William White, until recently chief-constructor to the Navy, and when it is taken into consideration that there are at present over half-a-million students enrolled at our Technical Institutes, apart from the teachers, and the large portion of the general public interested in science, we have every reason to believe the magazine will find a large public. No expense has been spared in the production of "Technics": it will be profusely illustrated, and printed on good paper. The price will be ninepence net.—Messrs. Bradbury, Agnew & Co. announce the European section of "The Armoury of Windsor Castle," by Guy Francis Laking, M.V.O., F.S.A., published by command of His Majesty the King. There will be 40 full-page photogravure plates. The price will be five guineas net.—The Rationalist Press Association are now issuing in their sixpenny reprint series, Mr. Edward Clodd's "The Story of Creation," with the whole of the illustrations and tables contained in the original edition. Mr. Clodd's book will be followed by Sir Leslie Stephen's "An Agnostic's Apology."—In their extra series the same association are also publishing through Messrs. Watts this week, under the title "Science and Speculation," the Prolegomena to G. H. Lewes's "History of Philosophy." The cover is adorned with a portrait of the author, reproduced from an engraving presented to Robert Browning by Lewes, and now in the possession of Mr. G. J. Holyoake.—The Rev. J. Arbuthnot Nairn has edited the "Mimes of Herodas" for the Clarendon Press, with introduction, critical notes, commentary and collotype illustrations. No complete commentary has appeared for some considerable time even on the Continent, and a great mass of new material has been meanwhile accumulating. It will be recalled that a papyrus roll containing some 700 lines of the work of "Herodas" was found in Egypt in 1891, and thus was recovered one of the leading representatives of an important branch of Greek literature. The book will be ready immediately.—Mr. John Long will publish at once a new novel by Percival Pickering entitled "Toy Gods," and additional interest should attach to the book from the fact that "The Memoirs of Mrs. Maria Wilhelmina Pickering," the author's mother, have just been issued to the public.—Mr. Elliot Stock is about to issue a work entitled "Self-Help for the Poor Clergy." It enumerates various plans for increasing their incomes, and gives directions as to how the clergyman's wife may supplement her husband's income without loss of dignity or compromising her position in the parish!

MR. T. N. FOULIS, of Edinburgh and London, is publishing the "Life of Omar Al Khayyami." The author is a Persian journalist, who differs on many points from previous writers on this subject, and is the first Persian author to discuss in English comments concerning Omar. He totally disagrees with English and American biographers regarding the poet's parentage, his profession and his philosophy in general, claiming him to be of Arab descent and never to have had anything to do with tent-making. This book should be of interest to those who are students not only of Omar but of Persian literature. There will be further interest in the decoration of the volume which is Persian, while on the vellum cases for the very limited édition de luxe the decorations are being prepared in Persia by native artists.

Bibliographical

IN his "Recollections of Rossetti and His Circle," Mr. H. T. Dunn mentions that, in Cheyne Walk, "often in the summer evenings, when the windows would be thrown wide open, the fine baritone of Theo Marzials," who was frequently at the house next door, "would come floating into our front rooms. Rossetti had a great admiration for Marzials as a poet, and often spoke of the high quality of his poems and songs, which were then becoming very popular and much discussed." It is curious how reputations come and go. In how many "places where they sing" do we now hear Marzials' "Twickenham Ferry"? And how often are his verses quoted? "The Gallery of Pigeons and Other Poems" of 1873 remains his only published volume of original work. His "Pan Pipes" of 1882 (reproduced in 1900) was only a collection of old songs to which he had put pianoforte accompaniments. There is a short notice of him in Mr. Miles' "Poets and Poetry of the Century," but no quotation from his verse. A few of his shorter pieces—quatrains and the like—were reproduced in the collection called "Latter-Day Lyrics" (1878).

There has been quite a protracted correspondence in one of the Sunday newspapers on the subject of Adah Isaacs Menken and her volume of "Infelicia" (1868). We are now told that this book was really the work of one John Thomson, or that at any rate he had a good deal to do with its production. Some idiotic gossip used to attribute the book to Mr. Swinburne, of all people; perhaps because it had for motto the lines:—

Leaves pallid and sombre and ruddy,
Dead fruits of the fugitive years;
Some stained as with wine that is bloody,
And some as with tears.

A good deal of "Infelicia" is rhapsodical prose after the manner of Whitman; the verse in it is of the poorest quality, and to ascribe it to Mr. Swinburne was to insult that great poet quite gratuitously. I see no reason to suppose that Menken did not write the book herself. She was obviously a clever woman, and apparently had received an exceptionally good education.

I have been asked to supply a list of Mr. George Gissing's successive publications. The following is, I believe, approximately complete: "Workers in the Dawn" (1880), "The Unclassed" (1884), "Demos" (1886), "Isabel Clarendon" (1886), "Thyrza" (1887), "A Life's Morning" (1888), "The Nether World" (1889), "The Emancipated" (1890), "New Grub Street" (1891), "Born in Exile" (1892), "Denzil Quarrier" (1892), "The Odd Women" (1893), "In the Year of Jubilee" (1894), "Eve's Ransom" (1895), "Sleeping Fires" (1895), "The Paying Guest" (1896), "Human Odds and Ends" (short stories, 1897), "The Whirlpool" (1897), "The Town Traveller" (1898), "Charles Dickens" (in the "Victorian Era Series," 1898), "The Crown of Life" (1899), "Our Friend the Charlatan" (1901), "By the Ionian Sea" (a book of travel, 1901), an abridgment of Forster's "Life of Dickens" (1902), "The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft" (1903). In addition to this, there is the work done for the "Rochester" edition of Dickens.

Said a writer in The Times the other day, "If any one tried to choose a Christmas anthology out of the English poets, he would find it difficult to fill even a small book with good verses. Most poems about Christmas have more piety than poetry in them." That may be so; but the attempt to compile an anthology of Christmas verse has been made more than once of recent years. In 1885 there was a "Christmas Garland," made up of carols and other poems from the fifteenth century to the present time. In 1890 there came from America "Christmas in Song, Sketch, and Story." This was followed, in 1895, by a little collection of "Christmas Poems," and by "A Book of Christmas Verse" which had been compiled by the Rev. (now Canon) H. C. Beeching, and which was reproduced in 1897 and 1898. In 1896 there also came "A Christmas Posy" of verse. The field, it will be seen, has been tolerably well tilled of late.

There will be many to welcome the "Gathered Poems" by Ernest Myers which Messrs. Macmillan are about to issue—always assuming that the task of "gathering" has been well performed. Mr. Myers' volumes of verse include "The Puritans" (a one-act play, 1869), "The Extant Odes of Pindar" (translated, 1874), "Poems" (1877), "The Defence of Rome and Other Poems" (1880), and "The Judgment of Prometheus and Other Poems" (1886). It will be interesting to note how these are dealt with in the forthcoming collection.

M. ANATOLE FRANCE

[Photo: Gilbert and Co., Paris.]

The announcement of a new book by Mrs. Eliza Brightwen reminds one of the great success of her first work—"Wild Nature Won by Kindness," which, published originally in 1890, came out in a fifth and revised edition in 1893. It was followed by "More About Wild Nature," (1892) and "Rambles with Nature Students" (1899). "Sidelights on the Bible" appeared in 1901, but it is pleasant to see that the lady is now returning to her first love—Nature.

Messrs. Routledge have just re-issued, in gift-book guise, Longfellow's translation of "The Divine Comedy"—a version which, if it is not very widely read, has certainly run through a fair number of editions. Of the most recent of these may be mentioned the 1877, 1885, 1886, 1890 (in two volumes), 1891, 1892, and 1893 (one of the Lubbock Hundred Best Books).

THE BOOKWORM.

1903

Biography

OBVIOUSLY the biography of the year is that of Mr. Gladstone by Mr. Morley—not merely because the subject was and is of so much interest to so many, but because the biographer has done his work with so much impartiality and skill. It is no fault of Mr. Morley that he has been able to tell us nothing new about the man as apart from the statesman. It is to be presumed that if Mr. Morley has drawn less than was expected on the journals and correspondence of his hero, it has been because the material at his disposal was less large or less fruitful than was supposed. Here we have to do chiefly with the literary aspect of biography, and from that point of view Mr. Henry James' "W. W. Story" comes next in importance to Mr. Morley's "Gladstone." In this case the subject makes no very wide appeal, and Mr. James' cleverly-constructed volumes are likely to secure for the American poet-sculptor a permanency of fame which that worthy was unable to compass by his own achievements.

A large proportion of the biography of the year has been literary in its topic. We have had, for instance, a "Life of Bret Harte" which, though rather flimsy in substance and undistinguished in style, was fairly adequate to the occasion. Somewhat the same verdict may be passed upon the "Robert Buchanan" of Miss Harriett Jay. Very much more technical mastery was shown by Mr. Graves in his account of Sir George Grove, who, though associated mainly with the "Dictionary of Music," may be regarded on general grounds as a littérateur, and whose letters proved unexpectedly attractive. The "Crabbe" of Canon Ainger and the "Fanny Burney" of Mr. Dobson are, of course, compilations in a sense, but are so particularly well done that they are likely to remain the standard authorities in their respective spheres. Mr. Coleman's "Charles Reade as I Knew Him" is bulky enough in all conscience, but is not so much a memoir as a series of random recollections. Disappointingly slight was the book on Dr. John Brown by his cousin and namesake, and necessarily slight were the biographical sketches of Dr. Robert Wallace, G. Douglas Brown, Anna Swanwick, and Edna Lyall. It is to be hoped that Mr. Walker's booklet on Lord De Tabley is only a preliminary study for a more solid performance. We have received from Mr. Dobell some fresh "Sidelights on Charles Lamb"; Mr. Julian Hawthorne has added to his published memoranda about his father; more "Rossetti papers" have proceeded from the apparently inexhaustible store of Mr. W. M. Rossetti; and the R. L. Stevenson tradition has been continued in his mother's very Stevensonian narrative of her visit to America and the South Seas, and in his step-daughter's graphic "Vailima Memories."

A good many of the biographies of 1903 were devoted to "distinguished foreigners." Among these were Giordano Bruno, Galileo, Isabella D'Este, and Hernando de Soto, whose character and work have now been fairly expounded for the benefit of the English reader. Voltaire, too, will be all the better understood here in future for the care and vivacity with which his life-story has been told by "S. G. Tallentyre." From the Master of Peterhouse we have had a scholarly monograph on the Electress Sophia, and from Lord Goschen an elaborate tribute to his grandfather, the publisher, and his circle. Rather of the nature of book-making is "A King's Romance" (that of the Servian Milan); while who shall say how much of romance there may not be in "A Keystone of Empire" (Francis Joseph)? In the department of historical biography there have been the books on the second Duke of Buckingham (a real contribution to the library), Lord Edward Fitzgerald, and Daniel O'Connell. This memoir of the chief author of "The Rehearsal" was certainly a desideratum. Among the subjects of contemporary biography have been Mr. Arthur Balfour, Mr. Chamberlain (by Mr. Jeyes), and Miss Marie Corelli (by two devout but injudicious admirers). In appropriate celebrations of English fighting-men, 1903 was rich: note the volumes on Sir James Outram, Lord Gough, Lord Seaton, and Sir Donald Stewart. Those religious teachers, Father Dolling, T. T. Carter of Clewer, H. C. Shuttleworth, and James Martineau, were the subjects of works ranging from the full "Life and Letters" to the slender "Reminiscences." Among the "miscellaneous" must be included the biographies of "A Versatile Professor" (Dr. Nares), a clever family (The Hawthreys), a friend of Coleridge (Tom Wedgwood), a proconsul who did not prance (Lord Dufferin), an Oxford light of other days (Sir Henry Acland), a police magistrate (Commissioner Kerr), and a provincial magnate (Sir Llewellyn Turner).

Among last year's Memoirs were a few which owe their main value to the letters they reproduced—those of Sir Henry Layard and of Bishop Westcott, for example. In these cases, as in the "More Letters by Charles Darwin," the subjects of the books told their own tale in very acceptable fashion. This too was done in part in the "Letters of Jane Welsh Carlyle," published by Sir Crichton Browne and Mr. Alexander Carlyle in (one fears) a polemical rather than in a biographical spirit. Of these "Letters," which could not fail to be absorbing, it is sufficient to record that they, and the introduction to them, drew from the representatives of Mr. Froude a document by that writer ("My Relations with Carlyle") which was universally read with pain. The Correspondence of Lady Burghersh proved to be a contribution to the biography of the "great world-victor's victor," Wellington. "The Orrery Papers" had a considerably wider scope, for they supplied at once a family history and numerous side-lights on bygone times. "The Creevey Papers" are, in a way, the biography of T. Creevey, M.P., but obviously they are very much more than that: they are invaluable "mémoires pour servir," and belong to historical rather than to biographical literature. Mr. Meynell's "Benjamin Disraeli" stands out from other books of the kind as an excellent specimen of the anecdotal biography: it presents no consecutive narrative, but supplies, by cumulative touches, a portrait sufficiently vivid and vraisemblant. There have been in 1903 other books, not devoted to any one person in particular, which have nevertheless a biographical interest and utility. Foremost among these is Mr. Bryce's "Studies in Contemporary Biography," followed by Mr. McCarthy's "Portraits of the Sixties," Mr. Ward's "Problems and Persons," Sir Mount Stuart Grant Duff's "Out of the Past," and the "Personalialia" of the still unidentified "Sigma." In all these instances the authors discourse of people whom they have personally known.

It remains to mention the more prominent autobiographies of the year. Among these, Lord Wolseley's admittedly stands first—not, of course, on account of its literary quality, which is not conspicuous, but on account of its present and its permanent interest. If it should not enjoy the popular success obtained by Lord Roberts' similar work, that will be chiefly because Lord Wolseley has been more diffuse than his predecessor, and has made the mistake of postponing to another time the conclusion of his narrative. From the point of view of mere popularity, one may rank next to Lord Wolseley's book those by the late William Simpson, Sir Frank Burnand, Mr. Arthur à Beckett ("The À Becketts of 'Punch'"), the late J. C. Horsley, Mr. Plowden, and Dean Pigou. The Dean gives us only some "Odds and Ends." Mr. Plowden is agreeably frank, and Mr. Horsley invariably entertaining. The editor and ex-assistant-editor of "Punch" both shed light on the literary and journalistic history of the past few decades. Very readable, and not without substance in them, are the additional "Recollections" of Sir Horace Rumbold; readable, too, are Mr. W. E. Adams' "Memoirs of a Social Atom"—both books are full of variety. From the autobiography of Mr. Guinness Rogers we gain informing details regarding "the Dissidence of Dissent," with incidental references to Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Chamberlain. Of the Memoirs of George Elers, and of the Reminiscences of the first Earl of Ellesmere, the chief features are the anecdotes of Wellington which personal acquaintance enabled the writers to supply.

English Historical Literature

IN history, the past year has been noteworthy rather for the continuation of important works already begun than for the appearance of any very noteworthy new books. The two great Universities have given evidence of the activity of their schools of historical work. At Cambridge, Professor J. B. Bury's inaugural lecture (published by the University Press) has given an earnest of the zeal with which he takes up the work of organisation due to his eminent predecessors, Sir John Seeley and Lord Acton. Lord Acton's own lectures have appeared, and added to the regret always felt by students that one who knew so enormously much history should have written so very little. Another volume has appeared of the "Cambridge Modern History," written on the co-operative plan which Lord Acton had mapped out. It deals with the history of the United States on a method something like that of the great work edited by Justin Winsor, though less sumptuous in scale, and not choked with bibliography. At Oxford, Mr. Charles Oman has given another volume of his admirable "History of the Peninsular War," going down to the end of the Talavera campaign, and clearing up in the light of later knowledge many matters left obscure or distorted by the brilliant but not always fair eloquence of Napier.

Military history has revived of late, as is perhaps only natural after a considerable war. The Times "History of the Boer War" goes on, and another volume of the Hon. J. W. Fortescue's "History of the British Army" has appeared, bringing the story down to that "darkest hour before the dawn"—the Netherlands campaigns of the Duke of York. Several minor contributions to military history have appeared in the shape of memoirs and recollections of the Peninsular War, and accounts of separate phases of the South African War, such as the "History of Lumsden's Horse" by H. H. S. Pearse.

A mournful interest attaches to some of the volumes of the year, in that they are the last fruit of some tree of learning cut down, as it seemed to us, in full vigour. The new issue of the late Professor S. R. Gardiner's unfinished "History of the Commonwealth," with one more completed chapter, and the "Historical Lectures and Addresses" of Bishop Creighton are of this class, though the latter historian would hardly have found time to carry on his historical work in his laborious diocese, or the still higher position to which he would probably have attained had he lived. Professor Freeman's memory is kept alive by a reissue of his "Historical Geography of Europe," revised by Professor J. B. Bury.

Sir George Trevelyan, happily carrying out the brilliant literary promise of his early days, and giving back to mankind what was too good for party, has issued the second part of his narrative of the "American Revolution." He keeps up the Whig traditions of his family, but is fairer than his famous uncle. Two interesting works on Indian history have appeared; "Ledger and Sword," though its title savours too much of fiction, is a history of the East India Company, in which the commercial and financial side of the organisation is brought out—a phase that we are apt to forget in the clash of arms and the blaze of the jewels of picturesque sovereigns. Mr. Beckles Willson has recalled this aspect to us, and Mr. S. C. Hill, charged with the care of Indian records, has told the story of the commercial ruin of the French in Bengal in his "Three Frenchmen in Bengal"—a tale hitherto obscured by the more sensational struggle in Southern India.

Several well-known historical writers have followed up their lines of research with fresh books. Mr. Edwin Pears, in his "Destruction of the Greek Empire," has told of the second fall of the Eastern Empire before the Turks, as he formerly told of its first overthrow by Latin Crusaders. Mr. Andrew Lang has pursued his ingenious, if sometimes over-subtle, inquiries into obscure and intricate byways of history in his volume of studies called "The Valet's Tragedy" (again a good title for a novel). Some of the authors known as historical novelists have turned their attention to romantic history. Mr. Julian Corbett has given the naval story of "England in the Mediterranean," and Sir Gilbert Parker has collaborated in a history of "Old Quebec." Mr. W. H. Wilkins has given another of his interesting eighteenth century studies in his life of Sophie Dorothee of Zell—called, novelistically, "The Love of an Unmarried Queen."

An interesting volume of the Calendar of State Papers has appeared, dealing with Ireland in 1600. Ecclesiastical history is richer by the posthumous work of the late Professor Bright, "The Age of the Fathers." Mr. John Willcock's account of "The Great Marquess," the only Argyll who bore the title, known chiefly as the enemy of Montrose, throws light on a puzzling character in an intricate time. An interesting and useful study of Napoleonic methods, now that the Emperor is once more becoming the object of a cult, both here and abroad, is to be found in Mr. H. A. L. Fisher's "Studies in Napoleonic Statesmanship in Germany." There we see how the subjects of Napoleon's vassal States were raised by the Code and crushed by the Conscription.

Two more general histories have appeared: Sir Spencer Walpole's "History of Twenty-five Years," and Mr. Herbert Paul's "History of Modern England," the first part. Written from differing political standpoints, both may add to our knowledge. Miss Bateson's work on "Mediaeval England," dealing with social matters chiefly, is valuable alike to historian and economist.

Abroad the most noteworthy event has been the death of Mommsen, one of the great generation of the founders of the German Empire—the Bismarck of Roman history. His work, it was known, was practically ended; but his death removed a vigorous and striking figure, as well as a man of vast learning and great power. His occasional intolerance of judgment could not disguise the great value of his contribution to our knowledge of the history that is called ancient. With him ended the great generation of German historians; though, as in our own country, and to a greater extent, the production of valuable and careful work continues. The modern methods of history leave less scope for individual eminence, now that too much is known for any single mind to master completely, except in studying a brief period.

Theology

IN the domain of Old Testament criticism the importance of the news that is being furnished by the researches of Assyriologists was brought home to the general public in this country at the beginning of the past year by the publication of Delitzsch's "Babel and Bible," two lectures originally delivered in the presence of the German Emperor. Under the title "The Oldest Code of Laws in the World" had already appeared an English translation of the Code of Hammurabi, and in our Christmas number we had under review Mr. Stanley Cook's "The Laws of Moses and the Code of Hammurabi." Therein are discussed two questions: the sources and date of the Code itself; and its relation to that Book of the Covenant which forms the basis of the Jewish Law. This author perceives that already there are signs of a reaction among experts against the impulse to have recourse to the "wand of cuneiform research" for the solution of every Old Testament enigma. English contributions to Old Testament criticism indeed are for the most part of a conservative character. Such, for instance, is Mr. McFadyen's "Old Testament Criticism and the Christian Church." Not that the assured results are ignored, but that their importance, as diminishing the value of the sacred books for ethical and doctrinal purposes, is reduced to a minimum. A similar line is taken in Mr. Preserved Smith's contribution to the International Theological Library, "Old Testament History." The traditional documents, whatever the history of their origins, picture a nation's soul that passed through the furnace of affliction to fit it to give birth to him whom its prophets foretold as the Sun of Righteousness.

Closely allied with this branch of inquiry is Mr. Tennant's highly philosophical inquiry into "The Sources of the Doctrines of the Fall and of Original Sin." After an exhaustive but inconclusive examination of contemporary legends, Mr. Tennant seeks by psychological analysis to solve the problem à priori. Knowledge begets consciousness of evil; progressive civilisation imposes heavier demands upon individual will and enforces a wider breach with the state of nature, and it seems as if "he that increases knowledge increaseth sorrow." The composite legend was found by the people and shaped by their genius; by them it was handed on till it received its final form in the soul of Augustine. And this is an appropriate corner for a mention of Mr. C. G. Montefiore's "Liberal Judaism," a remarkable essay towards a better understanding between his people and a world through which they are scattered abroad.

Among penultimate philosophers the vogue of Nietzsche received a fillip in February from the publication of a translation of his "Dawn of Day," a collection of detached thoughts worked out by him more fully elsewhere; which gave rise to some correspondence in our columns. The value-judgment theories of Ritschlian school are reflected in the essays of Mr. F. C. S. Schiller, published under the general title "Humanism." And it is perhaps to be attributed to the same influence that we have two volumes under the name of Anselm—"Devotions," and the complete works; for the famous ontological argument is certainly akin to the value-judgment. A complete contrast in method is furnished by the late Frederic Myers' "Human Personality and its Survival of Bodily Death." Myers argued from observed facts to his great generalisation. Whatever may be thought of its ultimate thesis, we said at the time that the book appeared, it is beyond question a work of the most profound and wide-reaching interest, forming a complete survey of the facts with which psychical research attempts to deal, and setting forth with singular persuasiveness and exquisite temper the interpretation of those facts which Mr. Myers thought that right reason compelled him to adopt.

In the field of history a momentary sensation was made by Mr. John Pollock's "The Popish Plot." Mr. Pollock had undertaken, in accordance with a suggestion of Lord Acton, an inquiry into one of the unsolved doubts which obscure the episode of which Titus Oates was the centre. His book was marked by wide research and daring speculation. Too daring indeed it was shown to be when, in their organ, "The Month," and elsewhere, the coldly logical mind of an English Jesuit was brought to bear upon his conclusions. We noticed also the sixth instalment of "The History of the English Church" treating of the period from the accession of Charles I. to the death of Anne, by Mr. W. H. Hutton. Of far wider scope was the admirable translation of Paul Wernle's study of "The Beginnings of Christianity," wherein the German disciple of Carlyle finds the solution of the riddle of Christianity in the enthusiastic hero-worship of Saul of Tarsus. We must content ourselves with a bare mention of Mr. Hannay's "The Spirit and Origin of Christian Monasticism," of "Anchoresses of the West," by F. M. Steele, and of E. Belfort Bax's "Rise and Fall of the Anabaptists"—all of them books which interested us. Though it hardly counts as history, we may name here the charming "Life of St. Mary Magdalen," excellently translated from the Italian of an unknown author and introduced by Vernon Lee. Mr. W. S. Lilly and Mr. Wilfrid Ward published volumes of essays, "Christianity and Modern Civilisation" and "Problems and Persons," bearing upon the relation of the Roman Catholic Church to the world.

"The Life of Father Dolling," by Charles E. Osborne, is the most notable contribution to spiritual biography. Here, we thought, was neither theorist nor man of letters—for he was professedly "an ignoramus" in book-learning—but a spiritual genius, an intensely human saint, who knew God's secret and lived it. The son of Dr. Westcott, late Bishop of Durham, in a work excellent alike in tone and temper, printed the life of his distinguished father.

Of the numerous volumes of sermons which passed into our hands, the majority at a high level of thought and style, the most memorable were those by Archdeacon Wilberforce, "Following on to Know the Lord"; Dr. Campbell, "City Temple Sermons"; and Mr. Stopford Brooke, "The King of Love." Mr. J. Brierley's "Problems of Living," a collection of essays, is worthy to be mentioned beside these.

Poetry

THE year 1903 has not been for English poetry, or poetry in English, precisely an annus mirabilis. A poem by W. E. Henley—his swan-song; new volumes by Messrs. Watson, Kipling, Austin, Yeats, Davidson, and Binyon; a new poet in Mr. Zangwill; a new poetess in Miss Ethel Clifford; and the full discovery of Thomas Traherne—these are the leading features of a not too striking twelvemonth.

For the most part it has been a matter of marking time. Only one of the accepted poets can be said to have made a notable advance in his art; and that, of course, is Mr. Laurence Binyon, whose "Death of Adam" has struck the popular imagination. Mr. Binyon's work has always had the respect, if not the applause, of the critics, while to the public he has been little more than a name. Now, all of a sudden, he has produced a single and not elaborate poem in which the human note is sounded simply and clearly, and at once he receives the recognition which is his due. The lesson ought not to be thrown away upon the younger writers of verse, who seem to think it is to their interest to get as far away as possible from the broad roads and streams of sympathy. Mr. Binyon has succeeded in "The Death of Adam," not only because he has given voice to an all-prevailing instinct, but because he has done so without obscurity and affectation. His style is still a little tortuous and cumbrous, and his lyric measures are wanting in ease and grace. It is in the more stately forms of verse that he is likely to make most impression on his countrymen.

His contemporaries stand where they stood before. There is no revelation of new power in Mr. Watson's "For England," or Mr. Kipling's "Five Nations," or Mr. Austin's "Flodden Field," or Mr. Yeats's two volumes, or Mr. Davidson's "Knight of the Maypole." The last-named, indeed, is compounded of prose as well as verse. It is dramatic in construction—that is, it professes to be a play; but neither the verse nor the prose in it has any special distinction, and its performance in public is scarcely to be looked for. As literature it is below the highest level to which Mr. Davidson has attained. Mr. Austin has been more fortunate than Mr. Davidson—if it be good fortune—inasmuch as his play has actually been played. It has, however, no dramatic grip, the "situations" being obvious, and the dialogue "poetical" rather than effective. It has some pretty and pleasing passages, but that is all. We have here the drama of the study, not the stage. "The Five Nations" leaves Mr. Kipling where he was. Here and there we seem to detect, amid the rush of rigorous rhetoric, a softer, tenderer tone than is usual with this vehement writer. But in the main we get here the more prevailing Kipling—the insistent and persistent, the rough and ready, the journalistic rather than poetic. For the first time, it may be noted, "Recessional" appears here within the boards of a volume. In Mr. Watson's "For England" we have the poet as politician, striving with all his might to maintain an unpopular position. In the matter of manner and diction Mr. Watson is, in these sonnets, quite himself at his best, and his verses will, in the case of many of his readers, secure pardon for his views.

In the newcomers—Mr. Zangwill and Miss Clifford—we have some performance and more promise. In the former's "Blind Children" there is a pathos and prettiness, but most power is shown (as might be expected) in the treatment of Jewish character and ideas. Why should not Mr. Zangwill become the present-day laureate of his race? He has enthusiasm and he has vigour; and if he cannot always be poetical, he can always be agreeably rhetorical. Miss Clifford's "Songs of Dreams" are typical of almost all the newer feminine verse—happier in selecting than in dealing with the more elusive moods of mind and soul. Our women writers are just now more subtle and intimate than most of their masculine contemporaries, but they seem unable to give perfectly adequate expression to their sentiments and sensations. They interest, they touch, they charm, for the moment; but what they have said has not been said once for all; there is a lingering sense of inadequacy even in the most interesting, most touching, most charming of the things they say.

One sees this even in the most welcome of the year's produce on the feminine side—in Mrs. Marriott Watson's "After Sunset," Mrs. Le Bailly's "Other Poems," Miss Alma Tadema's "Songs of Womanhood," Mrs. Shorter's "As the Sparks Fly Upward," Laurence Hope's "Stars of the Desert," and Lady Lindsay's "From a Venetian Balcony." We have named these writers in what seems to us to be the order of their accomplishments as verse-makers. Mrs. Watson comes easily first—the remainder longo intervallo. And yet how much there is in all the above volumes to attract and stir or soothe! Let us be grateful for the good the gods provide. From Vernon Lee we receive this year a play in verse—"Ariadne in Mantua"; but it has no real vitality. A little removed, too, from general sympathy are some of the products of the male makers of verse—such as "The Centaur's Booty" and "The Rout of the Amazons" of Mr. Sturge Moore. Much more to the taste of the hour are the "Dantesques" of Mr. G. A. Greene, "The Flower of Old Japan" of Mr. Alfred Noyes, and the "Ballads" of Mr. Masfield, who is at his best when treating of the sea. The collector may be advised to place all these three volumes on his shelves. Mr. Hamilton Aide's "Past and Present" is the work of a versifier pure and simple, and as a contribution to literature does not count at all.

The volumes by Thomas Traherne and Lord de Tabley, published in 1903, might almost be regarded as new verse, so little has Lord de Tabley been read, and so little was known about Traherne. The historic value of the latter's output has been universally recognised; he is, however, only one member of a choir to whose combined voices he adds a certain measure of strength, not sweetness. Mr. Mackail has translated the first six books of the Odyssey into the stanza of FitzGerald's Omar, and with an effect pleasing or disconcerting according to the predilections of the reader. Whether Homeric or not Homeric, the narrative flows with very agreeable smoothness, and as a tour de force is entitled to recognition. From over-seas have come volumes of new verse by those established poets, Messrs. C. G. D. Roberts and Bliss Carman. Among the humours of the year have been a book of "Sporting Sonnets," and another of "Ballads in Blue" by an inspired policeman. Some might include in those humours the issue of the Collected Works of Mr. George Barlow and Mr. J. Johnston-Smith, and the publication of two new volumes by Mr. Whitworth Wynne. But perhaps one ought always to respect enthusiasm and perseverance, even when they seem to be exerted in the wrong direction and to have no tangible results.

Fiction

THE novel ran like a locust through Great Britain in 1903, devouring most of the leisure which the public spared from picture puzzles. Of the vast output about ninety, by some merit rarer than readability, deserved to stay the pulper's inexorable machine.

In the department of posthumous fiction we had an elaborate, earnest, and radiantly witty study in heredity and parentage by Samuel Butler. The second volume of Frank Norris's intended trilogy on wheat delivered Art's last word on that monstrosity of Commerce, a food-corner; and, with the appearance of "The Captain's Toll-Gate," a turnpike story of a humour deliciously leisurely, the world grew sore again at the loss of Stockton.

The surprise of the year was "The Call of the Wild," by Jack London. In this story of a half St. Bernard's return, viâ the terrible experiences of breaking-in and government sleigh-dragging, to its ancient inheritance of freedom under the laws of carnivora, we had a poem that stung and thrallied. Beside it Mr. Ollivant's "Danny"—another dog-story, tearfully pretty—was but a Christmas card.

The satiric novel of society bloomed in many ways. Mr. Percy White was decorously dry, Mr. Ranger-Gull wickedly epigrammatic. In describing the neglected childhood of the daughter of "The Viscountess Normanhurst," Mr. E. H. Cooper surpassed his former work. The church of Laodicea was brightly satirised in Mr. R. Turner's "The Steeple," and the male gossip singed at the lamp of Mrs. Wilfrid Ward. Mr. Whiteing struck a blow in "The Yellow Van" at the aristocratic land-monopoly, and Mr. Benson pleased Mr. Howells by his drawing of rich America in "The Relentless City."

The "sex" novel was justified by Mr. Flowerdew, who in "The Woman's View" demonstrated the danger of a religious marriage ceremony to women fanatically inclined. The physical antipathy even in Brighton of white to black supplied the pathetic element in Mr. Merrick's "Quaint Companions," a significant though gentle book; and Mr. Marriott in his clever but inadequate "House on the Sands" exhibited the seamy side of platonic friendship. The only important roman à clef was "Lady Rose's Daughter," by Mrs. Humphry Ward, who skilfully strove to materialise the historic fascinations of Mlle. de l'Espinasse.

English peasant life inspired some good novels. Mr. Blyth diabolised the Norfolk "bor" in "Juicy Joe"; Mr. Orme Angus delightfully apotheosised the managing woman of Dorsetshire in "Sarah Tuldon"; and Mr. Gilchrist owed a modest success to Derbyshire.

The best Irish novel was Mr. Buckley's "Croppies Lie Down"—presenting an impartial picture of both sides in the rebellion of '98. Mr. Stephen Gwynn vigorously illustrated in "John Maxwell's Marriage" the tyranny of the parent and the scandalous levity of the Protestant priest in the Ireland of 1760. In "The Untilled Field" Mr. Moore directed attention to the anti-social effect of the priest in modern Ireland. Dr. William Barry took his liberty-loving Irish hero to Paris during the Commune, and as usual was too rhetorical. He should take the tonic shock of hearing a saintly woman called a "heifer," as in Mr. Shan Bullock's grey Ulster novel "The Squireen."

Colonial fiction offered nothing better than a "first novel"—"Bush Studies," by Barbara Baynton. She set unconsciously a lesson of realism to Mrs. Campbell Praed, whose "Fugitive Anne," strikingly studious of local colour, nevertheless revolves in melodrama.

Excellent Anglo-Indian novels came from four ladies. Mrs. Steel's "In the Guardianship of God" showed a rare knowledge of Indian custom and character, expressed in short stories which occasionally rose above talent. Mrs. Perrin in "The Stronger Claim" and Mrs. Penny in "A Mixed Marriage" showed respectively the imprudence of marrying English ladies to Eurasians and Mahomedans. Jovial contrast to their sombre themes was supplied by "The Thin Red Line of Heroes," a phonograph of idle chatter hidden by Mrs. Maturin in the vivacity of a born letter-writer.

Neptune found his prophet solely in Mr. Conrad, whose "Typhoon," first of a quartet, gave "the black hills of water" in the China seas both speech and drama. Mr. Bullen was less inevitably the story-teller in "Sea-Wrack," but for whales there was nowhere better to go to except the sea. Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne presented in "McTodd" a drunken engineer, an inferior contemporary of Captain Kettle; whereas Mr. Jacobs' salts were as funny as ever in "Odd Craft."

At the head of the year's adventurous romance comes Mr. Neil Munro's "Children of Tempest," a Hebridean tale of fate and superstition. Mr. Bernard Capes was, despite his poetic quality, too profuse and too "rechurched" in style, as plebeians say, quite to succeed in "A Castle in Spain," a novel which depicts a bogus Louis XVII. The other extreme was reached in the unadorned "Adventures of Harry Revel," an ex-sweep, by Mr. Quiller Couch. As for "The MS. in a Red Box," a rough-and-tumble seventeenth-century tale of Lincolnshire, it thrived mainly by the interest aroused by the clever advertisement addressed by the publisher to its mysterious author. "Romance," by Messrs. Conrad and Hueffer, was a hurly-burly of adventure which "came off" like Brock's fireworks.

Glimpses of literary and artistic laboratories were afforded by several writers. In "The Way Back" Mr. Kinross—whose touch in writing of women is sometimes like a bang—smartly assailed a journalism which should be American rather than English, and his point of view was independently supported by "The Odd-Job Man," a brilliant novel by Mr. Onions about a hack artist. Frank Danby drew a harrowing picture of a South African genius led astray by a financial Bel-Ami. Sir George Douglas adroitly developed in "The Man of Letters" the character of a literary prig. Actor's "shop" was too profuse in Mr. John Barry's "A Daughter of Thespis," which THE ACADEMY hoped would equal his "Acrobat" of 1900. Promising débuts were made in novels that severally portrayed a great actress, a lady composer and a ravishing pianist, by Mrs. Thurston, "Janet Laing," and Miss Rosamond Langbridge. Of these productions the poorest, but most coherent, was Mrs. Thurston's "The Circle," which went into five impressions. "Janet Laing's" venture was "The Wizard's Aunt," and Miss Langbridge's "The Flame and the Flood."

The sensation novel assumed unwonted grandeur in Mr. Shiel's "The Weird o' It" and "Unto the Third Generation." They are volcanic works over which Fate spreads black wings. Shrinking from no horror, Hugo-like in his encyclopædic realism, his shockers are a Titan's poems. For his proxime accessit in 1903 we must take Miss Braddon, who in "The Conflict" treated spiritual "possession" with power and judgment. Mr. Wells, in "Twelve Stories and a Dream," handled a similar idea with characteristic straightforwardness. Mr. Marsh, on the other hand, in "A Metamorphosis" simply changes a man's clothes, and hurries him through a whirl of objective experiences. What may be described as theological sensation was provided in Guy Thorne's novel "When it was Dark," which turns on forged evidence against the Resurrection, and has a proper atmosphere of scholarship.

Among miscellaneous novels of distinction Mr. Oswald Crawford's "The Ways of a Millionaire" showed a poetic idea of the power of money. Mr. Paul Gwynne displayed in "The Pagan at the Shrine" a knowledge of Spain incomparable among English novelists, though his art has still to grow. Mr. Basil King opposed to the problem novel "In Charity's Garden," a pretty romance wherein a deserted wife allows her late husband's mistress to pose as his widow. Mrs. Dudeney, deserting her grimness, charmingly recalled early Victorian days when Methodists shrank from crossing their braces; and Mr. Quiller Couch convinced Mr. Shorter that his portrait of "Hetty Wesley" constituted the novel of the year. An American humourist, Mr. A. H. Lewis, was introduced to English readers, and "Wolfville Days" proclaimed him the creator (with obligation to Bret Harte) of the Arizona cattle man.

As to the "veterans," Mr. Henry James was himself to the last wrinkle of beloved mannerism in "The Better Sort" and "The Ambassadors." Mr. Zangwill was unsatisfyingly copious in "The Grey Wig," a collection of tales, though the humour of his wiggled lady flashed from even the Morgue where he left her. Mr. W. E. Norris kept, at his accustomed temperature of 60° Fahrenheit, a well-composed story which touched the direst improprieties of social intercourse. Mr. Marion Crawford was at his best in "The Heart of Rome," where a lost Aphrodite pillows a slandered girl. In "Griff of Griffithscourt" Miss Helen Mathers created an unforgettable type of female loyalty and insubordination. Miss Mann's art shone in "Grandma's Jane."

Of the younger writers whom one expects to turn up like a magazine, Mr. Hornung pleased in "No Hero," where a divorcée melts the heart of the man who was to spoil her game. Mr. Pett Ridge dealt intelligently in "Erb" with the career of a railway agitator.

On the whole 1903 was a good year for fiction. The fatal predilections which prevent perfection still, it is true, persisted. Limelight and artifice came between many and success. But there was an enlarged power of expression, a power which would have surprised Richardson, and even George Eliot, consequent on the steady researches of their successors for innumerable right words.

Literature in the Law Courts

THE year 1903 has not been fruitful in important cases, or productive of monumental decisions in the law of letters. It is, indeed, a little to be wondered at, having regard to the patent acrimony of literary disputes, that so few came up for settlement by the courts. But it is to be feared that the paucity of decisions is due rather to the universal reluctance of injured parties, whether authors or publishers, to test the law so long as it remains in its present chaotic condition than to the "sweet reasonableness" of the literary temperament.

The "Encyclopædia Britannica" was the cause of another service to literature during 1903, besides those with which we are sufficiently familiar. For one of the earliest cases of the year was that of Messrs. A. & C. Black et al v. Imperial Book Company, Limited, and James Hale, which was heard at Toronto on the 3rd of January. Mr. Justice Street granted a perpetual injunction restraining the defendants from importing into Canada any copies or any parts printed in any country outside the British Dominions, thus establishing the integrity of Imperial Copyright apart altogether from the Canadian statutes. The production of a certified copy of the Register at Stationers' Hall was held, following the Copyright Act, 1842, to be sufficient prima facie proof of proprietorship under section 18 (which governs encyclopædias) as under section 11 (which governs books), while the Copyright Act itself was held to be in force in Canada. The judgment contains, moreover, a decision on one point raised by the defence which is useful as a warning to the trade. Section 152 of the Imperial Customs Act, 39 & 40 Vict., c. 36, requires copyright owners to give notice to the Commissioners of Customs of the existence and duration of their copyright in order to prohibit the importation of foreign reprints into British possessions. This direction, Mr. Justice Street held, would have been fatal to the plaintiff's claim—as they had not given the prescribed notice—but for the fact, which he found, that the Customs Act was not in force in Canada. Into the details of this finding we need not enter, but the trade will do well to note the view which coincides with that of Mr. Scrutton, K.C., who, moreover, in the fourth edition of his "Law of Copyright" (see page 213) suggests that the section may repeal ss. 17 and 29 of the Copyright Act, 1842, and literally deprive defaulting owners of their Colonial copyright.

Another case dealing with the "law of Encyclopædias" was decided, just as the year closed, in the House of Lords, which finally settled the much disputed points in Affalo and Cook v. Lawrence and Bullen. This case, which had been dealt with in the Chancery Division and the Court of Appeal mainly on points of law, was disposed of by the Lords reversing both previous decisions, mainly on the facts, finding, as their Lordships did, that the appellant defendants had purchased the copyright in the articles written by the plaintiffs for the "Encyclopædia of Sport," and that the case was covered by authority. This decision has definitely established the absence of any necessity whatever on the part of proprietors to make an actual agreement that copyright in contributions should belong to them, certainly in the case of Encyclopædias, and probably, although Lord Shand's dictum was obiter in that of any collective or periodical works. The burden of proof is thus thrown upon the author, who has to show that he has specially contracted himself out of the 18th section, which no layman and few lawyers are capable of comprehending, or, at any rate, of interpreting alike. In this case Mr. Justice Joyce—followed by Lords Justices Romer and Stirling in the Court of Appeal—Lord Justice Vaughan Williams dissenting—found for the plaintiffs, while the Lord Chancellor and Lords Shand, Davey, and Robertson followed Lord Justice Vaughan Williams, but on different grounds, and found for the defendants. The case will serve a useful purpose if only as demonstrating the cruel necessity for such a recasting of the statutes as shall render such a conflict of opinion on a simple issue impossible. That intelligent and honourable men should be hopelessly at variance as to what they are buying or selling is a reflection not on their probity, but on the jumble of statutory conditions which makes such a difference of view tenable.

There is a Cimmerian darkness about the rule as to what is a fair or unfair use of the labours of others in letters. Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce in Dickens v. Lee committed himself to the casuistical dictum as to the right to abridge that "there may be such an use of another man's publications as, involving the exercise of a new mental operation, may fairly and legitimately involve it." Nobody who has conducted any research can have failed to notice the wholesale annexation of the labours—and mistakes—of predecessors in the same field. The literature of copyright affords a host of examples. Mr. Justice Farwell has, however, no doubt given pause to the practice by his decision in the case of Parry v. Moring and Gollancz. In view of Mr. Gollancz's admissions as to his use of Judge Parry's edition of "The Letters of Dorothy Osborne to Sir William Temple," it is difficult to see how an injunction could have been refused even if the "Letters" are in the public domain. It is, perhaps, to be regretted that the case was dealt with on the defendant's admissions of fact and apart altogether from the precedents, some of which if not distinguished must have been overruled, and the difference between meum and tuum more fully defined.

The law regulating the liability of bailees may seem to be far removed from the laws of literature. But a case which was heard and decided by consent before one of the Masters of the Supreme Court illustrates the necessity for a code not only covering copyright but the whole of the incidents of the contract between authors and publishers. A MS. is voluntarily submitted for approval to a publisher and is lost. Who is responsible? Is the publisher a gratuitous bailee, and therefore liable only for gross negligence? Is he protected by notice disclaiming responsibility for loss? It is impossible to give the facts as there is no authorised report of the case, but the Master found that the case was taken out of the category of gratuitous bailees because the bailment was for the benefit of both parties, and that therefore the onus lay upon the defendant publisher of proving that the loss occurred without negligence, which he had failed to do. The disclaimer, again, was held not to bind the plaintiff, since it was not made when the MS. was received. Under the decision, so far as it is generally applicable, a publisher is liable for ordinary negligence unless he with the utmost promptitude contracts himself out of such liability and such a disclaimer is acquiesced in.

Art

THE year that is dead was not remarkable for the appearance amongst us of a new artist of the first rank, or indeed of any particular mark; whilst it has unfortunately seen the death of one of the greatest artists of our time, a man of unique personality and of consummate power—Whistler. And the light of another genius has guttered out in the socket—a man who should have been at the height of his manhood—the genial, kindly, sweet-natured man whom we knew so affectionately as Phil May. Compared to these two men, the others who have been reaped into the Great Majority by the Old Man with the Scythe—Horsley and Waller, the painter of elopements and sentiment, and Wells the portrait painter, and Maud the war artist—are but of second rank; but they held their place in the world even so.

The death of Whistler has overshadowed all other events in the world of art during the year. His beloved Chelsea will know the nervous, resolute, wiry figure with the flat-brimmed silk hat no more; the witty story and the sharp rapier anecdote will gather about his name as they did when alive, but the laugh has gone, and there remains of the man now but his superb achievement in art. A clean-souled man of genius he was, with a tender heart for a child, the cold shoulder for a coarse story, the ready repartee for the witty, and a passionate love of his art. His sensitive skin and a quarrelsome whim led him to the sallying forth into ridiculous and petty squabbles; yet the comedy of the man raised the smallest of his wrangles into witty encounters. But it is to his superb art that we must look for the greatness of the man; and no man could surpass him in the beauty of the melodious music which his colour gave out, glowing with the perfect expression of every mood he essayed to put into the terms of paint, and set down with a mastery of handling, of brushing, and of harmony that will make of his craftsmanship and of his art an immortal thing. I can remember as yesterday going into the rooms of the old Goupil Gallery in Bond Street, and standing before the master, work of a man whose name was unknown to me—I was a young cadet at Sandhurst and I think it was Whistler's first big exhibition—and I was astounded that the critics of the day, and Ruskin in particular, could be so lacking in art perception as to stand unmoved and scoffing and naked-souled and ridiculous before such exquisite beauty as was in the masterpieces upon those walls. To-day, work by Whistler crowds out almost everything else from the dealer's galleries; and we have had shows of his etchings that could scarcely be surpassed for completeness in the examples of his mastery over this medium.

Poor Phil May died in his prime, in strange contrast to the mellow old age and completed life of Whistler. His telling musical line sounds its rhythmic note no longer; and his quaint humour is silenced in the grave. What a thousand pities! It recalls a day I sat in his studio, and he stood brooding on the death of Beardsley. The pity of it.

Of the living men, Sargent's reputation has been further enhanced by the publication of his work in a sumptuous volume by Mr. Heinemann, with an essay by Mrs. Meynell. What a strange thing is artistic reputation! On what strange foundations built! I have just been reading an essay upon Sargent by this brilliant woman, and I do not find in it the slightest sign of the realisation of what constitutes Sargent's remarkable genius. Robert Louis Stevenson's saying of "that witty touch of Sargent's" so far from impressing me, only proves to me how much lack of the colour sense, the emotion of painting, was hidden under the strained English in Stevenson that won so many by its dread of the obvious. The man who could see as chief attribute "the witty touch" in the dominant music of Sargent's great resounding deeps, his eloquent massings, his big sonorous music, his vigorous statement, his superb feeling for character and arrangement, and his romantic musical sense of black and white—the man who could push all this man's huge gifts behind his "witty touch," was deaf to the greatness of Sargent and baffled by his magnitude. To look at Sargent's best work is to listen to an orchestration as profound as violin and deep-bellied 'cello and wood and brass wind can utter. It is resonant, large, deep-throated, orchestral -- not precious.

The Royal Academy at last shows signs of awakening—though it may be but the yawn before the re-drowsing. Clausen has been appointed professor of painting; and results of a resurgent kind may ensue.

The strongest artistic body of our time, the International Society, has elected the great French sculptor to its head in place of the dead Whistler; and thus and otherwise shows signs of continued strength.

Mr. Conder has enhanced his reputation in water-colour with his exhibition of fans; and Mr. Hazlewood Shannon with his show of lithographs; whilst the Academy schools look like giving us a student of distinction in Mr. George Murray. And Mr. Strang maintains his Holbein-like reputation for the chalked portrait. But of the younger men of mark, Mr. Brangwyn, the Beggarstaff Brothers, and others have been mute; and the year has been tame in surprises.

The facsimile reproduction of works of art in colours has advanced rapidly; and Cassell's book on Turner's water-colours at the National Gallery, and some reproductions of pastels and the like in the "Studio" and the "Magazine of Art" display a perfection in mechanical colour printing that bids fair to bring the masterpieces of the colourists into our homes in this pleasant form.

The illustration of books is chiefly remarkable for the work of two American women, Miss Elizabeth Shippen Green and Miss Jessie Wilcox Smith, in their strong and very beautiful designs to "The Book of the Child." Altogether not a great year for Art.

Music

A BUSY year, considered musically, has had its most interesting feature perhaps, so far as London is concerned, in the concerts of the Strauss Festival given in June. Think what one may of Strauss, there is no denying his significance and importance, and this series of concerts composed entirely of his music brought home the fact in an unequivocal manner. It was, in a word, a most valuable opportunity of making acquaintance with Strauss' work as a whole, and though with characteristic apathy and lack of enterprise the London musical public for the most part stayed away, a certain number were more discerning, and gained thereby a knowledge of the man and an understanding of his aims and methods which could hardly have been come by in any other way.

Under the guidance now of the composer and now of Herr Mengelberg, all of his more important orchestral works, from "Till Eulenspiegel" to "Ein Heldenleben," were given by the members of the Concertgebouw Symphonic Orchestra from Amsterdam with the most perfect sympathy and understanding, and the result, it can hardly be doubted, was enormously to advance their general understanding and appreciation. This is by no means to imply that Richard Strauss is now universally recognised as the genius which his more devoted followers reckon him; but at least there is no longer any question regarding his right to be regarded as the most remarkable of living composers, whose works are at least entitled, both on their own account and as an embodiment of the musical zeitgeist, to the most serious and respectful consideration. Since the festival in the summer the composer has made several other appearances before British audiences, so that he promises to become ere long one of the most popular and familiar of continental musicians who visit us from time to time. To which it may be added that his songs, which his accomplished wife Madame Strauss de Ahna sings so delightfully, seem likewise continually to increase in favour and popularity.

The opera season was on the whole one of average rather than exceptional interest. It had its features of note, but none likely to keep it very long in remembrance, unless it be the gala performance in honour of President Loubet, which though gorgeous and brilliant enough for what it was, still hardly counted from the stand-point of the musician. The season brought forth neither any new work nor any new singer of any importance. A new work there was indeed in Messrs. Carré and Missa's "Magelone," a forcible-feeble little thing the only warrant for whose production—if indeed one may admit so much—was that it served to provide a new rôle for Madame Calvé; but otherwise the record was barren of any novelty great or small. The "Ring," on the other hand, was duly produced under the now familiar "Bayreuth-at-Bow-Street" conditions, and these performances constituted perhaps the most considerable achievement of the season as a whole. Dr. Richter in particular, in the conductor's chair, won unstinted praise, while the stage-management, though still falling a good way short of perfection, was none the less a decided advance on any previous attempts of "our only opera house" in this direction. Perhaps indeed it was on their vocal side that these particular performances were least distinguished. Such artists as Van Rooy and Ternina could not be other than acceptable, of course, but as regards many of their companions the conclusion was painfully borne in on one that the demand for first-class Wagnerian singers is at the present time considerably in excess of the supply. The legitimate successors of Schröder-Devrient, Schnorr, the Vogls, Materna, Klafsky, and the rest have yet, it would seem, to appear.

As to concerts their number has been legion—and this despite the fact that with very few exceptions they have been wretchedly attended throughout the year. Perhaps there have been too many of them, perhaps there have been other causes at work; certainly the fact remains that concert-givers as a class have had anything but a happy time during the last twelve months, and that taking the season all round an enormous amount of money must have been dropped. And this has applied to undertakings both great and small. The important and the insignificant have suffered alike in this respect, so that it will not be surprising if the coming year witnesses a considerable diminution in the amount of enterprise displayed.

Professor Kruse has been particularly unfortunate in this regard. The results attending his gallant attempt to revive the vanished glories of the "Pops" have been signally discouraging, while despite the attraction of a first-class orchestra and one of the greatest of living conductors in the person of Herr Weingartner, his Beethoven festival concerts met with no better fate. None the less the performances secured on that occasion by Herr Weingartner may unquestionably be ranked among the most memorable experiences of the year. At the "Promenades" in the autumn the number of new and ambitious orchestral works by British composers of the younger school brought to a hearing by Mr. Wood was a conspicuous feature of the season's doings, while more recently several Berlioz Centenary concerts, nearly every one of which again was most miserably attended, have engaged attention. The usual number of eminent virtuosi of one sort and another—Busoni, de Pachmann, Sauer, Ysaye, Sarasate, Kubelik, and the rest—have also appeared, of course as heretofore with varying degrees of success, while the briefest record of the past year's musical happenings would be incomplete without reference to the extraordinary number of young and brilliant violinists who have made their appearance within this period.

Outside of London perhaps the two most notable events of the musical year have been the first performance (at Birmingham) of Dr. Elgar's "The Apostles" (in which connection it may be recalled, too, that "The Dream of Gerontius" obtained its first hearing in London at the Westminster Cathedral) and the production of "Farsifal" in New York.

Drama

No great new play, no great new dramatist, no change in the status of well-known playwrights, no extraordinary success by any actor or actress, a dead level of fairly good work, that must be the verdict on the past dramatic year. No great advance, but no retrogression. The most disquieting symptom to those who take the theatre seriously is not the increase of musical comedies and other entertainments, but the decrease of serious work in comedy, drama, and tragedy.

At Drury Lane the only striking event was Sir Henry Irving's production of a play utterly unworthy of his gifts, for Sardou's "Dante" was, to speak truth, nothing else than a poor melodrama, in which the acting of Miss Lena Ashwell was the most striking feature. At His Majesty's Mr. Beerbohm Tree has presented very varied fare: a revival of "The Merry Wives of Windsor," "The Eternal City," by Mr. Hall Caine, "Resurrection," an adaptation from Tolstoy, "Flodden Field," by Mr. Alfred Austin, "Richard II.," and "The Darling of the Gods." Mr. Tree has hardly added to his already high reputation as an actor, though his Falstaff remains a wonderfully fine performance, and his Richard II. had its moments, but as a manager in the last-named play, and in his recent Japanese production, he has more than maintained his fame as a "producer." If Mr. Tree would only learn to leave something to the imagination of his audiences, both as an actor and as a stage manager, his work would be more worthy. At the St. James's Mr. Alexander has marked time with "If I were King" and "Old Heidelberg," the autumn months being filled with Mr. E. S. Willard's sumptuous production of that somewhat stagey play, "The Cardinal," by Mr. L. N. Parker.

At the Haymarket the chief pieces have been "The Unforeseen," which did not do anything like justice to Mr. Robert Marshall's undeniable ability, a revival of "The Clandestine Marriage," which gave Mr. Maude an opportunity for displaying his cleverness in depicting senility, and "Cousin Kate," by Mr. H. H. Davies, one of the most delightful entertainments of the year, and full of promise of good things to come. At the Garrick I can remember with pleasure only "The Bishop's Move," delightfully conceived, neatly written, but not adequately acted, save by Mr. Bouchier as the amiable old bishop; "The Golden Silence," by Mr. Haddon Chambers, was a sad disappointment.

Of other new plays and reproductions the most interesting were Sir Charles Wyndham's "Mrs. Goringe's Necklace," by the author of "Cousin Kate," though not equal to the latter piece; "A Clean Slate," by Mr. R. C. Carton; "Billy's Little Love Affair," by Mr. H. V. Esmond; "Othello"; and "The Light that Failed"—in the former Mr. Forbes Robertson failing to do himself justice, in the latter making the best of a bad case; Dr. Ibsen's "Vikings," and "Much Ado About Nothing," in both of which Miss Ellen Terry played admirably, but which were really most notable for the exquisite and impressive mounting designed by Mr. Gordon Craig; "The Climbers," by Mr. Clyde Fitch, a machine-made but in some ways striking play; "Letty," by Mr. Pinero; and "Little Mary," by Mr. Barrie.

To sum up, neither progress nor retrogression. The only striking feature of the dramatic year was the good work done by some of the younger school of actors, Mr. H. B. Irving, Miss Lena Ashwell, Miss Nina Boucicault, Miss Beatrice Forbes-Robertson, Mr. James Welch (in Gorki's "Doss House"), Miss Eva Moore, and one or two others.

Of the year just commenced it would be useless to prophesy; the coming dramatist may come, we may be granted a great drama or a true comedy; we can only watch and pray. Gorgeous productions will be given to us, with costly scenery and dresses. Our actors will again prove themselves worthy of better work.

The dark outlook can only be accounted for by the fact that the theatre—or rather writers for the stage—is drifting more and more out of touch with the realities of life. Of the plays of yester-year only "Letty" can be said to have tackled seriously any intimate problem of life, seriously, not successfully. Our dramatists are accomplished in stage-craft and are often writers of clever dialogue, but—no more; they seem to study life as a stage, not the stage as life; they seem to be unable to throw aside convention; and to be afraid of probing lives and souls to their depth. It is all surface emotion, superficial fun, hollow humour. Success—and fortune—awaits the play-writer who will tell us a fresh, simple, true human story, who will give us characters of flesh and blood, incidents from life as it is in the work-a-day world. Let us hope.

New Books Received

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL

- Harris (Rev. W. S.), Mr. World and Miss Church-Member, A Twentieth Century Allegory (Brown, Langham) 5/0
 Gamble, M.A. (H. R.), The Ten Virgins and Other Sermons, (") 3/6
 Spurgeon (C. H.), Sermons Preached by, The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit, Vol. XLIX. (Passmore and Alabaster) 7/0
 Richardson, Mus.Doc. (A. Madeley), Church Music (Longmans) net 2/6

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES

- Hopwood (Aubrey), Rhymes without Reason (Warne) net 2/6
 Gowans, M.A. (Adam L.), selected by, The Hundred Best Poems (Lyrical) in the English Language (Gowans and Gray) net 1/0
 Hill, D.O.L., LL.D. (George Birkbeck), Letters Written by a Grandfather (Brown, Langham) 3/6
 Shorter (Dora Sigerson), As the Sparks Fly Upward (Moring) net 2/6
 Hebbel (F.), translated by H. Goldberger, The Niebelungs: A Tragedy in three parts (Siegle) net 2/6
 Goddard (Ethel), Dreams for Ireland (Hodges, Figgis) net 2/6

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY

- Bateson (Mary), Medieval England, 1016-1350 (Story of the Nations Series) (Unwin) 5/0
 George (Claude), The Rise of British West Africa, Part V. (Houlston) 2/0
 Beveridge (Albert J.), The Russian Advance (Harper) 10/6
 Wilkins (W. H.), A Queen of Tears, Caroline Matilda, Queen of Denmark and Norway, and Princess of Great Britain and Ireland, 2 Vols. (Longmans) 36/0
 Brown (Wilfrid), From Ottery to Highgate: The Story of the Childhood and Later Days of Samuel Taylor Coleridge (Colebert) 2/0
 Wakefield (E. S.), Thomas Wakefield, Missionary and Geographical Pioneer in East Equatorial Africa (K.T.S.) 3/6

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY

- Bernard, D.D. (J. H.), The Cathedral of Saint Patrick: A History and Description of the Building (Bell)

EDUCATIONAL

- Brighouse, M.A. (T. K.), The Philippics of Cicero V.-VII. (Blackie) 2/6
 Conway, M.A. (Rev. F.), Cicero: De Amicitia (") 2/0
 Wells, M.A. (G. H.), Cicero: De Senectute (") 2/0

ART

- Bell (Mrs. Arthur), Lives and Legends of the English Bishops and Kings, Medieval Monks, and Other Later Saints (Bell) net 14/0
 Strutt (Edward C.), Michelangelo (Miniature Series) (Bell) net 1/6
 Strange (Edward F.), The Colour-Prints of Japan: An Appreciation and History (Siegle) net 1/6

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY

- Brauer, M.A. (Herman G. A.), The Philosophy of Ernest Renan (Bulletin of the University of Wisconsin) net 10/0
 Distant (W. L.), The Fauna of British India, including Ceylon and Burma: Rhynchota, Vol. II., part 1 (Taylor and Francis)

MISCELLANEOUS

- Dames (E. Longworth), Myths (Hodges, Figgis) net 2/0
 Forsyth (John), A Manual of Elocution (Dent) 2/0
 Murray (Dr. James A. H.), edited by, A New English Dictionary on Historical Principles, Vol. VII. (Oxford) 2/6
 Ellwood, Ph.D. (Charles A.), Public Relief and Private Charity in England (University of Missouri Studies) (University of Missouri) 75c.
 Dobbs, M.A. (A. E.), The Nation in Judgment (Stanford) 1/0
 Thompson's Pocket Diary and Calendar 1904. (Thompson) net 0/3
 Beneficial Home Trade (Reeves) net 0/3
 Rentoul (R. R.), Proposed Sterilisation of Certain Mental and Physical Degenerates (Walter Scott) net 1/0
 The People's Friend, 2 vols., 1903 (Leng) net 4/0
 Stall's Pastors' Pocket Record (Vir Publishing Co.) net 4/0
 Conwell (Joseph Alfred), Manhood's Morning: an Inspiring Character-Building Book for Young Men (Vir Publishing Co.) net 2/0
 Index to the Periodicals of 1902 ("Review of Reviews" Office)
 Orton, Jr. (Edward), The Progress of the Ceramic Industry (Bulletin of the University of Wisconsin)

FICTION

- "Mrs. McCraw," by Samuel MacPlowter, Ruling Elder (Gowans and Gray), net 1/0;
 "Carmen," by Prosper Mérimée (new translation) (Gowans and Gray), net 0/6;
 "The Lady of the Island," by Guy Boothby (Long), 5/0; "Sly Boots," by John Strange Winter (Long), 6/0; "Remembrance," by Mrs. Lovett Cameron (Long), 6/0; "Children of the Tenements," by Jacob A. Rius (Macmillan), 0/0.

JUVENILE

- "Æsop's Fables in Words of One Syllable" (Cassell), 0/6.

NEW EDITIONS

- "Galatea," by Miguel de Cervantes, edited by J. Fitzmaurice-Kelly, translated by H. Oelssner and A. B. Welford (Gowans and Gray), net 1/0; "The New Testament," with fifty-one designs by Charles Robinson (Gowans and Gray), net 2/0;
 "A Short History of the English People," by John Richard Green, Part 39 (Macmillan), net 0/6; "A Pocket Dictionary of Hygiene," by C. T. Kingzett and D. Homfray (Baillière, Tindall), 2/6; "The Death of Glory Boys: The Story of the 17th Lancers," by D. H. Parry (Cassell), 3/6; "Browning's Essay on Shelley," edited by Richard Garnett, C.B. (Moring), net 2/6; "Critical Papers in Literature," by W. M. Thackeray (Macmillan), 3/6; "Devotional

NEW EDITIONS—continued.

Services for Public Worship," prepared by the Rev. John Hunter, D.D. (Dent) net 3/6; "Eight Essays of Bacon," with notes by E. H. Blakeney, M.A. (Blackie), 0/6.

PERIODICALS

"The Independent," "Blackwood's," "Hibbert Journal," "Monthly Review," "National Review," "Scottish Historical Review," "Architectural Review," "Churchman," "Antiquary," "Genealogical Magazine," "Harper's Monthly Magazine," "Burlington Magazine," "School," "Book Monthly," "Lippincott's," "Animal's Friend," "The Quarry," "University Extension Journal," "Journal of the Royal Colonial Institute," "American Antiquarian and Oriental Journal," "Essex Review," "New Liberal Review," "Geographical Journal," "Westminster Review."

Foreign

THEOLOGICAL

Curtis (S. I.), Ursenitische Religion im Volksleben des heutigen Orients (Hinrichs, Leipzig) 9 marks

SCIENCE

Guarini (M. E.), L'état actuel de l'électroculture (Ramlot, Bruxelles) 1 fr.

MISCELLANEOUS

Jellinghaus (Dr. H.), Ossians Lebensanschauung (Williams and Norgate) net 1/6

PERIODICALS

"Mercure de France."

Fiction

THE MASTERFOLK. By Haldane MacFall. (Heinemann. 6s.) This story is at once interesting and disappointing, at the same time a tale which once begun cannot be laid down until it has been read from the first word to the last. Its sentiment and pathos is sometimes real, sometimes the reverse; its humour is at times unforced and at other times it strikes the reader as anything else than free or easy; there are pages of brilliant descriptive writing, and many passages that appear stilted and untrue; most of the principal characters are drawn with insight and unflinching touch, others are caricatures, yet others are entirely false to human nature; of the whole book it must be said that while in much—even most—of it the author has done himself justice, in many parts he has failed, his artistic eyesight has been dimmed, his mental focus wrong. An interesting, irritating story, which is well worth reading, not only for its actual merits, but because an author who can write so well will one day produce a very fine work of art. At present he overcrowds his composition, many unnecessary persons and incidents distract attention from those which form the centre of the plot and too many details thrust essentials into the shade. Above all Mr. MacFall occasionally writes of departments of life of which he seems to have had no intimate experience. On the other hand his pictures of certain aspects of journalistic and Bohemian London and Paris life, with which the story deals, are fresh and true. No lover of good work and honest endeavour will fail to read Mr. MacFall's next venture with great hope of great pleasure.

THE DULE TREE OF CASSILLIS. By William Robertson. (Menzies.) A gloomy story of an eventful period in the history of Ayrshire. It tells of the rivalry and blood feud between two powerful families, the Kennedys of Carrick and the Craufords of Kerse. The lord of Carrick, Earl Gilbert of Cassillis, covets the commendatorship of Crossraguel Abbey, which is in the heart of his lands. To gain "the reversion of the Abbey and all that belonged to it, with the patronage of seven good parishes thrown in, he was ready to abjure the Pope and all his ways, and to stand up among the Protestant lords of the realm." He unscrupulously attempts to overcome all the obstacles in his path. He has the new commendator roasted over a huge fire in the vaults of Dunure until he surrenders and signs the paper giving the reversion to the Earl of Cassillis. This is the beginning of much fighting and many terrible deeds and many men are slain before a truce is declared on the death of the Earl of Cassillis. The Dule tree is the tree of mourning, under which six hundred Kennedys mourned their dead, lost in the Battle of Flodden. The times were dark and gloomy, so that the narrative cannot but be the same. There was little time spent in the romance of life then, the clash of steel was too often heard.

MORCAR. By Thomas Scott. (Greening. 6s.) The ownership of the Morcar titles and estates, and the story of a great hidden patrimony, form the subject of this story. Alfred Morcar, who has been despoiled of his rights, has his only son stolen from him by the reigning marquis, who has no children and would have been glad to settle the matter by the adoption of the boy, if his kinsman had been content to waive his claim. The boy is brought up under an assumed name, and ultimately finds the hidden treasure which by right belongs to him. Old fashioned and somewhat uninteresting.

Personalities : George Gissing

IT is a sad privilege to say these few poor words on George Gissing. I am the more glad of the opportunity because many of the "notices" which have appeared are inadequate and unworthy. Gissing seems to have been destined to misrepresentation after his death as during his life. A true artist, a fine scholar, and a most capable workman in letters, he is baldly described as though his views of life were limited to his immediate horizon and that he was nothing if not autobiographical. In a word George Gissing, a master of his craft, a writer imbued with the true spirit of Greek tragedy, is spoken of, no doubt by many of those who vexed him so terribly when living by their misinterpretation of his method and cheap judgment of his work, as if he were the veriest tyro who could not get beyond his own surroundings. Others, again, speak of him as if he were an unhappy misanthrope who never smiled. Humourist he may never have been, not even in the "Town Traveller." Tragedy seemed to him at once the truest criticism of life and the highest plane of art, but genial and full of fun, a boy all through, he was from first to last. Taine's Law was no doubt true of him as of all great writers. He was the product of his age and environment. But let me give a few brief extracts from letters. He lived in the shadow of death. "Lung trouble," he wrote in 1897, "is still hanging over me; the future is very uncertain." And again he speaks of "three months of weary idleness dodging the east winds," and that he is "off northwards in the vain hope of getting a little strength for next winter." Writing to me once more he says: "What I am bent on doing is to write books which will be read not only to-day but some years hence." Later he speaks anent social engagements: "Society is a delight and a refreshment to me, but I am a prisoner nearly all my time." Again, I find on a postcard from Catanzaro a touch of him at his best: "Weather wretched, gales and rain, tornadoes, wrecks, but the Calabrian wine is no less good." He had a passionate admiration for Vesuvius. He once told me that when he caught his first glimpse of the great volcano from the deck of a steamer he exclaimed, to the great amusement of the captain: "This is the proudest moment of my life." I find a picture of his on a postcard, "There is about a mile of red-hot lava down the slope of Vesuvius—a splendid glow at night."

Gissing was one of the most loveable of men and the brightest of companions. His laughter was whole-hearted. His sensibility was reflected in his refined face, and as he spoke his eyes lighted up with a rare brilliancy giving a glimpse of a bright and beautiful soul. The vulgar and the sordid were to him an abomination, and in the midst of his greatest necessities he would never stoop to work he considered unworthy, or to "take occasion by the hand." Literature can ill spare George Gissing.

W. MORRIS COLLES.

Anton Tchëhov*

IN Russia the political safety valve for public opinion is found chiefly in the utterances of what Englishmen would naturally pass over as simply fiction. Hence a Russian novelist, whose tales can run rapidly through successive Russian editions and who yet remains quite unmolested by the government censor, is a rare individual.

* In the English spelling of Russian names, &c., here adopted, the nearest approach to the original sounds is aimed at, in as few letters as possible. It is surely time for English writers to abandon the cumbersome and complicated German orthography so much in vogue for the transliteration of Slav words.

Such is Anton Tchëhov, amongst his own countrymen, one of the most widely read contemporary Russian writers. Although only now in his forty-fifth year Tchëhov has already written some hundreds of stories. He may perhaps be styled the creator of a type of Russian tale complete in a couple of pages: one idea, one motive, suffices him. His striking want of incident, and his usual avoidance of anything approaching a worked-up denouement, have met with much adverse criticism. Thus in the opinion of many readers Tchëhov's tales lack every element which constitutes a really good short story. Others, again, see here his chief merit, and delight in some fugitive impression focussed with the swiftness of a snapshot. In his choice of backgrounds, in his accessories, so to speak, Tchëhov is distinctly national. He describes scenes which could only be witnessed in Russia; but neither in his stories, nor in his plays—he has written two—does he ever evolve genuine, national types of humanity. Dipso-maniacs, lunatics haunted with every species of weird hallucination, hysterical, amorous, and generally depraved women. These are Tchëhov's favourite subjects, interspersed curiously enough here and there with charming little idylls of child-life. Though even these are frequently marred by the shadow of a brutal want of sympathy cast by the child's elders. Yet through all his presentments there runs a note of exaggeration, of artifice. His characters remain unquickenened by that breath of life which pulsates through Gorki's work, for instance.

Again, Tchëhov's attitude towards life is totally opposed to that of the generality of Russian authors. Dive deep enough into the hearts of these and you will not fail to catch a resounding accent of love and attachment to their country, and as a Russian puts it: "There is always an invisible tear behind their visible laughter." Not so with Tchëhov. He has no reformer's aspirations, he preaches no sermons, he utters no "harsh and angry cry from the depths." He views the mental and physical misery on his every side merely with a kind of satirical apathy, occasionally almost comic in its indifference.

Having no soul-stirring convictions himself, he can hardly impart them to others. Evidently the censor has been astute enough to discover this.

But, viewing Tchëhov's various limitations, wherein, it may be asked, lies the secret of his undoubted hold upon the Russian public? Chiefly, one is inclined to think, in his remarkable brevity and conciseness. With these qualities he represents a new phase in Russian literature. They have enabled him to fascinate an impatient modern generation of readers, who are also probably somewhat weary of having constantly to read between the lines of stories with a purpose. In Tchëhov they meet, it may be for the first time, with a compatriot who writes solely pour passer le temps dans un monde où l'on s'ennuie.

A. E. KEETON.

Egomet

IDO not quite understand, or agree with so far as I do understand, the sentimental regrets so often expressed, especially in works of fiction, for schoolboy days. Lapse of time, may-be, blunts the memories of many of us, smoothing down the rough places of the past, the while the uneasy things of to-day loom large. But for myself, many things as I may have forgotten, I still recall only too vividly the discomforts of school. The place in which my schooldays were laid was indeed pleasant; beneath the shadow of lofty minster-towers: in the cloisters where of old monks walked, talked, laved themselves and would doubtless have slept but for precautionary peepholes supplied by the cunning architect:

in old chambers and dim halls and vaulted rooms. What more could a lover of books and of ancient days desire? To wander through the grey minster aisles, worshipping at the shrines of dead kings and queens, poets, painters and statesmen; on a rainy day, when sports, thank heaven, were impossible, to loiter in the cloisters, book in hand; to listen at eventide to the chorus of the crows returning to nest.

The lack of human sympathy was that for which I thirsted in vain. I was a mere unit, a cypher rather, among hundreds. Why should any master choose me out, to make my way easy, to lighten burdens which I utterly abhorred, to teach my intelligence, guide my desires? Surely I was only one of many such boys, lonely, yet seeking companions, eager to read, yet fed with husks. How hateful to me the dreary routine of the lessons, so much to learn by heart, so little appeal to the head. Most of what was drummed into me at school I have striven to forget, that which I still treasure I taught myself to value. It is often urged as part of the value of a public school education that boys gain friends who will be valued in after life. I did not do so—do many? The only friends I had then and still retain were books—books I chose, not those which were put into my hand.

Unexpected and expected volumes were among my boy friends. Marryatt I loved dearly, not for adventures' sake, but chiefly "Jacob Faithful" and "Japhet," for their pictures of town and country life; Dickens I cared not for, he was to be a friend of maturer days; Macaulay's History, Browning, of all poets for a boy, especially in those days when he was not worshipped so freely as he came to be in later times; Cellini's Autobiography; Pepys; such were a few of my boyhood's books, in addition to those of childhood.

Boys as a rule read as little as do men and women, which is meant as no sneer but as a sad statement of fact. I used to think that most men loved books and read them; I now know that book lovers are few, a few thousands at most among the millions. It is easy to stray over the borders of the book world and to talk with those to whom great writers are at most mere names. If men would but dare to confess, it would be found that not one in a thousand has ever read Shakespeare. It is partly because of this that the Bible has had so vast an influence upon our tongue; it is the one book which all men have heard read even if they have not read it for themselves.

Are boys better off at school to-day than they were in my time? I doubt it, judging by the little I have heard. Still boys are taught in flocks by shepherds who know not their sheep except by name. To each master every boy is alike, must be taught alike, punished alike. Then when the boys grow up they prate about the dear dead days of school—and drive their own offspring through the same mill-grind. Thus it seems ever to have been, likely ever to be, only here and there a voice calling in the wilderness, awakening profitless echoes.

E. G. O.

[NOTE.—The continuation of John Oliver Hobbes' "Letters from a Silent Study" is unavoidably postponed until next week.]

Dramatic Notes

A VISIT to "The Professor's Love Story" at the St. James's Theatre was profitable in more ways than one. Mr. Willard is giving his many admirers an excellent sample of his powers, though occasionally he is a thought too formal and studied, and Miss Gracie Leigh as the heroine of this simple love story acts with rare, very rare, distinction and restraint. There are few actresses with faces so full of expression: too many of our performers are content to rely solely upon words for the expression of their emotions. When Miss Leigh is not speaking she is thinking, and we can follow her thought not merely in her eyes and the shadows and smiles upon her face, but even in the attitudes she assumes and in the lines of her figure. If only the conventionalities of the stage do not overpower her she will give us great work some day.

"THE PROFESSOR'S LOVE STORY" is what may be called an early Barrie, and affords ground for an interesting study of that master's methods and mannerisms. As I have said before, Mr. Barrie is a teller of fairy tales, and to that class of work it will probably be most profitable for him to confine himself. The play in question, "Crichton," and "Little Mary" all fall to the ground when tested with the rude argument of truth to human nature and to the life of every day; they fail also whenever the author himself puts them to that test; the last act of "Crichton" failed because it brought us all down with a rough jolt to the affairs of earth; the most unreal episode in "Little Mary" is the too true scene between the father and the son. Mr. Barrie has shown advance chiefly in his use of humour. In "The Professor's Love Story" it is all very naïve, sometimes charming, sometimes childish, as when a physician mistakes "Cherchez la femme" for the name of a disease! Mr. Barrie's humour remains naïve and fresh as ever, but childish things he has put away, it is to be hoped for ever. His dialogue, too, improves as the years go by. Perchance one day he will soar into the realms of unrestrained fancy and present us with a classic; another "Midsummer Night's Dream" or "As You Like It"; is that too high praise? Well, there are some of us who have much faith in Mr. Barrie.

It is often cast in the teeth of those who hope for higher things from our dramatists than they are at present giving us, that we are offended at the vogue of musical comedy. All we really contend for is that such productions are not the be-all and end-all of the drama, that the play's the thing, good as may be gorgeous scenery, sumptuous dresses, sparkling verse, tuneful music, and the laughable funniments of the low comedian. "Musical comedy" is a bad name, for it has been used to include all sorts of productions, to some of which it is impossible to apply any more seemly word than "drivel." On the other hand, it also includes much better works, such, for example, as most of those produced in recent years at Daly's Theatre. "The Geisha," "San Toy," and "A Country Girl" are, to all intents, comic operas, standing as high in their class as any others, save only, and probably always, the series known as the Gilbert-Sullivan. The plot of the last piece is nebulous, but what of that? Has not that been the case with many a charming comic opera? But the lyrics by Mr. Adrian Ross rank high, being written neatly, smartly, and with a distinct feeling for good verse: the music by Mr. Lionel Monckton, if not of extraordinary originality, is melodious, skilfully written both for voices and orchestra, and apparently deliberately free from mere tuniness and vulgarity. The first scene, a Devonshire landscape, is sheer stage conventionality; but the second, the interior of the Ministry of Fine Arts (would there were such an office !), is one of the most realistic and splendid interiors ever put upon the stage. Of the performance it is hardly possible to speak with equal enthusiasm. Mr. Hayden Coffin can sing excellently well when he chooses to do so, and I think he underrates the culture of theatrical audiences by not giving them of his best. Miss Isabel Jay is an artist of refinement, gifted with a charming voice. Mr. Rutland Barrington has much too little to do, but delights us, as he always has done, with his clear enunciation and quiet humour. Mr. Huntley Wright is a farceur of parts, more dependent upon his author than most low comedians, which is desirable when the author can provide plenty of good things, which in this case he has failed to do.

It is not only grown-up folk who are to-day provided with artistic, pretty, clever musical pieces, the youngsters are in luck too, so also their elders who take them to such admirable productions as "Little Hans Andersen" at the Adelphi Theatre, and "Snowdrop" and "Brer Rabbit" at the Court. To the former I have already devoted some space, and need only add that Captain Basil Hood and Mr. Walter Slaughter and all concerned are to be congratulated, and so are those who sit among the spectators. "Snowdrop" is also delightful, well devised, well mounted and well played. Lucky children! How far superior both in form and fancy are such productions as these to the noisy entertainments which to-day usurp the name of pantomime.

MR. GILBERT'S re-appearance at the Garrick Theatre as a writer of plays will be watched with interest. Much, if not all, of his early work for the stage has been forgotten by present playgoers; there was work of very high merit in "Broken Hearts," "Engaged," and "The Wicked World," all of which pieces repay reading and would be worth replaying. I hope, however, Mr. Gilbert will give full rein to his fancy, not confining himself too rigidly to the events, men, and women of every day.

THE characters in Captain Marshall's new play do not "follow the drum." The gallant officer's latest addition to the literature of the stage is a "Comedy of Manners." There are only four principal characters, which are to be played by Miss Eva Moore, Miss Marie Illington, Mr. Weedon Grossmith and Mr. Graham Browne. The latter gentleman is playing the part for which Mr. Allan Aynesworth was originally cast, and which he has had to resign on account of a great access of work and trouble—all sympathy will be with Mr. Aynesworth, the loss of whose father is the cause of his resignation. Captain Marshall's play is a comedy absolutely in the lighter vein, involving no serious issues.

"MADAME SHERRY" calls for no critical comment; it is commonplace and vulgar. But two questions suggest themselves: if the Licenser of Plays considers this piece fit for public production, on what grounds or guided by what reasons does he form his decisions? And why, when home products are so good, do managers consider it necessary to import foreign nastiness? This is certainly a case of "dumping" which might profitably be put an end to.

Jerusalem

THE PROPHETIC BOOKS OF WILLIAM BLAKE: JERUSALEM,
Edited by E. R. D. MacLagan and A. G. B. Russell.
(Bullen. 6s. net.)

WE have here an edition, on good paper and in large clear print, at the same time comparatively cheap in price, of the "Jerusalem," one of the "Prophetical Books" of the celebrated painter-poet, William Blake. It is preceded by an excellent introduction, which explains so far as any introduction of moderate brevity may do the intricate and difficult symbolical system of the poem and the prophetical books in general. It is well we should have some such edition of these books, because they are not included in ordinary issues of Blake's poetry, and can only be obtained in expensive editions of his complete works.

It cannot be pretended that these books are ever likely to become popular, even among sincere lovers of poetry—even among sincere lovers of Blake's poetry, sufficiently rare though these are. Of course, the term "prophetical books" need frighten no one, as though it meant books foretelling the future. Blake used the term in its original sense, to signify books dealing with mystical subject-matter. But apart from the inherent difficulty of such subject-matter, and the symbolic language which it involves, Blake translated everything into a symbolic language of his own, invented symbolic characters of his own; or rather, he bestowed on mythological characters already existing a nomenclature of his own, which adds vastly to the difficulty of following him. Nay, he went a further length. In the prophetic books of the Bible, which to a considerable extent he made his model, geographical names of the countries and localities about Judea (such as Edom and the like) are employed with a symbolic meaning. Had Blake used these names, his meaning would have been comparatively clear, their signification being already fixed. He does, in fact, sometimes employ them. But he also uses constantly, with a parallel symbolic signification, the names of various London quarters, such as Norwood, Finchley, Blackheath and Hounslow. To attach any symbolic ideas to these is indeed hard; and when they have to be made out from the poems alone, without other aid, the most dauntless may well falter. Indeed, the entire symbolism of Blake has to be arrived at from his poems alone; with the added difficulty that a large portion of these "prophetic" books has been destroyed by men who counted themselves his admirers.

We cannot but reckon the poet wantonly and needlessly eccentric in the methods he took to express, or rather to conceal his meaning. The result is that even a fellow-poet so well capable of understanding him as Coventry Patmore has questioned the sanity of these poems. And of this "Jerusalem" itself, viewed as a poem, apart from any central sanity of meaning, it must be said that (while it has fine lines and passages, for it is Blake) it is as a whole chaotic, uncouth, and often actually ludicrous. It is impossible to read it for pleasure; because it is not, for any length of time, coherently work of art. Blake's poetic power seems here to run to seed. No evocation of meaning from apparent meaninglessness can do away with or atone for this lack of poetic form. Nay, yet worse, there is more often than not a lack of substantial poetry. By which we do not mean that it might not have been poetry, but that it is not poetry; and this defect does not depend on mere ruggedness or even roughness of expression. We cannot think that "Jerusalem" has in it the breath of life, when the fashion of literary resurrectionism shall have passed.

Musical Notes

THAT was excellent advice which Professor Niecks was giving to the Incorporated Musicians the other day, when he insisted on the importance of general culture as part of the musician's outfit. All of us have met too frequently professors and students of the art by whom it could be adopted with advantage. But this is far from implying that matters are worse in this respect to-day than formerly. On the contrary, our latter-day musicians are probably far better cultivated as a class than their predecessors. How it may be with teachers I will not pretend to say, but as regards composers this is almost certainly the case. I am not sure indeed that many of our younger men are not going even too far in this direction—becoming, that is to say, too literary and introspective.

THIS one writes poems and music with equal facility; that one is a brilliant essayist when he is not dashing off a symphonic poem; another is a pamphleteer concerning the conditions of the art; while a fourth is at once executant, composer, analyst, and musical historian all rolled into one. This sort of thing certainly means no lack of culture, though doubtless there is a culture of a still wider sort which Professor Niecks had in view. But this also, I fancy, could be shown to exist in plenty too. Richard Strauss, by all accounts, is a man of very various knowledge and wide intellectual sympathies. Sir Hubert Parry, at once sportsman, scholar, antiquarian, critic, school director, composer, and social lion is essentially an all-round man. Sir Alexander Mackenzie is known as a man of wide culture, a notable linguist and a wit. Dr. Elgar's versatility is a matter of common knowledge—if he has now given up his kite flying, he has still a dozen other interests outside his art from agriculture to archæology.

AND with latter-day executants it is much the same. Mr. Leonard Borwick is only one of many pianists possessed of wide general knowledge—due in his case to the precepts of Madame Schumann. Herr Rosenthal plies the pen hardly less brilliantly than he fingers the keys. Josef Hofmann corresponds fraternally with Edison as a fellow inventor, and can discourse on pictures, of which he has a valuable collection, by the hour. Dr. Joachim studies literature with the enthusiasm of an expert. Jean de Reszke's devotion to the turf is well known. And so one might run on to any extent. But these, it may be said, are those who have succeeded, and therefore support Dr. Niecks's case. Certainly it must be agreed that among the smaller fry few "talk shop" with more persistency than your professional musician—or with more depressing results.

DR. COWEN's paper respecting composers' mannerisms was also advice on a fruitful subject, which seems to have been far from exhausted by the speaker, if one may go by the reports to hand. That famous "essential turn" of Wagner, for instance, was certainly not the last word concerning the mannerisms of the composer of the "Ring." Certain harmonies and chords which he constantly employs I should regard, for example, as even more characteristic. The case of Wagner would seem to show, too, that decided mannerisms of a sort may co-exist with the highest genius. Dr. Cowen's seeming suggestion that absence of mannerisms is a distinguishing work of the supremely great appears therefore questionable.

It may be noted, too, that while Wagner had his peculiar characteristics, yet these did not prevent him from differentiating the music of his several works to an extent absolutely unapproached by any other composer. The music of "Siegfried" is totally different from that of "Die Meistersinger," as that of "Tristan" is utterly different again from either; and of each of the master's other works, from "Rienzi" onward, no less must be said. Yet let him hear but ten consecutive bars from any of his works, and who that knows his Wagner will have the smallest difficulty, whether he recognises the particular passage or not, in naming the opera from which it comes? On the other hand, taking the operas as a whole, who can deny that each is absolutely and unmistakably Wagnerian? Surely here is one of Wagner's greatest wonders—he was at once so intensely individual and yet so marvellously various.

THEREFORE I doubt if there is anything whatever in the "no mannerism" theory as a mark of greatness. I doubt indeed if there is any composer great or small in whose works characteristic peculiarities cannot be found. Dr. Cowen and Professor Prout, I notice, claimed that Bach and Beethoven were exempt from such. But it would hardly be difficult, I fancy, to cite numerous instances in disproof of this suggestion. The preludes and fugues of the "Forty-Eight" are amazingly distinctive no doubt, yet the same figures and devices constantly recur; and the same applies even more markedly in the case of the sonatas of Beethoven. As to Mozart there can surely be no question as to his distinctive traits, while Brahms, of course, who seems to have been curiously overlooked by Dr. Cowen, is an even more striking instance to a like effect, as Herr Weingartner long ago pointed out.

BUT of course there are mannerisms and mannerisms—from those of the cheapest street tunes (which Gurney discussed at some length in that interesting volume which ought to be so much better known, "The Power of Sound") up to the noblest characteristics of the greatest masters; and, in a sense, no composer is of much account until he has developed them—until he has developed, that is to say, that distinctive style of which they are largely the ingredients.

It is pleasant to hear that Humperdinck is engaged on a new opera. At present the composer of "Hänsel und Gretel" bids fair to go down to posterity as a "single speech" musician. Certainly it argues extraordinary reticence and self-restraint on Herr Humperdinck's part, that he has not been tempted to follow up more energetically the prodigious success achieved by that delightful work. Many will recall no doubt the charming incidental music which he wrote to accompany the fairy play "Die Königskinder" (of which a mutilated English version was brought out at the Court Theatre), while one or two lesser works have also been heard at rare intervals; but, so far, I think he has written no second opera. The new work is based, it seems, on an adaptation by Humperdinck himself of Dumas' play "Mademoiselle de Saint Cyr" and the characters will all appear in modern dress.

THE Royal Academy of Music has secured a valuable addition to its staff in Mr. Ffrangcon Davies, who has been appointed one of its professors of singing. Mr. Davies is to be reckoned, at the present time, one of the finest baritones we possess, who not only has an admirable voice but knows how to use it with rare judgment and effect. At the same time he is a man of such general cultivation, who has thought so deeply concerning the problems of his art, that he should be peculiarly well able to impart his knowledge to others. Some of the greatest singers have, of course, been totally unable to do this. Other very mediocre vocalists themselves have been superlatively successful teachers.

MUSICAL critics in this country are a retiring body of men, who would assuredly shrink from the conditions under which the craft is pursued in New York, where apparently the grossest personalities are to be reckoned as part and parcel of the trade. Most of these appear indeed to proceed from one source, to wit, the weekly journal known as the "Musical Courier," outside of whose staff, one gathers, neither honesty nor capacity is to be found in the ranks of the New York musical press; but they must be none the less unpleasant to those concerned. A recent effort of this organ was to reproduce a photo of the critic of the "Tribune" playing the violin in a children's orchestra with the object of disproving his claims to criticise other fiddlers. But such an application of the "who drives fat oxen" principle would, if applied all round, expel most critics from the business.

MADAME PATTI's reported statement to a New York interviewer that "Parsifal" was written by Wagner with a view to her taking the part of Kundry, is quite the most comical item of musical intelligence which has appeared for some time. "Tristan," we know, was written in the first instance as a light and popular work, which might engage the sympathies of South American audiences; but "Parsifal" and—Patti! The force of incongruity could no further go. If Wagner really had imagined that Madame Patti, after a lifetime devoted to opera in its most conventional forms, would be likely to devote her talents with advantage to the impersonation of such a part as Kundry, in such a work as "Parsifal," his faith in the perfectibility of the prima donna nature must have been childlike and bland indeed. But I would have given much to have been privileged to witness Madame Patti gravely studying the score of "Parsifal," the perusal of which convinced her, we are told, that the music "was not for me." Yet there is one part in Wagner which, had the fates so ordained it, the songstress of Craig-y-Nos might have sung divinely. Patti in her prime would have been the ideal Eva.

ONE of those things which one can never quite understand is why the stream of concerts, at other times so unduly swollen, should cease so completely at the present season. At a time when so many people are making holiday and generally on pleasure bent, one might have thought the concert-giver would find his opportunity. Yet seemingly in the judgment of the profession this is not the case. Certainly it is not for the critic to complain of a condition of affairs which affords him and his like a most welcome respite. But presumably it is hardly on his account that matters are ordered thus, and viewing the question from a broader standpoint, I cannot help fancying that many of those performers who will later on be competing fiercely against one another for attention to the extent of ten or twelve concerts a day, would be well advised another year to take occasion by the hand and step in at a time when their competitors are mostly silent.

CERTAINLY the audiences at the only concerts which have been given since Christmas lent no countenance to the theory that people are disinclined for music just now. Both the Queen's Hall symphony concert on New Year's Day and the annual performance of the "Messiah" by the Royal Choral Society in the evening drew enormous audiences. In the absence of Mr. Wood, the symphony concert was conducted by Mr. Emil Pauer, who proved himself once more an orchestral chief of very decided parts, while affairs at Albert Hall were directed, of course, by Sir Albert Bridge with results neither better nor worse than those usually attained on these occasions. The singing of such things as "And the Glory," "Lift up your Heads," and the rest by so vast a body as the Albert Hall choir could never be wholly unimpressive; but this is far from saying that it was really high-class choral singing which was heard on this particular occasion. It is probably the old story. Familiarity, &c. Madame Clara Butt, Madame de Vere, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Watkin Mills were the soloists.

SUCCESSSES do not come to English opera so frequently that one can afford to overlook that which seems to have been achieved in distant Malta by a work entitled "The Red Laird," words by Lord Herbert Scott, and music by Mr. C. W. James. The opera is described as light in character, as regards both its book and its score, but since it is said to have been given with success several times in the presence of large audiences, its authors would appear to have achieved their end—and not Wagner or Mozart could do more. Mr. James, the composer, is well known in London musical circles, not only as an erudite musician, but likewise as an accomplished critic.

CONGRATULATIONS to Miss Evelyn Stuart on her escape from what seems to have been an eminently unpleasant experience during—or rather while returning from—her recent visit to Warsaw, where she was engaged to play at one of the Philharmonic concerts. Artistically her triumph seems to have been complete, since we are told that after taking part in Saint-Saëns G minor concerto, she had to give no less than two encores. It was on her way back to England that trouble befell her. Having had a little difficulty over her passport in the first instance, she missed her right train and then, as if this were not enough, the train she was in must needs run into another one, entailing further delay under very disagreeable conditions, though happily, it would seem, no loss of life or limb. Miss Stuart will probably think twice before going to Warsaw again. After the open arms which we have extended to Russian music in England it is really too bad that they should try in this fashion to deprive us of one of our most gifted artists.

Art Notes

THE winter exhibition of Old Masters at the Royal Academy this year will certainly be known as the "Lawrence year," and the reputation of the old president stands the strain more than passing well. The room devoted to the work of the lately dead—Horsley and Sydney Cooper and Wells—is perhaps a sad and pathetic exhibition; indeed it is rather a pity that the jibe at them should have been so unduly called for. But the sculptors Harry Bates and Onslow Ford make good the accomplishment of the Academy. There is a fascinating collection of bronzes by the old Frenchmen, Italians, and Venetians of the fourteen and fifteen hundreds.

THERE is a remarkably fine Reynolds in the great gallery—"The Marquis of Granby," standing by his horse—the whole canvas is masterly in colour and treatment, and the handling of the paint virile and vigorous. There is a very good Canaletto, "Verona." There is a charming Romney and a good Raeburn. But most art-lovers will turn from these things, even from the Rembrandt and the Velasquez and the Botticelli, to say nothing of the Vandykes, to the Lawrences. Here is the picture of Miss Farren which we all know so well from the celebrated engraving—and a delightful masterpiece it is, silvery and pure in colour, and strongly and firmly painted. It has that facile suggestion of ease in the handling that is always an attribute of master-work. The "Master Lambton" is also here, as is the well-known "Countess of Gower and Child."

The general impression left upon the mind—and it is in Lawrence that we are chiefly interested, the great dead whose occasional masterpieces are scattered over these walls are only by the way—the general impression of Lawrence's genius is to me rather strengthened than weakened. Of a truth, in the lump his affectations and his sentimentalities are forced upon us—I do not deny it. But I have been more struck with his strength of handling, particularly with the brush work and the colour, than when I have seen his canvases apart. His feeling for form and his mastery of the stroke of the paint are very marked. And in his superb masterpiece, the "Miss Farren," he reaches a dexterity, an artistry and a splendid achievement which are devoid of all his faults and show all his fine talents at their highest and best. Altogether a most interesting exhibition, on which the Royal Academy is to be congratulated.

At the Leicester Galleries is a show of colour-prints on glass, dating back to Queen Anne in their beginnings. There is such a mania for colour-prints to-day that it is more than likely these mezzotints that have been transferred to glass, rubbed down, and coloured, may sell for large prices—but surely the vogue will be a vogue for curiosities and for rarity rather than for artistic merit! When, however, it is remembered how perishable these things are from their very nature, it is wonderful to find such a large collection brought together; and even as a curiosity they are bound to attract notice.

ANOTHER room at the same galleries is given up to the work of "Tom" Collier, R.I., the master of water-colour landscape, who was received into the Legion of Honour. Mr. Wedmore writes a charming little preface to the catalogue of Collier's work, but he waxes unduly sentimental as to the artistic genius of the French: "The Land that understands all Art," he says—"the people who are ready to receive it—made him a Chevalier of the Legion of Honour." Well—they never "understood" or "received" Turner; and I have rarely met a French artist that knew Turner's work, nor have I seen a Turner in a French public gallery of any repute!

At the Dudley Gallery is a show of the work by a group of landscape painters, Messrs. Allan, Peppercorn, Aumonier, Leslie Thomson, Mark Fisher, and Sir E. Waterlow. The work of such men is always a pleasure to behold; and I have never seen a more perfect picture of sunlight from Mr. Mark Fisher's hands than the "Backwater—Spring." His "In County Dublin" is delightful. Mr. Allan makes a hit with his "Sienna," and his twilight "At Moret," whilst Mr. Peppercorn, who displays the poetic mind in all he does, is remarkably good in "The Bend in the River."

THE "Architectural Review" for January has a photograph of the base of Mr. Blomfield's fine "South African War Memorial" at Haileybury College, that somehow seems to call for a quadrangle round about it to show it off in its proper atmosphere—it looks at sea in the fields.

In "The School World" Mr. Archibald Christie has a much-needed protest against the dry-as-dust methods of teaching drawing as it is practised in schools. He pleads hard for drawing to be made interesting—that the youngster should be allowed to let his hand try to reach his imagination, and be taught to appreciate the works of the masters, instead of bending all his talents and his interest on the mere technique of drawing dull objects. I am utterly with Mr. Christie. I could teach a boy more art in a month by giving him a book of Randolph Caldecott's to copy, than can be won into his hand by shading all the pyramids and globes and forms so dear to the scholastic minds that direct art schools. Any boy will learn more of art from a few interesting examples of good pictures, especially of romantic pictures, than any drawing-master of a school can give him from all the laws of the game. In fact, drawing-masters forget that art is the capacity to transfer emotion; and lose their own strength and the strength of the pupil in trying to teach the grammar of a language instead of the language itself.

SOME schools have been in advance of others in teaching art. And just as Harrow has achieved fame in music, so Charterhouse has always been remarkable in its artistic training. The periodical of the school, "The Greyfriar," shows that there is no falling off in this matter—indeed the art feeling throughout it is most commendable.

I WAS particularly struck the other evening on visiting, by the veriest chance, the London County Council School of Photo-engraving and Lithography at 6, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, by the wonderful success of some teachers of drawing. Here the capable art master has brought out the capacity of the students to express the mood and emotion of things in a way that is a rare and pleasant surprise. Some of the work was excellent, and the lithographic "pulls" struck me as quite remarkably fine.

THE present number of "Art," edited by J. E. Buschmann, is devoted to the art of Jan Van Goyen and the drawings of Rubens.

"THE BRICKBUILDER," an American publication devoted to architecture, shows the same artistic energy in this great branch of art in the United States that marks the enormous artistic awakening of that wonderful country.

AMONGST the recent additions to the Art treasures at the South Kensington Museum may be mentioned two plaster casts from the antique, one of the "Apollo della Terme" which was taken from the Tiber in 1891, and the other of a kneeling youth of which the headless exquisite marble was found at Subiaco in 1883, being Attic work of the second half of the fourth century B.C. The Furniture and Woodwork has gained in specimens of carved oak from the Rhine. To the generosity of Mr. Fitzhenry is due a series of tiles dating from the fourteenth century, the enamel surface being painted in Gothic leaf-work encircling shields of arms. This same donor has given a large group of the Virgin and Child in terra-cotta of Veronese workmanship. Mr. Marling, the British agent at Sofia, has given a very fine, large, glazed-earthenware vase, probably painted by the Chinese at Ispahan, at the Court of Shah Abbas II. in the early years of the seventeenth century. Pewter is becoming a daily increasing craze amongst such as collect collections, and the pewter work in the Museum has just been re-arranged, the English being separated from the foreign.

In the gallery near Leighton's cartoon "The Arts of Peace" is shown for the first time a selection of drawings lately acquired for the National Art Library. These include two original drawings for the Moxon "Tennyson," by Sir John Millais; one for Dickens's "Little Dorrit," by James Mahoney, a fine artist of the 'sixties; one for "Once a Week," by F. W. Lawson; and one by "Phiz" for "Pickwick." Frank Barnard's tinted study for "Jingle" is amongst other attractions. There are "Punch" drawings by Leech—pencil studies with a proof from the finished wood-block—Charles Keene's pen drawings—George Du Maurier's pencil studies from his sketch books, also his pen drawings and proofs from the wood-blocks; whilst on the walls of the National Art Library Reading Room are a set of original drawings and tinted and working proofs of Randolph Caldecott's picture books and "Graphic" illustrations.

It may not be generally known, but there is a large amount of such interesting work to be seen at South Kensington, of which the present exhibition is but a selection.

MESSRS. HANFSTAENGL'S illustrated catalogue of the masterpieces at the Hague and at Haarlem recalls many splendid first impressions of the glories of the Dutch galleries. The reproductions are on a good useful scale, instead of the appalling miniatures that make the modern illustrated catalogue a terror to the eye and brain; and the publisher's name is sufficient guarantee for their excellence. How strangely kind the camera is to some masterpieces, how wantonly unkind to others. Cerezo's "Penitent Magdalen" reproduces beautifully, and Frans Hals' "Portrait" by himself or pupil at Haarlem, needless to say, comes out excellently well, as do the Rembrandts. An interesting catalogue of reproductions from these great galleries.

Correspondence

George Gissing

SIR,—May I have a short space in your columns in which to say a word or two respecting my late friend George Gissing? I find that the majority of writers who have mentioned him since his death refer to what they are pleased to term the monotony of his writings, repeating the old, worn-out statement that so wearied Gissing in his life. In one of his letters to me, dated February 23, 1903, he alludes to some words of mine respecting his "By the Ionian Sea," and his autobiography under the nom de plume of Henry Ryecroft, and he adds, "I should like to say that your estimate of my work as a whole seems to differ most refreshingly from that which is most often brought under my notice. After having been told by all manner of authorities, year after year, that the note of my writing is its depressing monotony, and that variety of subject and manner seem wholly beyond my reach, it is, I confess, encouraging to hear a different opinion, and one which my own heart tells me is a true one."

"I suppose the fact of the matter is that very few reviewers have read more than one or two of my books, and to those who like yourself keep a certain number of them in mind I am most grateful—all the more so that I must needs wonder how they do it and how you do it amid the press of writing which calls for their and your attention."

To these words may I add that no one who ever knew Gissing could honestly speak of monotony in his conversation or writing. He was an erudite man, well versed in classic lore, had the Latin historians and some of the Greek ones at his finger tips, and could read both languages easily when he cared to do so. He was a very shy and fastidious man, and was much troubled by adverse criticism, as he was peculiarly sensitive to it. He was almost morbid in many of his thoughts, and had a strange vein of romance running through his sad life. Into the details of his early career I do not care to enter. They were very hard and very cruel, and the learning which he accumulated was obtained at vast cost and through much suffering.

He was one of the kindest of men, one of those who would take any trouble to help another, especially if the man requiring help was a writer who was striving to live by his pen, and to such an one his heart went out, and he aided him secretly and splendidly; asking no thanks in return. The memory of his own old days of hard struggle never left him and tinged the whole of his life, but it was seldom that his friends could get him to talk of those old sad days.

As a conversationalist he had few equals. His voice was a delightful one, full of charm and melody, and he loved to read aloud and to talk of nature, of flowers, and of mountains. He had few friends and few of them knew one another, as Gissing did not love to have many men about him, but to commune with one at a time and to admit but very few into the secret recesses of his heart. Of the country he had an ever-abiding and profound love, and in that connection let me quote from another of his letters, in which he says, "To live at Guildford, as you do, and to see Spring coming up over the heaths! Here (St. Jean de Luz) we have primroses and violets, yes, even hart's-tongue and spleenwort; but all these things on the slopes of the Pyrenees are not the same thing as to see them in a Surrey lane."

"Would that I could be with you and see lovely Surrey in all her maiden beauty again."

To those of us who knew Gissing, "The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft" are full of meaning. We can see him and hear him in every page of the book, and we know how his own life and his own love are pictured in that book. We would have wished that he had not been so much the Apostle of Pessimism, and yet that was more the result of his health than the state of his mind. He was really a very cheerful man, of a certain quaint lurking humour withal, and with an eager desire to gain health and to do still better work than he had ever done, and yet with a consciousness that in "Henry Ryecroft" he had done his last important work. It has proved that it was so, and to the great grief of his friends Gissing has left us, and has been called from the world—that at first so evilly treated him and afterwards so grudgingly gave him her praise—to a better sphere; one of which he often spoke, and where he would be able, as he said, "to rest and think and be happy," and where "surely there would be violets and birds, with the fruits of the willow and the tender green grass" to delight his wearied eyes.

There have been few simpler minds in the world, few who have had sweeter and simpler pleasures, few truer men, and few who have more longed for rest, and now the rest has come, and the world has hardly yet understood what she owes to George Gissing and to his books.—Yours, &c.,

The Mount, Guildford,
January, 1904.

GEORGE C. WILLIAMSON.

"The Styles of Statesmen"

SIR,—The writer of the article with the above title is not a perfectly trustworthy guide in statistics. He states that of the forty-two words contained in Mr. Morley's paragraph, but ten are of English origin, and by the simple arithmetical process of deducting ten from forty-two obtains a remainder—thirty-two, or seventy-six per cent.—which, he concludes, represents the words of foreign origin. But, on proceeding to give the etymologies of this group, he can enumerate only twenty-eight, and he calmly ignores the discrepancy, leaving us to assume that one the, one a and one of must be of foreign descent. And what about the proper name?

On the philological side, too, he is equally unreliable. The Gothic form, corresponding to the adverb hardly, was harduba, but the O.E. was heardlice or hardlice. Yet we are told that our modern word is derived from the former! In Icelandic the ordinary co-ordinating conjunction is ok = and, the only form which is at all like and being enda, which means and even, and was rarely used. On the other hand, one cannot read three lines of O. English prose without meeting the word. Similarly with the word to, which, we are assured, comes from Dutch! I have not, at the moment of writing, a copy of Bosworth-Toller's A.S. Dictionary by me, but in it will be found the following words: mægar, heardlice, dropian (dropan), to, fiŋg, ute, wæron (v. wesan), and.

Thus—leaving out of question the proper name, though its component parts, glrd, stan are purely O.E.—we find that the number of foreign-derived words is reduced from thirty-two to nineteen, i.e., to forty-six per cent.

Yet, in spite of his errors, the writer is correct in assuming that this paragraph contains an extremely large proportion of foreign words. Turning over the pages of Johnson, Burke, Bolingbroke and others, I find that the usual percentage is from twenty-five to thirty-six, and it is difficult to find a paragraph of fair length which exceeds the higher of these two numbers. In Burke's "Regicide Peace," I noticed a sentence of eighteen words which contained fifty per cent., but the addition of the preceding or of the following sentence immediately reduced the proportion. Similarly, if the context of Mr. Morley's paragraph were quoted, it is very probable that a reduction in the percentage of foreign-derived words would follow.—Yours, &c.,

S. D.-B.

The Date of Charles Lamb's Birth

SIR,—May I point Major Butterworth's attention to this extract from the Temple Church register?

LAMB { Charles, the son of John Lamb and Elizabeth, his wife, of Old Crown Office Row, in the Inner Temple, was born 10th February 1775, baptised 10th March following by the Rev. Mr. Jeffs.

The above is a true copy of the entry in the Register of Baptisms in the Temple Church.

(Signed) C. J. VAUGHAN, D.D.

Master of the Temple.

This copy was made at the instance of Charles Keene, who was the first of Lamb's biographers to see this entry. There are six in the same register of Charles Lamb's brothers and sisters; Charles made the seventh. Mr. Keene called upon the then Master of the Temple, in whose study the register was kept, "a rather thinnish quarto volume in beautiful preservation."

This as proof seems quite acceptable, and certainly proves the date as given in the Major's letter as correct.—Yours, &c., EDRIC WEBSTER.

Happy Endings

SIR,—In a notice of the late George Gissing's life which appeared in a popular daily paper, the writer, discussing one of the novelist's short stories, remarked that "it bore witness to the novelist's new delight in happy endings."

Now, I fail to perceive that happy endings to genuine stories of life and character can afford any particular delight to the conscientious fictionist. The plot or subject of a story must have a natural termination; the development of incident has its own finality; the sequence of events its rational dénouement; and had I sufficient space, I could prove this in examples cited from the masterpieces of fiction. Only the vapid delineator of superficial life pictures and worn-out incidents is concerned about happy endings; great imaginations pourtray life's truths—trials, virtues, vices, errors, victories, defeats, hopes, and fears—on a canvas which neither time nor custom can ever dim. They have no limitations as to sequels which only pander to a vulgar taste, or to the millions, who are ignorant of the real constituents of true and noble fiction.—Yours, &c.,

ISIDORE G. ASCHER.

The Passing of Greek

SIR,—May I just say that I am entirely at one with your correspondent, Mr. Wright, as to the desirability of teaching the rudiments of Greek in our public and grammar schools. I have never forgotten the revelation it was to me to discover parallels and contrasts between Latin and Greek. I remember how the Greek method of construction, which corresponds in everything but the name of the case with the Latin ablative, absolute, and the so-called English nouns, alike absolute, opened up a whole set of new ideas. It was indeed my introduction to the conception of evolution. Therefore, and also on the grounds he names, do I entirely agree with Mr. Wright. I am sorry I did not make myself plainer in the article. He will thank me, I am certain, for the suggestion that he reads Professor Perry on Oxford and Science in the current number of "Nature" (December 31).—Yours, &c.,
C. W. SALEEBY

THERE is a good article on Thomas Hearne by the Rev. W. Edmund Crothers in this month's "Temple Bar." Several amusing extracts are given from the antiquary's Diary; here is one that shows that there were modest men in those days, his excuse for not going to London being: "'Tis probable I might receive a much better welcome than I deserve, or is suitable to one that so much desires and seeks a private humble life without the least pomp or grandeur." Again, in 1733, "July 5.—One Handel a foreigner, who they say was born at Hanover, being desired to come to Oxford to perform in music . . . is come down. . . . Accordingly he hath published papers for a performance at 5s. a ticket . . . this is an innovation—The players might be as well permitted to come and act—" "July 8. . . .—His book (not worth a penny) he sells for a shilling." Two references to Pope are not without a spice of malice: "Mr. Pope the poet who is now publishing Homer in English verse (three volumes in 4to. being already come out) was born in the parish of Binfield, near Ockingham in Berks. He is a papist, as is also his father, who is a sort of a broken merchant. The said Mr. Pope was patronised and encouraged by the late Sir Wm. Trumbull. . . . He is most certainly a very ingenious man. He is deformed;" and "this Alexander Pope, though he be an English Poet, yet he is but an indifferent scholar, mean at Latin, and can hardly read Greek. He is a very ill-natured man, and covetous and excessively proud."

At the end of the review of "The Creevey Papers" in the "Monthly Review" there are three stanzas printed from the MS. of a naval officer, unnamed, date 1816. I quote the first:—

A PARODY OF "NORA CREINA."
(Lesbia hath a beaming eye.)

TUNE—"CRONY 'CREEVEY."

MR. GEORGE TIERNEY sings.

Blessington hath a beaming eye,
But no one knows for whom it beameth;
Right and left it seems to fly,
But what it looks at, no one dreameth;
Sweeter 'tis to look upon
Creevey, though he seldom rises;
Few his truths—but even one
Like unexpected light surprises.
Oh! my crony Creevey, dear,
My gentle, bashful, graceful Creevey,
Others' lies
May wake surprise,
But truth, from you, my crony Creevey.

BOOKSELLERS' Catalogues Received: Mr. Bernard Quaritch, Piccadilly (General); Messrs. Brentano's, New York, "Monthly Bulletin"; Mr. Charles Day, Grosvenor Square (History, Biography, Travel, &c.); Messrs. Hatchards, Piccadilly (Books of To-day and To-morrow).

"Academy" Questions & Answers

Questions and Answers for this column must be addressed to THE EDITOR, THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, 9, East Harding Street, London, E.C. The envelope to be marked in the top left-hand corner "A.Q.A." Full name and address must be sent, not necessarily for publication. Each Question or Answer must be written on a separate sheet of paper and on only one side of the paper. The Editor will not undertake the forwarding of any correspondence. Questions must be confined to matters of Literature, History, Archæology, Folk-lore, Art, Music and the Drama. The Editor reserves the right of deciding whether or not any Question or Answer is of sufficient interest to be published.

COMPETITION.

Until further notice, four prizes, of the value of 5s. each, will be awarded weekly for the two best Questions and the two best Answers contributed to "Academy" Questions and Answers."

The Editor's decision must be considered absolutely final and no correspondence whatever will be entered upon with regard to the awards. The prizes will go to those Questions and Answers which are deemed to be of the greatest general interest, and brevity in all cases will count as a merit.

The names and addresses of prize winners will not be published, but the winning Questions and Answers will be indicated by an asterisk (*).

The prizes will consist of 5s. worth of books to be chosen by the several prize-winners. The name and address of the booksellers where the book or books can be obtained will be given.

Each prize-winner in the United Kingdom will be advised that a credit note has been sent to a bookseller as early as possible in his (or her) immediate neighbourhood, and that on demand he (or she) may choose a book or books to the value of 5s. Winners outside the United Kingdom will receive a cheque for 5s.

Non-adherence to the rules and regulations of "Questions and Answers" will imply disqualification.

No Questions or Answers received after Monday will be considered eligible for the current week's competition.

No competitor can win a prize more than once in three months.

Questions

LITERATURE

"THE MONK DONISARCUS OF PADUA."—Who was he? He lived in the fourteenth century, I believe—but I am ignorant of his writings. Can someone give me the names of these? And also tell me whether English or French translations are to be had of any of his writings?—Varda Wathen-Bartlett.

"WILCOX."—A short poem entitled "Illusion," and beginning "God and I in space alone," by Ella Wheeler Wilcox, appeared in the Chicago "Chap-book" for June 1, 1896. Can any reader tell me in which of her published volumes this poem is to be found? It is not in "Poems of Pleasure" or "Poems of Passion," published by Gay and Bird.—A. C.

"LIVES OF THE SAINTS."—Can anyone refer me to a handy or pocket volume dealing with the lives of the Saints. At a country bookshop I can hear of nothing save an important work in several volumes. I want a collection of succinct lives of all the Saints in the Roman Calendar, telling me who they were, when they lived and died, and why they were canonized. Something practical, simple, reliable, and cheap. Does such a volume exist?—K. C. (Plymouth).

"MALBROUK," a name for the long-tailed ape.—Ouvrier, in a note on "Pliny's Natural History" (viii., 21, 30), tells us that the name "Malbrouk," i.e. Marlborough, was given by the French people to the long-tailed monkey (simia fannus) the "ceropithecus" of Pliny. It would be interesting to know whether the word "malbrouk" is still used in French "argot," or in any French dialect. Perhaps some French reader of THE ACADEMY might be able to tell an English admirer of the great Duke whether this ape-name has ever been used in French literature elsewhere than in Cuvier.—Comestor Oxoniensis.

"WORSE THAN WALTHAM DISGUISES."—This expression occurs in Richardson's "Clarissa Harlowe" in the address of Clarissa to Lovelace. What is its origin, and what does it mean?—M. M.

GENERAL

"THURROCK" AND "NAILBOURNE."—What is the derivation of the words "thurrock"—a water channel and "nailbourne"—an intermittent brook; terms which are in use in Kent?—Percy J. Spillett (Canterbury).

WILLIAM UPOOTT, the autograph collector.—Was his collection disposed of before or after his death?—Aries.

"CHRISTMAS BOX."—What is the etymology of Christmas Box?—Tomas.

"OTHER GUESSES." "OTHERGATES."—Are these words synonymous? I have come across them in the "Ingolishby Legends" and in Shakespeare ("Twelfth Night"), but can find them in no dictionary. Barham writes:—

"A Jew or a Turk,
But it's other-guess work," &c.

—Geogulphus.

"ANDREA FERRARA."—In Washington Irving's "Knickerbocker's History of New York" I came across the following passage: "He wore a true Andrea Ferrara tucked in a leather belt." I presume this is a sword or a dagger. Who was Andrea Ferrara; was he an armourer, when did he flourish, and are any of his weapons to be seen at Hertford House, or elsewhere?—Cato Smith.

"MY HEART CAME INTO MY MOUTH."—Is it true that the origin of this phrase is to be found in the fact that in mediæval times the soul was conceived as escaping in miniature form by way of the mouth? If so, what are our authorities?—R. B. A.

"BABY."—I wish to know who was the first writer to use this word for the reflection of one's self in miniature seen in the pupil of another's eye. This delightful conceit was, of course, familiar to the ancients, but who was the first to use it in this sense in English?—R. B. A.

"KICKSHAW."—Can any correspondent tell me the origin of this word as applied to dainty dishes, and odds and ends of good feeding?—M. M.

Answers

LITERATURE

"GREGOROVIVUS."—An English edition of Gregorovius' "History of the City of Rome in the Middle Ages," translated by Mrs. Hamilton, and in eight volumes, is published by Messrs. George Bell and Sons, York Street, Covent Garden, at three guineas net. I believe there is also an English edition of the "Lives of the Popes," but do not know the publisher.—C. A. W. (Guildford).

"HABAKKUK."—In answer to "G. R. S." Voltaire's witicism refers to the story of "Bel and the Dragon" in the Apocrypha, verses 34-39, where Habbauc (sic) makes pottage, but is suddenly ordered by the Angel of the Lord to take it to Daniel in the lions' den at Babylon, "and Habbauc said, 'Lord, I never saw Babylon, neither do I know where the den is.' Then the Angel of the Lord took him by the crown, and bare him by the hair of the head, and through the vehemency of his spirit set him in Babylon over the den," &c., &c. "So Daniel rose and did eat, and the Angel set Habbauc in his own place again immediately."—T. K. B.

[NOTE.—The enquiry asked specifically for a reference to the passage in Voltaire: not to that in the Apocrypha.—Ed.]

"KING OF ROMÉ."—Two good histories in French upon this personage: "Le Duc de Reichstadt," par le Comte G. I. de Montbel (Paris, 1833, 8vo.), and "Napoléon et son Fils," par F. Muesen, a finely illustrated book recently published. A short biography will also be found in Hoefer's "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."—Henry T. Folkard (Wigan).

"KING OF ROMÉ."—Reliable works on Napoleon II., Roi de Rome, are:—a. G. J. Baron de Montbel, Le Duc de Reichstadt. Notice sur la vie et la mort de ce prince, rédigée à Vienne, sur des documents authentiques. Paris, '32. (Souvent réimprimé.) Traduit en allemand, en italien et deux fois en espagnol. b. J. de Saint-Félix, Histoire de Napoléon II., Roi de Rome, d'après les documents officiels et les meilleurs renseignements. Paris, 1853. c. H. Welschinger, Le Roi de Rome ('11 '32). Paris 1897. (Souvent réimprimé.)—D. Smith (Librarian of the Leamington Museum, Amsterdam).

PAINTING

"LE PETIT BONHOMME."—When I was an art student in Glasgow any figure in a landscape was called "the bonnie." I do not know whether this is a purely local nickname, or whether it is just a corruption of the French expression.—Angus (Peebles).

DRAMA

"MONSIEUR BEAUCAIRE."—"Historian" of Paris asks whether any historical personage ever bore the four ducal titles attributed to the hero of this play. No, certainly not. The very titles themselves: Orléans, Nemours, de Montpensier, and Chartres are historically incompatible with any one French noble family. It is merely another example of the fatuous ignorance of the average playwright and the average actor.—John Wyllies Hunt (Tadmorden).

"ACTING RIGHTS."—All representations of copyright dramatic works are liable to fees if either money or consideration be taken for admission, tickets sold, a collection made, or where any theatre, hall or other place be hired for such a purpose. The fees to amateurs on plays of three, four, and five acts are from £1 to £5 5s., the latter sum being charged for most of the plays by Pinero and H. A. Jones. A reduction in the case of a charity is not often made. Fees, however, need not be paid for performances taking place in a private dwelling-house to invited guests, where no money or consideration be taken for admission, tickets or programmes sold, or a collection made.—S. D. A. W.

"ACTING RIGHTS."—It is certainly necessary to obtain permission from the author to produce a play (presuming it to be a copyrighted play). The usual fee is about five guineas, but that of course rests entirely with the author, who may refuse permission altogether if he so choose.—L. X.

"ACTING RIGHTS."—Apply to the authors, who, as a rule, when possessing the power, give free permission for their plays to be enacted for charitable objects. In other cases it is well to enquire at the Dramatic Authors' Society, Tavistock Street, W.C.; or send to French (Limited), Southampton Street, W.C.—E. D.

MUSIC

"ABBÉ LISZT."—When Liszt came to London in 1886 he played both in public and private. He played Schubert's "Divertissement à Hongroise" at the Grosvenor Gallery before a number of distinguished musicians. Before Queen Victoria at Windsor he played (1) an improvisation, (2) "The Miracle of the Roses," (3) a Hungarian Rhapsody, and (4) Chopin's "Nocturne No. 1 in B flat minor"—M. Dutton.

"ABBÉ LISZT."—I remember hearing in 1886 that the Abbé Liszt played in the music room of the mansion belonging to Mr. Littleton, the music publisher, at Sydenham. Many of the residents were invited to hear him. Probably Messrs. Neville would remember what the Abbé played.—E. L. C. (Redhill).

"ABBÉ LISZT."—At a reception given by Liszt's pupil, the late Walter Bache, in Bond Street, in 1886, I had the privilege of hearing the great musician play Schubert's Divertissement à quatre mains, arranged as a solo, and remember the vivid impression of the grave warty face surrounded by straight falling white hair, and the inspired expression of the master.—Lella.

"ABBÉ LISZT."—In answer to W. Wingfield, I have pleasure in informing him that Liszt played at least thrice during his stay in London in 1886. Possibly he played on other occasions, but I can answer for the following: (a) At Mr. Littleton's At Home at Sydenham; (b) At the Royal Academy of Music in Tenterden Street to the professors and pupils when the Liszt scholarship was announced; and (c) At a reception at the Grosvenor Gallery. The first and third were entirely private functions, the second semi-public, and the master played the Chopin-Liszt "Chant Polonais."—A. R. A. M.

GENERAL

ORIGIN OF THE WORD "YULE."—I wish to refer you to Rudolf Koegel's "Geschichte der Deutschen Litteratur," 1 Band, 1 Teil pag. 37-38, where the eminent Germanist has shown that the Indo-European root-word from which "yule" is to be derived signifies "new, young, new born" and may be interpreted as an epithet of the newborn God of Light.—A. Halling, M.A. (Assistant-Librarian to the University of Copenhagen).

"YULE."—It is little use to ring the changes on all the crude theories of past times, thus jul, ot, oel, ale; giul, hiul, wheel; yehal, A.S. gal, geol; have passed into the limbo because, where all cannot be right the converse places them in the wrong. Another word for Christmas is weihnachten, old form "ze wilen nahten," to equate yule; our latest authority, Herr Kluge, classes it as a pure Germanic form and underived; he starts with weiths, "holy," weithen, "to sanctify," weitha "a priest." I have good reason to connect it with the Latin "via," which takes a sacred form as viaticum, the last sacrament. Our present source is the Sanskrit rah, so rahan an attribute of Deity, to be enthroned, as a survival of totems or animal worship; thus Garuda, called King of the Birds, was the supporter or vehicle (rahan) of Vishnu. The Germanic forms include weithan to strive, and the A.S. wig, to fight, also werg, "a way."—A. H.

[NOTE.—One of our correspondents, misunderstanding our rules, has sent in a couple of not very recondite queries, to which the answers are attached. It should hardly be necessary to explain that this is not what is wanted. These columns are for legitimate enquiry and legitimate reply and we are confident in the bona fides of our readers.—Ed.]

PRIZES.—The asterisks denote the two questions and two answers to which prizes have been awarded. The winners can obtain on application at the following booksellers Five Shillings' worth of books. Notices have been despatched to the several winners and to the three booksellers whose names follow:—

1. Mr. W. G. Grant, Addison House, The Plain, Oxford.
2. Messrs. T. R. and E. Vickers, The Grove, Ilkley.
3. Mr. H. F. Bumpus, 325, High Holborn.

THE ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE COMPANY.—At a Court of Directors held on the 6th, Mr. A. Dutton was appointed Underwriter in the room of Mr. Toulmin, resigned.

Education Supplement

THE CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS.

THE CAMBRIDGE MODERN HISTORY.

Planned by LORD ACTON, LL.D.

EDITED BY Dr. A. W. WARD, Dr. G. W. PROTHERO, and STANLEY LEATHES.

To be completed in 12 Volumes, royal 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 16s. net each.

Vol. II. THE REFORMATION

WILL BE PUBLISHED ON JANUARY 12, 1904.

Vol. I. THE RENAISSANCE (Third Impression) is now ready.

Vol. VII. THE UNITED STATES (Second Impression) is now ready.

Terms to Subscribers.—Subscriptions will be received for the Complete Work at £7 10s. net, which may be either paid in advance or by payments of 12s. 6d. net for each Volume on publication.

A Prospectus will be sent on application.

NOW READY, THIRD EDITION. Demy 8vo, cloth. In two parts. Price 25s. net.

THE GROWTH OF ENGLISH INDUSTRY AND COMMERCE IN MODERN TIMES.

By W. OUNNINGHAM, D.D., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge.

Part I. THE MERCANTILE SYSTEM, pp. i-xxxviii, 1-608. Part II. LAISSEZ FAIRE, pp. i-xii, 609-1039.

A New Edition of the same Author's "THE GROWTH OF ENGLISH INDUSTRY AND COMMERCE DURING THE EARLY AND MIDDLE AGES" is in the press.

CAMBRIDGE HISTORICAL SERIES.

Edited by G. W. PROTHERO, Litt.D., LL.D. NEW VOLUME NOW READY.

THE EXPANSION OF RUSSIA, 1815-1900.

By F. H. SKRINE, F.S.S., H.M.'s Indian Civil Service (retired).

Crown 8vo, with 3 Maps, 6s.

ATHENÆUM.—"Has charmed us by its frank manliness and its desire to speak the truth at all hazards. . . . Mr. Skrine supplies the fullest details of the emancipation of the Serfs, and indeed in all statistics shows how carefully he has worked up the subject. We must especially praise these parts of the book, and also his accurate knowledge of Asiatic Geography in tracing the Russian Conquests of Merv and Samarkand, and his account of the great Siberian Railway."

A HISTORY OF CLASSICAL SCHOLARSHIP.

From the Sixth Century B.C., to the end of the Middle Ages. With Chronological Tables, Facsimiles from Manuscripts, and other Illustrations.

By JOHN EDWIN SANDYS, Litt.D.

Fellow and Lecturer of St. John's College, and Public Orator in the University of Cambridge. Large Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Extract from the Preface.—"My aim has been, as far as practicable, to produce a readable book which might also serve as a work of reference."

DEMOSTHENES. On the Crown. School Edition. Edited by WILLIAM WATSON GOODWIN, Hon. LL.D. and D.C.L., Eliot Professor of Greek Literature (Emeritus) in Harvard University. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready Jan. 12.]

SOPHOCLES. Œdipus Coloneus. With a Commentary, abridged from the large edition of Sir Richard C. Jebb, by E. S. SHUCKBURGH, Litt.D., late Fellow and Assistant Tutor of Emmanuel College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo, 4s. [Immediately.]

COMPOSITIONS AND TRANSLATIONS. By the late HENRY CHARLES FINCH MASON, sometime Scholar of Trinity College and Bell Scholar in the University of Cambridge; Porson Prizeman and Sir Wm. Browne's Medallist (1878); Assistant Master in Haileybury College, 1883-1902. With Prefatory Memoir by R. C. GILSON, Trinity College, Cambridge; Head Master of King Edward VI.'s School, Birmingham. Edited by H. H. WEST, formerly of Trinity College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net. [Immediately.]

PROLEGOMENA TO THE STUDY OF GREEK RELIGION. By JANE ELLEN HARRISON, Fellow and Lecturer of Newnham College, Cambridge, Hon. LL.D. (Aberdeen), Hon. D.Litt. (Durham). Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

THE GOSPELS AS HISTORICAL DOCUMENTS. Part I. The Early Use of the Gospels. By V. H. STANTON, D.D., Ely Professor of Divinity. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. (To be completed in Four Parts.)

LOS LADRONES DE ASTURIAS. Being the First Fifteen Chapters of La Historia de Gil Blas de Santillana, as translated into Spanish by JOSE FRANCISCO ISLA, from the Original French of Alain René Le Sage. Edited by F. A. KIRKPATRICK, M.A. 3s.

RUSSIAN READER. Lermontof's Modern Hero. With English Translation and Biographical Sketch, by IVAN NESTOR SCHNURMANN. Extra fcap. 8vo, 8s.

A List of New Books and Announcements will be forwarded on application.

London: C. J. CLAY & SONS, Cambridge University Press Warehouse, Ave Maria Lane.

MACMILLAN & Co.'s LIST.

New Works on Geometry to meet the New Requirements.

A SCHOOL GEOMETRY.

By H. S. HALL, M.A., and F. H. STEVENS, M.A. Globe 8vo.
 Parts I. and II. Part I.—Lines and Angles, Rectilinear Figures. Part II.—Areas of Rectilinear Figures (containing the substance of Euclid, Book I.), 1s. 6d.
 Part III.—Circles (containing the substance of Euclid, Book III., 1-34, and part of Book IV.), 1s. Parts I., II., and III., 2s. 6d.
 Part IV.—Squares and Rectangles, Geometrical Equivalents of certain Algebraical Formulae (containing the substance of Euclid, Book II. and Book III., Props. 35-37), sewed, 6d. Parts I.-IV., 3s.
 Part V., containing the substance of Euclid, Book VI., with additional Theorems and Examples, 1s. 6d. Parts I.-V., 4s. 6d.
 Parts IV. and V. (containing the substance of Euclid, Book II., Book III., 35-37, and Book VI.), 2s. [Shortly.]
 Part VI., containing the substance of Euclid, Book XI., 1-21, together with Theorems relating to the Surfaces and Volumes of the simpler Solid Figures.
 *°° This work is based upon the recommendations of the Mathematical Association. [In preparation.]
 The Journal of Education.—"Seems quite the best of the new text-books of geometry that have lately been published. It is moderate in its changes, and excellent as to arrangement and selection."

A NEW GEOMETRY FOR SCHOOLS.

By S. BARNARD, M.A., Assistant Master at Rugby School, late Fellow and Lecturer at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and J. M. CHILD, B.A. (Cantab.), Lecturer in Mathematics, Technical College, Derby. Globe 8vo, 4s. 6d.
 Nature.—"There is no doubt that in this work of Messrs. Barnard and Child the teacher will find every requisite for the modern teaching of geometry, including a very large number of illustrative examples."

A NEW GEOMETRY FOR JUNIOR FORMS.

By S. BARNARD, M.A., and J. M. CHILD, B.A. (Cantab.). Globe 8vo, 2s. 6d. [Tuesday.]
 *°° This volume contains all the Practical and Theoretical Geometry required for a pass by Junior Candidates in the University Locals.

THEORETICAL GEOMETRY FOR BEGINNERS.

By C. H. ALLCOCK, Senior Mathematical Master at Eton. Parts I. and II. Globe 8vo, 1s. 6d. each. Part III. [Shortly.]
 School World.—"To those teachers who prefer a modified Euclid to text-books which are frankly revolutionary this book will be very acceptable. Undoubtedly Mr. Allcock has succeeded in retaining the good features of the 'Elements,' while removing most of those which make Euclid's work most distasteful to the schoolboy."

BOOKS FOR SPECIAL EXAMINATIONS, 1904.

LONDON MATRICULATION, 1904.

ENGLISH.

Nesfield's Manual of English Grammar and Composition	2 6
KEY, 2s. 6d. net.	2 6
Mathew's First Sketch of English History	3 6
Mill's Class Book of General Geography	3 6
Green's Short History of the English People	8 6

ELEMENTARY MATHEMATICS.

Castle's Practical Mathematics for Beginners	2 6
KEY, 6s. net.	2 6
Lock's Arithmetic for Schools	4 6
Examples, 3s. Answers, 6d. KEY, 10s. 6d.	4 6
Loney's Arithmetic for Schools	4 6
Examples, 3s. Answers, 6d.	4 6
Hall and Knight's Elementary Algebra . With a Chapter on Graphs	3 6
With Answers, 4s. 6d. KEY, 8s. 6d.	3 6
Hall's Graphical Algebra	1 0
C. Smith's Elementary Algebra	4 6
KEY, 10s. 6d.	4 6
Croome Smith's Primer of Geometry	2 0
Eggar's Practical Exercises in Geometry	2 6

GEOMETRICAL & MECHANICAL DRAWING.

Harrison's Practical Plane and Solid Geometry for Elementary Students	2 6
OPTIONAL SCIENCES.
Emtage's Elementary Mechanics of Solids	2 6
Gallati's Mechanics for Beginners	2 6
Sanderson's Hydrostatics for Beginners	2 6
D. E. Jones's Elementary Lessons in Heat, Light, and Sound	2 6
Remson's Elements of Chemistry	2 6
Roscoe and Lunt's Inorganic Chemistry for Beginners	2 6
Roscoe's Lessons in Elementary Chemistry	4 6
Evans's Botany for Beginners	2 6

COLLEGE OF PRECEPTORS EXAMINATIONS.

JULY AND DECEMBER, 1904.

Cæsar's Gallic War . Books II. and III. W. G. RUTHERFORD. (First and Second Class)	1 6
Virgil's Aeneid . Book I. A. S. WALPOLE. (First and Second Class)	1 6
Aeneid . Book I. T. E. PAGE. (First and Second Class)	1 6
Horace's Odes . Book I. T. E. PAGE. 1s. 6d. Edited by the same, 2s. (First Class)	1 6
Eutroplus . Books I. and II. W. WELCH and C. G. DUFFIELD. (Third Class)	1 6
Euripides's Alcestis . M. A. BAYFIELD. (First Class)	1 6
Shakespeare's Richard II. K. DEIGHTON. (First and Second Class)	1 9
Aytoun's "Edinburgh after Flodden," "Burial March of Dundee," and "Island of the Scots." H. B. COTTERILL. (Third Class and Lower Forms)	6
Saintsbury's Short History of English Literature	8 6
Nesfield's Outline of English Grammar (Third and Second Classes)	1 6
KEY, 2s. 6d. net.	1 6
Oral Exercises in English Composition . (Third Class)	1 6
Junior Course of English Composition . (Third and Second Classes)	1 6
Senior Course of English Composition . (First Class)	3 6
KEY, 1s. net.	3 6
Manual of English Grammar and Composition . (First Class)	2 6
KEY, 2s. 6d. net.	2 6
Acts of the Apostles—Authorised Version . With Notes. By T. E. PAGE and A. S. WALPOLE	2 6
The Greek Text . With Notes. By T. E. PAGE	3 6
St. Matthew's Gospel—The Greek Text . With Introduction and Notes. By A. SLOMAN. (First, Second, and Third Class)	2 6

CAMBRIDGE LOCAL EXAMINATIONS, 1904.

Acts of the Apostles—Authorised Version . T. E. PAGE	2 6
and A. S. WALPOLE. (Junior)	2 6
The Greek Text . With Notes. T. E. PAGE. (Junior)	3 6
Gospel according to St. Matthew—The Greek Text . Introduction and Notes. A. SLOMAN. (Junior and Senior)	2 6
Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare . C. D. PUNCHARD. This Edition contains:—The Tempest; As You Like It; The Merchant of Venice; King Lear; Twelfth Night; Hamlet. (Preliminary)	1 6
Shakespeare's Richard II. K. DEIGHTON. With Appendix by F. GARTWRIGHT. (Junior and Senior)	1 9
Scott's Marmion . M. MACMILLAN. 3s.; sewed, 2s. 6d. (Junior)	1 0
Cantos I. and VI., separately. (Preliminary)	1 0
Marmion and The Lord of the Isles . F. T. PALGRAVE. (Preliminary and Junior)	1 0
Kenilworth . (Junior and Senior)	2 6
Sponser's Faerie Queene . Book I. H. M. PERCIVAL. (Senior)	3 0
Cæsar's De Bello Gallico . Book IV. C. BRYANS. Book V. C. COLBECK. (Junior)	1 6
Cicero's Pro Lege Manilla . A. S. WILKINS. (Senior)	2 6
Pro Archia . G. H. NALL. (Senior)	1 6
Plautus's Captivi . A. R. S. HALLIDIE. (Senior)	3 6
Virgil's Aeneid . Book I. A. S. WALPOLE. Book I. T. E. PAGE. (Junior and Senior)	1 6
Xenophon's Anabasis . Book III. G. H. NALL. (Junior)	1 6
Plato's Crito and Phædo . C. H. KEENE. (Senior)	2 6
Euthyphro and Menæxenus . O. E. GRAVES. (Senior)	1 6
Euthyphro, Apology, Crito, and Phædo . Trans. by F. J. CHURCH. (Senior)	2 6
Thucydides . Book IV. O. E. GRAVES. (Senior)	3 6
Sophocles's Antigone . M. A. BAYFIELD. (Senior)	2 6
Molière's Les Femmes Savantes . G. E. FASNAUGHT. (Senior)	1 0
Schiller's Die Jungfrau von Orleans . J. GOSTWICK. (Junior and Senior)	2 6
Jungfrau von Orleans . W. HUMPHREYS. (Junior and Senior)	3 6

OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE SCHOOLS EXAMINATION, 1904.

Scott's Waverley . Border Edition	3 6
Shakespeare's Julius Cæsar . K. DEIGHTON	1 9
Shakespeare's The Tempest . K. DEIGHTON	1 9
Bacon's Essays . F. G. SELBY	3 6
Chaucer's Prologue . A. W. POLLARD	2 6
Chaucer's Prologue. The Knight's Tale . M. H. LIDDELL.	3 6
Chaucer's Prologue. The Knight's Tale, &c. A. INORHAM	1 0
Milton's Lycidas and Comus . W. BELL	1 6
Milton's Samson Agonistes . H. M. PERCIVAL	2 0
Cicero's Pro Murena . J. H. FREESE	2 6
Horace's Odes . Book III. T. E. PAGE	1 6
Classical Series. 2s.	1 6
Horace's Epistles and Ars Poetica . A. S. WILKINS	5 0
Virgil .—Book I. H. M. STEPHENSON	1 6
Virgil .—Books II. and III. H. M. STEPHENSON	3 6
Terence's Phormio . J. BOND and A. S. WALPOLE	2 6
Virgil's Aeneid .—Book IV. H. M. STEPHENSON. Book V. By A. CALVERT. Book VI. By T. E. PAGE	1 6
Euripides's Medea . M. A. BAYFIELD	1 6
Euripides's Medea . A. W. VERRALL	2 6
Plato's Apology, Crito, and Phædo . Translated by F. J. CHURCH	2 6
Plato's Crito and Phædo . C. H. KEENE	2 6
Euripides's Alcestis . M. A. BAYFIELD	1 6
Euripides's Alcestis . M. L. KANLE	3 6
Thucydides . Book II. O. E. MARCHANT	3 6
Molière's Les Précieuses Ridicules . G. E. FASNAUGHT	1 0
Goethe's Hermann und Dorothea . J. T. HATFIELD	3 6
Schiller's Die Jungfrau von Orleans . J. GOSTWICK	2 6

MACMILLAN & Co., Ltd., St. Martin's Street, London, W.C.

The Teaching of Children

PROPERLY speaking, education is the provision of a fit environment for the young and foolish by the elderly and wise, and its supreme end is character-making, which is itself the only means by which the ethical ideal may ever be attained. These are commonplaces, but after all, as Stevenson has said, the commonplaces are often the great poetic truths: which is my excuse for stating them. But in this article I can attempt only to insist on one or two principles of the first importance in this youthful but high-destined science of education, which is based upon and is part of all other kinds of knowledge. As we shall see, the educationist must, in theory, be familiar with embryology, physiology, psychology, hygiene, and practical medicine, not to mention the various morbid conditions that may affect the growing mind. Yet if you are fit for nothing else, you may, at any rate, start a private school!

And, unquestionably, the first thing to insist upon in these days is that the education—in the narrow sense—of a child must not be begun too early. Anyone who desires to read a clear and popular discussion of this subject should study a paper by the distinguished Edinburgh alienist, Dr. Clouston, in a recent number of the "Paidologist," the journal of the British Child-Study Association. Dr. Clouston reminds the reader that the actual construction of a child's brain is not completed until the seventh year, and he insists, as so many of his profession, judging by experience, and Spencer, by à priori reasoning, have been insisting for many years, that the mental education of our children is, as a rule, begun too soon. We must look at this matter in the light of evolution. Before man had any mind worth mentioning, he had a body. It is the same with every son of man to-day. The first education of a child is therefore to be physical, a training of the senses and of the power to use the muscles. Hence the natural instinct of the baby—or the kitten—for play, which is to them the very best possible work. Playing with a moving object, the child or kitten is training the muscles—altogether twenty in number—that control its eye-balls, and is training that part of its brain which appreciates visual images. Further, it is learning to adjust the movements of its body to the impressions received by its senses—as in catching a ball. This training is invaluable and primal, because it is a training in the means whereby we avoid danger—as in dodging a hansom in later life—and must be perfected first, because, as Spencer has shown us, we must preserve our lives before we are able to use them.

With the law of development still as our guide we must further realise that the moral sense is the last to be evolved. It is in the highest degree ridiculous to give a child a training in ethics before the latent powers of its muscles and its inquiring mind are exercised. And one word on that spirit of curiosity, of wanting to know why. A German philosopher has called man the "cause-seeking animal": this is the divine thirst for knowledge which makes us the lords of creation. The parent—I say the parent and not the schoolmaster, because I still labour under the old-world and well-nigh obsolete conception that the parent is the child's natural and proper teacher—the parent, then, who attempts to stifle the spirit of inquiry in a child's mind is stifling the mind itself, and thereby incurring an awful responsibility. Would I could make my words stronger.

And this suggests the opposite case, of which I have lately had under observation an excellent example. The fond parent of a precocious child—and notably the fond mother of a precocious man-child—may fall into the error of fostering its precocity. Let her beware. The precocious child that becomes a prodigy stands to reach a premature end. In the majority of cases—there are many exceptions, I know—the infant phenomenon not only does not retain its mind in advanced years, but never reaches them. The recent scientific study of the child has shown most finally that precocity is to be discouraged rather than encouraged. The child that loves its lessons must be taught cricket forthwith. The mind is there right enough; the cricket will not destroy it. Give it time and it will make fresh conquests for humanity. Give the child open air, direct its mental activities to pursuits which do not depend on the printed page—men thought long before they learnt to read—and one day your child will rise up and call you blessed.

And another point. We "humans" are mentally distinguished for our power of attention and concentration. The trained mind will approach a matter and stick to it, not losing the thread at the first difficulty. If it starts to read a serious article and meets an unintelligible phrase it will not resort to the waste-paper basket. But this remarkable and almost inexplicable power of attention or apperception is slowly gained. The child's power of attention is notoriously small. We must not expect too much from it. I seriously question whether half-an-hour should not be an outside limit for the length of a lesson up to the age of ten years at least. A child who attends for so long to a task which is quite as difficult to it as your tasks are to you—assuming that you ever attempt to master anything new—has done very well. A headache at the end of a lesson means that the child has lost when it should have profited. In some countries, which have gained more than we have by the work of English educationists—Spencer's epoch-making little book is put into the hands of every State-teacher in France—the type in which lesson-books are printed is made a matter of the utmost importance, and countless headaches are thereby averted. This one point really needs an article to itself.

Another gross error in our present system is that of too early specialisation. Just as the child, which only late acquires a sense of right and wrong, is initiated into the mysteries and anomalies of its parent's private ethical code long before its time, so, a few years later, it is instructed in the three R's long before it is taught to observe—or, for that matter, to brush its poor little teeth, probably already ruined—to the lasting detriment of the appearance of the lower half of its face—because the parents, in their turn, were taught next to nothing about elementary dietetics. So, after a few more years, this premature specialisation is, for the third time, thrust upon it, and the ridiculous nonsense known as English grammar—a dry-as-dust's worthless imitation of the syntax of Latin, a language which really had a grammar—is forced into the child's uncomprehending ear, only to leave its head forthwith by the other. Similarly Latin and Greek are both begun too soon, as our wisest are beginning to show us.

It has been possible to deal with only a few points on a subject the importance of which cannot possibly be over-estimated. In thus apologising for a brief series of remarks, and in regretting that I may not fill THE ACADEMY for the next month with this fascinating topic, I conclude by beseeching any reader who has not already done so to read Spencer's masterly work, which has already, as Professor Michael Sadler remarked the other day, abolished the false ideals of his day in the education of girls, has begun to effect a recognition of the value of physical education, and has—I may add—relieved the burdens and increased the happiness and health and future usefulness of thousands of children's lives. One little instance: children like sweets, as Spencer will tell you, not because of original sin, but because sugar—as its general formula $C_{12}H_{22}O_{11}$ will show to anyone who knows anything of physiology—is an invaluable food to the growing, as to the adult organism. Beware how you repress the healthy instincts which a million years of heredity have produced in the coming race: whether a love of sugar or a love of knowing “why.”

C. W. SALEEBY.

School Books, etc.

Greek

THE THESMOPHORIAZUSAE OF ARISTOPHANES. Edited by B. B. Rogers. (Bell. 7s. 6d.) The “Thesmophoriazusae” is not one of Aristophanes’ great plays, but Mr. Rogers brings out the “hits” so effectively that the duller reader will put the book down regretfully. No comedian is more in need of a commentator than Aristophanes. To understand his quips and cranks one needs educating, special coaching so to speak, so that no sally may lose its meed of appreciation. Mr. Rogers is not only a competent scholar, familiar with every line of his author—half the translation of this play was done without reference to the text—but he cannot write a dull line; his notes, his introduction and translations are all written in easy and vivid English. It was in the “Vespæ” that we first learnt how much of our enjoyment of an ancient classic depends on the commentator. Mr. Rogers revels in difficulties, welcomes each rebuff which makes Aristophanes’ allusions and by-play so repellent to the beginner. Before Mr. Rogers set to work on the “Vespæ” it seemed a poor play; under his touch it became one of the most rollicking comedies, full of good fun and sparkling satire, not a line of which would we wish away, not a single coarse joke—and Aristophanes has many—would we excise. Even the English reader will find this book worth the reading, for it is not necessary to understand Greek to enjoy Mr. Rogers’ work, and of a commentator one can speak no higher praise.

GREEK ANTIQUITIES. Professor Maisch. This translation of Professor Maisch’s “Griechische Altertumskunde” adds another book of compressed information to the series of Temple Primers. Those people who like their facts pressed close together, and little else but facts, these primers must satisfy completely. As a book of reference it might add considerably to the interest of Greek history and literature. Why are not all such books as this provided with a map? (Dent. 1s.)

ETON IN 1829-1830. Edited by Dr. Edmond Warre. (Murray. 10s. 6d. net.) This record of boating and other events was written in Greek by T. K. Selwyn during his seventeenth and eighteenth years—a very remarkable performance, and Etonians will be grateful to the Headmaster of Eton for his very careful editing and translation of this schoolboy’s diary. The illustrations, maps and introduction will make this book welcome to many a non-Etonian interested in Public School life, but its immediate appeal will of course be to old Etonians whose school-life is hidden in the mist of years. The diary does not lend itself to quotation, but we must find room for a reflection made by the Editor on the Eton of those days. “Autres temps autres mœurs” is a proverb which finds illustration in Selwyn’s pages, and we cannot help being struck with the contrast of the manner in which he records lapses as regards sobriety and the indignation which he manifests at a desecration of the Sabbath. Betting seems to have been rife in his days, and lotteries are also mentioned by him as popular. Possibly in this respect things may not have improved as much as one would wish. “Betting is a parasite of games and sport, and a familiar beast to man.”

THE FOUR SOCRATIC DIALOGUES OF PLATO. Translated by Professor Jowett. (Clarendon Press. 3s. 6d. net.)

Whilst welcoming this edition of Jowett’s translation in a cheap and pleasantly readable form, we wonder whether these dialogues are the only ones which it is intended to popularise. It does seem that it would be worth while to bring out some of the less known writings of Plato in a similar way; if there is no such intention on the part of the Clarendon Press then we regret very much that they have chosen these dialogues, as they were already easily accessible to the English reader in other good translations.

ALCESTIS OF EURIPIDES. Edited by A. J. Tate. (Blackie. 2s.) The readable introduction, 28 pp., and the notes, 70 pp., are prima facie evidence that Mr. Tate has enjoyed his work of editing this best known and best loved Greek play. The book is well illustrated and sustains in every respect the excellence of the series.

Latin

SELECTIONS FROM TIBULLUS. Edited by J. P. Postgate. (Macmillan. 5s.) Tibullus is very little read, indeed Virgil and Ovid occupy nine-tenths of the whole time devoted to Latin poetry. We welcome this selection, and although Tibullus is a poor thing for a boy, yet a few here and there will enjoy his smooth verses, his conceits and his affectations of real sorrow and pessimism. The book is excellently edited.

A FIRST LATIN READER. By K. P. Wilson. (Blackwood.) The boy who works through this carefully constructed book will get a good insight into the essentials of Latin.

A FIRST LATIN-ENGLISH DICTIONARY. By A. C. Ainger. (John Murray. 2s. 6d.) The use of this compilation will make it unnecessary to supply the beginner with a special word list for each book or chapter he reads. The quantities are carefully marked, and the meanings of the words are given in as few words as possible.

PRO PATRIA. By Professor E. A. Sonnenschein. (Sonnenschein. 2s. 6d.) A satisfactory piece of work, and a sort of sequel to the author’s “Ora Maritima,” which we reviewed favourably in these columns some time since.

THE DIDACHE. Edited by G. C. Allen. (Astolat Press. 3s. 6d. net.) The MSS. of which this is a translation was discovered in 1873 in a monastery at Jerusalem. The editor thinks that, at the latest, the manuscript dates back to the beginning of the second century. As the translation fits into ten pages of the book it is a pity that the Greek text was not inserted—the translation facing the Greek page by page. The notes appear to be competently done and the translation reads well.

VIRGIL’S ÆNEID. Book I. Edited by H. Kynaston, D.D. (Dent. 1s. 4d.) CÆSAR’S GALLIC WAR. Books IV.-V. Edited by J. Marshall. (Dent. 1s. 4d.) Cæsar and Virgil have been edited too many times for new editors to find even a little to say which is not a re-saying of their predecessors. Each book is complete in itself—introduction, text, notes, vocabulary. The publishers ought to see to it that the paper of the first book is improved, as its texture carefully preserves the slightest impress of finger or thumb; and the editor in not translating the Homeric parallels in a book dedicated to children who know very little Latin, is clearly not of the opinion that little Latin means less Greek.

SELECTIONS FROM LATIN AUTHORS. (University Tutorial Press.) To this press must be awarded the very doubtful honour of anticipating every want of the examinee. Set books in Latin gave place to Unseens, and here Messrs. Watt and Hayes are at the class-room door with the patent remedy for the new complaint.

PLAUTUS. THE TRINUMMUS. Edited by H. C. Nutting. (U.S.A.: Sanborn. 60c.) At the foot of each page difficulties occurring in the text are explained. The idea is to gain facility in reading.

From Messrs. Blackie come M. Tulli Ciceronis Laelius de Amicitia Liber Ad T. Pomponium Atticum (Edited by the Reverend F. Conway, M.A.), Ciceronis Cato Maior de Senectute (Edited by G. H. Wells, M.A.) and the Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh Philippic Orations of Marcus Tullius Cicero (Edited by T. K. Brighouse, M.A. [Lond.]), in the Illustrated Latin Series. (The first two 2s. each, the last 2s. 6d.) The text is well and clearly printed, the notes full and useful, and the illustrations distinctly add interest and value.

German

LESEBUCH. By Dr. W. Paszkowski. (Weidmanche. 3m.) A selection of difficult passages illustrative of German life and thought.

ELEMENTS OF GERMAN. EXERCISES IN GERMAN COMPOSITION. By T. H. Weisse. (Williams and Norgate.) Very full treatment "old style" of German grammar and composition.

French

RECITATIONS AND POÉSIES. By V. Partington. (Horace Marshall. 2s.) A bright little book—on each page an illustration of nursery lore which is printed in ordinary and phonetic script. There is much humour in the drawings.

A FRENCH AND GERMAN PICTURE VOCABULARY. By W. M. Poole. (Murray. 3s. 6d.) The "new style" brought into contempt. On each page, twelve rectangles $1\frac{1}{4}$ inches by $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches; in each rectangle a drawing and a number, and elsewhere in the book the French and German names in both scripts for the things drawn. How tiresome!

A SECOND YEAR FRENCH WRITER. By G. H. Wade. (Rivington.) A carefully written book composed of passages for translation into French, preparatory lessons, and a vocabulary. If thoroughness of workmanship were all, an excellent book.

FOUR FRENCH LECTURES. By J. Hallard. (Blackwell. 1s. net.) The titles of essays are: "Un aspect de l'esprit français"; "Sur l'importance de savoir le français"; "Pierre Loti—Pêcheur d'Islande," and "Ramuntcho."

Mathematics, etc.

GRAPHS. By C. H. French and G. Osborn. (University Tutorial Press. 6d.) This little book provides beginners with exercises in graphic work; there is some little freshness both in matter and in presentation. A leaf is taken from the Calculus in finding maxima and minima values, and we regret that more use has not been made of the Elementary Calculus, a subject which cannot much longer be kept out of the class-room of secondary schools.

THE SCHOOL ARITHMETIC. By W. P. Workman. (University Tutorial Press. 3s. 6d.) We are glad to note that Mr. Workman has omitted from this volume "Elaborate Explanations of the Four Rules," for a child's first lessons in arithmetic should begin with little problems in money and in measuring. The problems are the chief merit of the book; the treatment of the subject is not ahead of but far behind the best teaching. Surely arithmetic should be taught inductively, that is, the rule should be left to the child to discover for himself. The book would gain if a few hundreds of the examples were cut out—see, for instance, the dreary work in fractions (pp. 124–128), Blackie's Illustrated Classics.

General Editor—Prof. R. Y. TYRRELL, Litt.D.

ILLUSTRATED LATIN SERIES.

Gallio War. Books I.—VII. Edited by Prof. J. BROWN, M.A. I., II., III., and IV., 1s. 6d. each; V., VI., and VII., 2s. each.

The Catiline Orations. Complete. Edited by Prof. KERN, 2s. 6d. First Oration. 1s. 6d.

De Senectute. Edited by G. H. WELLS, M.A. 2s.

De Amicitia. Edited by Rev. F. CONWAY, M.A. 2s.

Philippics V., VI., and VII. Edited by T. K. BRIGHOUSE, M.A. 2s. 6d.

Pro lege Manilia. Edited by W. J. WOODHOUSE, M.A. 2s.

Eutropius. Books I. and II. Edited by W. C. LAMING, M.A. 1s. 6d.

Horace.—The Odes. Books I.—IV. Edited by S. GWYN, B.A. 1s. 6d. each. Complete, 5s.

Livy. Book I. Edited by Prof. J. BROWN, M.A. 2s. 6d.

Livy. Books V. and VI. Edited by W. C. LAMING, M.A. 2s. 6d. each.

Livy. Books XXI. and XXII. Edited by G. G. LOANE, M.A. 2s. 6d. each.

Metamorphoses, I. Edited by ERNEST ENSOR, B.A. 1s. 6d.

History of Alexander the Great. Book IX., Chap. I.—V. Edited by H. B. COTTERILL, M.A.

The Catiline Conspiracy. Edited by Rev. W. A. STONE, M.A. 1s. 6d.

Agricola. Edited by W. C. F. WALTERS, M.A. 1s. 6d.

Phormio. Edited by W. C. LAMING, M.A. 4s. 6d.

Aeneid. I. and VI. Edited by H. B. COTTERILL, M.A. 2s. each.

Aeneid. II. and III. Edited by Prof. SANDFORD, M.A. II., 2s.; III., 1s. 6d.

Georgics. I.—IV. Edited by S. E. WINBOLT, M.A. 1s. 6d. each.

ILLUSTRATED GREEK SERIES.

Eumenides. Edited by L. D. BARNETT, M.A., Litt.D. 2s. 6d.

Cyclops. Edited by Rev. J. HENSON, M.A. 1s. 6d.

Alcestis. Edited by A. TATE, M.A. 2s.

Iliad XVIII. Edited by Prof. PLATT. 1s. 6d.

Odyssey I. Edited by the Rev. E. E. EVERARD OWEN, M.A. 2s.

Crito. Edited by A. S. OWEN, M.A. 2s. 6d.

Anabasis I. Edited by O. E. BROWN-RIGG, M.A. 2s.

Anabasis II. and IV. Edited by Rev. G. H. NALL, M.A. 2s. each.

Anabasis III. Edited by A. C. LIDDELL, M.A. 2s.

Blackie's Little French Classics.

Interesting Selections from great French writers, well edited, well printed, well bound. Fourpence each book.

JUNIOR SECTION. Price 4d.

Alphonse Daudet—La Mule du Pape, &c.

Erckmann Chatrian—Contes fantastiques.

Théophile Gautier—Le Pavillon sur l'Eau, &c.

La Fontaine—Shorter Fables.

Poems for Recitation.

MIDDLE SECTION. Price 4d.

Balzac—Un Episode sous la Terreur.

Brueys and Palaprat—L'Avocat Patelin.

Buffon—Selections.

Chateaubriand—Les Martyrs.

Cornellie—Scenes from Le Cid.

Dumas—Scenes of Travel.

Gautier—Scenes of Travel.

Victor Hugo—Waterloo.

La Fontaine—Longer Fables.

Lesage—Selections from Gil Blas.

Prosper Mérimée—Mateo Falcone, &c.

Molière—Scenes from Le Médecin malgré lui.

Molière—Scenes from Les Fâcheux.

MIDDLE SECTION. Price 4d.

Musset—Selections in Verse and Prose.

Racine—Scenes from Bérénice.

Racine—Les Plaideurs (complet.)

Madame de Sévigné—Select Letters.

Souvestre—Un Philosophe sous les Toits.

Stendhal—Un Episode de Guerre.

Voltaire—Select Letters.

Lamartine—Graziella.

Rousseau—Confessions.

SENIOR SECTION. Price 4d.

Sainte-Beuve—Portrait of Molière.

Bossuet—Oraisons funèbres.

André Chenier—Select Poems.

Victor Hugo—Lyric Poems.

Michelet—L'Insecte.

Montaigne—Select Essays.

Pascal—Selections.

Rabelais—Selections.

COMPLETE PLAYS.

Molière—Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme. (81.)

Augier and Sandeau—Le Gendre de Monsieur Poirier. (81.)

Sandeau—Mademoiselle de la Seiglière. (10d.)

Labiche—Le Voyage de Monsieur Perrichon. (8d.)

Labiche—La Poudre aux Yeux. (8d.)

Musset—Fantasie. (81.)

where there are 110 numerical exercises in mixed fractions, too many even for the most humdrum teaching.

A SCHOOL GEOMETRY. Parts I.-V. By H. S. Hall and F. H. Stevens. (Macmillan. 4s. 6d.) When the University and other examining bodies, in consequence of continual outside pressure, threw over Euclid's sequence and demanded a more rational knowledge of geometry from their candidates, it was found that the existing text-books were quite as useless for examination as they had been previously for education purposes. The result was that the market was soon flooded with geometry books written on the new lines. Hall and Stevens' "Old" Geometry was one of the best at the time of its publication, but now even that book is unfitted for the new requirements. The present volume is a compromise; it contains graphic work and a slight change in the order of the propositions; but this book is still a compromise and looks backward rather than forward.

EXERCISES IN GEOMETRY. By R. B. Morgan. (Blackie and Son. 1s.) The propositions are enunciated in black type and are followed by exercises bearing on the proposition. Is it not quite time for this method to be reversed?

LECTURES ON THE LOGIC OF ARITHMETIC. By M. E. Boole. (Clarendon Press. 3s.) Mrs. Boole's lectures will help many a young teacher if he is fortunate enough to see it before he has hardened his heart against all innovations. Writers of text-books, totally ignorant of the simplest facts of psychical life, tumble their stodgy books into the classrooms, and the old-fashioned teacher works through them with the conviction that somehow or other the children will pick up sufficient arithmetic if you only keep them long enough at it. Against this tyranny and ignorance Mrs. Boole protests. Arithmetic is a subject which must be taught intelligently, an impossible task for those who do not add to their knowledge of mathematics a knowledge of child-life. Indeed, were we to sum up in a sentence the gist of the lectures, we should say: the arithmetician qua arithmetician is of all people the least fitted for teaching arithmetic.

MONEY AND CREDIT. By W. Aldrich. (Grafton Press.) The object apparently of this short treatise on money is to give instructions in simple facts connected with the economies of money and credit. After a short interesting historical introduction the writer plunges into his subject, and discusses with fair fulness such matters as coined and paper money, and the connection between money and credit.

THE NATURE AND NECESSITY OF INTEREST. By G. Cassel. (Macmillan. 6s. net.) This very able exposition of the function of interest is preceded by an historical sketch which summarises the ideas held on this subject from very early times. It is not difficult to see why our forefathers erred so grievously in their economic theories—indeed, it can scarcely be called error, seeing that the farther we recede economically the nearer do we get to the single family forming a solidarity, and therefore to a time when interest could not exist. But this ideal state never really existed, and it is therefore a little surprising that some of the greatest thinkers in the Middle Ages regarded interest as an evil rather than as a necessary thing. After proving conclusively, as we think, that interest is an essential factor in modern business, and that use of capital or demand for waiting must always be paid for, Mr. Cassel passes to the discussion of socialistic conceptions, and attempts to show that even communism could not escape in some form or other the paying for durable goods by interest. Students of economics will find this book a real contribution to the academic side of their subject. We are glad that the publication of such a work has been made possible by a subvention from the Swedish Government.

Science, etc.

CURIOSITIES OF NATURAL HISTORY. By Francis Buckland, M.A. (Methuen. 3s. 6d.)

BIRD LIFE IN WILD WALES. By J. A. Walpole-Bond. (Unwin. 7s. 6d.)

ETON NATURE-STUDY AND OBSERVATIONAL LESSONS. By M. D. Hill, M.A., and W. M. Webb. Part I. (Duckworth. 3s. 6d. net.)

NATURE'S RIDDLES, OR THE BATTLE OF THE BEASTS. By H. W. Shephard-Walwyn, M.A. (Cassell. 6s.)

POPULAR NATURAL HISTORY OF THE LOWER ANIMALS (INVERTEBRATES). By H. Scherren, F.Z.S. (Religious Tract Society. 3s. 6d.)

EXPERIMENTAL HYGIENE. By H. Rowland Wakefield. (Blackie. 2s. 6d.)

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF CHILD DEVELOPMENT. By Irving King. (University of Chicago Press. $1.)

THE GROUNDWORK OF PSYCHOLOGY. By G. F. Stout, M.A., LL.D. (University Tutorial Press.)

IN noticing individually each of this extremely heterogeneous collection of books we must attempt to draw from them some general conclusions as to the present tendencies and methods of teaching science. And it is necessary in this connexion to observe that the word "science" is here used for convenience in that narrow and popular sense which will at last be obliterated only by the extension of the scientific method and spirit to every branch of human knowledge—an extension which, happily, we may see in progress all around us.

It can scarcely be said that the two books at the top of the list have any particular relation to our subject. We do not mean that they are uninteresting or valueless: on the contrary. But as means of education their value cannot be high. Rather does the first comprise a large amount of observation which may later be added to the great body of scientific knowledge by way of illustration or further amplification of familiar truths, whilst the latter is interesting and readable but obviously not intended by the author to be anything more than is suggested by the title and the frontispiece—a photograph of Mr. Walpole-Bond "with his young buzzard, badger and jays."

The volume that comes from Eton is of much greater interest in our present purpose, and is not to be gauged merely by the singularly uncouth title. "Observational Lessons," both to the ear and to the literary sense, strikes us as singularly unhappy. What possible purpose is served by the last syllable of that horrible adjective? The authors appear frankly to recognise that nature-study is not science, but, admirable as these lessons are when looked at individually, we cannot understand what support can be given to a method of preparing for the study of science which is so essentially unscientific. Dr. Warre's "Foreword" is not sufficient to convince us that, as he believes, the book is "sound in its method." Method, indeed, seems to us to be conspicuously absent. We can quite understand that children who are already possessed of a taste for these things may be aided in the development of what we suppose the authors would call their "observational faculty" by these lessons, but there is no hint in this volume that the "observationalist" has a mind, as well as senses, and needs to correlate phenomena if he is ever to become a thinker. The history of science abundantly shows that observation, as such, has invariably been sterile. Only when observation has been guided by some idea, some theory or hypotheses—whether right or wrong—have results of any value accrued. So far is this volume from breathing into its interminable series of apparently meaningless facts any of the living spirit which alone makes facts worth observing or recording, that the authors can actually, in the twentieth century, produce for their pupils such a sentence as, "It seems surprising that nature, to speak figuratively, has not arranged," etc.

Figuratively, indeed! Surely in an educational work the use of metaphors which suggest a totally inaccurate interpretation of the facts should be rigidly avoided. Fortunately the boy whose introduction to the Cosmos and its riddles is made by such a "method" as this may become a thinker in spite of it. In "Nature's Riddles," however, we do find some appreciation of what we may call the philosophy of modern biology. The book is an excellent popular account of some aspects of what we know, in Dr. Wallace's phrase, as the "struggle for existence." In this book the camera has been put to a purpose more than merely descriptive, and such facts as those of protective colouring and mimicry—in a word, the meaning of what has been observed by thousands to whom it meant nothing whatever—are expounded in really admirable fashion.

Mr. Scherren's little book has a certain descriptive value, but we can say little more of a work which, like another mentioned above, seems to have no concern with the actual unity and with the all-important interpretation of the numerous discrete and apparently dis coherent facts which it contains.

"Experimental Hygiene" is simply a well-arranged and carefully graduated book for guidance in practical class-room work.

In the "Psychology of Child-Development" Mr. King has produced an original work of real merit, with which it is fully impossible to deal here. All who remember the Spencerian dictum that the least we can demand from a teacher is a knowledge of the manner in which new facts and ideas are taken in by the growing mind, will hasten to read a book in which the author has made a highly successful attempt to understand what mental processes "mean to the child, and not to what they are analogous in the adult mind."

In Professor Stout's highly condensed but lucid little book we have another valuable work which brings the author's views up to a later date than in his "Manual." But this is not the place in which to discuss an important scientific work on the intricate subject which underlies all theories and should underlie all the practice of education.

English

From the Clarendon Press (4s. 6d.) comes "Gower, Selections from the Confessio Amantis," edited by G. C. Macaulay, with introduction, notes, glossary and a useful index to notes. The editor tells us the little that is known of John Gower, though it is a curious statement that the poet is "sumptuously" buried in St. Saviour's, Southwark, and gives a useful and clear account of his works. The sections on Language and Metre are clear and instructive. No better introduction to Gower could be desired by teachers and students. "Tales from Chaucer" (Marshall, 2s.) stands in a different class, being a modern English prose version of the Prologue and six tales from the Canterbury Tales, by Clara L. Thomson, intended for teachers of the young and to such likely to prove useful.

Dent's "Shakespeare for Schools" is very well done: "Hamlet," edited by Oliphant Smeaton, M.A., "Richard II.," by Dora Curtis, both illustrated admirably. The introductions, illustrated notes and glossaries are models of what they should be. With such volumes teachers will find it an easy task to make Shakespeare palatable to their scholars, easily avoiding the danger of making them look on him as the writer of dry "lessons" books.

"A First Book in English Literature," Parts I. and II., by C. L. Thomson (Marshall, 2s. each), simply written and filled with good excerpts. Useful for beginners. The illustrations illustrate.

"Eight Essays of Bacon" (Blackie's English Classics, 6d.) with notes by E. H. Blakeney, M.A., are neatly printed and the notes are useful. Useful to higher rather than lower form boys.

From GINN & COMPANY'S LIST.

LOCI CRITICI.

By GEORGE SAINTSBURY, M.A. Oxon., Hon. LL.D. Aberd., Professor of Rhetoric and English Literature in the University of Edinburgh.

Passages (in English) illustrative of Critical Theory and Practice, selected from the works of Aristotle, and other Masters ancient and modern. 6 x 8½ ins. 439 + xi pages. 7s. 6d.

Academy.—"The book should become a necessity, not only to those for whom it is designed, but to many lovers of critical study who have the capacity, without the means, to consult the array of not always very accessible authors it covers."

INTRODUCTION TO THE HISTORY OF WESTERN EUROPE.

By J. H. ROBINSON, Professor of History in Columbia University, U.S.A.

714 pages. Illustrations and Maps. 7s. 6d.

Clear and interesting account of all important movements, customs, and achievements since the German barbarians conquered the Roman Empire, care being taken to bring out the spirit and permanent results of each event and movement.

Educational Times.—"An extremely capable and useful work."

Pilot.—"We know of few books better adapted to give the intelligent reader a general conspectus of historical development."

School World.—"An excellent book, which we cordially recommend to all our readers."

HISTOR AND DESCRIPTION OF ROMAN		s. d.
POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS. F. F. ABBOTT	...	7 0
HISTORY OF PHILOSOPHY. W. TURNER	...	12 6
LEADING FACTS OF ENGLISH HISTORY.
D. MONTGOMERY	...	5 0
ROME: Its Rise and Fall. P. V. N. MYERS	...	5 6
THE MIDDLE AGES. P. V. N. MYERS	...	5 0
THE MODERN AGE. P. V. N. MYERS	...	6 0

Descriptive Lists post free on application.

GENERAL HISTORY.

By P. V. N. MYERS, recently Professor of History and Political Economy in the University of Cincinnati, U.S.A.

759 pages. Illustrations and Maps. 6s. 6d.

A complete outline in one volume of the History of the World, from that of Eastern Nations to the present time.

School World.—"This is a handsome volume, well printed on good thin paper, and admirably equipped with illustrations and maps. The text is clear, readable, and well-proportioned (bisecting at A.D. 476) and it attains a high level of accuracy. Altogether the book strikes us as by far the fullest and cheapest single volume manual of 'General History' with which we are acquainted."

CLASSIC MYTHS IN ENGLISH LITERATURE.		s. d.
C. M. GAYLEY	...	6 6
FIRST BOOK OF OLD ENGLISH. A. S. COOK
(Third Revision)	...	3 0
THE MOTHER TONGUE. G. L. KITTREDGE and S. L. ARNOLD.
I. Lessons in Speaking, Reading, and Writing English	...	2 0
II. Elementary English Grammar and Composition	...	3 0
III. Elements of English Composition	...	4 6

GINN & COMPANY, 9, St. Martin's Street, London, W.C.

History, etc.

In "Social Life in England," Vol. II. (Black, 1s. 6d.), Mr. John Finemore completes a useful and handy work, telling pleasantly the story of British work and play from 1603 to the present day. Such volumes as these make history interesting to the young folk. The illustrations are very well done.

"The Life of the State" (Marshall, 2s. 6d.), by Geraldine Hodgson, contains a series of lectures delivered to the girls of the Godolphin School, Salisbury, upon the City States of Greece and Rome, the Growth of the English State, Parliament, the Judicature, &c. Thorough, thoughtful and clear.

In "The Origin and Growth of the English Colonies, and of their System of Government" (Clarendon Press, 3s. 6d.), Mr. Egerton has provided a succinct and clear brief history of the British Colonies. It is no mere dry text-book, but a well-written, well-studied short history. Seldom has so much good matter been confined in so small a space.

To "The Story of the World" Messrs. Blackwood have added two more volumes, "The Growth of the British Empire" (2s.) and "The Struggle for Sea Power" (1s. 9d.), by M. B. Synge; handy books of information all compact. Should prove extremely useful to all teachers of history. How pleasant history is made now-a-days compared with what it was not so many years ago.

In Dent's Temple Series of English Texts (1s. 4d. each) appears Dryden's "Essay of Dramatic Poesie," edited by W. H. Hudson, M.A., with introduction and notes; neat, handy, in every way excellent.

Commerce and Geography

Commercial education is at last showing signs of life in this country, one of the most promising signs being the publication of such a book as Professor Spencer Trotter's "The Geography of Commerce" (Macmillan, 5s. net); a few years ago such a book would have appeared in vain. It deals with physical geography and "the activities of men and organizations of men," climate, mineral, vegetable and animal products in all countries. The maps, diagrams and other illustrations are all first-rate. No better book of its kind.

Messrs. Black issue "Australia and Oceania," by F. D. Herbertson (2s. 6d.), selections from the works of various authorities, such as Dr. H. O. Forbes, Dr. A. R. Wallace, Charles Darwin, J. A. Froude; an excellent idea excellently carried out, calculated to stimulate interest in a too-often dry subject.

Professor W. J. Ashley would not stand sponsor for anything short of the best, and such is "British Industries," edited by him and written by such well-known authorities as Stephen S. Jeans (Iron and Steel), Elijah Helm (Cotton), Sir R. Lloyd Patterson (Linen and Flax), Dr. B. W. Ginsburg (Shipping), &c. A book of great value to all interested in British commerce. (Longmans. 5s. 6d. net.)

Theology, etc.

THE SECOND EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS. By A. Plummer, D.D. (Cambridge University Press. 1s. 6d. net.) This contribution to the excellent Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges is well up to the level of the series. The purpose of the series is to impart a critical knowledge of the New Testament to students who have not learnt Greek. Apart from a certain clumsiness in style, necessitated by this limitation, the notes are concise to a fault (if that were possible), and they are besides a mine of learning. They are written in the most liberal and scholarly spirit, with such freedom from dogmatism on crucial questions as may perhaps leave the tyro somewhat dissatisfied. It is a little startling to find in a book intended for schoolboys the theory adopted by which the Epistle is dissected into two fragments which have been welded together by a later hand. Dr. Plummer declares that he has adopted this theory with reluctance, as the only suggestion which suffices to explain that change of tone and tactics which at the end of chapter ix. has been a standing crux to the commentator.

ST. MARK: THE REVISED VERSION. For the use of Schools. By Sir A. F. Hort and Mary Dyson Hort. (Cambridge University Press. 1s. 6d. net.) This little book appears to be an instalment of a commentary on the Historical Books of the New Testament as they appear in the Revised Version. We should not have learned so much from the title-page without the aid of an inference from the preface. As Mr. Carr—who would seem to be the general editor—remarks, the Revised Version has to some extent superseded the need of annotation. Except for the advantage gained by taking the newer rendering the present volume is very much in line with the Cambridge Bible for Schools, but it would seem to be intended for students a couple of years less advanced. The book has a good historical introduction of xxvii. pages and a useful index.

THE BOOK OF JEREMIAH, WITH INTRODUCTION AND NOTES. By George Douglas. (Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.) The prophecies of Jeremiah, as they have come down to us, are not arranged in chronological order, nor are most of them assigned to a particular date. Their adjustment therefore to the phases of national history, to which they stood in the relation partly of prediction and partly of comment, is in no case an easy task; and particularly by reason of the enigmatic character of their Oriental imagery. Much turns upon the date to be assigned to the capture of Jerusalem; which, in opposition to many of the best known writers on the subject, including Cheyne, Driver and Hommel, Mr. Douglas assigns to the year 605 B.C., the fourth of Jehoiakim. The grounds on which he builds his theory we cannot enumerate here, but they are plausible if not convincing; and the theory bears well the weight of the superincumbent mass. About two-thirds of the volume are taken up with the exposition of the text by means of marginal- and foot-notes. These do not exclude moral reflections of a practical bearing for contemporary life, but for the most part are historical and comparative. Taken with the introduction they form an illuminative guide that will be of service to candidates for ordination and for the preacher.

CONSCIENCE AND LAW; OR, PRINCIPLES OF HUMAN CONDUCT. By William Humphrey, S.J. (Thomas Baker. 3s. net.) It is not necessary for us to do more than note the issue of a second edition of this little book. Father Humphrey has a good power of analysis and the knack of lucid exposition. The series of works in which he has given the general public the opportunity of studying the principles of Roman Catholic theology in the vernacular has therefore a serious value.

SOME POPULAR PHILOSOPHY. By George Long. (Swan Sonnenschein. 2s. 6d.) Mr. Long's modest little volume explicitly addresses itself to the man in the street. This seems an indiscretion, for who will recognise himself as belonging to this category? But for the rest his book is a wise and informing little work which directs attention to the sane, healthy view of things in general, including the motives of human life and conduct, and winds up with a misquotation from the Bible. It is well suited to the shelves of the parish library and of that of the Young Men's Christian Association.

THE CATEGORIES. By James Hutchison Stirling. (Edinburgh: Oliver and Boyd. 4s. net.) Dr. (honoris causa Edinburgh and Glasgow) Stirling in his modest preface refrains from expressing any opinion as to the value of his contributions to philosophical literature, and contents himself with quoting the judgments of his friends. Except, indeed, in one place, where it occurs to him that the verdict by which his work is said to be "for acute and penetrating criticism almost superhuman" may be suspected of irony. Upon that, indeed, he does protest: "I do see in it this truth: Kant has never yet been so analysed, will never again in this world be so analysed—oh, well, say—without cribbing!" and he adds that the writer is "a perfectly honourable and accomplished expert." Thus signed and countersigned, the judgment may be accepted as valid; and we send the student straightway to "The Categories," of which it were superfluous that we should write another word.

A HISTORY OF THE CHURCH: FROM THE DAY OF PENTECOST TO THE COUNCIL OF CHALCEDON. For the use of Children. By the late Rev. J. M. Neale, D.D. (Mowbray. 1s. 6d. net.) The facts of the history of the early-Church, from whatever point of view it is regarded, are many of them difficult to square with any received notion of ecclesiastical authority. Not the least embarrassing is that of High Church Anglicanism, which, fifty years ago, Dr. Neale, out of his wide knowledge and sincere conviction, sought to illustrate in this book for children. His book is rich in anecdote and well adapted to predispose the childish mind to accept the teaching of the school of which in his day the writer was a champion.

MY CATECHISM BOOK: A SIMPLE EXPLANATION OF THE CHURCH CATECHISM FOR YOUNG CHILDREN. (Mowbray. 2s. 6d. net.) A charming present for a child is "My Catechism Book" which is published by Messrs. Mowbray. The answers are illustrated in a kindly discursive fashion, and there are twenty-two sufficiently interesting pictures. Their subjects are mainly scriptural, but the last shows that the book is meant only for High Church children. The text, besides, shows that to the mind of the author the sacramental system is the crown of Christianity.

LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY. By Jean Réville. Translated by Victor Leuliette. (Williams and Norgate. 4s.) M. Réville treats his subject in a manner that presents a striking contrast with that of the typical Englishman of similar views—concise, precise, and logical. Thus while rejoicing because the missionaries of the traditional churches are more and more setting before their people "the purely moral Gospel," he concludes his book by adjuring them to have the courage frankly to confess that they have ceased to be orthodox, that they are no longer dogmatic Catholics or Protestants.

THE STUDY OF ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY. By W. E. Collins, B.D. (Longmans. 2s. 6d. net.) The latest addition to the useful series of Handbooks for the Clergy, of which the Rev. A. W. Robinson is general editor, is well up to the level of its predecessors. If fault it have, that lies certainly not upon the side of slovenliness in the matter of precept; rather, on the other hand, its tone of severity might effectually scare the timid from attempting anything. The writer owns his debt to the late Bishop of London, and we recognise, in the passages dealing with local history as matter for the parson historian, the opinion expressed by that great man in the course of certain lectures lately noticed in these columns.

CHRISTIAN SOCIALISM IN ENGLAND. By Arthur V. Woodworth, Ph.D. (Swan Sonnenschein. 2s. 6d.) In this latest volume Dr. Woodworth has traced the rise and development of the movement which began in the fifties with Maurice and Kingsley, and that is now represented by the Guild of St. Matthew and the Christian Social Union. This he has done in a moderate and orderly fashion, keeping clearly in view that element in the movement to which Carlyle pointed a prophetic finger when he asked the pregnant question: "Is it not the root of all our confusions and bewilderments that we have too much forgotten God?"

FROM BEHIND THE VEIL. By H. E. Stone. (Marlborough. 2s. 6d. net.) We do not note any striking originality in this Messrs. Dent's School List.

IN DENT'S MODERN LANGUAGE SERIES.

Edited by WALTER RIPPMMANN, M.A.

DENT'S WALL-PICTURES OF THE FOUR SEASONS.

FOR USE WITH

DENT'S NEW FIRST FRENCH BOOK.

By S. ALGE and WALTER RIPPMMANN.

The JOURNAL OF EDUCATION says:—

"We know of no better book to start French on."

"A new and greatly improved set of wall-pictures."

The price of Dent's New First French Book is 1s. 6d. net. The Pictures, four in number, have been specially drawn by Mr. J. A. Symington, and represent essentially French scenes. They are elaborately printed in colours, measure 55 by 35 inches, and may be obtained in the following styles:—Unmounted, 2s. 6d. net each; Mounted on Linen and Byeletted, 3s. 6d. net each; Mounted on Linen and Bound at Edges, with Rollers, 6s. net each.

Oxford & Cambridge Locals.

Ask to see Messrs. DENT'S Text Books.

VIRGIL'S AENEID. BOOK I. Edited by Rev. Prof. H. KYNASTON, D.D. With Introduction, Notes, and Vocabulary. 1s. 4d.

CAESAR'S GALLIC WAR. BOOKS II. and III in one Volume. Edited by A. CROOM PATERSON, M.A. Edin. and Oxon With Introduction, Notes, and Vocabulary. With Coloured Frontispiece Maps, and numerous Illustrations. 1s. 4d.

CAESAR'S GALLIC WAR. BOOKS IV. and V. in one Volume. Edited by Dr. JOHN MARSHALL (uniform with Books II. and III.). 1s. 4d.

SCOTT'S LORD OF THE ISLES. Edited by W. KEATH LEASK, M.A. With Illustrated Biography, Introduction, Illustrated Notes, and Glossary. 1s. 4d.

SCOTT'S MARMION. Edited by the Rev. R. P. DAVIDSON, M.A. (Oxon.). (Uniform with "Lord of the Isles.") 1s. 4d.

SPENSER'S FAERY QUEENE. BOOK I. Edited by Prof. W. H. HUDSON. With Introduction and Notes. 2s.

DRYDEN'S ESSAY OF DRAMATIC POESY. Edited by Prof. W. H. HUDSON. With Introduction and Notes. 1s. 4d.

POPE'S ESSAY ON CRITICISM. Edited by B. M. WANTILOVE, M.A., Litt.D. With Introduction and Notes. 1s. 4d.

Together in 1 vol., price 2s.

IN "DENT'S SHAKESPEARE FOR SCHOOLS."

Edited by OLIPHANT SMEATON, M.A.

AS YOU LIKE IT. Edited by FLORA MASSON. With Illustrations by DORA CURTIS. 1s. 4d.

RICHARD II. Edited by W. KEATH LEASK, M.A. With Illustrations by DORA CURTIS. 1s. 4d.

HAMLET. Edited by OLIPHANT SMEATON, M.A. With Illustrations by PATTEN WILSON. 1s. 6d.

* * Each volume includes Biographical Sketch, Introduction, Notes, and Glossary. In addition to the Illustrations mentioned above, each Volume contains Coloured Frontispiece of Costumes and many Reproductions from old sources elucidating Archaic Words and Phrases.

* * Full School Lists will be sent Post Free on Request.

J. M. DENT & Co., 29 & 30, Bedford Street, London.

treatment of the Book of Job. However, these studies, Mr. Stone tells us in his little preface, were made signally useful to many of the Abbey Road congregation, to whom they were originally delivered, and we doubt not that both Abbey Road and many other earnest Christians will find a like profit in the printed pages.

Oddments

If we may judge by the first two volumes "The Start in Life Series" (3s. 6d. each volume, Hodder and Stoughton) will prove a distinct boon to all about to enter on professional or business life. The series is edited by Mr. J. E. Hodder Williams, whose name is guarantee of good, practical work. "Journalism as a Profession," by Mr. Arthur Lawrence, preface by Dr. Robertson Nicoll, with a chapter by Mr. A. C. Harmsworth, is full of wise advice and timely warnings; every youthful journalist, or would-be journalist, will find much practical and really useful information in these pages. "Guide to the Civil Service," by Mr. John Gibson, is equally practical and sound, full of helpful matter both for the office boy who would "polish up the handle of the big front door" and for those who aspire, as he does or should do, to climb higher.

"Supervision and Education in Charity" (Macmillan, 4s. 6d.), by Dr. J. R. Brackett, deals well and suggestively with an interesting and important topic. "Every act of public aid or charity or correction worthy of the name should be educational" is the author's text, and all those who are working at the amelioration of the lot of the poor and homeless will find in these pages much instructive information and comment.

THE SCHOOLMASTERS' YEAR-BOOK AND DIRECTORY. (Sonnen-schein. 5s. net.) This year-book is a great improvement on its predecessor which, being the first, contained many blemishes; the information relating to the record of teachers was often very inadequate or, if virtually correct, misleading. We asked last year why the list of teachers should be confined to men, and we pointed out that the omission from the list of mistresses was an anomaly, seeing that in this country women practically teach all boys and girls up to eight years of age and all girls. However, the present issue is in many respects a very excellent piece of work, and supplies facts and comments which make it an invaluable book of reference. The bibliography deserves censure. By what right is such a book as Mrs. Boole's on arithmetic stigmatised as treating of "half-boys and monkeys." This simply proves that the writer of the notice does not distinguish between fair bibliographical comment and the statement of his own bias. We cannot go through the whole of the criticisms, if such a term is applicable, and can only hope that next year the editor will either give the contents of the various books noticed without comment, or will, where comment—adverse or favourable—is resorted to, support it by reasons.

An Epoch Indeed

A HISTORY OF EUROPEAN THOUGHT IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. Vol. II. By John Theodore Merz. (Blackwood. 15s. net.)

THE very title of Mr. Merz's scholarly and invaluable work sets us thinking. The word "European" might have been omitted, for the thought of the nineteenth century was none of it, we may say, Asiatic; and yet the adjective is accurate, for it was almost unnecessary to discuss any American contributions in a history of nineteenth century thought. Indeed it is a serious matter, this, and one to give us pause, that the great Transatlantic republic has yet to produce thinkers who shall be numbered with the immortals. And there is another significant aspect of this title, connected with the popular conception of history. Apart from cosmic disturbances—earthquakes, sunspots and the like—can there be any history worthy the name that is not just a history of thought? Assuredly not. Had Mr. Merz been writing some few hundreds of years hence his title would have been, "A History of the Nineteenth Century." Mr. Lecky's was the true conception of history, and some of us who loathed and hated in our school days the immeasurably insignificant gossip that still passes for history in our present educational system can welcome a work which recognises that historical, like other facts, are of two kinds, dead and living, and that the historian who is not to be a mere competitor of the novelist is concerned with the latter alone. And, in drawing this distinction between facts, let us remember that those which are living to some minds are dead to others. Examples are numberless: a Henry had six wives, but when you learnt the fact at school, were you taught it as an end in itself, or because of its significance as an illustration of a thousand things, in the social and moral order, that mattered then and matter now?

In this volume of his great work Mr. Merz concludes the history of scientific thought. None of his readers can fail eagerly to await the further chapters in which he is to trace the history of philosophic thought in the astounding century that has lately been gathered to its fathers. And few will question that two ideas, each of which Mr. Merz treats with the greatest judgment, stand pre-eminent in the history of scientific thought in the nineteenth century. That they are indeed all-important in every form of thought is an evident fact, and one of the utmost significance. As Mr. Merz says at the end of his chapter on the Physical View of Nature, "We are thus led beyond the province of scientific into that of philosophic thought. In future chapters we shall frequently have occasion to note this tendency of the purely scientific thought of the century to lead up to philosophical problems." It is indeed so, as the consideration of the two ideas alluded to will abundantly show. The first is the idea of Eternal Energy—uncreatable, indestructible, ever undergoing transformation. At the base of all further considerations there now lies this law of the Conservation of Energy, which we owe in the main to two German physicists, Mayer and Helmholtz, and to our own Lord Kelvin. In recent days we have come back to a clearer Monism which conceives of matter as a form of energy. The law of the Conservation or Eternal Perdurability of Matter is therefore implicit in the law already stated. And upon this law there has been established the second cosmic generalisation, that of Evolution. Of this there are two expositions. The original one is Spencer's system, which is based throughout upon the law of Eternal Energy. Competing with it is Haeckel's system, which is also directly based upon what he prefers to term—though very incorrectly—the "law of substance." The celebrated German zoologist differs from the Englishman, upon whom he builds, in that for him there remain no problems. The great idea of relativity of knowledge has never reached him, and he is as dogmatic as he is essentially unphilosophic. We await with the utmost interest Mr. Merz's treatment of these two conceptions and the Philosophy based upon them as they bear on the Evolution of Philosophic Thought in a century which, with all its failures, is without a distant parallel in the history of Ideas. C. W. SALEEBY.

STRAY STUDIES. By John Richard Green. (Macmillan. 4s. net.)

THESE volumes of historical sketches have a double value. They are pregnant with recondite information, collected in a course of broad and patient research, and inevitably they stimulate the reader to lines of unfamiliar investigation

The Proprietors of

The Christian World

offer a . . .

SCHOLARSHIP

value . . .

£300 (Three Hundred Pounds,)

(£100 per annum)

tenable for . . .

THREE YEARS

available at . . .

A UNIVERSITY

in the . . .

FOR FULL PARTICULARS

SEE

THIS WEEK'S

Christian World.

OF ALL NEWSAGENTS.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

UNITED KINGDOM.

EYRE & SPOTTISWOODE.

THE PRESERVATION OF OPEN

SPACES, AND OF FOOTPATHS AND OTHER RIGHTS OF WAY. By SIR ROBERT HUNTER, M.A., J.P., Solicitor to the Post Office. Second Edition. Cloth, 12s. 6d.

"It would be public money well spent if every clerk to a local council were provided with a copy of Sir R. Hunter's work."—Guardian.
"The book proves itself to be the result of wide experience and long and careful research."—Speaker.

"It ought to be in the hands of every district and parish councillor, since it is with those bodies that it chiefly rests to put the law into action."—Pilot.

FINANCIAL SUPPORT GIVEN

FROM STATE OR MUNICIPAL FUNDS TO DRAMATIC, OPERATIC, OR MUSICAL PERFORMANCES IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES. Return relating to. 4½d.

NATIONAL COMPETITION, 1903.

List of Students rewarded, with the Report of the Examiners on the Selected Works of Schools of Art, Evening Schools, and Day Classes. With Illustrations. 2s. 6d.

MANUAL OF FIELD SKETCHING

AND RECONNAISSANCE. 1s. 6d.

ARMS OF THE DOMINION AND

OF THE PROVINCES OF CANADA (Illuminated). 3d.

CALENDAR OF THE PATENT

ROLLS PRESERVED IN THE PUBLIC RECORD OFFICE. Edward III. Vol. VII., A.D. 1345-1348. 15s.

CALENDAR OF THE STUART

PAPERS BELONGING TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING, preserved at Windsor Castle. Vol. I. 2s. 11d.

HISTORICAL MANUSCRIPTS COM-

MISSION. Report on Manuscripts in Various Collections. Vol. I.—Berwick-upon-Tweed, Burford, and Lostwithiel Corporations; the Counties of Wilts and Worcester; the Bishop of Chichester; and the Deans and Chapters of Chichester, Canterbury, and Salisbury. 2s.

CALENDAR OF THE MANUSCRIPTS

OF THE RIGHT HON. THE MARQUIS OF SALISBURY, K.G., &c., &c., preserved at Hatfield House, Hertfordshire. Part IX. 2s. 3d.

HISTORICAL MANUSCRIPTS COM-

MISSION. Report on the Manuscripts of the Duke of Buccleuch and Queensberry, K.G., K.T., preserved at Montagu House, Whitehall. Vol. II. Part I., 1s. 10d.; Part II., 1s. 11d.

HISTORICAL MANUSCRIPTS OF

HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF PORTLAND, K.G., preserved at Welbeck Abbey. Vol. VI., 1s. 9d.; Vol. VII., 2s. 3d.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN STATE

PAPERS, 1898-1899. Vol. XCI.—Compiled and edited by AUGUSTUS H. OAKES, Esq., C.B., and WILLOUGHBY MAYCOCK, Esq. 10s.

ACTS OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL,

1597. 10s.

CALENDAR OF STATE PAPERS,

IRELAND, 1600. 15s.

CALENDAR OF STATE PAPERS,

AMERICA AND WEST INDIES, 1693-1696. 15s.

CALENDAR OF TREASURY BOOKS

AND PAPERS, 1742-1745. 15s.

CALENDAR OF PATENT ROLLS

preserved in the Public Record Office. Edward II. Vol. III. 1317-1321. 15s.

LIST OF PAPERS SUITABLE AND

NECESSARY FOR READING IN CONNECTION WITH THE SUBJECT OF THE HOUR (FISCAL POLICY) sent on application.

ALL PUBLIC BILLS UNDER DIS-

CUSSION IN EITHER HOUSE OF PARLIAMENT are on sale to the public.

ALL ACTS OF PARLIAMENT, Parliamentary Papers, and Government Publications are upon sale.

London: East Harding Street, E.C.

that are full of interest. In their severe compression we might compare them to pemmican; but though as nourishing, they are infinitely more palatable and digestible. The historian who resigned himself to patient drudgery, was an enthusiast who often rises to eloquence. Take, for example, his pictures of the state of England under the stormy reign of Stephen and after the Great Earl fell in the rout and massacre of Evesham. Mr. Green is always characterized by lucidity of style, precision of thought, and the earnest seeking for safe foundations on which to base what must often be inductive speculation. Groping much in the dark he grasps at character and seeks to analyse and define it. Dunstan, Godwin, Harold the Conqueror stand out vividly from his pages. Extricating Dunstan from the fogs of superstition, he presents him as the statesman and jurist far in advance of his period. Yet there are some of his judgments we accept with reserve. In summing up Earl Godwin, and on his own showing it is difficult to understand why he denies him the epithet of great, considering the times and the circumstances. His assumptions as to the strategies of Harold and William—in which he awards the palm to the Saxon—are admirably plausible and almost convincing. His diligence in studying topography and authorities is shown in his laudatory criticisms of Freeman—there, in an almost exhaustive list, he indicates one chronicle which the other historian had overlooked. As he says of Freeman, he had himself a remarkable faculty for exact inquiry, and he had the gift besides of selecting the best and most probable from heterogeneous masses of material. It is the same qualities which give value to his constitutional investigations, and to the picturesque "Stray Studies" in the second series, on what may be called historical archaeology. Château Gaillard, the House of Brienne, Como and Knole are specially good and suggestive.

"THE CHRISTIAN WORLD" UNIVERSITY SCHOLARSHIP.

A UNIVERSITY SCHOLARSHIP of £100 a year for three years is now being offered by the proprietors of "The Christian World," to be awarded under certain definite conditions. These conditions involve on the part of a candidate: (1) Nomination by the minister and some members of the church or congregation to which he or she is attached, and (2) election by the votes of readers of "The Christian World." It is the hope of the founders of the scholarship that by its aid some promising young student of either sex may reap the advantage of a three years' University course, and the conditions laid down have been drawn up with an eye to simplicity and to guaranteeing that the fullest possible benefit may be derived from the scholarship, which is to take the form of an annual money allowance of £100 for three years. The scholarship will be available at Oxford or Cambridge, or, if the successful candidate be a lady, Oxford, Cambridge, or London. The four candidates receiving the highest number of votes shall submit themselves for examination in London, the travelling expenses of each being paid. A Consolation Prize of five pounds' worth of books will be awarded to each of the three candidates who are in the final examination but are not selected for the scholarship.

FREE ADVERTISEMENTS

OF
BOOKS, PICTURES, ETC. WANTED OR FOR SALE
ARE GIVEN TO ALL

SUBSCRIBERS.

(See Inside back page of Cover.)

THE TATLER

EDITED BY

CLEMENT SHORTER.

The Lightest,

Brightest, and most Interesting

SOCIETY AND DRAMATIC PAPER EVER PUBLISHED.

THE TATLER

An Up-to-Date Society Paper.

Society and the Stage Richly Illustrated Week by Week.

The Best Printing.

The Best Paper, The Best Contents of any Paper of its kind.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

*Can be obtained of all Newsagents,
and at all Bookstalls.*

Offices: GREAT NEW STREET, E.C.

The Academy and Literature

No. 1654. Established 1869. London: 16 January 1904.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17/6 a year.]

Literary Notes

THE annual record of the past year's output of books, issued by the "Publishers' Circular," contains, as usual, matter for comment. It is surprising to learn that about 300 sixpenny novels were published during 1903. Of these, of course, the large majority were reprints of old and new favourites, but the largeness of the number speaks loudly of the still growing appetite for works of fiction. It is often said, with no little untruth, that the days of adventures are passed away; in the main such a statement cannot for a moment be supported, but if it were limited to town life, it would be rash to deny that the ever-increasing commercial competition and the sub-division of labour has painted grey the life of hundreds of thousands. These have to seek in the pages of novels for light and colour, and it is matter for thankfulness that the majority of British novelists turn out stories that, even if they are unable to do little good, can do little hurt.

It is as easy to under-estimate as to over-estimate the influence of fiction upon national life. The vast majority of readers confine their attention to newspapers and to fiction, and just as most of them learn the history of to-day at the hands of the journalist so do most of them believe that they learn life at the hands of the novelist. It is not a question of figures or of parliamentary returns, but it is impossible to repel the persuasion that vast numbers of men and women look upon life with eyes blinded with the untruths of cheap and unveracious novels, from the pages of which they draw their views of morals and men. Bearing on this point, it may be noted that of the 8,381 works published last year, 2,650 were juvenile works and fiction, a somewhat unsatisfactory classification; next in number comes "Miscellaneous, including Pamphlets," but "not Sermons," 906; theology, &c., 702; educational, doubtless chiefly school-books, 748, and history, 573.

But the mere number of works issued gives no sort of key, to the number of volumes sold under each such heading as given above; were history 2,650 and novels 573, the latter might be far ahead really as regards numbers sold; were such figures obtainable the quantity of sack to bread would probably be far more striking. Then again, serious works are in little demand at the lending libraries as compared with fiction. But for the latter class of literature such libraries would soon close, exposing their unprofitable careers in the Bankruptcy Court. The more we study the reading public, the more clear does it seem that the circle is very small that truly loves good books. So it is to-day, was yesterday, and probably ever will be. It is human nature, I suppose; the best art, the best music, the best books appeal to a small, highly cultivated number of men and women.

I HAD written the above lines before coming upon, in the "Library World," an extract from an address given before the Illinois State Library Association by Mr. E. S.

Mr. BERNARD EDWARD JOSEPH CAPES

[Photo. H. W. Salmon, Winchester.]

Wilcox, which is so curiously coincidental that I cannot refrain from quoting a few lines:—

There are people who can not read at all, and others who have no taste for books, in whom the power to fix continued attention on the printed page is still an undeveloped faculty, and to whom a word of more than three syllables is as hard to get by, as a spook in a lonely road in the woods after dark; and there are others again who have just reached the story-telling age in their development, like young children or those Orientals who never tire of the "Thousand and One Nights," all these people have rights in a Free Public Library and claims on it, as well as you and I. Let us remember then, that a wholesome story, a work of the imagination, even if it be a little weak and watery to our taste, may give not only entertainment, but may also bring a gleam of sunshine, some thrill of human sympathy into the humdrum life of many a tired woman. It is only people of some education and culture who find their pleasure in history and philosophy, in our great poets and essayists. Nor is it otherwise in music and the drama. Taking our population straight through, how many of them understand and enjoy a Beethoven sonata, a

Robert Franz song of a Loewe ballad compared with the multitude whose toes tingle at a Strauss waltz or a lively tune in rag time.

Yes, sugar for children, but the sugar must be pure.

THE friends, and they were many, of the late Benjamin Franklin Stevens will read with interest the privately printed Memoir written by Mr. G. Manville Fenn. Mr. Stevens held from 1860, until his death in 1902, the responsible office of United States Despatch Agent, but, apart from his official work, will be—or rather is—chiefly remembered for the numberless services he rendered to American bookmen, above all, historians. By English men of letters he, among other services, should be remembered kindly as one of the chief agents in securing the purchase of Carlyle's House in Cheyne Row.

THE dearest and greatest work of his life, however, one of which it would be difficult to over-estimate the value, was the compilation of a Catalogue Index of MSS. in the Archives of England, France, Holland, and Spain, relating to America, 1763 to 1783. It was compiled in three divisions, in each of which the 161,000 documents were cited; the divisions being (1) the Catalogue, 50 volumes, giving the short titles of the documents in the order in which they exist in public and private collections, such as the Record Office, the French Foreign, Marine, and War Offices, the collections of Lord Lansdowne, &c.; (2) the Chronological Index, 100 volumes, giving a description of each document; (3) the Alphabetical Index, 30 volumes, of Authors and Receivers or Subject Matter. What a monument of worthy industry; what a gold mine to future historians. No wonder that the hope is expressed that the work will find a resting-place in one of the National Institutions of the United States. Here is an opportunity for an American man of money to prove his love of letters.

THERE are few more useful works for literary men than "The Index to the Periodicals," of which publication the 1903 issue is just to hand. A vast amount of valuable work appears in the magazines to which it would be most difficult to refer if it were not for this annual. Books on any given subject can easily be "turned up," but articles and reviews often contain information not obtainable elsewhere, also illustrations, and the literary worker or searcher can lay his hand upon what he wants by reference to this handy index. Miss Hetherington is to be congratulated upon the accuracy and completeness with which her work is done.

ENGLISH literature has always been very sensitive to foreign influence, and Major Martin Hume's choice of "Spanish Influences upon English Prose Literature," as subject for his lectures at the Birkbeck College, is interesting. The lectures are for the University of London, University Extension Board, and commence on January 20. In connection with these lectures I may mention that a Central Association of University Extension Students has been formed "to assist in making the Central Courses of Lectures as widely known as possible and generally to promote University Extension work." It can hardly be doubted that such an association is needed and will do good work. The hon. sec. is Mr. Max Judge, 7 Pall Mall, S.W.

A CORRESPONDENT writes:—In turning over some old letters to-day I came across one written ten years ago in reply to a query, addressed by me to an intimate friend of Mr. Herbert Spencer and of my own (Mr. W. R. Hughes, F.L.S.), which is not devoid of interest. The question propounded was: "Did the great philosopher possess domestic pets of any description?" and it elicited the following response: "He (Mr. Spencer) has returned from St. Leonard's, but is in very, very indifferent health, and, as you know, resents the slightest possible interruption to his work—or, rather, the work of his lifetime, pursued for fifty years—the completion of the Synthetic Philosophy. Besides this he has lived all his life the life of a bachelor—in private apartments, where he would not be likely to keep pets. . . . The following statement, however, may be regarded as accurate: His intense love of Individualism extends even to the lower animals, and he strongly objects to birds being confined in cages."

THE ESSEX REVIEW for January makes interesting reading, notably the article on "Great Waltham Five Centuries Ago," by Dr. Andrew Clark, with two capital illustrations, especially that of the fine old mantelpiece at Langleys.

"THE WAR OF 1812," by Captain Mahan, commences well in this month's "Scribners'." How is it that our magazines fear to give their readers such serious fare as is often, in fact almost always, provided by "Scribners'," "Harpers'," and "The Century"? I probably am wrong, but I do believe that many, many people in this country would welcome a change in this direction in some of our better class illustrated magazines. Tit-bits of articles are beginning to pall, yet for relief we must look to our cousins over the water. Is this as it should be? Or as it might profitably be to all concerned? In the same issue is an able article by Mr. M. H. Spielmann on Mr. Frank Brangwyn, finely illustrated.

"THE LIFE OF HIS MAJESTY WILLIAM THE SECOND, GERMAN EMPEROR," which Messrs. MacLehose, of Glasgow, are on the point of issuing, is one evidence that the conduct of a large commercial business is sometimes quite compatible with the pursuit of authorship. For, coming from the pen of Mr. William Jacks, it is the work of a man who has risen from a beginning in a shipyard to the head of a large iron and steel business, and has contrived to find time to write several books.

WILLIAM JACKS, LL.D., is said to have on one occasion expressed his belief in "politics, pig-iron, and poetry," and he has concerned himself in all three. He has represented in Parliament first the Leith Burghs and then Stirlingshire; he has dealt in pig-iron or its products during all his business career; and his interest in poetry and in languages has found expression in a translation of Lessing's "Nathan the Wise," and in a volume on "Robert Burns in other Tongues." His "Life of James Watt" testifies to his interest in engineering; and his new book, following upon a "Life of Bismarck," to his admiration for German notabilities. His honorary degree comes from Glasgow University.

PROFESSOR WALTER RALEIGH, of Glasgow University, has written a comedy, which was acted privately in the Second City the other evening and which, it is said, will shortly be played in London; but it is much more likely, in the first instance, to be produced, for copyright purposes, on the little stage in the Glasgow Athenæum. The play exhibits the superiority, in the knowledge of a maid, of a linen-draper's bagman over an Oxford don. But then Professor Raleigh is a Cambridge man. The comedy is said to be extremely amusing.

WHETHER or not Professor Raleigh believes, with Mr. Churton Collins, that the philologists have captured the English Literature Chairs in the Universities, he certainly is of opinion that the teaching of the language and of the literature of our country should not, as in his own case, be conjoined. He has presented to the University Court of Glasgow a statement in which he urges the need of adequate and distinct provision for the teaching of the language, by a professor or lecturer, with a salary large enough to attract a scholar of acknowledged attainments. Hitherto a thorough training in English philology has required a prolonged residence abroad, and Mr. Raleigh urges Glasgow University to make such a training possible at home. The Court has undertaken to give the statement sympathetic consideration.

BESIDE Edinburgh and Glasgow, several of the larger Scottish towns give such encouragement to art as is derivable from the promotion of periodical exhibitions of pictures. Among these is Paisley, which is now holding its twenty-eighth annual show. The thread town and its vicinage have many private collections of great value, and these contribute largely to the loan section, which includes examples of Lely, Raeburn, Dupré, Jacob Maris, Alexander Fraser and Sam Bough. Several of the more notable present-day painters are members of the Paisley Institute, including J. E. Christie (who began his art education in the town), and they send numerous pictures. The total number on the walls is 362, and the all-round quality of the work is not appreciably lower than at more important shows.

THE three most read books in Germany during the past year are, according to the reports of the booksellers, three novels (and in the following order): Beyerlein, "Jena oder Sedan"; Heyking, "Briefe die ihn nicht erreichten"; and Frenssen, "Jörn Uhl."

THE authors, still novelists, who come next in popularity, are Clara Viebig, Thomas Mann and Georg von Ompteda. The German critics are rejoicing because for the first time for several years there are no foreigners among the most read novelists in Germany. In former years Zola, Tolstoi, and Sienkiewicz have taken high places.

AN excellent appreciation of George Gissing, by Dr. Max Meyerfeld of Berlin, appears in "Die Nation" (January 9, 1904). The German critic writes most sympathetically, and testifies to a thorough understanding of the English novelist's point of view and purpose. We have not come across anything we like better from Gissing's English critics. In the same number Professor Richard Meyer concludes a very interesting essay on modern women novelists. He deals, of course, with his own countrywomen, but incidentally says some pertinent things of George Eliot and Mrs. Humphry Ward.

THE first number of a new periodical, "La Revue des Idées," made its appearance in Paris on the 15th of this month. It is to contain studies in general criticism, and will be published fortnightly. Among the contents of No. 1 are articles on Radium, on the Scientific Value of Renan's Work, on Francis Bacon and Joseph de Maistre, on Herbert Spencer, and on the Abbé Loisy. The list of contributors includes all the most celebrated scientists and philosophers of France; the only English names we note are those of Arthur Symonds in the division of æsthetics, and of Havelock Ellis in the department of psychology.

The editor is M. Remy de Gourmont. The review, it is hoped, will form a bridge between literature and science, and be thus an instrument of general culture.

WE regret to record the almost sudden death, at Paris, of Miss Hannah Lynch, who for some time was the Paris correspondent of THE ACADEMY. That she was a clever and able writer in many paths of literature is well known to readers of her books, among which may be especially noted the "Autobiography of a Child."

THE Royal Library of Dresden possesses the unique copy of the black-letter edition (the second) of Rabelais' "Pantagruel," printed by François Juste at Lyons in 1533. A facsimile in photogravure is now published by the Société du Mercure de France, preceded by an historical, bibliographical and critical essay by Léon Dorez and Pierre-Paul Plan. Only 200 copies are issued, at the cost of 20fr. each.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS, ETC.

By arrangement with Messrs. Macmillan and Messrs. Smith, Elder, Messrs. James Finch will publish "The Hampstead Shakespeare," in four volumes, being the complete works of Shakespeare with the Life by Mr. Sidney Lee; there will be four photogravure plates, special endpapers, and other decorations. Also by arrangement with Messrs. Macmillan the same publisher will issue the illustrated edition of J. R. Green's "Short History of the English People," in four volumes, with many special features, including maps, a photogravure portrait, endpapers, &c.—In view of the prominence events in the Far East are taking, Messrs. W. Thacker & Co. are bringing out a second edition of Mr. F. T. Jane's "The Imperial Russian Navy," the first edition of which was published by them about four years since.—"How to Write Verse" is to be the title of a little book to be issued from the office of "Great Thoughts." The efforts of would-be poets have been criticised for some time past in a special column of the journal, and this book is an attempt to meet the needs of those who would fain express their thoughts in verse, but who have no knowledge of the technical side of verse-writing.—The first volume to be issued in Messrs. Methuen's series of "Books on Business" is "Railways," by Mr. E. R. McDermott. The work opens with a historical sketch; the relations between the railway companies and the public are dealt with, and chapters are devoted to railway administration and the future. The work also treats of the profit-earning powers of British railways. In the "Little Biographies" series the same publishers are issuing Mr. T. F. Henderson's "Life of Robert Burns," with twelve illustrations. The work should be of special interest just now.—"The City of the Magyars," by Mr. F. Berkeley Smith, is the title of a book on Budapest, which Mr. T. Fisher Unwin will publish on January 18. He will also publish on same day a popular edition of Dr. Augustus Jessopp's "Before the Great Pillage, with Other Miscellanies." The volume will be uniform in price and get-up with the three-and-sixpenny edition of the author's other works.—"Elizabethan Critical Essays," edited by Mr. G. Gregory Smith, lecturer on English Literature in the University of Edinburgh, will be issued this spring from the Clarendon Press in two volumes, uniform with Professor Ker's "Essays of Dryden."—Ben Jonson's complete works, in a standard edition of, probably, nine octavo volumes, is announced by Mr. Henry Frowde. The Delegates of the Clarendon Press have long had this work in contemplation, and have secured the co-operation of Professor C. H. Herford and of Mr. Percy Simpson.

Bibliographical

THE "Complete Poetical Works" of Miss Rossetti, in one volume, promised us by Messrs. Macmillan, will be, of course, very welcome. Such collections, though not comparable in personal interest to the separate volumes on which they are founded, are eminently useful for purposes of reference; and in the present instance rumour says that the collection will contain some hitherto unpublished matter. Bibliographers, at any rate, will not be satisfied if the new "Works" are not absolutely "complete." There must be no omissions; all the verse by Miss Rossetti, which has taken form in print, must be brought together in this volume. Messrs. Macmillan, we may assume, have secured from the S.P.C.K. the right to reproduce the verse contained in the books by Miss Rossetti which have the Society's imprint. As most people know, Miss Rossetti scattered original verse through several devotional volumes—"Annus Domini," "Called to the Saints," "Time Flies," and "The Face of the Deep," to wit. Indeed, the original verse contained in the three last-named were brought together in a book published by the S.P.C.K. itself in 1893. This last was called, simply, "Verses," and, together with the "new and enlarged" edition of the "Poems" published in 1890, and the "New Poems Hitherto Unpublished or Uncollected" issued in 1896, represents the presently accessible collections of Miss Rossetti's verse.

Mr. Austin Dobson is, of course, the very man to edit and annotate Madame D'Arblay's Diary and Letters. His edition should practically be the final one. Meanwhile, it is interesting to trace the gradual "recrudescence" of Fanny Burney's popularity, which, after dying down very low indeed, has within the last fifteen years or so been greatly revived and strengthened. A praiseworthy effort to that end was made in 1889 with "Fanny Burney and her Friends," a collection of passages from her correspondence and journals. Then, in 1890, we had her "Early Diary," edited in two volumes by A. R. Ellis. In the same year Mr. W. C. Ward began the publication of his edition of the Diary and Letters in three volumes—an edition completed in 1892. Meanwhile, in 1891, came, in three volumes, the Diary and Letters as edited by Charlotte Barrett. It was no doubt the success of all these enterprises which suggested the inclusion of Fanny in the "English Men of Letters" series.

The production of "The Widow Woos" at the Haymarket Theatre will no doubt have the effect of drawing renewed attention to the prose fictions of "M. E. Francis." Mrs. Blundell appears to have first challenged the verdict of the public in 1892, when her "Whither?" appeared. Next year came "In a North Country Village" and "Town Mice in the Country," followed in 1894 by "The Story of Dan," in 1895 by "A Daughter of the Soil" and "Frieze and Fustian," in 1896 by "Among the Untrodden Ways," in 1897 by "Maime o' the Corner," in 1898 by "Miss Erin" and "The Duenna of a Genius," in 1900 by "Yeoman Fleetwood," and so forth. It is to be noted that in adapting her little story to the stage of the Haymarket, Mrs. Blundell has had the wisdom to collaborate with that experienced actor, Mr. Sydney Valentine.

Three of Messrs. Methuen's forthcoming "Little Biographies" will be devoted respectively to Goethe, Canning, and Lord Beaconsfield. They will not be at all supererogatory, for, though we already possess "little biographies" of Goethe, Canning, and Lord Beaconsfield, by A. Hayward, F. H. Hill, and J. A. Froude respectively, these all date so far back that they may very properly be supplemented. Froude's "Beaconsfield" (1890) will of course always have a certain measure of interest, inherent in the personality of the writer. But Mr. Walter Sichel is likely to give us something more thoroughly sympathetic and assuredly not less full and accurate. Materials exist in print for a very satisfactory monograph on Disraeli, if the monographist do but have the necessary learning and judgment.

MR. LOUIS BECKE

Mr. C. G. D. Roberts' new volume of "Poems" has aroused fresh interest in the books from his pen, whether in verse or in prose, which have been published or circulated in this country. These are now fairly numerous. To go no farther back than the beginning of the 'nineties, we have had from Mr. Roberts "Down the Ohio" (1891), "Songs of the Common Day" (1893), "Around the Camp Fire" (1896), "Earth's Enigmas" (1896), "The Forge in the Forest" (1897), "A History of Canada" (1898), "By the Marshes of Minas" (1900), "New York Nocturnes and other Poems" (1898), "Sister to Evangeline" (1899, 1900), "The Heart of the Ancient Wood" (1900, 1901, 1902), "Barbara Ladd" (1902), and "The Kindred of the Wild" (1902), to say nothing of a couple of guide-books to Canada.

The promised reprint of the Essays of Abraham Cowley should find favour with many, for they have not been republished separately since 1886, when Henry Morley included them in "Cassell's National Library." No doubt they duly had a place in the "Prose Works" of Cowley issued from the Pitt Press in 1887.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews

Shakespeare Problems

SHAKESPEARE-RÄTSEL. Von Eduard Engel. (Leipzig: Seemann. 2 m.)

DR. ENGEL gathers together in this volume some of the problems about Shakespeare that are of greatest interest to the modern reader and student. He discusses the question of the authorship of the plays in a manner that should convince the most ardent Baconian of his errors, and demonstrates that Shakespeare's position in the judgment of his contemporaries leaves no doubt whatever about his identity. One of the most interesting of the essays is entitled "Shakespeare in Pomerania." Philip Julius, Duke of Pomerania, spent three weeks in England in 1602 and repeatedly visited the theatres. On his return to Germany he invited to his court a company of about twenty English actors, a proceeding that caused his ministers to fear the strain on the State finances, and also called forth a reproof from the court chaplain, who objected to the performances even of mysteries or miracle plays being given in the churches. We learn from his letters a most important fact, that the players spoke their words in English. The audience must therefore have understood enough of that tongue to enable them to follow and appreciate the play.

Engel, we are glad to note, is a most determined anti-Baconian. He declares that the Germans might as well try to demonstrate that Kant wrote Schiller. Engel brings forward some new arguments to show how slight was Bacon's general culture; nowhere does he mention the great English writers who were his contemporaries or forerunners. We hear nothing in his writings of Chaucer or Spenser, or Sidney, or More, or Ascham, and as little of the great names of European literature—Dante or Petrarch, or Ariosto or Tasso. His interest in art seems to have been as small as his love of poetry. According to Engel, even his claims as a man of science rest on slippery ground. He was something of a plagiarist there, and part of the "Advancement of Learning" is a free translation or adaptation of Charron's "De la Sagesse." That Bacon was no poet is clear to all who read him, that he had no feeling for art is also clear, and Engel is probably right when he says that more poetry may be found in Bismarck's speeches and letters than in Bacon's works. But all the same, it is matter for doubt if in these sorts of discussions much is to be gained by belittling Bacon's own achievement.

The question whether Shakespeare was ever in Italy forms the subject of another essay. Shakespeare shows so close, not to say minute, an acquaintance with Padua and Venice, that Engel thinks in all probability he had visited those cities. But documentary evidence is entirely lacking, and therefore no definite answer can be given. Engel is inclined however to the opinion that the likelihood of Shakespeare's travels in Italy is greater than the contrary.

The last essay in the book—"How Othello originated" is a clever and amusing jeu d'esprit. Shakespeare is seen at his writing table in the room he rents from Mistress Hacket near the Globe Theatre. He is reading in Cinthio's "Hecatommithi" the story of the Moor of Venice. Point by point he goes through it, elaborating, criticising, improving, even asking his landlady's advice as to her course of action if she knew that her husband intended to murder a woman—"She would not keep such a secret, no, not an hour!" And this goes on until at length the poet has evolved the plot and some of the lines of his great tragedy. The geniality and swing of the little skit lend it a certain attraction.

"A Sigh for the Olden Times"

OLD TIME TRAVEL. By Alexander Innes Shand. (Murray. 12s. net.)

TRAVEL talk is almost always entertaining, and quite delightful are the reminiscences of old times and old ways given us by Mr. Innes Shand. They are jottings and notes from memory, therefore, perhaps, all the more fresh and distinct. What sticks in the mind's eye is usually more to the point than memories called up by notes made at the time. Mr. Shand carries us with him on his travels over most of Western Europe, journeyings made round about fifty years ago, having much to tell us of other days and other manners and methods. Such a book as this enables the reader to realise how vast a change in travel has been brought about by the extension of the European railway system and by the march of commercial enterprise. The traveller of to-day rushes, or is rushed from city to city, from town to town, from country to country, seeing little of the places and the country-side that intervene. Of the life of the different peoples he visits he sees but little, and though there be many a nook still undefiled by the globe-trotter, they are only explored by the lover of the by-ways of travel. Who, for instance, to take a trite example, really explores to-day the valley of the Rhine? Cologne, Coblenz, Mainz, that is the Rhine to the average traveller, only the pedestrian or the bicyclist learns to know the true beauty of the river scenery, visits the countless small towns and villages full of romantic association and of beautiful relics of the past, or sees anything of the lurking lovelinesses of the small valleys on either bank.

The tendency of the age is to overdo certain show-places and to ignore all centres of interest, natural or acquired, which do not figure largely in the programmes of the various tourist agencies. Those who would know how much they miss, how many hidden delights there are in Europe, will do well to read, from cover to cover, Mr. Shand's most enjoyable book.

A brief quotation will serve to show the altered state of affairs in hotel life:—

At Berne there were two excellent old-fashioned hostelries in the main street, with the signs of the Crown and the Falcon. I used to put up at the Falcon, and it was significant of the times that the friendly host always recognised and greeted me as an old acquaintance. He remembered my tastes and studied them. Once I was greatly touched by his paternal and disinterested solicitude. He laid a hand on my shoulder when leaving, and told me he had been thinking I was wasting my life and what he was pleased to call my talents. I should be a happier man if I renounced roving, and went in for marriage.

He was a genuine type of the old Swiss landlord, who, though he looked sharply enough after the main chance, was more of the courteous gentleman than the profit-seeking host.

So it is in almost all big centres, but off the tourist track many an old-fashioned hotel and old-fashioned host and hostess may still be found; long may they flourish. Apart from the practical interest of the book, there are many pages of what may be called personal chat, all small beer, or shall we say lager beer—in comparison with the more robust provender usually provided in travel books. But such small beer is a very pleasant refreshment and in the present strenuous days very palatable.

In its fresh, fragrant, open-air way this is quite one of the pleasantest books we have been given for a long time past.

Shelley

AN EXAMINATION OF THE SHELLEY MANUSCRIPTS IN THE BODLEIAN LIBRARY. By C. D. Locock, B.A. (Clarendon Press. 7s. 6d. net.)

In the fourth act of "Prometheus Unbound" Ione speaks—

I see a chariot like that thinnest boat,
In which the mother of the months is borne
By ebbing night into her western cave.

Mr. Locock conjectured that for night should be read light, and having examined the manuscript in the Bodleian Library he had the pleasure of ascertaining that his conjecture had the autograph authority of Shelley. Thus began his examination of the Shelley manuscripts, the results of which, as his title-page puts it, are "the publication of several long fragments hitherto unknown, and the introduction of many improved readings into 'Prometheus Unbound' and other poems." In his task, carried out with all the patience and exactness required by manuscripts often difficult to decipher with their numberless swift cancellings and substitutions, Mr. Locock has gleaned after a diligent and scholarly gleaner, Dr. Garnett. No additions to the published verse of Shelley at all comparable in value to those given in the "Relics of Shelley," 1862, by Mr. Locock's predecessor, are now to be obtained; yet Mr. Locock has added some passages, so characteristic of Shelley, that they have the value of diamond sparks. The following may serve as an example:—

Serene in his unconquerable might
Endued the Almighty King, his steadfast throne
Encompassed unapproachably with power
And darkness and deep solitude and awe
Stood like a black cloud on some aery cliff
Embosoming its lighting.

The most important work in this volume, however, will be found in certain unquestionable corrections of the text in poems already published. A single example must suffice. In the received text of "Arethusa" we read—

And the black south wind
It concealed behind
The urns of the silent snow.

Mr. Rossetti suggested the word congealed for concealed. The MS. word unsealed, says Mr. Locock, is perfectly legible.

Mr. Locock's investigation throws an interesting light on the value of printed texts and of conjectural readings. In several instances Mr. Rossetti's ingenious conjectures are confirmed by the MS. In several instances Mr. Forman errs through his conservatism. But again, in several instances, Mr. Rossetti's conjectures are disproved, and Mr. Forman's conservative readings are sustained. The conclusion at which one arrives is that in cases, such as the case of Shakespeare's plays, where we have no manuscript authority, conjecture has a very high value, and yet that it can rarely attain to moral certainty. We infer that an editor ought to be highly conservative in his printed text and boldly conjectural in his notes.

More than twenty published poems, and among these "Epipsychidion," "Prometheus Unbound," and "Prince Athanase" are dealt with by Mr. Locock. His reconstruction of the opening stanza of "To Constantia, Singing," is of special interest.

The Duke's Talk

PERSONAL REMINISCENCES OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON. By Francis, the first Earl of Ellesmere. Edited, with a Memoir of Lord Ellesmere, by his daughter Alice, Countess of Strafford. (Murray. 10s. 6d. net.)

THESE sayings and letters of the Duke, collected by one of his few near friends, have long been known in a measure to historical students. In one form or another they have appeared in reviews and notices and memoirs, till there is comparatively little in the present volume that is absolutely new. Lord Ellesmere's "Quarterly" articles on "that pompous compiler from Gazettes, Alison," were known to have been inspired by the Duke. The Duke's various memoranda on the battle of Waterloo were also known, and to speak truly, they were regarded as rather interesting than authoritative.

Still, it was undoubtedly well to bring together the scattered recollections of a great man, and it was a happy inspiration to preface these with a memoir of the kindly and able friend who preserved the sayings of the Duke. Lord Ellesmere's own letters on his diplomatic and other travels are very sprightly. He saw Spain in the anarchy of 1823, before the French occupation, and was not impressed with the country or people. "The Spaniards are the finest barbarians in the world," he wrote; but, added, "The moment that a Spaniard is in any way civilised, he is lost for ever."

The reminiscences of the Duke of Wellington, which occupy most of the volume, are not arranged on any plan, and sometimes there are repetitions. It is a pity, too, that an index could not have been added, as it will often be hard to find a particular item in a series of unconnected anecdotes. I notice one rather bad slip, probably due to Lord Ellesmere, when he speaks of the Duke as considering the Archduke Charles of Austria's campaign "against Jourdain and Moreau, in 1798," as a masterpiece. The opinion is sound, but the general was Jourdan, and the date 1796.

The most interesting parts of the reminiscences are those that present the Iron Duke under a human and kindly aspect. It is amusing to find Wellington, when at Eton, winning his first battle by defeating "Bobus" Smith, the Rev. Sydney's dull brother, on the bank of the river. It is also odd to find that when studying at Angers he was weak and sickly, and that India, which has shattered so many British constitutions, gave him the iron health which did so much for his success in the field. Other traits are more like the traditional sternness of the Duke. "In the whole course of my life," he wrote in 1818, "whether in poverty or otherwise, I have never had occasion to accept a bill." There is a characteristic touch of British self-righteousness here.

The remarks of the Duke on Waterloo have been mostly known before. There is some piquancy in his idea that Alison the voluminous was a Whig, inspired by political bias. Poor dear "Mr. Wordy"! Surely this was the unkindest cut of all, to be called, by the Tory hero, "a d—d rascally Frenchman." What the Duke would have said of a recent Imperial attempt to separate the glory of the King's German Legion from that of the British comrades with whom they had fought for seven years we may easily guess.

ARTHUR R. ROPES.

A County Family

MEMOIRS OF ANNA MARIA WILHELMINA PICKERING. Edited by her son, Spencer Pickering, F.R.S., together with extracts from the journals of her father, John Spencer Stanhope, F.R.S., describing his travels and imprisonment under Napoleon. With six photogravures. (Hodder and Stoughton. 16s. net.)

THIS autobiography, the writer of which was born in 1824, gives an intimate picture of the life of members of two famous families as they were observed by a lively girl first, then by a wise and tender woman. Mrs. Pickering was the daughter of John Spencer Stanhope and Elizabeth Wilhelmina Coke, whose father, a descendant of the famous Lord Chief Justice (ob. 1633), was afterwards Earl of Leicester. The extraordinary manner in which the two families, by dint of double and triple marriages, were mixed up, is illustrated by a passage from the Memoirs, which we quote:—

I remember that one day at Holkham, Lord Huntingtower, who had just arrived, was sitting by me, and said: "I suppose you are a relation, and can tell me all about these people: I wish you would, for I do not know any of them." "Oh, yes," I said, "with pleasure; I can tell you who they all are. That is my mother, and that is her brother, setting next to her" (pointing to Edward Coke, who looked like her son); "that" (pointing to Wenny, then a little boy) "is uncle to the old gentleman sitting near them (Lord Rosebery); that is Lady Rosebery, and she is niece to my mother" (being just the same age as she was): "and that is my father, sitting next to his mother-in-law" (who was much younger than he was); and so I rattled on through the whole party, which sounded far more extraordinary than any description here can give the slightest notion of. I burst out laughing, and said, "Now I have told you who all the people are, and how they are related to each other; and I think you will consider us a very extraordinary family."

The bright, discursive pages are full of yarns and snapshots. One slips happily from leaf to leaf, not always clear as to whom precisely one is reading about, but aware of the atmosphere of a county family of a hundred years ago, in which all the men were brave and all the women more or less charming, and for the most part not yet hideously dressed. One is in touch with the men and events of the day. Lord Brougham bustles up (Solon, Lysurgus, Demosthenes, Archimedes, Sir Isaac Newton, and Lord Chesterfield in one post-chaise), bound on the voyage of discovery that created Cannes. Longley, Archbishop of Canterbury, is hastily apostrophised as "Butter in a lordly dish." A Yorkshire yokel boasts that his fifty years of married life had passed without a jar, and his old helpmate comments: "Varie conscientious but varie dool." Lord Melbourne stops a maid of honour running away from Buckingham Palace with "We are not going to have a revolution on your account." Sydney Smith, from the pulpit of St. Paul's, claims the attention of Archibald, a member of the family, with a sneeze: "Ar-chie, Ar-chie, Ar-chie." You see Keane and Macready as Richard III.; "the joyous Chantrey" in his studio; the Emperor Francis Joseph a promising and prophetic young man; Prince Albert a collegian, King Christian of Denmark before he was married, and General Bonaparte on St. Helena; the last of the Yorkshire bone-setters bone-setting; and London learning the polka. Stories of animals you have by the score, and stories of famine riots and of election amenities.

Nearly one-third of this large volume is taken up with portions of the journal of Mrs. Pickering's father, John Spencer Stanhope, written during the time that he was travelling in Spain or a prisoner of the French. He wrote with an excellent style, so that it is easy to see from whom his daughter derived her ready pen, as she had in her childhood learned from him to manage a horse.

RECOLLECTIONS OF DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI AND HIS CIRCLE (CHEYNE WALK LIFE). By the late Henry Treffry Dunn. Edited and annotated by Gale Pedrick. With a Prefatory Note by William Michael Rossetti. (Elkin Mathews. 3s. 6d. net.)

It is no small testimony to the genuine significance of Dante Rossetti and the members of his immediate circle in the history of art and literature, that even the slight reminiscences here offered us should be acceptable as garnish to the substantial dish provided by their biographer-general, Mr. W. M. Rossetti. This is clearly Mr. Rossetti's own opinion, since he has been at the pains to revise Mr. Dunn's posthumous text, and correct his frequent mistakes. These are not of a nature to affect Mr. Dunn's general credibility, being for the most part easily explained by the interval of time he had suffered to elapse before noting down his recollections, and by the relation of many of them to matters upon which he could have been but imperfectly informed. The most serious is his placing the date of his acquaintance with Rossetti four years too early, in 1863 instead of 1867. He seems to have become ^{short} these a member of Rossetti's household not very long afterwards, one combining in a measure the functions of "art assistant," as Mr. W. M. Rossetti, in his edition of his brother's family correspondence styles him, and of major-domo, and to have been always regarded as a faithful and reliable friend and factotum, remaining with Rossetti until 1881. Of the greater part of this period, however, he tells us hardly anything, either having left his reminiscences incomplete or not caring to dwell upon the gloomy history of the bodily and mental infirmities of Rossetti's latter years. He is chiefly occupied with the brighter incidents of his early acquaintance with the poet-painter; and if some of his anecdotes are trivial and diffusely narrated, they have at all events a Rossettian aroma, and tend to confirm the impression already conveyed from other quarters of the power and geniality of Rossetti's character, no less than of its excrescences and eccentricities. A more unmixed example of the artistic temperament has hardly ever been exhibited to the world. Mr. Dunn died in 1899, and apparently did not conceive the idea of writing his reminiscences until their vividness had become impaired by lapse of time. Mr. W. M. Rossetti's testimony that they convey "a very fair notion" of his brother should nevertheless ensure them a welcome, while if he be correct in believing that Mr. Dunn "saw as much of Dante Rossetti as any other person whatsoever did," Mr. Dunn can hardly be considered to have made the most of his opportunities.

R. GARNETT.

AS THE SPARKS FLY UPWARD: POEMS AND BALLADS. By Dora Sigerson Shorter. (Alexander Moring, The De La More Press. 2s. 6d. net.)

MRS. SHORTER (best known by her maiden name of Miss Dora Sigerson) has always been a deft weaver of ballads; with something, at her best, of that strange Celtic note of retrospective melancholy. But in this volume her ballads seem often to touch a deeper and more poignant feeling. So it is, for example, with the ballad called "Sweet Marie." It has a note of tragic sadness, which goes very near to the springs of tears. In common with all the poems in this book it is tinged with an extreme pessimism; but unlike many pessimistic poems, these are not merely wailing and weak. Yet, like all good ballads, they do not lend themselves to quotation. The execution is simple, direct and adequate; it has, moreover, the rare quality of suggestiveness in the best passages, which even the old ballads only attain now and again, and as it were by accident. But each stanza is linked to and dependent on each other; so that apart they fail of effect. Even the most suggestive stanzas would seem pale and ineffectual, torn from their context. Better praise than this we could not give these ballads.

But the very finest of all are the opening poems; all of which are based on the common theme of the child. Or rather, perhaps, we should say on the common theme of maternity. With this theme a new inspiration and a new power seems to have come to Mrs. Shorter. Yet, even in treating of childhood, the vein of pessimism remains persistent in her. All these child-poems are sad to the core. But they have a sincere and penetrating poignancy—they are unmistakable poetry. The unconsciousness of the child, contrasted with the sorrow of its earthly lot—this is a familiar theme, yet Mrs. Shorter handles it with unfamiliar freshness and power. And she adds thereto a new theme—the irresponsiveness of the child contrasted with the mother's jealous yearning for affection. That is the theme of the opening poem; it is new and true, and it impresses. Altogether, this volume extends our idea of Mrs. Shorter's power.

FRANCIS THOMPSON.

SONGS OF THE VINE. Selected and edited by William G. Hutchison. (Bullen. 3s. 6d. net.)

WE are not so sure as Mr. Hutchison declares himself to be that no apology need be made for a collection of drinking songs—without music. As he himself puts it, "assuredly the drinking song must have a chorus," so wherein lies the worth of an anthology of songs of the vine and the hop unaccompanied by music? But in fairness it must be granted that this objection applies equally to any collection of songs, save that perhaps a love lyric carries its melody with it, whereas however singable a drinking song may be it is but dry bones when unsung.

The editor has provided a very pretty introduction to his book, wherein he discusses sagely and seriously such solemn subjects as fish dinners, the inspiration of wine, taverns, sack, beer, and many another matter of import. Of his pleasant gossip we may give an example: "Rabbinical legend tells us that—

When Noah first planted the Vine
The Devil contrived to be there, as he usually does contrive to be present on historical occasions; and when the patriarch poured the blood of a white lamb without spot on the delicate root, Satan followed by drenching the young plant with that of a lion, an ape, and a hog; the natural result being that, while moderation in the cup promotes only the innocent gaiety of the lamb, deeper draughts bring the lion, ape, and hog to light." Which explains many things.

The selection of songs is, on the whole, admirable, but as the selector admits there is no pleasing everybody, and while there is little if anything we would wish away, there are some we would desire to have had included. It is a grotesque company here gathered together at the Sign of the Vine, most expected, some unlooked for—Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, Herrick, Henry Vaughan, Cowley, Alexander Brome, Samuel Johnson, Burns, Blake, Thackeray, Browning, Henley, who all sing in their own particular way—

Toss the pot, toss the pot, let us be merry,
And drink till our cheeks be as red as a cherry.

HECTOR BERLIOZ ET LA SOCIÉTÉ DE SON TEMPS. Par Julien Tiersot. (Hachette et Cie.)

NOTWITHSTANDING the flood of reminiscences, biographical and otherwise, which has been published lately in the three principal languages of Europe on the occasion of the centenary of Hector Berlioz, there is a sure welcome for this authoritative work of M. Julien Tiersot. The materials from which the author has drawn his picture of the musician and the folk of his time are thoroughly well known, and accessible to all. We have the two volumes of Memoirs, the Correspondance Inédite, the Lettres Intimes, the Soirées de l'orchestre, à Travers Chants, and les Grotesques de la Musique. On the title page of the copy of this last work, now before me, is this inscription: "À mon ami . . . souvenir affectueux H. Berlioz." It is written in pencil, in the clear plain script of the master. M. Tiersot has done his work thoroughly well. He draws the portrait of Berlioz the man, the musician, the lover, the husband, the journalist, and the grumbler—above all the grumbler. For it was in the man's most intimate nature to imagine himself always misunderstood, unappreciated. And to a certain extent this is true, for his posthumous popularity is doubtless due to the desire, after the Franco-Prussian War, of the French nation, to show the world that they too had a national composer who was comparable with the incomparable Richard Wagner. Be that as it may, we have in this book a clear conception of the various forces that moulded the man. Even the date of his birth was ominous. "Sunday the nineteenth day of the month of Frimaire, in the year 12 of the French Republic, at five o'clock in the afternoon," he was born to the citizen Louis Joseph Berlioz, officer of health, and Marie Antoinette Joséphine Marmion, his wife. His early struggles and disappointments, his marriage with the Irish actress Henrietta Smithson, his passion for Shakespeare, his living on a journalistic pittance, his travels abroad (he only made money out of France), and his thorough and whole-souled hatred of Paris, are all set forth. Berlioz's dislike to Paris was no mere affectation. He dedicated his "Grotesques de la Musique" to "mes bons amis les artistes des chœurs de l'opéra de Paris, ville barbare." And yet, on the whole, he was well treated, and had a host of friends, the bare recital of whose names indicates their influence; they included Victor Hugo, Alexandre Dumas, Alfred de Vigny, Heine, Delacroix, Meyerbeer, Rossini, Balzac, Liszt, Georges Sand, Jules Janin, Chopin, Théophile Gautier, Flaubert, Mendelssohn, Paganini, Gounod, Wagner. Of Balzac, Berlioz wrote "Paris is to me a cemetery, every paving stone is a grave stone. I find everywhere reminiscences of friends or enemies. I met Balzac there for the last time." Georges Sand wrote of Berlioz: "He is an artist; very good, very poor, and very proud." Heine said of his music: "Berlioz is a colossal nightingale, a lark as big as an eagle, such as may have existed in a primitive world." Some of the sidelights are interesting. In 1840, at the inauguration of the column of July, Berlioz wrote his Funeral and Triumphal Symphony for the band of the National Guard, and conducted it himself with a sword instead of a baton. In 1851, he was one of the musical jurors at the Great Exhibition in Hyde Park. He was in London again in 1855, Wagner was also in town, and Berlioz writes of him: "Wagner is overpowered by the attacks of the whole of the English press. But he remains calm, being assured that he is bound to be the Master of the musical world in fifty years!" A true prophet in very sooth! This new book is a necessary adjunct to the library of every lover of the great musician.

Fiction

THE VINTAGE OF DREAMS. By St. John Lucas. (Mathews. 3s. 6d. net.) Dreams may be fantastic, realistic, or merely pretty, and some of each kind are contained in this volume. The six stories which are gathered together under the title of "The Vintage of Dreams" are undoubtedly clever, if a little difficult to classify. Some are charming fairy tales with an undercurrent of real life, but still fairy tales. "Peter's Pilgrimage" is one of the prettiest stories in the volume. Peter journeys in search of the rainbow, for the Doctor tells a fellow-playmate that Peter would be able to run about again like the other children when he found the place where it grew. So Peter sets off for the valley in the White Mountains, and having hopelessly lost his way, meets a young man. "I have lost my way, I think," says Peter apologetically. "It serves you right for having one," said the young man. "Now observe me. All through my life I have wandered where chance led. No map has defiled my pocket. No horologe has ever therein ticked horrid reminder of that absurd barbarism—time. . . . Eliminate time and money and you have the golden age. Eliminate modern humanity and you have nature. Oh!" he cried, "for printed books and tobacco thank civilisation; for everything else, detest it." The rest of the story tells of the happiness he found when he arrived in the valley. There are many good things in the book. The writing is bright and full of humorous touches. Every story is quite distinct and unlike the other five. An odd book but a clever one.

CHILDREN OF THE TENEMENTS. By Jacob A. Riis. (Macmillan. 6s.) Here we have no record of every-day life in the tenements of New York, no illuminating document of the inside lives of the dwellers in the slums, but merely a handful of sketches, slight and by their very nature somewhat unsatisfactory. In the preface the author says that "the stories" came under his notice in the course of half a century's work as police reporter. Such a man should be able to write a very interesting book of his experience in the tenements. But "Children of the Tenements" is not what it might have been, partly because the form of the book is unsuitable to the matter. The author gives us some forty or so "stories," most of which are mere incidents. We should not call a police court notice in the daily paper a "story," and Mr. Riis' sketches are little more than that. He shows us the dwellers in the tenements as seen through the eyes of the police court. The effect is fragmentary and lacking in purpose. A large proportion of the sketches are of a Christmassy nature, although one hardly expects to find a belief in Santa Claus and Christmas trees among those who lead the hand-to-mouth struggle for existence in the tenements. But it seems it is so. The youngsters of the West Side Boys' Lodging House find to their amazement that the little waif, nicknamed "the kid," has with touching faith hung up his stocking on Christmas Eve. "Santa Claus had never been anything to them but a fake to make the coloured supplements sell." They determine that the kid's faith shall be justified, and putting together all their savings buy such a heap of toys that, as one of the boys says with assumed innocence, "If Santy Claus ain't been here an' forgot his hull kit, I'm blamed."

REMEMBRANCE. By Mrs. Lovett Cameron. (Long. 6s.) "Remembrance" is a pleasant, refined novel, such as one expects from the pen of Mrs. Lovett Cameron. There is no particular originality or brilliance in her choice of a plot or her style of writing, but then there are no unpleasant details or morbidity of sentiment. The book is very like the heroine, Dora Donne—bright, fresh and easily understandable. Dora, at nineteen, is an unwelcome intruder in her mother's ménage, herself a heartless, smart Society woman. She is despatched with all speed to a lonely country house, where she falls in love with a young man who at that time does not appear very eligible. Naturally things do not run smoothly, or there would be no story to tell. Dora's lover goes to the Colonies to make his fortune, and Dora is urged to accept the hand of a more suitable lover. After a while, however, everything straightens itself, and the poor lover returns from the Colonies "one of the best matches of the year." Several of the characters in "Remembrance" are carefully and brightly delineated, particularly Dora's mother, who is jealous of her own child. The lover, Jerry Essenden, the son of a country shopkeeper is, perhaps, a little vague and unreal. If he were the son of such parents as the writer describes it is hardly probable that aristocratic Dora Donne, whose heart sinks because he appears at dinner in his ordinary Sunday best, would fall so deeply in love with him. But Mrs. Lovett Cameron says it was so, and we accept it.

DENISE DE MONTMIDI. Von Georg Freiherr von Ompteda. (5m.) DIE SEHNSÜCHTIGEN. Von Gertrud Franke-Schievelbein. (5m.) DER GÖTTLICHE. Von Hermann Dahl. (Berlin: Fleischel. 6m.) Although there is perhaps nothing very striking about this group of novels, each is furnished with a main idea of some interest, and as the scenes of the first and last are laid, not in Germany, but in France and Denmark respectively, they go to prove that the German novelist is becoming less local, a pleasing fact in the eyes of those who abstain from German fiction because it is too parochial. Ompteda in "Denise de Montmidi" tells the story of an unhappy marriage and the consequent degradation of both husband and wife. The characters are all French and of a decadent type. Denise's husband gambles away her dowry at Monte Carlo on the wedding tour, and the pair are forced to live in the country on a small neglected estate owned by the husband. As a study of characterless, irresponsible, entirely selfish human beings, it is extremely clever, and unhappily very true to life. Denise had in her the making of better things, but she was not strong enough to overcome the circumstances in which she found herself placed. "Die Sehnsüchtigen" treats of the longings and struggles of men and women after a more perfect way of life. The heroine, Countess Faustine, goes in search of happiness and on her way meets with many persons who think that they have found it. The physician's idea of it is that all people should be healthy, content and sober; the artist's is that the beautiful appearance of things brings to his soul forgetfulness of the realities of things; the materialist looks on man as "condemned to life," and seeks to alleviate as far as he can the hard lot of his fellows and desires to be freed from life, to sink into nothing. In the end Faustine finds her salvation in a belief in Christianity, and marries an enthusiastic Protestant pastor. "Der Göttliche" is a far more important achievement. It is a powerful piece of work, evidently the outcome of deep thought, and of profound knowledge of the religious struggles of the day. It deals, too, with the old, yet ever new, problem, the struggle of the flesh and the spirit. The hero, a Danish evangelical clergyman, working in Copenhagen, strives to return to the earlier forms of Christianity based on Socialism, and to bring about a political alliance between the Church and the Social Democrats. He only succeeds in alienating both parties, and so founds a new one, and becomes the apostle of a new religion. But he is neither a fanatic, an ascetic, nor a saint, and is not strong enough to overcome his evil passions and impulses. He founders, dying by his own hand, yet it seems the fruits of his work will not be wholly lost. It is a moving story, well told with fitting seriousness, and must appeal to all who have sympathy with living humanity and its efforts towards better things.

LOVE THE FIDDLER. By Lloyd Osbourne. (Heinemann. 6s.) Lloyd Osbourne may be remembered as the author of a volume of short stories, "The Queen versus Billy," favourably reviewed in these columns not so very long ago. And the present volume has the same dash and originality, the same American accent which one then learnt to associate with his work. He has worked in the school of Stevenson and with Stevenson, and he imparts to his characters a humanity rather uncommon in short stories, for the writing of short stories does not come natural this side of the channel; and the productions usually so classified flavour of the cheaper magazines. "Love the Fiddler" is a generic title covering sixteen stories—love stories, of course, where every Jack has his Jill. American Jills, for choice, with the charming sangfroid and forty-guinea gown recklessness born of Dana Gibson's art. There is not much to choose between the several refrains: the "fiddling" and the "love" business reach a high standard. On every page, the reader makes acquaintance with brilliant talkers, and will learn that it is possible to be amusing even when in love. Heroes and heroines, or Jacks and Jills, speak in epigrams which deserve the immortality of the gramophone at least. "It's awfully exciting, seeing you again," she went on, "you came within an ace of being my husband. I might have belonged to you and counted your washing. It's queer, isn't it?" "Finches first" is a trifle hard on British susceptibilities, but the end is sweetly idyllic. The author has a distinct penchant for the unobtrusive heroism of good-looking engineers and those who served on the Dixie, a historic ship in the Spanish American War. The volume is full of good things.

THE TRACKLESS WAY. By E. Rentoul Esler. (Brimley Johnson. 6s.) We think that Ruskin would not have been displeased to see the imprint of George Allen on the title page of this book, which has, we believe, the distinction of being the most notable novel as yet issued by Mr. Brimley Johnson. It is the story of the release of an Ulster Presbyterian from the thraldom of sect. He is a minister, and has to endure arraignment and expulsion as the price of his declaration of independence. The proceedings of Presbytery, Synod, and General Assembly, which follow a charge of heresy, are dramatically described, and the drawing of McGregor, an unctuous but kindhearted Presbyterian minister who lamely defends the hero, is a little masterpiece. Less successful is the portrait of the hero's wife, whose inconsiderate truancy extinguishes his love for her and scandalises his flock. She has a spirituality which does not chime with the conduct ascribed to her, and the episode of a MS which she produces under her husband's name, though it is really by his friend, is unconvincing. But a slight odour of the manufactory does not alter the fact that "The Trackless Way" is a novel worth reading and re-reading. It is not necessary to agree with it in detail to recognise the acuteness and justice of its criticism of Christianity as represented by an unlovely and illiberal formalism. Its sagacity, which allows the usefulness of tact even in a process of self-liberation, is worth the more as the author imagines for her impetuous heretic an experience which only falls short of a theophany. In another edition, by the way, Mrs. Esler should make up her mind as to the period of the story. At present it veers oddly from Edwardian to Victorian.

SIX-BOOTS. By John Strange Winter. (Long. 6s.) Here we have a collection of short stories, although no such indication is given on the cover or title-page. There is little to say about it, except that it is in the authoress' usual style. Most of the stories are laid in the cathedral city of Exeter, where we meet the usual self-satisfied pompous Bishop, the frisky Sulaltern, and the amiable, nice-looking Captain, all according to John Strange Winter.

HOW HARTMAN WON. By Eric Bohn. (Marshall. 3s. 6d.) The scenes in this book are laid in Old Ontario, and the principal characters are engaged in the lumbering trade. The Thorntons keep a large store in the little village of Linbrook, from which they are early in the book ousted by an embezzling clerk, whose knavery is not for some time suspected. Such chapter headings as "The Sugar Carnival," "Quilling Bee, No. 2," "A Night Drive into a Snowdrift" and "The Grasshopper Storm," indicate the nature of the story.

L'APPRENTISSAGE DE VALÉRIE. Par J. M. Mermin. (Genève: Ch. Eggimann et Cie. Paris: Paul Paclot et Cie.) The most unpretentious of little tales. Valérie's mamma is ordered to the Vosges for a couple of months for her health, and Valérie, a not quite grown-up girl, has to do the housekeeping for her father and schoolboy brother. As she has only been taught to play the piano, to paint, and to embroider, she naturally makes a terrible mess of it. Incidentally, a charming insight into the quaint simplicity of French bourgeois life and the excellent economies of the ménage.

Short Notices

Poetry

THE POEMS OF CHARLES WOLFE. With Introductory Memoir by C. Litton Falkiner. (Bullen. 3s. 6d. net.) POEMS BY CHARLES COTTON. Chosen and Edited by J. R. Tutin. (Published by the Editor, Cottingham, near Hull. 2s. net.) And others. This couple of reprints we may group together. The first slender volume contains the remaining poems of the Irish clergyman who wrote "The Burial of Sir John Moore." They do not call for many words. It is one of those curious, but far from infrequent cases, where a man, apparently without poetic genius, suddenly, in the stress of a single and unrecurrent emotion, flames into one immortal song; and for the rest of his life smoulders on after his former dull fashion. He never repeats the triumph; and the wonder comes, not that he never repeats it, but that he ever achieved it. The other verses here reprinted are exceeding few; but, few as they are, they are all superfluous. The longer set poems are of the semi-rhetoric cast, in which the newer romantic mood struggles dully with the Pope tradition; the lyrics have the sentimentally romantic tinge of the Byron-Moore era. All are purely of their day, and all are feebly of their day. They did not merit reprint. The "Sir John Moore" is absolutely apart and unique: it looks merely miraculous beside the rest of the stuff. It is otherwise with the selection from Cotton. We cannot agree with Mr. Tutin's admiration of him. He had the advantage of being born in a rich age, when poetry was abroad and infected even those meaner wits, who would have showed poorly enough in a poorer day. But he has, it seems to us, small native gift. The angling poems are fresh and sincere, they catch many of the charming turns of expression peculiar to the verse of Cotton's century. But they lack, after all, the central substance and force of poetry. The amatory verse, in which he is more guided by model, again pleases by recalling the common dexterity of the seventeenth century; it is ingenious and has a measure of fancy; but the inward beauty, the inexpressible something which makes the verse of the Cavalier lyrists authentic poetry—that fascination is lacking. The poems read hard by comparison. Nor have they the perfect deftness of execution which does not fail in his fellows. We are glad to have the book; but we cannot rank it high as poetry. Of the four or five books of verse before us we may say the same thing; and it might be said of most such books nowadays before one opens them. It would seldom prove false. They are derivative. They echo a prevalent fashion, or fashions, in verse. Robert Loveman's "Gates of Silence" (Knickerbocker Press, New York) is excellently finished in metre and diction, it is adorned with a fanciful and coloured imagery. All it wants is originality. The imagery is not original, the style is not original. Dr. C. W. Stubbs' "Castles in the Air" (J. M. Dent, 3s. 6d. net) has pleasant little lyrics, carols and so forth in the approved imitation-mediaeval style and grace generally. It has not innate power. Lady Lindsay's "From a Venetian Balcony" (Kegan Paul, 2s. 6d. net) contains the most various poems, all with that external accomplishment and that poetic feeling we have learned to associate with Lady Lindsay; while the volume is enhanced in value by pen-sketches from Miss Clara Montalba. It has not strength of inspiration; nor any poem having the charm which occasional poems of this lady's have had. Mr. R. C. Ensor's "Modern Poems" (R. Brimley Johnson, 2s. 6d. net) are different. They possess a good deal of sincerity in the enforcement of democratic ideals; but, unlike the others, they fail by a too rough and uncultivated expression. Mr. H. H. Chamberlin's "Age of Ivory" (R. G. Badger, Boston, U.S.A.) stands by itself. It is devoted to the lives and loves of elephants, and seeks humour by contrast between the subject-matter and the most elaborate—even exaggeratedly elaborate—poetic style of treatment and diction. The jest, to our mind, is rather thin. But with these two exceptions, all these books have every element of poetry save that personal, vital, and unique force which is poetry itself. And though the authors and the subjects are so varied, one rises from them with a tired impression of sameness.

THE SEVEN GOLDEN ODES OF PAGAN ARABIA, KNOWN ALSO AS THE MOALLAKAT. Translated from the Arabic by Lady Anne Blunt. Done into English Verse by Wilfrid Scawen Blunt. (The Chiswick Press. 5s. net.) We owe thanks to Mr. Blunt and Lady Anne Blunt for giving us these odes. They are, as he explains, remains of the primitive Arabic verse which the Moslems call the "Poetry of the Ignorance"—meaning thereby that it was before the regenerating light of Islamism. Bards somewhat like the noble trouvères of the middle ages, they roamed abroad on their camels—the war-horse of the desert—fighting, raiding, seeking adventure; and as their fame grew were gladly welcomed in the tents of sheikhs and the courts of princes, where they sang their songs of love and enterprise. The lives of many of them were as reckless and licentious as those of the old trouvères to whom we have likened them. For Mr Blunt tells us, and to any reader of these poems it needs no telling, that the Arabs of the Ignorance, like their descendants of the present day, were "rank materialists," believing in nothing but a shadowy theism, and fearless of aught here or hereafter. They were fighters and pleasure-seekers pure and simple. They were children of the Night; sleeping all day, and roaming or drinking and singing round their camp-fires under the stars. These poems of theirs are unlike that cultivated Eastern poetry we know. They are free, wild songs of love and adventure, with a primitive strength and spaciousness about them. Mr. Blunt truly says that they remind us of the Biblical lyrics without the piety. Not once or twice only will the reader think of the Song of Solomon. In the imagery, especially, one perceives this parallel. Very beautiful, often singularly original, and sometimes strange to the Western mind, is this imagery; and beautiful is the poetry as a whole. Mr. Blunt has rendered it into verse with power, and the trained touch of a poet. But the unusual rhymeless lyric metre which he uses is often rather harsh and heavy in the handling. This, however, is the only fault we have to find with an exceedingly interesting translation.

A VERSATILE PROFESSOR. Edited by G. Cecil White. (Brimley Johnson. 5s. net.) The versatile professor was the Reverend Edward Nares, who at Oxford lectured on modern history early in last century. Mr. White, in the preface, says that "the title prefixed to these reminiscences does not more indicate the person with whom they are mainly concerned, than a characteristic of the work itself." What that means is not clear. Nor does one, having read the volume, find any sanction for the assertion that, "turning now and again from grave to gay, it treats of the social as well as the scholastic life in which its subject moved." To speak plainly, it does nothing of the kind. Mr. Nares was the author of a novel called "Thinks I to Myself," which had a popular success. Judged by the excerpts now presented, it was a work informed by good feeling and no genius: platitudinarian. Mr. Nares's lectures do not seem to have been important: one gathers, indeed, that only a very few men attended them. His warrant included the teaching of Political Economy, of which he was wholly ignorant until, on going to Oxford, he read books on the subject. Why was this volume published? An answer is suggested by the fact, mentioned on the title-page, that Mr. White was "sometime domestic chaplain to John Winston, seventh Duke of Marlborough, K.G." Mr. Nares was a son-in-law of a Duke of Marlborough: perhaps a biography of him was desirable in order to keep complete the family records at Blenheim. As far as it goes, that was a sufficient consideration; but it does not go far enough. It justifies the production of a volume for private circulation; but it does not justify submitting the volume as a serious contribution to public literature. In a biography offered for review one naturally expects to find something entertaining, or suggestive, or important: and so one patiently reads on, until the very last page: only, in this case, to find after hours of attention, that Mr. Nares was a person of not the slightest historical importance, and to feel that Mr. White's elaborate account of the boy Nares's shyness, interest in heraldry, and so forth, was nothing less than a taking advantage of the respect which one pays to any book published with an honourable imprint. It is not pleasant to write in this strain; but to write in any strain more agreeable to those responsible for the issue of "A Versatile Professor" would be almost a breach of trust. It would, in as far as it encouraged our readers to buy works like this, result in their looking askant at biographical works as a whole.

THE BOOK OF HERBS. By Lady Rosalind Northcote. (John Lane. 2s. 6d. net) To the right-thinking gardener, be his acreage small or large, a herb-garden is as necessary, as poetical, and as practical an adjunct as his sundial or his onion beds. And yet such is the callousness of the average gardener that he ignores, not wilfully perhaps, but through sheer forgetfulness, the manifold legend, romance and poetry connected with herb-culture. To such, no less than to those who are alive to its charm, this book of Lady Rosalind Northcote will come as a veritable godsend. The mass of ancient lore anent herbs, their cultivation, their properties, and their classification is immense, but with rare discrimination the authoress has made up a book full of sweet suggestion, quaint quotation, and useful advice. It could assuredly not be better done. We are re-introduced to such old-world authorities as Culpepper, John Evelyn, Tusser, Gerarde, and Turner, and the fragrance of their sage counsel renders every page of the little book redolent of the sweet service which herbs have done, and may yet do, to mankind. They used to be of the very essence of true gardening, and played a most important part, not only as a flavouring to practically every dish, but also in the toilet, and in the family medicine-cupboard. Although their purely medical purposes may to a certain extent be disregarded nowadays, yet the use of pure garden herbs as toilet accessories cannot be too much encouraged: there is a clean and healthy simplicity about them, unapproached by any decoction of the laboratory. In how many country houses does the cult of the still-room survive? This book serves a practical as well as a sentimental purpose, and no garden lover can afford to be without it. There are some delightful photographs of growing herbs, and an excellent and useful index.

FATIGUE. By A. Mosso. Translated by Margaret and W. B. Drummond. (Swan Sonnenschein. 4s. 6d.) Professor Mosso, the distinguished physiologist of the University of Turin, is to be congratulated on finding, in the Scottish capital, two excellent translators of this most important and valuable little book. The new psychology—based upon physiology—is making rapid strides everywhere. It is indeed difficult to remember that it owes its birth to the comparatively recent work of Spencer, whose conception of the evolution of reflex action into the complex phenomena of volition is its logical starting-point. English readers are already acquainted with Professor Mosso's work on Fear, but on the subject of the present volume he is the acknowledged master. To any who have come to regard education as a science, and a science to be applied to us all every day—for the "perfectly educated" person never was, or will be—several chapters in this book are of the first importance. Perhaps most interesting of all are the chapters on attention and intellectual fatigue. In these days of an intellectual pressure without any parallel in the past, their subject matter is second to none in the need of being treated in scientific fashion. This Professor Mosso has done, and Dr. Drummond has preserved for us all the lucidity of the original, whilst retaining sufficient "style" to avoid offending the literary sense.

SOME LESSONS OF THE BOER WAR. By Colonel T. D. Pilcher, C.B. (Isbister. 2s. 6d.) Colonel Pilcher was one of the most indefatigable and generally successful leaders of mounted men in the long man-hunt that occupied the latter half of the Boer War. Anything he has to say comes with the weight of experience and of the experience of one who never came to grief seriously, and deserved more success than he won. There is nothing very new in the precepts of Colonel Pilcher as to warfare generally. The provision of a plan for each likely set of circumstances, and the readiness to shift to a more promising plan at once, has been the essential of a good general in all ages. Napoleon's decline and fall was not due so much to any loss of vigour or skill, but chiefly to the arrogant temper that assumed that matters would fall out as the Emperor desired or anticipated. The rule "always keep a reserve" was the foundation of the tactics by which the Romans conquered the world. Colonel Pilcher acknowledges this, but states, as is only too true, that the fundamental doctrines of military science need to be reasserted even now. Like nearly all good generals, Colonel Pilcher pronounces for attacking. Very interesting is his method of "galloping" the Boer positions. Here is a "wrinkle" that might well be remembered by our officers in fighting any enemy, and that would not, perhaps, occur to a man without experience of actual war: "It must always be borne in mind that an enemy expecting to be attacked from his front, and behind cover constructed for that purpose, can shoot more effectively to his left than to his right, for in order to shoot to his right he will usually have to expose a great deal more of his body, unless, indeed, he shoots from his left shoulder." Might not marksmen be taught to shoot from either shoulder? Equally practical is the advice on posting pickets, on mounting the captains of companies, and on training soldiers to shoot. Some of our philanthropists will shrink at Colonel Pilcher's unhesitating decision that a man who sleeps on sentry should be shot. But really, a man who commits this offence, which is almost the most dangerous to his own army, short of actual treachery, that can be imagined, has incurred little or no moral guilt, and does not deserve any degrading punishment. He is to be shot, Colonel Pilcher declares, to encourage others to stay awake; and nothing less than the dread of death will sometimes help a tired man to keep his eyes open. The other practical bits of advice in the little book are as sensible, couched in a plain homely style that makes no pretence to literary effort, but fulfils its purpose of conveying a clear meaning in clear words. No practical soldier ought to be without Colonel Pilcher's work. If it does not give him the directions applicable for any particular case, it will set him thinking on the right lines.

OSSIAN'S LEBENSACHAUNG. Von Dr. H. Jellinghaus. (Tübingen and Leipzig: Mohr. 1m. 50.) No one has seriously questioned the conclusions regarding Macpherson's "Ossian," arrived at by the Committee of the Highland Society of Scotland in 1797. Dr. Jellinghaus lightly dismisses the controversy, and attributes to the Ossianic poems the greatest influence on English poetry, and especially on the poets Goldsmith, Byron, Burns, and Scott. The influence on Byron is certainly well established, but we cannot altogether take the view of the German critic with regard to the other names. This is not, however, the place to discuss the matter. In Germany, Klopstock, Herder, and Goethe—it will be remembered that Ossian drove Homer from Werther's heart—were to some extent influenced by Ossian's outlook on life and on external nature. French authors, too—Chateaubriand especially—owe something to Ossian. Dr. Jellinghaus endeavours, and with some measure of success, to demonstrate by means of ample quotation in a German translation, what was Ossian's outlook on such things as religion, morals, evil, external nature, and love. He concludes with brief reflections on Ossian's melancholy—"the ecstasy of melancholy," as Goethe called it—and on his personality. The criticism taken as a whole is not very illuminating, and better may easily be found in many English essays on the subject. Dr. Jellinghaus scarcely recognises that Macpherson's work was more the outcome of the time than of the man. A liking for the less familiar aspects of external nature, for wilder scenery than is offered by trim gardens and daisied fields is to be found in poets writing before 1762. The verse of Parnell (d. 1718) and Anne Finch, Countess of Winchelsea (d. 1720), testifies to a love of country life, of moonlight nights and shady woods, while the Welsh poet, Dyer (d. 1758), had an eye for fine landscape in its wilder aspects. He rejoiced in the wide prospects to be seen from "windy summits" and found beauty in "naked rocks."

A GRAMMAR OF THE DIALECT OF ADLINGTON (LANCASHIRE). By Alexander Hargreaves. (Anglistische Forschungen. Herausgegeben von Dr. Johannes Hoops. Heft. 13. Heidelberg: Winter. 3 m.) We have here an attempt to construct a dialect grammar on a sound scientific plan, the general scheme being modelled on Professor Wright's "Grammar of the Windhill Dialect." Adlington is a mining and manufacturing village of about 5,000 inhabitants in the hundred of Leyland. The dialect is rather mixed, a fact due to the migratory habits of the people, who do not, however, move far away, and the newcomers do not come from any great distance. The book, like most of the others in the series, is entirely technical, and appeals solely to serious students of philology.

ŒUVRES COMPLÈTES DE ALFRED DE VIGNY. POÉSIES. Édition Définitive. (Delagrave.) Some one maliciously said that Alfred de Vigny considered that French literature began with him. Catulle Mendès, the latest critic of nineteenth century French literature, says that it was continued by De Vigny nobly and magnificently. De Vigny certainly claimed "d'avois devancé en France toutes celles de ce genre dans lesquelles une pensée philosophique est mise en scène, sous une forme épique ou dramatique," and he undoubtedly created the taste for philosophical poetry in France. This volume contains all the poems that the author deemed worthy of preservation. He belonged to the young romantic school, and his work is distinguished by absolute sincerity, by proportion and taste. "L'art est la vérité choisie" was his motto. Among the mystical poems we prefer the "Moïse" with its haunting lines, lines that recur, and that echo a profound truth:—

"O Seigneur! j'ai vécu puissant et solitaire, Laissez-moi m'endormir du sommeil de la terre!"

The "Éloa" is, of course, exquisite as a piece of mystic fantasy, but it makes slight appeal, we think, to human feeling. "Dolorida," which introduces the "Livre Moderne," is a highly dramatic poem and less known than it deserves. De Vigny was too vigorous a thinker perhaps to be a great poet. His novel, "Servitude et Grandeur Militaires," and his drama "Chatterton," will secure him an everlasting place among French literary artists. His idealism is best expressed in the phrase "la parfaite illusion est la réalité parfaite." He married an Englishwoman, Lydia Bunbury, and French critics see in his work the influence of English taste. His version of "Othello," prepared for the Comédie Française in 1829, is of great excellence.

MÉLANGES DE LITTÉRATURE ET D'HISTOIRE. Par A. Gazier. (Colin. 4frs.) The seventeenth century attracts the French literary essayist as by a powerful magnet. It is the great age of French letters, many of its problems are still to solve, and modern seekers after truth, engaged in patient research among unpublished documents of the period, may still happen upon material of importance. Hence no student of literature, nor anyone generally, interested in French seventeenth century authors and their lives and works can afford to neglect books like this of M. Gazier. He treats such subjects as Molière and the literary history of "Tartufe," over which French critics are so divided; the supposed love affairs of Pascal; Racine and Port Royal. He in no way aims at criticising those great men anew, he seeks rather to give fresh explanations, and to elucidate hitherto obscure points. For instance, in the Molière essay he brings into clearer light the dramatist's relations with the Prince de Conti, and so helps towards the solution of a problem hitherto deemed insoluble. The most attractive pages of the book to us are those on "The Solitary of the Rocks," the great lady whose identity is not known for certain, and who, in the seventeenth century, elected to lead a hermit's life in the fastnesses of the Pyrenees. Her history is romantic to the last degree, from the moment when through a subterfuge she got rid of her attendants (she was fifteen years of age), changed clothes with a beggar woman in the Champs Élysées, then "une espèce de forêt," and after various adventures, set up her dwelling in a cave of the rocks, until her death which took place about 1700 probably at Trenta in Italy. We should know nothing of the life of this remarkable mystic who seems to have naively confused the seventeenth century with the fourth, and the south of France with the south of Egypt, but for a more or less regular correspondence carried on between her and her "director," the Père Luc de Bray, Curé of Châteaufort, a village about eight miles from Versailles. He carefully preserved her letters as well as notes of his replies. When he lay dying his intimate friends who knew of the correspondence, took the letters and had them copied, restoring the originals to their place in case the dying man should ask for them. Later the original letters were destroyed by fire. The copies, however, had multiplied—Louis XVI's aunts possessed one—and it is from one of them that M. Gazier has been enabled to write this account of a most extraordinary woman. She subsisted chiefly on nuts and roots, never ate more than once a day, and often only two or three times a week; five hours' sleep was the most she allowed herself, and for seven years she never had either fire or light. Yet she scarcely knew what illness meant, and often walked 80 or 90 miles to attend mass or receive absolution. Her intellect was clear, and despite occasional mystical ravings and certain excesses common to all religious enthusiasts, kept in check by the good sense of her "director," the letters are sane and reasonable, and betray a feeling for nature rare at that period. We could easily enlarge on the details of so strange an existence, but space forbids, and for more we must refer our readers to M. Gazier's deeply interesting essay.

New Books Received

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL

- Garnier (Col. J.), The Worship of the Dead, or The Origin and Nature of Pagan Idolatry, 40s. (Chapman and Hall) net 12/6
 Clifford (John), The Secret of Jesus: Sermons (Brown, Langham) 3/6
 Bennett, D.D. (Rev. W. H.), Joshua and the Conquest of Palestine (Dent) net 0/9
 Sayce, D.D. (Professor A. H.), Joseph and the Land of Egypt (Dent) net 0/9
 Drury, B.D. (T. W.), Confession and Absolution: The Teaching of the Church of England, as interpreted and illustrated by the Writings of the Reformers of the Sixteenth Century (Hodder and Stoughton) 6/0
 Carr, M.A. (Arthur), Hebrew Bible: Short Studies in the Old and New Testaments (Hodder and Stoughton) 6/0
 Archibald (George Hamilton), Bible Lessons for Little Beginners (Melrose) 2/6

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES

- Spiers (Kaufmann C.), Guido and Veronica and Other Poems (Nutt) 2/0
 Weston (Jessie L.), translated by Sir Gains at the Grail Castle (Nutt) net 3/0
 The Divine Vision and Other Poems, by A. E. (Macmillan) net 4/6
 Hardy (Thomas), The Dynast, A Drama (Macmillan) net 5/0
 Lowe (David), Burns's Passionate Pilgrimage, or Tait's Indictment of the Poet (Wilson) net 5/0
 Allan, M.P. (Sir William), Songs of Love and Labour (Brown, Langham) 6/0
 Lomax (Montagu), Frontes Jaducae (Glasier) net 3/6
 Moore, D.D. (Edward), Studies in Dante, Third Series: Miscellaneous Essays (Clarendon Press) net 10/6

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY

- Halford (Frederic M.), An Angler's Autobiography (Vinton) net 21/0
 Johnson (Walter) and Wright (William), Neolithic Man in North-East Surrey, with a Chapter on Flint, by B. C. Polkinghorne (Stock) net 6/0
 Acton, J.L.D. (The late Lord) (planned by), The Cambridge Modern History, Vol. II. The Reformation (edited by A. W. Ward, Litt.D., G. W. Prothero, Litt.D., and Stanley Leathes, M.A.) (Cambridge) net 16/0
 Henderson (T. F.), The Life of Robert Burns (Methuen) 3/6

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY

- Harper (Charles G.), The Ingoldsby Country: Literary Landmarks of the "Ingoldsby Legends" (Black) 6/0

EDUCATIONAL

- Trois Récits de Froisart, modernized by Marguerite Ninet, with French Notes by F. B. Kirkman (Black) 0/6
 Lucas, C.B. (C. P.), revised by H. E. Egerton, M.A., Geography of South and East Africa (Oxford) 3/6
 Tennyson (Lord), The Cup, with notes by H. B. Cotterill, M.A. (Macmillan) 2/6
 Barnard, M.A. (S.), and Child, B.A. (J. M.), A New Geometry for Junior Forms (Macmillan) 2/6

ART

- Great Masters, Part VI. (Heinemann) net 5/0
 Sime (John), Sir Joshua Reynolds (Methuen) net 2/6

ART—continued.

- A Little Gallery of Reynolds (Methuen) net 2/6
 Walters (H. B.), Greek Art (Methuen) net 2/6
 Dimier (L.), French Painting in the Sixteenth Century, translated by Harold Child (Duckworth) net 7/6
 Meyer (Alfred Gotthold), translated by P. G. Konody, Monographs on Artists: Donatello (Grevel) net 4/0
 The Artist Engraver: A Quarterly Magazine of Original Work (Macmillan) net 7/6

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY

- U.S. Geological Survey, Monographs XLIV.: Pseudoceratites of the Cretaceous, by Alpheus Hyatt; Monographs XLV.: The Vermillion Iron-Bearing District of Minnesota with an Atlas, by J. Morgan Olements (Government Printing Office, Washington)
 Annual Report of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, for the Year ending June 1902 (Government Printing Office, Washington)
 Contributions to Economic Geology, 1902 (Government Printing Office, Washington)
 Catalogue and Index of the Publications of the United States Geological Survey, 1901 to 1903 (Government Printing Office, Washington)
 Scouler (J.), The Law of Evolution: Its True Philosophical Basis (Richards) net 3/6
 Crandall, M.D. (Floyd M.), How to Keep Well: An Explanation of Modern Methods of Preventing Disease (Richards) 6/0

MISCELLANEOUS

- Sharp, F.R.S., F.Z.S. (David), edited by, The Zoological Record, being Records of Zoological Literature, Vol. 39 (Zoological Society)
 Smith (F. E.), edited by, Toryism: Illustrated by Extracts from Representative Speeches and Writings (Harper) net 3/6
 "Indicus," Labour and Other Questions in South Africa (Unwin) 3/6
 Annual Report of the American Journal of Archaeology, Second Series (Norwood Press, Mass.)
 Elkind, M.D. (Louis), The German Emperor's Speeches (Longmans) net 12/6
 Earle (Alice Morse), Two Centuries of Costume in America, 2 vols. (Macmillan) net 21/0
 Clarke, F.R.S. (C. B.), On Free Trade (Macmillan) 0/6
 The Imperial Guide to India (Simpkin, Marshall) net 6/0
 The Englishwoman's Year-Book (Black) net 2/6
 Mudie's Select Library, Catalogue, 1904 (Mudie's Library) 1/6
 Milton (Francis), edited by, Ships and Shipping: A Handbook of Popular Nautical Information (Moring) net 5/0
 Garnett (Richard) and Gosse (Edmund), English Literature (in four volumes), Vols. II. and IV. (Heinemann) each, net 16/0
 Bérard (Victor) Pro Macedonia (Paris: Colin) 2 fra.
 Matthey (Tobias), The Act of Touch: Pianoforte Tone-Production (Longmans) 7/6
 "Zara," Self-Help for Ye Poor Clergy (Stock) net 2/6
 Willing's Press Guide, 1904 (Willing)

FICTION

- "The Mis-Rule of Three," by Florence Warden (Unwin), 6/0; "Peelah, or The Bewitched Maiden of Nepal," by Ernest Manfred (Sonnensohn), 6/0; "The Three Musketeers," by A. Dumas, newly translated by A. Allinson, with Introduction by Andrew Lang (Methuen), 2/6; "The Iron Hand," by James MacLaren Cobban (Long), 6/0; "Toy-Gods," by Percival Pickering (Long), 6/0; "Delphine," by Curtis Yorke (Long), 6/0; "Over Stony Ways: A Romance of Tennyson-Land," by Emily M. Bryant (Jarrold), 6/0; "Rose Stewart's Love Story: A Romance of Culloden," by Catherine Mackay (Mackay), 2/6; "John Blankett's Business," by Joseph Clayton (Brown, Langham), 6/0; "The French Master," by Alfred Wilson Barrett (Ward, Lock), 0/6; "The Sword of Damocles," by A. K. Green (Ward, Lock), 0/6; "Through Sorrow's Gates," by Halliwell Sutcliffe (Unwin), 6/0; "A Heart's Triumph," by E. A. Rowlands (Henderson), 0/3; "Tracked by Fate," by Maurice Scott (Henderson), 0/3.

JUVENILE

- "The Swiss Family Robinson," in Words of One Syllable (Cassell), 0/6.

NEW EDITIONS

- "The National Sports of Great Britain," by Henry Alken (Methuen), net 4/6; "Twenty Years After," by A. Dumas (Methuen), 1/0; "The Castle of Eppstein, Crop Earel Jacquot, and Other Stories," "The Snowball and Sultanetta," and "Cécile," by A. Dumas (Methuen), each 0/6; "The Analysis of the Hunting Field" (Methuen), net 3/6; "Memoirs of Mlle. des Echerolles, being Side-Lights on the Reign of Terror," translated by Marie Clothilde Balfour (Lane), net 5/0; "The Letters of a Portuguese Nun" (Marianne Alcoforado), translated by Edgar Prestage (Nutt), net 2/6; "A Treasury of Translations" (Verse), by A. E. A. Axon (Albert Brounibent), 0/3; "An Emerson Treasury" (Brounibent), 0/3; "A Treasury of Devotional Poems," by W. G. Kingsland (Brounibent), 0/3; "The Story of Creation," by Edward Codd (Watts), 0/6; "Science and Speculation," by G. H. Lewes (Watts), 0/6; "Was Jesus a Carpenter," by Ernest Crosby (Mas n Press); "The Imitation of Christ," by Thomas a Kempis (Richards), net 1/0; "Plays of Molière," in French, with a new translation by A. H. Waller (Richards), net 3/6; "History of Civilization in England," by H. T. Buckle (Richards), net 1/0; "King's Letters: from the Days of Alfred to the Accession of the Tudors," newly edited by Robert Steele (Moring), net 2/6; "As You Like It," and "Love's Labour's Lost," (Little Quarto Shakespeare, Methuen), each net 1/0; "In Relief of Doubt," by R. E. Welsh, M.A. (Allenson), 0/6; "A Popular History of the Ancient Britons, or the Welsh People, from the Earliest Times to the end of the Nineteenth Century," by Rev. John Evans, B.A. (Stock), 5/0.

PERIODICALS

- "Scribner's Magazine," "Casell's Magazine," "American Journal of Archaeology," "The Reader," "The Lamp," "The Independent," "The British Realm," "The Bookman," "Critic," "Baconiana," "Forum," "Indian Magazine," "The Artisan," "Quarterly Review."

Foreign

ART

- Dezsinis Anciens (Muller et Cie, Amsterdam)

Personalities : J. A. Nau

THE Academy de Goncourt has given its first prize of £200, and a little wave of excitement has rippled over the literary world. The awards of the older Academy are no longer arousing to any but the recipients. The possibility of surprise has been too completely eliminated. Eminently proper, the Home of the Immortals is also just a little dull in its propriety. But the New Academy holds the potentialities of the young and the unknown. In consequence, its first decision could only bring with it instant celebrity—were it nothing else but the celebrity of curiosity.

To explain the De Goncourt Academy is unnecessary. At its founding it was amply described and commented upon. We quote only one admirable sentence out of Edmond de Goncourt's dispositions concerning it:—

My supreme desire is that the prize should be given to freshness and originality of talent, to courageous endeavours after newness of thought or construction. Other things being equal I wish also that preference should always be given to a work of fiction.

In this simple phrase De Goncourt set the aim of his Academy. But the qualifications implied are rare, and among critics generally it was thought that if rigidly adhered to the dispensing of the yearly prize would lapse into the solitary event of a lifetime. But the first prize has been given, and in Paris the book "Force Ennemie" and the author, Monsieur John Antoine Nau, are the topics of the moment.

Both were unknown yesterday. Nevertheless from the beginning this new celebrity has known a career full of surprises, strangenesses, and constant upheavals from routine. Originally a sailor, he was also a poet, but after many vicissitudes and failures he accepted a post as gardener in Andalusia. From there he sent from time to time poems to various French magazines. Some were published but none attracted any general attention. Then came the novel "Force Ennemie," and one of the De Goncourt Academy reading it was vividly impressed with its possession, not only of talent, but of talent rich in personal and direct observation. At the next dinner it was proposed for candidature. The result we know; it remains to mention briefly the main outlines of the book itself.

"Force Ennemie" is above all original and sincere. Its appeal is wide, and, in spite of a subtle and fine psychology, simple and permanent. It treats of one of the common tragedies of life—a tragedy that at any moment may intrude into the placid domesticity of existence—the tragedy of madness. In the immense flood of French amorous novels it is a great stride taken away from the well-worn roads of fiction. But its originality goes deeper than in merely choosing insanity as the central theme of a long novel. Insanity as a subject has been treated before in French literature, and treated, besides, with incomparable power and pathos. Monsieur Nau's book is the study of a condition that civilisation forces perpetually nearer to the whole population, that of partial insanity, when the victim is neither wholly sane nor wholly a prey to dementia. Ostensibly the story is written by the lunatic himself, in the asylum where he has been placed by a cousin. The "Force Ennemie" is the unfortunate man's own conception of an inimical being escaped from some awful world to take possession of his body as a dwelling place. He is himself sane, lucid, until this pitiable creature suddenly obtains mastery, and pours out incoherent bitterness and rage.

It is horrible and morbid, but madness is too close about us for the subject to be either indifferent or unworthy. Again, the book is full of faults. Immaturity invades it everywhere. Redundancy and bad taste struggle to spoil it as a finished performance. There are scenes whose publication even the French critics have deeply regretted. Much of it is repulsive. Nevertheless, the fact remains that the writer shows power and a grip of the more difficult elements of human psychology, as well as a marked personality of manner.

The De Goncourt Academy has not needed, in this its first authoritative action, to make concessions to necessity. Its next award will in consequence be awaited with an even sharper curiosity.

M. BERESFORD RILEY.

Egomet

AN unknown friend in the North sent me at Christmas the pretty present of a paper-knife, pretty in itself and pretty also in the kindly good-will that inspired the gift. It is a home-made paper-knife, certainly a case of home-made's best. I possess many paper-knives, though no collector, just as I own many pipes, but I only use one habitually, and now use only my pretty present. Paper-knives vary in appearance, ability and character, as do men and women. Some are merely ornamental, uncomfortable to the hand and destructive to books. My new favourite is of wood; a long, slim, well-bred, book-respecting article, which would never roughly rend a page or hurt the hand that caresses it.

True book-lovers delight to sit down to the cutting of a volume, though the pleasure does not always arise from the same cause. Some of us cut straight through from cover to cover, then read from first page, sometimes to the last; others of us—we book-lovers are brethren, though we differ as brothers ever have done—taste almost every page as it opens. For myself I am betwixt and between, cutting away with all due caution and proper care; then when a word or a line catches my fancy I stay my hand, reading awhile—a line, a paragraph, perhaps a page.

But in this matter as in all others I am no slave to routine. When I am cutting an old friend, maybe disguised in a new dress, no sense of curiosity persuades me to pause; when my task is completed I settle down cosily in the corner of my old chair and re-read, calmly content and certain of what pleasure I shall find. Then, too, I deal with different books in diverse ways; a history, for example, I sometimes, in fact usually, cut from end to end, never pausing to taste; if a volume of poetry, I sip the sweets as I go on; essays tempt me not seldom to read a page or two on my way, and so forth.

Thin paper books are troublesome to cut without disaster; so, likewise, are those, too common nowadays, printed upon what is a near cousin to blotting-paper. Badly bound volumes, that groan and creak as they are opened, are queer customers to deal with; most periodicals—wire-bound abominations—are hateful, and the sincere paper-knife with difficulty restrains itself from doing them a damage. For paper-knives have their little tempers and must not be dealt with as if they had no feelings. Handle them roughly and they will be revenged upon you; be tender to them and they will be gentle; they are responsive to kindness, docile when used with respect. Has a paper-knife ever written its autobiography? It would make good reading.

E. G. O.

JOHN OLIVER HOBBS' "Letters from a Silent Study" will be published simultaneously in THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE and "The New York Tribune"; the exigencies of copyright law necessitate the postponement of the next letter for a week.

Science

Its Debt to the Dead

IT is but five weeks since the death of the heterodox thinker who was distinguished, amongst nations that own the Prince of Peace, for his singular and immitigable opposition to Militarism—a thinker whose closing years were saddened by a long and sanguinary war between two blood-related Christian peoples; and now two of the Empires that paid their tribute at his death are on the verge of war. This is the foremost subject in the minds of thinking men, whether they be humanitarians under a banner, or like him, wield a free lance: and on this brief reckoning, at any rate, Herbert Spencer is a failure, like all the deathless dead before him that have sought to do justice and love mercy. A failure indeed, but thanks to him, we know that human nature is not the same in all ages, but is rising, as he taught Tennyson, to a "height that is higher."

But now let us see of what else the world is thinking, besides a war of which no horrors can exceed this most poignant and ultimate of tragedies, that in the twentieth century after Calvary the Pagan should stand for light and progress and the Christian for unutterable barbarity. Let us take the astronomers—students of the most exact and wonderful of the natural sciences. Of what are they thinking? The answer is cosmic evolution—the new astronomy. In a few days a reverend Jesuit, noted for his astronomical researches, is to lecture at the Royal Institution on recent progress in astro-physics; in our knowledge, that is to say, of cosmic evolution, which has become, since Spencer wrote his famous essay on the "Nebular Hypothesis," half a century ago, the most fascinating and awe-inspiring subject that the human intellect can contemplate. So astronomy bows to him: and one reads with amusement, not unmingled with something very like contempt, the statement of a theological critic of Spencer—differing from his co-religionist—that "cosmic evolution is now universally regarded as a myth"!

And what are the chemists and physicists talking about? Why, curiously enough, they are all agog about atomic evolution, which has become, within the last year, as certain a truth as cosmic evolution. Species are not immutable: not even species of atoms. And whilst the public gapes at the price of radium, the whole scientific world is thanking it for having supplied the final proof that evolution applies to the very "foundation-stones" of the material universe. So physics and chemistry join with astronomy in bowing to Spencer's genius.

And what are the biologists talking about? Why, curiously enough, they are all agog about organic evolution. Only last week Professor Ray Lankester concluded a series of lectures on "Extinct Animals" at the Royal Institution—the Christmas lectures for children! As a matter of fact, these were really lectures on the overwhelming evidence derived from geology and palaeontology in favour of the theory of organic evolution. And this week Professor Miall has begun a series of six more lectures on the development of animals, and, in April, will follow them with three more on the transformations of animals! So biology joins with physics, chemistry, and astronomy in bowing to Spencer's genius. Well might Darwin call him "our great philosopher," remembering Spencer's memorable essay on the "Development Hypothesis," published in 1852, seven years before the "Origin of Species," and establishing beyond a doubt his right to be remembered as the first independent thinker who adopted the theory of organic evolution. In this connection it is interesting to observe that, except for a dim adumbration in "Social Statics," Spencer completely missed the idea of what he afterwards illuminated by calling it the "Survival of the Fittest." It seems obvious enough to us now that if there is a struggle for existence the fittest will survive; and it is a commentary on the limitations of the human mind that Spencer should have missed it. Of course he had not at that time the ideas of "fitness" in adaptation to "environment": words and ideas which he has given to us for the clarification of all subsequent thinking.

The word "evolution"—formerly used in a totally different sense—we also owe to Spencer: so that it is of interest to observe that his great opponent, the Master of Balliol, is adding two more volumes on the "Evolution of ——" to that which he has already issued. Indeed it would be easy to show how Spencer's opponents are unable to attack him, or even do any of their own "independent" thinking, without using his terms and ideas as the key and clue to all their mental operations.

Space fails, or I would quote the educationists, with their new magazine, the sociologists, with their new society, and the psychologists, with their recent advances, in proof of my thesis. But I must just mention the medical men who, as Sir William Collins has just pointed out, are finding, in the application of Spencerian ideas to the problems of cell-life, the right way in which to solve the nearly-conquered problem of cancer: whilst there lies before me a card of the Morison Lectures which are to be delivered on "Insanity" before the Royal College of Physicians of Edinburgh, and which will deal with that subject on the basal idea of evolution.

And what is the French Press talking about? Well, mainly, it seems, about the ignorance of the British Press, and the apathy of the British people, when one of the immortals passes from amongst them. Now I fancy it might easily be shown, from the recorded figures of sale of Spencer's books, that many people have lately had to write about him without any knowledge of their subject. But the fact remains that certain people have, without excuse, written some astounding nonsense. Principal Fairbairn says that his philosophy will be dismissed by posterity as that of one who was a poet and a dreamer rather than a thinker. Another writer says he was not a man but an intellect. These may be left to one another. I have myself been challenged, by one who had not read ten pages of Spencer, to adduce "a single idea" from him; but a writer in the "Daily News" has achieved a costly immortality by describing Spencer as an industrious plodder rather than an original thinker, and by adding, in a phrase at which the centuries will laugh, that "First Principles" is not wholly destitute of "a certain literary power." This of a book for which science and philosophy had been waiting since the dawn of thought, and which the forty most active years in the history of man's mind have since established by telescope, spectroscope, microscope, by processes mathematical, experimental, logical, and by all other processes whatever, as part of inexpugnable Truth. Verily may it be said, in Emerson's phrase, of him whom "all the world outside the walls of our Universities"—to quote the "Fortnightly"—honours and thanks to-day, that "to be great is to be misunderstood." But as I walked sadly away from the last scene, and saw a little film of smoke rise into the air from the crematorium tower, denoting the physical end of the great brain for which we are but the first of thousands of generations that shall yet give thanks, I comforted myself with old Daniel, "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever."

C. W. SALEEBY.

Dramatic Notes

It is pleasant to find Mrs. Craigie lending the weight of her authority to the argument so often put forward in these columns, that the stage of to-day is weak because of its being overweighted with convention, and of its lacking fidelity to nature. In her lecture before the O.P. Club, on Sunday evening last, Mrs. Craigie urged that what was required of authors and actors alike was less of convention and more of nature. Stage convention is an unhappy term in that it includes many things that cannot and should not be abolished, as well as many that should be made an end of as soon as can be. All theatrical art may be said to be a convention, equally truthfully it may be said that when we go to the theatre we are called upon to "make believe." Quite so, but stage conventions should be used to assist us in making believe and not to destroy all possibility of illusion. I do not ask for reality on the stage, but for a performance, both from author and actor, which will appear real; of course I am now writing only of the serious drama—of plays that claim to deal with the actual affairs and events and emotions of life. Some stage conventions are rendered necessary by the circumstance under which plays are acted.

THE actor must speak in tones and with elaborate distinctness which would be unbearable in ordinary intercourse, because in the theatre he is addressing a large and in part distant audience; the scenery must be painted in colours far distant from nature because the lighting of the stage is utterly unlike the lighting of nature; in nature there are shadows, on the stage there are none, hence the scenery and the actors' faces must be provided with painted shadows; such conventions as these are indispensable. There are conventions, however, which are not only unnecessary, but wholly destructive of illusion—of the possibility of making believe that the performance we are witnessing is life and not play-acting. As Mrs. Craigie pointed out, there is a tendency nowadays, as we sit and watch the play, to say that "Mr. So-and-So is doing this, that, or the other very cleverly," whereas we should say "such and such a character in the play has come home to our hearts, and has stirred in us responsive emotions." As I have before now pointed out, actors and actresses should, as do painters or writers of fiction, study straight from nature the characters they are called upon or choose to depict. The acting of old men and other character parts is almost wholly a matter of convention in the theatre of to-day; there are conventional voices, gestures, garments, make-up, and so forth. In so far as these conventions were founded upon study of human nature they can stand, but they must be checked from day to day; the convention that yesterday was true and natural may to-day be quite the opposite.

THEN stage manners are almost wholly conventional; we have abolished the time-dishonoured performance of insisting on a dialogue being carried on by two seated actors who have carried chairs down to the footlights for that particular purpose, and who will carry them back to their previous positions when the conversation is concluded. But stage managers still consider it necessary to keep the actors bustling about the stage in a meaningless, unnatural and distracting manner. In life I do not speak three or four sentences to my friend at one side of the room, and then, with him, elaborately cross the room before I continue my discourse. Why should I do so on the stage? A volume might be written upon the subject of stage conventions; here I can only draw attention to the theory that underlies all stage performances.

REALISM in the theatre has unfortunately come to be a synonym for everything that is sordid—too often for everything that is nasty. Otherwise it is the word we want.

SHAKESPEARE'S LONDON: ST. SAVIOUR'S, SOUTHWARK.

[Photo. Booker and Sullivan, Chancery Lane.]

We do not ask of the stage what is real; the absolutely real on the stage would appear unreal; what is desired and but too little sought after, is the unreal, which will to the spectator appear real. To take the greatest example of all, Shakespeare's plays as regards diction and often as regards possibility, are utterly unreal, but the emotions are real, and, properly acted, the effect upon the audience is that of reality. Or, to take another high example, a flat cloth of a landscape, painted by such an artist as the late Mr. Beverley, often appears more real than elaborately built up sets, with real leaves, real flowers, real water, and other realities that in their unreal surroundings appear unnatural and untrue. The fact is, they are unreal and untrue in such surroundings.

THE comic note was, unfortunately, in evidence more than once at untimely moments in Mr. A. O'D. Bartholeyns' drama, "Swift and Vanessa," produced at the Royalty Theatre on Monday last. Undoubtedly there is tragic material in the story of the Dean, Vanessa and Stella, but probably not material for a drama; if known facts are adhered to and not added to, the motives of the leading characters must remain obscure; if fiction is added to facts, those acquainted with the latter are naturally dissatisfied. Mr. Bartholeyns not only indulges in fiction, but introduces, quite unnecessarily, such persons as Gay and Congreve, and utilises well-known sayings of well-known folk in a way neither accurate nor happy. Some of the scenes are skilfully constructed, but the language hardly ever, except when quoted, rises above mediocrity; in three words—an ambitious failure. Had it been better acted the play would have been more impressive; only Mr. J. D. Beveridge as Swift played with character and distinction.

As a distinguished French critic puts it, M. Brieux's dramas represent an ingenious method of giving lectures. His latest play, if it can so be called, "Maternité," produced at the Théâtre Antoine, is actually a most serious lecture or discussion on that subject. And strangest of all M. Brieux succeeds in interesting us and in arresting our attention.

If the Anti-Semites had not made capital out of it from their point of view, Maurice Donnay's "Le Retour de Jérusalem" would be regarded as one of his best comedies. It is above all a drama of sentiment, and the scene in which the lovers decide to separate is one of the most simple and pathetic that Donnay has ever written.

A FRENCH theatre is about to be established at Rome, in which French actors will produce French plays both old and new.

AMONG living German dramatists, Franz von Schönthan, author of comedies and farces, stands highest in popularity. There were last year, in Germany, no less than 1,366 performances of plays by him. Blumenthal and Kadelburg follow with 1,337 performances. Meyer-Förster's "Alt-Heidelberg" was played 1,255 times. Works by Sudermann reach the remarkable number of 1,050. Schiller heads the list of classical dramatists with 1,111 performances. Shakespeare comes next with 658, and then Goethe with 347. Living foreign dramatists may be ranged in the order—Maeterlinck, Ibsen, Björnson.

New dramas are announced by Max Dreyer, the author of the "Probekandidat," entitled "Venus Amathusia," and "Möller Hildebrand." Hugo von Hofmannsthal, the author of "Elektra," is preparing a German version of Otway's "Venice Preserved," which was last performed in Germany at the Weimar Theatre when under the direction of Goethe.

At the Royal Theatre, Stuttgart, the Goethe-Bund produced for the first time three satires of Lucian in the German version of Paul Lindau. Those selected were: "Timon, the Misanthrope," "The Cock, or the Cobbler's Dream," and "The Tyrant, or the Passage of the Styx." The two last obtained the most applause.

ON New Year's Eve, the Lessing Theatre, Berlin, produced a new farce by Gustav Kadelburg, entitled "Familie Schierke." It is witty and amusing, and abounds in comic situations. The leading motive is to be found in the accident by which a highly respectable man makes the acquaintance of a little street dancing-girl, and so disturbs the harmony of his hitherto peaceful domestic life. But despite the many complications, all ends happily, and the audience dispersed in a merry humour ready to enjoy their Sylvesterabend (New Year's Eve) supper with the indispensable hot punch.

Musical Notes

SOME years ago, Sir A. C. Mackenzie announced that he should write no more works for British musical festivals; the game, he declared, was not worth the candle. Art for art's sake, in Sir Alexander's judgment, was all very well, but a little bread and butter was none the less acceptable, and so he figuratively shook the dust of the festivals off his feet. Apparently, however, Sir Alexander has changed his mind or has converted others to his way of thinking, and the interesting announcement has been made that a new cantata from his pen entitled "The Witch's Daughter" will be the most important novelty at the next Leeds Festival. "The Witch's Daughter" suggests possible descent from "The Spectre's Bride"; but having in view Sir Alexander's nationality it is more likely, perhaps, that the lady will prove to be, as the Babu writer said, "of Scotch." Other new works to be heard at the festival will be a setting of one of Aytoun's poems by Dr. Charles Wood, and a cantata from the pen of Dr. Walford Davies, based on a text derived from the old morality play "Everyman." The latter should lend itself to musical treatment rather well.

MISS ADA CROSSLEY seems to have carried all before her during her recent visit to the Antipodes. In Australia the papers appear to have vied with one another in the expression of their enthusiasm—enthusiasm naturally not diminished by the plucky way in which, rather than disappoint the public, she sang after the accident to her ankle with her foot in plaster of Paris and standing between two chairs to afford her support. And from New Zealand came tributes equally emphatic—among others a graceful sonnet from the pen of Mr. David Will. M. Burn, of which a copy has reached us. Thus run the concluding lines:—

Out of the Deep a Voice sings—Thine—this day,
And the charmed waves of plastic human minds
Leap to the mastering magic of Thy lay,
Rich with Earth's runes, wistful as wandering winds,
And soft as star-shine—leap, and surge, and sway
Till each, soul-stilled, the Heart of Beauty finds.

Such things would make some vocalists vain—but not Miss Crossley.

IN these days, when so many are content to have the courage of other people's convictions, it is pleasant to read of someone, such as the late Mr. Andrew Deakin of Birmingham, who was not afraid to possess opinions of his own, and to express them with uncompromising vigour; and this, even though one of those same opinions was to the effect that "the two greatest choral works ever written are both by Mendelssohn—the 'Elijah' and the 'St. Paul.'"

"What of the B minor Mass of John Sebastian Bach?" we timidly inquired.

"I don't think much of it. There are many masses much better. I prefer any of Schubert's masses to Bach in B minor."

There is something very refreshing in this. "What about the Prophet Samuel? Was not he both great and good?" Thus Mark Twain has told us his parents reasoned with him when he objected to the baptismal name which they had bestowed on him. "Not so very," was the youthful Samuel's unabashed response. Mr. Deakin's reply to the interviewer recalls that historic passage. Mr. Deakin was, it seems, for many years musical critic of the Birmingham "Daily Gazette."

WHY the "Elijah" and the "St. Paul," by the way? Unless I am mistaken it is a fad of quite recent development thus to allude to these and other works, though wherefore this has come about I am at a loss to say. The names of the oratorios are "Elijah" and "St. Paul," and there is no more need to call them the "Elijah" and the "St. Paul" than there is to say the "Hamlet" or the "Macbeth." The trick is the more irritating since it is usually encountered on the lips of the would-be always accurate and precise. By parity of reasoning one might expect to find them saying the "The Dream of Gerontius" and the "The Apostles."

APPROPOS of that familiar "essential turn" of Wagner, which Dr. Cowen alluded to the other day, the question has been raised as to the right method of its performance as it occurs in the Prayer from "Rienzi." Should it be given in the ordinary straightforward way, or in the form of a "back turn," such as it takes in the case of the "Brünnhilde" motive from "Götterdämmerung"? In former days it was, if I am not mistaken, invariably given in the direct and ordinary manner, and to my ears this sounds obviously the correct and more pleasing reading, since the turn seems then to go with instead of against the natural curve of the melody, whereas when the other reading is adopted I derive a precisely contrary impression. None the less, the "back turn" would seem of recent years to have found favour in some quarters with or without authority—Dr. Muck, for example, adopts this reading at the Berlin opera—and it would be interesting, therefore, to ascertain if possible which version is actually the right one. Presumably the original score throws no light on the subject, or no difference of opinion would have arisen. But Richter and many others could say, of course, what Wagner's own practice in the matter was. And this should settle it.

ONE used to be told of Sugar and spice

And all that's nice

in one's childhood; and the distich comes back to one on reading that no less than seven of Massenet's operas, which are nothing if not sugary and sweet-stuff-like, are to be heard at Nice during the forthcoming operatic season there. These are "Marie Magdeleine," "Hérodiade," "Manon," "La Navarraise," "Cendrillon," "Thaïs" and "Werther." The novelties of the season will be Puccini's "La Tosca," Lucien Lambert's "La Flamenca," and Xavier Leroux's "La Reine Fiammette," while Wagner will be represented by "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," and "Das Rheingold."

"LYING" or "lying down"? That seems to sum up in epigrammatic form the singular controversy which has arisen in New York as to the precise nature of a remarkable incident which appears to have occurred the other day at the Metropolitan Opera House. Mr. Conried's is one story—or rather, to be quite accurate, a statement ascribed to Mr. Conried in the "Musical Courier":—

As he passed down the corridor and by the Press-room, he noticed that the daily critics, after the second act of the opera, were at work writing their reports. He went into the room and told them, among other things, that he could not understand how they could, under the circumstances, write correct criticisms of the opera. . . . Thereupon the critics left the room and returned to their seats to listen to the next act.

That is the "lying down" version of the incident. According to Mr. Krehbiel, the critic of the "Tribune," on the other hand—

Such a scene as that described . . . between Mr. Conried and the gentlemen of the Press at the Opera House never took place. It is a lie made out of whole cloth.

That is the "lying" version. Clearly it is not for anyone on this side to attempt adjudication in such a delicate matter. But the episode is a pretty one as it stands.

A QUARTET by Mr. J. B. McEwen, a former pupil of the Royal Academy of Music, was an acceptable feature of the last Broadwood concert. Like many young composers, Mr. McEwen seems rather inclined to mistake extension for fullness, and his work would certainly gain by compression. "What I say three times is true" may be a sound rule in the Wonderland region, but it is apt to prove tiresome embodied in music—for all the examples of the great masters to the contrary. Most of the musical works in existence are too long—Wagner operas and Beethoven symphonies not excepted. Still Mr. McEwen has ideas and knows how to treat them, and his quartet, which is Scotch rather than Scotch in character, was quite worth hearing. A set of "pastorals" for vocal quartet, with an accompaniment of piano and strings, by Dr. H. Walford Davies were also introduced, and proved pleasantly melodious and expressive.

Art Notes

WITH regard to what I said in reviewing "Moot Points," the other day, Mr. Day writes to ask me if I "would tell him a little more in detail how it is that craft and not art has to do with the beautiful." Well, I had hoped that I had made this clear; but I will try to set it in as clear terms as possible. It may be conceded, to start with (I think Mr. Day and his opponent, Mr. Crane, would both concede me this), that the most interesting thing to man is life. Now, we can only know of life through two means (I am excepting the obvious fact that the best way to know life is to live it)—either by the intellect or by the senses. We cannot know of life by the intellect, that is to say, by the thinking machinery, until we can transfer ideas and facts to others, and they to us, by speech (or language if you will). And just as speech transfers thought from one to the other, so does art transfer the emotions (or the things felt) from one to the other—whether by the sense of sound, or taste, or form, or colour, or other human sense. The artist cannot transfer an emotion as he can transfer a thought by mere logical speech, but he can use speech to build up a sensation (poetry or prose), or he can make colour build up a sensation (painting), or he can make sound build up a sensation (music); and he must do so before he can transfer that sensation into the emotional receptivity of others. That act is art. But I have said he has to build it up, just as in appealing to the intellect he has to build up speech (a language that his hearers can understand). And it is in this building up of his art (the means by which he transfers emotion) that craftsmanship is born. And just as when a man would transfer thoughts to others, the craft of his transference (speech) cannot be too perfect if he would be fully understood, otherwise you would but have a Babel of strange sounds; so when a man would transfer emotion to others, the craft of his transference cannot be too perfect. In other words, craftsmanship requires perfection of statement as its essence, and will therefore always contain the essence of the beautiful. But art, which, undoubtedly, and I admit it, transfers emotion to others according to the perfection or power of its craftsmanship, need not in itself be beautiful, or seek after beauty—beauty indeed is only one of many sensations. An ugly thing, a gargoyle or an ugly woman, or a dwarf, or vengeance, or hatred, are just as artistic as any beautiful thing. Tragedy is just as artistic as comedy. I hope I have made it clear, then, that beauty is almost an essential necessity to craftsmanship, and therefore, to the manner in which a work of art is created; also that this has probably been the chief source of error in confusing beauty with art. I do not know whether I have convinced Mr. Day, or even made him re-examine his own ideas as to beauty, and art, and craftsmanship. But once the attention is drawn to the plain fact that art is not beauty, and is as much concerned with ugliness, or horror, or vengeance, or death, or any other far from beautiful thing, as long as that thing is a human emotion, surely the truth-seeking artist will at once realise that, at any rate, art and beauty are not one.

MONSIEUR RODIN has taken the keenest interest in the International Society of Sculptors, Painters and Gravers, and is being feasted and made much of by the Society, which is as enthusiastic about their president as he about it. A fuller notice of the exhibition I must leave over until next week. But I should like to say, before my space gives out, that in the midst of all this talk of the Society I regret to see no mention of the man out of whose guidance, brain, energy and resource, the Society was created—Mr. T. P. O'Connor's stepson—Francis Howard. One more word about Monsieur Rodin before I close: I am heartily glad to see that he reminds an interviewer that there were very few statues in Greece that were really works of art or very beautiful; indeed, there is no particular mention amongst Greek writers that the Venus of Milo was particularly appreciated! Critics generally speak of Greece as of a nation in which art was largely diffused throughout all classes. As a matter of fact, the youth of Greece were probably as Philistine as English public-school boys, and the average man as erudite as an undergraduate.

MR. GALLATIN's handsome catalogue of "Aubrey Beardsley's Drawings," with his list of criticisms thereon, is a rare prize for the Beardsley collector. I tested it by looking for certain articles which I wrote as "Hal Dane" upon Beardsley in "St. Paul's" long ago, and I found them correct in every detail, but what was a far more severe test, I looked carefully to see whether two or three headpieces and tailpieces of Beardsley's that were illustrations to my articles had been noted, and I am bound to say that Mr. Gallatin's keen eyes have missed no slightest detail. Beardsley designed in all, I think, three headpieces for "St. Paul's." When an American is an enthusiast, there is no man in the world to approach him for enthusiasm. I congratulate him on the large-heartedness of his collecting spirit, which has given all of us who collect Beardsleys, the opportunity of securing a reproduction of the strangely tragic portrait of Aubrey by Rothenstein, and two or three drawings, "Alvary as Tristan" and "Klafsky as Isolde," that even I did not know—and all this in addition to a catalogue which it is a very joy to possess, a catalogue which no lover of Beardsley's work can well do without. And I must add a word of praise for the good taste shown in the whole production of the book from cover to cover.

MR. NORMAN GARSTIN shows a number of water-colours at the Fine Art Society's in Bond Street, of Normandy, Brittany, and Holland, which he entitles "In Border Land"—though Julia does not appear.

MR. GEORGE CLAUSEN's lectures on Painting begin at four o'clock at the Royal Academy on Mondays and Thursdays. Monday 11th opens the series with "Some Early Painters," to be followed by "Lighting and Arrangement," "Colour," "Titian, Rembrandt, and Velasquez," "Open-air Painting and Landscape," and, lastly, "Realism and Impressionism."

MISS BESSIE WIGAN is to have an exhibition of water-colours entitled "Wanderings and Wanderers" at Messrs. Dickinson's Galleries in Bond Street next week.

THE Women's International Art Club opens its doors to the public about the same time with their exhibition at the Grafton Galleries.

MR. JOHN BAILLIE's galleries in Prince's Terrace, Hereford Road, will also be open on Monday the 16th with shows of oil paintings by Connard, water-colours by Bellingham Smith, and Japanese colour-prints.

MR. CHARLES GORDON has written an interesting account of "Old Time Aldwych, Kingsway, and Neighbourhood" (Unwin, 21s. net), in which he not only sketches the historical associations of the ground covered by the Strand improvements of to-day, but gives a useful summary of the scheme for these improvements, and of the wrangles and squabbles that were the inevitable prelude to the work of the County Council. To me, personally, the most serious trouble as regards the improvements lies in the narrowness of Fleet Street at the point where that abortion of a monument stands to mark the site of the old Temple Bar—surely this place will always tend to congestion. The much-abused griffin on top is the only good piece of the monument. But I am not here concerned with anything but the artistic merits of the improvements. The feeling of fresh air and space is delightful; and, picturesque as was the old Bookeller's Row, the open space is far more pleasant. But I have always fears of "artistic improvements" in London city. In France they know the value of broad flat spaces for the walls of houses, relieved by the universal and picturesque rows of painted wooden shutters to the windows. But the English city architect hates the great flat front of stone—how he loves to put grooves along the edges where they meet, and to carve those heavy meaningless forms above doorways and about windows! There are house-fronts in Fleet Street that make the teeth ache. And to think that once upon a time, after the great fire, Sir Christopher Wren nearly designed a new London! But vested city interests (ah! those vested interests!) came between London and grandeur, and Wren's magnificent plan for a new London came to naught. Yet, though the great opportunity died, there grew up as London a wonderful patch-work and beautiful city. The Strand, built on the picturesque lines and charming colour of the temporary building known as "Short's," with its black beams and its green shutters, would have been a delightful place; but I see the hard-lined, gruesome, raw-edged, hideously "utilitarian" city-front rising in the near future to make of this romantic old dingy thoroughfare a show-place fit for the sale of ill-made things—a street relieved here and there by a picturesque Gaiety Theatre, where the pit-doors at which people await admittance in a row for hours is unprotected by a canopy of any kind, whilst the stall entrance, where nobody waits for the buying of tickets, is gorgeously protected. I quite realise that the fine lines of the Gaiety are not improved by the ironwork awnings; but that architect must lack genius indeed who cannot triumph over an awning. There are artistic possibilities latent even in a button-hook. Mr. Gordon has been generously merciful, and given us good maps to his book, besides a most interesting series of old plates of the "neighbourhood." One cannot, on reading his pages, help regretting the "old town"—but the years pass and new conditions call for the burying of old cities and the rise of the new. And perhaps age has more than a little to do with the picturesque.

THE bust of Washington presented by France to the United States has reached America, and is to be set up in the Rotunda of the Capitol at Washington it is said.

Correspondence

The Date of Charles Lamb's Birth

SIR,—If Mr. Edric Webster would do me the favour of carefully re-reading my letter he would see that I was aware of the extract he quotes—and have been, though this is of no interest, any time within the last twenty-five years. It is the one I referred to in the following words:—"If further evidence is required to 'make assurance double sure,' this may be found in the extract from the Temple Register of the births of the Lamb family, which the late Mr. Charles Kent published in his Centenary Edition of the 'Works' so far back as 1875."

Further, your correspondent would appear to be in error in his statement that the copy of the extract was made at the instance of Mr. Charles Keene, this having been done by Mr. Charles Kent, as stated above.—Yours, &c.,

S. BUTTERWORTH, Major, R.A.M. Corps.

Keats Grecian Urn

SIR,—I have read the three letters in THE ACADEMY for January 2 in reply to my letter of December 19. With your permission I will answer them as briefly as possible.

In reply to the first letter, signed K. de Watteville. I cannot avail myself of his suggestion to examine the frieze of the Parthenon at the British Museum, an institution with which I am very familiar, because I am at the present time living in the Isle of Man. I am fully aware that it is thought by an authority at the British Museum that Keats probably imagined his urn by a combination of sculpture actually seen in the British Museum with others known to him only from engravings. When he proceeded to describe his supposititious urn, he let his imagination falsify nature.

Mr. A. J. Dawson gives an interesting account of the attitude struck by calves recently debarred from the use of the maternal udder. The attitude is this: feet planted well apart, tail lifting slightly, and so on. That posture is quite incompatible with the description supplied by Keats of the "mysterious priest" leading the heifer to the sacrifice. Mr. A. J. Dawson compliments me on my verse. He says it is passable. What does Mr. Dawson think of Keats for his rhyming "skies" with "sacrifice" and "drest" with "priest"? Both of these abortive attempts at rhyme appear in the extract of a quatrain which I gave you in my letter of December 19. Does Mr. Dawson think that they are "passable"? I don't.

The third letter by Mr. E. Knox Linton contains the gist of the whole matter. He says, "Keats's phrase refers to the slight lifting of the muzzle which accompanies the action of lowing. The skies do not, of course, mean the region of the Pole Star, but somewhere nearer the horizon." The popular and poetical definition of "sky" is given by Webster in the small edition of his dictionary thus: "The aerial region above our heads." It is customary both in poetry and prose to use the word "skies"—not "sky"—in a devotional sense; and it is in that sense it was used by Keats when he wrote about the sacrificial heifer "lowing at the skies."

There is a fashion in poetry as in everything else, and Keats happens to be in vogue to-day; in my youth, Keats was certainly not in vogue. As a matter of fact, Lord Houghton and Matthew Arnold "discovered" him for a mass of professed lovers of poetry-lovers who cannot see any fault in their Master for the time being, however flagrant it may be.—Yours, &c.,

Isle of Man,

January 8, 1904.

L. P. PATTEN.

SIR,—I am surprised that no one has come forward in defence of Keats's accuracy in the line—

"Lead'st thou that heifer lowing at the skies."

I do not pretend to much familiarity with the ways of cattle, but I am sure the poet is perfectly right. Everyone but the objector must have noticed that the cow turns her face upwards (at least comparatively to its usual position) when she lows. Thomson, who, I believe, was brought up in the country, has a very similar expression in his Winter:—

"With broaden'd nostrils to the sky upturn'd,
The conscious heifer snuffs the stormy gale."

—Yours, &c.,

INDEX.

Dante

SIR,—At page 12, column 2, line 10, of THE ACADEMY for January 2, occurs this passage on Englishing foreign-tongued classics: "How fine, how even classic, such things may be without [the Homeric translations of Mr. Andrew Lang and his colleagues." The apparent impiety is caused, of course, by a dropped line, which possibly runs thus: "the aids of rhyme and metre, is abundantly shown in" An article on Dante hints that there are extant several good prose translations of the "Divina Commedia." Would Mr. F. Kettle help us by mentioning them, distinguishing the best? By "best" I mean the most Andrew Langian. That scholar and poet is to me "the channel through which Heaven floweth" in such matters, and I should like to work him twelve hours a day for the rest of his life.—Yours, &c.,

S. HALE.

[I am away from my books, so cannot give Mr. Hale a full answer. Longfellow and Cary are good, though I do not myself read them with pleasure. Norton's is very faithful, but with little, I think, of the Dantesque feeling. Musgrave—we still await his Purgatorio and Paradiso—is a translation abounding in good things, and quite the best for the Dante neophyte. Carlyle's Inferno is admirable, and in prose. None of these translations are (how could they be?) in the manner of Andrew Lang's Odyssey. Wicksteed's Paradiso is a fine piece of exquisite workmanship. Butler, Vernon and Wright have their special merits. Musgrave's Inferno is in the Spenserian stanza—I forget both publisher and price.—F. KETTLE.]

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me space to thank Mr. Kettle for drawing my attention in his review of my book, "Exiles of Eternity," to my omission to acknowledge my indebtedness to Father Rickaby's translation of parts of St. Thomas Aquinas, and Selfe and Wicksteed's translation of selections from Villani's Chronicle—an omission which surprises me much more than it can your reviewer. Not only was it unintentional, but until I read his review I was quite certain that I had made due acknowledgment in the footnotes, and I am extremely sorry that my memory played me so ungentlemanly a trick. They are both, as Mr. Kettle says, very valuable books for the English reader.

Most of the items singled out for criticism are matters of interpretation, in which, of course, Dante gives plenty of scope for differences. But in one point I think your reviewer quite misrepresents—no doubt unintentionally—my position. Speaking of Dante's unworthy treatment of Friar Alberigo in Ptolomaea, he says, "Mr. Carroll sees little in this act deserving of censure, and gives it an ethical interpretation." I confess I do not understand what Mr. Kettle wants. I expressly say that Dante's better feelings seemed to be chilled by the wind of Lucifer's wings; that he broke his promise, and that he acted treacherously. I explain his extraordinary conduct by saying that it was his "very abhorrence of treachery which betrayed him into treachery." That is my understanding of Dante's character, but your reviewer will have none of it. Nothing short of a "demonic seizure" will satisfy him as an explanation. Has Mr. Kettle no natural indignation against a man who invited his brother to a banquet, and gave orders to his servants to slay him when he called for the fruit? I am not concerned to defend everything Dante did, but to call his indignation against such cold-blooded treachery to brother and guest mere Spas or "demonic seizure" seems to me, to put it mildly, a strange misunderstanding of the whole moral situation.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN S. CARROLL.

Innisfail, Newlands, Glasgow.

"Academy" Questions & Answers

Questions and Answers for this column must be addressed to THE EDITOR, THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, 9, East Harding Street, London, E.C. The envelope to be marked in the top left-hand corner "A.Q.A." Full name and address must be sent, not necessarily for publication. Each Question or Answer must be written on a separate sheet of paper and on only one side of the paper. The editor will not undertake the forwarding of any correspondence. Questions must be confined to matters of Literature, History, Archaeology, Folk-lore, Art, Music, and the Drama. The Editor reserves the right of deciding whether or not any Question or Answer is of sufficient interest to be published.

COMPETITION.

Until further notice, four prizes, of the value of 5s. each, will be awarded weekly for the two best Questions and the two best Answers contributed to "Academy" Questions and Answers.

The Editor's decision must be considered absolutely final and no correspondence whatever will be entered upon with regard to the awards. The prizes will go to those Questions and Answers which are deemed to be of the greatest general interest, and briefly in all cases will count as a merit.

The names and addresses of prize-winners will not be published, but the winning Questions and Answers will be indicated by an asterisk (*).

The prizes will consist of 5s. worth of books to be chosen by the several prize-winners. The name and address of the booksellers where the book or books can be obtained will be given.

Each prize-winner in the United Kingdom will be advised that a credit note has been sent to a bookseller as early as possible in his (or her) immediate neighbourhood, and that on demand he (or she) may choose a book or books to the value of 5s. Winners outside the United Kingdom will receive a cheque for 5s.

Non-adherence to the rules and regulations of "Questions and Answers" will imply disqualification.

No Questions or Answers received after Monday will be considered eligible for the current week's competition.

No competitor can win a prize more than once in three months.

Questions

LITERATURE

SHAKESPEARE'S KNOWLEDGE [OF RED OR COLOURED SNOW.]—Can any of your readers inform me whether they have ever met in any old English chronicle, or in Hakluyt, or in any old book of travels, &c., a reference to this phenomenon, which Shakespeare was likely to have read, prior to 1595?—C.

CLOUGH AND TENNYSON.—In the volume of Clough's collected poems the date 1849 is attached to the verses entitled "Peschiera," in which occur the lines—

"'Tis better to have fought and lost
Than never to have fought at all."

"In Memoriam" was published in 1850, but Clough had had an opportunity of reading it previously. The question I want to ask is this: Was Clough's poem "Peschiera" published anywhere in 1849? If so, we should have the possibly unique case of an imitation being published before the poem imitated.—W. A. L.

THE TWO-AND-THIRTY PALACES.—In a letter written to Reynolds [postmark, Hampstead, February 19, 1818] Keats writes: "When man has arrived at a certain ripeness of intellect, any one grand and spiritual passage serves him as a starting-post towards all 'the two-and-thirty palaces.'" Query, where are these palaces, and why two-and-thirty?—Comestor Oxoniensis.

SIR WALTER SCOTT'S GRAMMAR.—In an edition of the "Waverley Novels" in my possession (published by Lippincott, Philadelphia, 1861) I find in Chapter IX. of "Feveril of the Peak," in the letter addressed by Sir Geoffrey Peveril to Master Bridgforth, "you hold hard construction of certain passages between you and I." Can anyone tell me if this is seventeenth-century grammar or Scott's notion of it? Or can it be merely an exasperating transatlanticism which has crept into an American edition of this novel?—Oliver E. Bodington (Paris).

THE BOOK OF THE FOUNDATIONS.—What book is this? It is referred to in an article on "Darwin and his Interpreters," by P. N. Waggett in the "Pilot" of November 7, 1903, thus: "It ['The Origin of Species'] is one of the books which, like Boswell's 'Johnson' and 'The Book of the Foundations,' bring one within the direct influence of a deep soul."—M. A. C.

GENERAL

HENRY VI.'S COOK.—A grave-stone expert tells me that Henry's VI.'s cook is buried in the old churchyard at Cookham-on-Thames. Who was he? Is there any inscription on his grave? Is he referred to by any contemporary or later writers?—H. H. L.

THE MAN IN THE STREET.—What is the origin of this now common phrase? I have seen the question asked but not answered.—Index.

THE HOUSE THAT JACK BUILT.—This nursery rhyme is adapted from an ancient Jewish Passover hymn. What is the English rendering of its lines, and to what periods of Hebrew history do they refer?—Caltha.

THE LION AND THE UNICORN FIGHTING FOR THE CROWN.—What are the origin and signification (if any) of this famous rime? There was, indeed, once upon a time a battle fought at Flodden Field; but it is many a long day since that chaste and supercilious beast, the unicorn, has permitted himself to be chased round the town by a mere English lion (or leopard).—A. R. B.

OLIVES.—In a volume of old Scottish poems I have been reading, I find olives are mentioned as if they grew in Scotland. This, of course, they never did. But in the patois of a district in the Jura, primroses are called olives. Is it possible that in old French this word was used for primroses, and has been adopted in Scotland, as so many French words have been?—M. M. (Birmingham).

MARDY, MAUDY.—In Nottinghamshire an ill-tempered child is often called a "mardy" child, and in the southern shires a "maudy" child. I do not find this word in English dictionaries. Is it not possible it is from the French, maudit—"cursed"? Can any correspondent give me a more plausible derivation?—M. M. (Birmingham).

GEORGE WASHINGTON.—Can anyone tell me when the title of "Father of his Country" was first applied to George Washington; and has it ever been applied to any other character in history?—E. V. S.

Answers

LITERATURE

HABAKKUK.—In his "Philosophical Dictionary," under the head of "Prophets," Voltaire says: "Habakkuk was transported through the air, suspended by the hair of his head, to Babylon; this was not a fatal or permanent calamity, certainly; but it must have been an exceedingly inconvenient method of travelling. A man could not help suffering a great deal by being suspended by his air during a journey of three hundred miles. I certainly should have preferred a pair of wings, or the mare Boreas, or the Hippogriff." I am not aware that he refers again to this prophet.—Index.

MALBROUK.—The name of Malbrouk occurs in the "Chanson de Geste" and in the "Basque Pastorals."—D. Levy.

LIVES OF THE SAINTS.—"Miniature Lives of the Saints," by the Rev. H. S. Bowden, 2 vols., Burns and Oates, 1879, 4s., contains the information needed by "K. C.," and is the most complete for a moderate price work.—W. P. (Bristol).

BABY.—The first writer to use the word in English and in the sense required was Sir Philip Sidney in his "Astrophel and Stella":—

"So when thou saw'st in nature's cabinet Stella thou straight look'st babies in her eyes."

—A. Gasourin.

BABY.—In Farmer and Henley's "Dictionary of Slang and its Analogues" (revised) more than a dozen quotations are given of this quaint conceit. The first is from Sir P. Sidney's "Astrophel and Stella," published about 1591. Similar quotations are given from the plays of Fletcher, and from Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy." Herrick and Mrs. Aphra Behn are laid under contribution. The phrase is classified as "Old Colloquial."—W. B. L. (Stockport).

ANDREA FERRARA.—A sword or sword-blade of a kind greatly esteemed in Scotland towards the end of the sixteenth century and later. The blades are commonly marked "Andrea" on one side and "Farara" or "Ferrara" on the other, with other devices. The swords known by this name among the Scotch Highlanders were basket-hilted broadswords. It is now asserted by Italian writers that these were made at Belluno, in Venetia, by Cosmo, Andrea, and Gianantonio Ferrara, and that the surname is not geographical, but derived from the occupation. [Compare Ital. ferrajo, a cutler, an ironmonger = Eng. farrier, < Lat. ferrarius, a blacksmith.]—M. A. C.

ANDREA FERRARA.—A broadsword maker established at Belluno, in Italy, 1585. It is claimed for him that he tempered his blades by the same method as the swordmakers of Damascus.—J. M. H. (Edinburgh).

MY HEART CAME INTO MY MOUTH.—The best authority is Burns, who expresses it most pithily in "Hallowe'en":—"Poor Leezie's heart maist lap the hool." The hool is the pod of a pea. Lizzie's heart almost leapt out of its enclosing sheath.—J. M. H. (Edinburgh).

GENERAL

WILLIAM UPCOTT.—antiquary and autograph collector, died 23rd September 1845. His library, books, manuscripts, prints, and drawings were sold by Sotheby at Evans's auction-rooms, 106, New Bond Street, on 15th June 1846 and following days. They are said to have realised £4,125 17s. 6d.; a large paper copy of the catalogue is at the British Museum. Many of the autograph letters were bought for the nation, and now form Additional MSS. 15841 to 15987 at the British Museum.—M. A. C.

KICKSHAW.—This word is a corruption of the French quelque chose (something). It is sometimes spoken with contemptuous emphasis, and is used in English to describe a fancy dish in cookery, not one of the known "substantial English" dishes, but a "something" French. "A joint of Mutton, and any pretty little tinie Kick-shawes," Shak., "2 Hen. IV.," v. i. 29.—W. P. (Bristol).

OTHER-GUESS. "OTHERGATES."—Gate = way, manner. "Ice, gada; Da, gade; Ger, gasse (compare guess)." "Twentieth Century Dictionary." Othergates (ade, and ady, ibid.), "survives as a north-country provincialism. Another form is 'other-guess,' used in Somersetshire." Aldis Wright on "Twelfth Night," Act V, sc. i. l. 185. But Scott puts "another guess job" into the mouth of Justin Foxley, of Cumberland. Atkinson quotes "other gates" from the "Townley Mysteries." Other-gate (adv.) occurs in "Fragment B" of the "Romance of the Rose," which fragment Skeat attributes to "a Northerner." "Another-gains, which was used by Sidney in his 'Arcadia,' seems to have resulted from the confusion of anotherkins (of another kind), which survives in the Whitby dialect, and another-gates (of another gate, winner)." Strong, Logeman, and Wheeler, "Introduction to the Study of the History of Language," chap. viii.—B. M. G.

CHRISTMAS BOX.—In the early days of Christianity boxes were placed in churches for pious charities, and opened on Christmas Day. The contents were distributed next day by the priests, and called the "dole of the Christmas box," or the "box money."—G. E. D.

CHRISTMAS BOX has been derived from "bakshesh," on the authority of Bishop Heber and Dr. Kelsall. It is more likely, however, that it was originally simply a sort of money-box with a slit in the cover, which was either placed on the hall table of country houses at Christmas for the benefit of the servants, or carried round the house by the children for the same purpose. Christmas Boxes of this description were sold in Dublin to shops thirty years ago—and possibly even to-day.—Terence O'Brien.

YULE.—Could you not find a way of impressing upon your correspondents that whenever an etymology is wanted, such books as "Chambers's Etymological Dictionary" or Ash's Dictionary of 1895 are of absolutely no use? They should consult either the big "Oxford Dictionary," edited by Murray, Bradley, and Craigie, or the "Concise Etymological Dictionary," by Professor Skeat. There can be no doubt that Yule was not originally the name for a (heathen) festival, but for a part of the old Germanic year. The old Germans counted by double-months, and Yule (Old English, gylt; Old Norse, jöl; Gothic, giul-is) undoubtedly was the name of one of these double-months, either November-December or December-January. (Comp. A. Tille, Yule and Christmas, London, 1899.) The original meaning of the word "Yule" has not been settled yet. But Chambers's suggestions, quoted by your correspondent, are philologically impossible. An etymology which answers the laws of phonology is given by Kluge and Lutz ("English Etymology," 1898) who connect the word with Old Norse él, "snow-storm." Then "Yule" would mean "the time of snow storms."—Max Förster.

WALTHAM DISGUISES.—In the eighteenth century the deer-stealers of Waltham wore black crape masks which were known as "disguises." The deer-stealers themselves were known as "Waltham Blacks," and the Act to put them down is called the "Black Act."—H. W. (Manchester).

A large number of Questions and Answers is held over owing to want of space.

NOTE.—Will correspondents to this page be kind enough to observe the rules and mark their envelopes A.Q.A.?—otherwise delay and disqualification ensue.

PRIZES.—The asterisks denote the two questions and two answers to which prizes have been awarded. The winners can obtain, on application at the following booksellers, Five Shillings' worth of books. Notices have been despatched to the several winners and to the four booksellers whose names follow:—

Mr. H. Burnside, 20, Tranquil Vale, Blackheath, S.E.
Messrs. W. Heffer and Son, 103, Fitzroy Street, Cambridge.
Mr. William Bryce, 54, Lothian Street, Edinburgh.
Messrs. Kent and Matthew, 234, Lavender Hill, S.W.

The Comic Note

An Address delivered to the O.P. Club by Mrs. Craigie

I do not think many could have wondered about the general significance of the term "Comic Note." "A comic note—a tragic note"—we find both terms constantly employed in the criticisms of dramatic performances and in the reviews of fiction and verse.

So much then for its literary employment, but I will try to illustrate it still further by an anecdote I heard this morning about perhaps the most eminent surgeon in England.

He objected to a certain candidate for a post under him on the following score:—

"He is an affected ass," said he, "when he takes up the forceps, he curls his little finger!"

Now that assistant, in fact, struck the comic note. It was a false movement, and an inappropriate one, and, in rejecting his services the great surgeon was acting on a sound instinct.

Thus, a comic note is not infrequently struck in some of our most serious productions, and we have all heard ripples of ill-suppressed laughter or giggling run through an entire audience during some scene of intentional pathos.

Now, I believe I have traced this tittering to the want of dignity in many impersonations. And by dignity I do not mean pomposity, which is of course grotesque, and I do not mean what is called "a presence," and I do not mean "the grand manner." I shall make myself clearer by saying that many children possess it, if they have not been over-trained, and all animals, which have not been domesticated, possess it. I do not profess to have studied the wild beast at close quarters in his home life, but I always make a point of observing the caged beasts of every great city, and the difference between the dignity of these captives, even in imprisonment, and the dreadful humiliation of animals trained for the circus and music hall is, to me, not only marked but extremely painful. A caged lion is superb; a tame lion beating a drum or rolling an empty barrel round the stage is a degrading spectacle, in fact, undignified. And in the same way I feel it undignified when a human being of good intelligence, appearance, and gifts, is brought to think, by a false system of art, that he must play down—against his convictions—to a large, mixed crowd; this is an insult to the large mixed crowd, and this is why they titter.

It may seem, at first, a paradox to you if I say that many so-called low comedians possess this dignity which I want you to consider, and, although the house is often convulsed with laughter at their absurdities, it is legitimate laughter—it is not a guffaw. A very conspicuous example of this quality is in Dan Leno, who, because of his extraordinary naturalness, never seems to degrade humanity. I often think that but for his disguises, which are studiously preposterous, he would more often make us weep than shout. Of course, this association of dignity with humour goes back to the original idea of the Clown, or Pierrot. Pierrot is always terribly in earnest: he suffers; he is made a fool of; he brings many of his troubles upon himself; he is a type of heaven-born imbecile, and it is his dress and artificially whitened face alone which give us the charter to take his difficulties as a joke.

When we come to the impersonations in so-called tragedy and high comedy and serious drama—when the make-up is intended to be impressive, and the dresses are most elaborately designed with an eye to all that is picturesque and portentous, either the language put into the player's mouth or the player's own demeanour are so deficient in right feeling, that while we restrain the outward expression of our amusement, we move uneasily and wonder whether the age is become flippant, or we ourselves are out of touch with these enormous emotions. Then, just as this doubt enters our heads, the comic note is struck unexpectedly and absurdly. We don't always call it comic—we call it false: the author is attacked—the actor, if he is not popular, is very much blamed. I think it wrong to blame anyone. All the modern traditions of the English stage are against the realisation of life as a very natural affair. If you give an emotional part to any intelligent actor or actress, they begin to think out the most elaborate business: they invent most ingenious tricks in the way of expression, gesture, and attitude. They want ten lines where as many words would be, perhaps, too much, and it is hard to convince the average stage-manager that the greatest and most terrible moments in experience are essentially untheatrical.

Frederick the Great was ardently fond of the drama, and, while he had the keenest appreciation for satire, he liked to lose himself, or be reminded of his own experiences, in watching what we should call a sensational play. "But," he writes, in one of his private letters, "the moment any actor over-acts and allows his art to stifle naturalness, I become chilled to the bone, I lose all interest, and I am no longer moved by the most pathetic situation." Now Frederick had lived all his life in an atmosphere of highly-charged emotions; no one will deny that his knowledge of the human heart under all conditions, strains, reverses, and passions, must have been altogether supreme. Yet he insists on simplicity—quietude even. A critic might reply that an ordinary patron of the drama has not the vast experience of Frederick the Great, and therefore he prefers exaggeration; he cannot be reached unless the performer indulges in really extravagant gestures and rhetoric. Here I would venture to disagree with such a critic. I grant that we have not all great experience, but we all have certain instincts for what is comic. We find this sense of the ridiculous very strong in many children, who can have no experience of the great passions which agitate mankind, and I have often observed them stifling their laughter during the efforts of some popular tragic actor or actress in a very strong third act. In other words, they detect, in their innocence, the burlesque of the human soul.

I am not pleading now for what is called realism, because the word realism has become almost exclusively associated with everything that is squalid. To call any work of art realistic is another expression for dismissing it as repulsive and ignominious. People are afraid of studies of so-called humble life or poor life because they might be disagreeable. I quarrel with this entirely, and I deny that poor surroundings detract from the dignity—I am using the word pretty often—of the individual. The things that are undignified are matters of the soul, they are not matters of the environment, and this is why gorgeous mountings, dresses, slow music, and the really splendid effects of the scene-painter's art, as we see them nowadays, only serve to bring out the inadequacy of many performances which are intended to be heroic. And, before I go any further, I hope you will all understand that I am attacking current ideas with regard to acting, I am not attacking individuals. English actors and actresses of the first rank compare with the actors and actresses of any other nation, but they have to contend against traditions which do not exist in any other country. They are the slaves of some secret body of conventions which they dislike as much as I dislike them, and most of you dislike them, nevertheless, they regard them as unalterable. It is not too much to say that some of our most distinguished artists have zealously forced themselves to appear in plays which they are far too intelligent to think plausible, and to depend upon tricks in the creation of their own roles, which they are too well-informed to imagine could be acceptable to reasonable beings.

I have often questioned friends of mine—clergy, soldiers, members of the legal and other professions, who see, of course, much more of the effects of actual emotion than any one individual in an ordinary career can ever hope to see—about what are called “big situations,” and I assure you, that they all subscribe to the criticism of Frederick the Great, and I could give you some extraordinary overwhelming evidence to prove the quietness of the human being under the most terrible and tragic strains—and this is without reference to class or education or temperament.

I want to dwell particularly upon this last point of class, education and temperament, because we all know that the manners of those who are too exalted for correction, in common with those who are too humble to be trained, are remarkable for the want of self-discipline. An eminent statesman once remarked in a former century that certain exhibitions of feeling were possible only to empresses and pauper fish-hags. But, in the many intervening classes between these two extremes, we all know that certain kinds of education make for self-restraint, and other kinds make for an untrammelled display of feeling and thought which it is the habit to call vulgar. I can but speak from my own observation, and I have noticed sublime examples of self-command and dignity among the obscure and the uneducated, whereas the most highly educated can be violent in their tempers, gross in their language, and undisciplined in all their actions. These things are a matter of constitution—what I might call fibre. Beyond doubt certain temperaments have less self-control than others, and indulge in outward signs of emotion which are acknowledged to be effective, and possibly necessary, upon the stage. Still, this much is certain—and there is no exception to the rule—in moments of acute feeling, no one is in the very smallest degree, in spite of any peculiarity of dress or appearance or circumstances, comic. There is a terrible simplicity in any shock which is strong enough to overpower our self-consciousness. But it must overpower the self-consciousness, and that is exactly where these elaborate studies of the stage fail. We are not carried away; we notice the cleverness when we ought to have lost ourselves in the emotion. If people are really moved, whether in themselves as sufferers or as onlookers, they are entirely unconscious of what they are saying or doing.

But it might be objected by playwrights that a drama about well-behaved, wholly sane, reserved and fastidious natures would be no drama at all. I confess very little would be done; there would only be very long thinking parts. We should see the revival of the soliloquy in an aggravated form. We should soon have no dialogue at all. Well, I am not so sure, in many cases, that would not be a gain. It would rid us of this awful fear which haunts the composer of problems that his words would not “carry.” It must always be remembered in writing for the stage that a great deal must be allowed for the manner and expression of the actor. Three words written on a sheet of paper may signify little, but spoken in the right way by the right person they may convey a whole world.

This is the great reason why I think it is a mistake to allow managers to read the MS. of a play. A play is written to be acted. It is written for the voice; it is written for any amount of right by-play, and it is not meant at all for the reader in the arm-chair. I have seen some MSS. prepared for managers, and the stage directions were tedious to a degree that I should have thought inconceivable had I not read them with my own eyes.

Apparently the parts are written on the hypothesis that the players are mere marionettes. On the other hand, I must say, in defence of the author, that there is a kind of laziness now on the part of our actors. They are afraid to trust themselves for a second without a sentence. All English players dread a pause. Personally, I do not care how long a speech is so long as it seems to come spontaneously from the speaker. It is quite right to give certain characters long speeches because in real life we meet people from time to time who have a real gift for describing their feelings and thoughts at every turn. If one can think of such a person and make him or her into a one-man or one-woman part, one may be congratulated.

There is nothing to be said against rhetoric on principle. We have all met born rhetoricians, just as there are born sentimentalists, but the best rhetoric ever written loses its point unless it is plentifully punctuated by pauses. Often a speech which is not in itself outrageous is made to seem so because the actor hurries through it as though he were speaking faster than he thought, and then we get what I may call again the comic note. Each utterance should seem to be the result of some experience; it should be connected with some earlier line of a scene in the play, or it should itself be leading up to some further development: the whole essence, in fact, of composition turns upon this. Wagner, in his operas, brought it out clearly as a system of motives. The actor, therefore, should convey the effect of someone who knows what he is talking about.

My plea is for naturalness, and any study of an emotional or of a philosophical rôle ought to be taken from life and not—as is now the case—from our little catalogue of tricks. It is the trickery which provokes indifference. Say, someone comes on looking very much like—well—an ordinary lover—I will not take an abnormal type. But, I ask you, does the leading juvenile behave like a lover or speak like one? The author may give him the most touching and charming things to say, but for some reason we find ourselves wondering why we are so singularly uninterested in the failure or success of the young man's suit. I remember taking a French friend with me to see a highly successful farcical comedy. He said, at the end, “I know now what the British expression ‘love-making’ means. It is something like a quadrille for two. The couple exchange seats, join hands at intervals, cross at intervals, and talk at the top of their voices the whole time.” I then took him to a work of a less frivolous character, but he pretended to discover the same characteristics pitched in a more solemn key, and, to him, the gravity of the superior lovers was even funnier than the irresponsibility of the lighter pair.

Now, as an author, my sympathies are naturally with my own profession. I am fully alive to the difficulties of the playwright. If he decides to be serious, he is expected to be more serious than life itself. He has to conceal his humour, that decent gaiety which underlies existence always. And I maintain that if you do not give that decent gaiety in the dialogue or the demeanour of the players, you will get a scornful gaiety in the audience. The common sense of humanity—perhaps I should say the common wisdom of the pit—will assert itself.

A great change has been coming over the public in its attitude toward humour, toward sentiment, and toward all abstract ideas. In that striking work, “The Flood Tide,” which was, to me, one of the most remarkable signs of the times, Mr. Cecil Raleigh hit off with admirable daring the precise feeling which now exists with regard to the old traditions of moral and other conduct on the stage. I say other conduct deliberately, because there are so many shades of opinion on the subject of conduct which was formerly described as immoral—again, I must remind you that I am speaking

THE BYSTANDER

No. 6 NOW READY,

AND CONTAINS

80 PAGES,

96 ILLUSTRATIONS,

BESIDES A

COLOURED SUPPLEMENT

By the late PHIL MAY.

Have you seen the New BRIDGE COMPETITION

WITH

Valuable Money Prizes?

THE BYSTANDER is Bright, Topical, and Smart. It is acknowledged to be the Best Sixpenny Journal now published.

PRICE SIXPENCE EVERYWHERE.

OF ALL BOOKSELLERS AND NEWSAGENTS.

ORDER AT ONCE.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY.

Office: Tails Street, Whitefriars, London, E.C.

of stage morals. In Mr. Raleigh's play no one behaved particularly well, some behaved badly, most were shameless, and all were frank. As a result, the audience knew where they were. The old sham stuff was being discarded and laughed at, and they were asked to join in the general relief.

In a recent production, of the two lines which bring down the house, one could not have been said on the English stage at all two years ago, and the other would have been permitted to the heroine only if she had been an adventuress. It will be interesting to watch further developments on this line of the least resistance. I think it would be a pity if we became, as a nation, flippant. It does not suit us, because it is only an outward flippancy. It is not in the race to take things, which we have been taught to regard as sacred, lightly, but the evident rebellion against utterly false conventions of which I have already spoken, is a sign of great health and vigour in the present generation. It will no longer stand nonsense; and I have not seen a genuine success in any department of art which has not had a great deal to recommend it on one score or another—either the spectacle, or the stage management, or the ability of the company, or the merit of the author's work has commanded support.

Mr. Tree's last production, "The Darling of the Gods," is a triumph of the scene-painter's and the stage manager's art, and the melodrama—to use a colloquial expression—gets along! Mr. Belasco has thought out a very peculiar art of his own, for which I anticipate some possibly great improvements. It will show you how unselfish I am in the matter when I add that I think the author will not figure to any large extent in the scheme. Mr. Belasco has mastered the secret of giving vitality—I do not mean atmosphere, I mean vitality—to a stage picture. That is to say, his scenes are alive, and they are so alive that the greatest vivacity is demanded from the actor who appears in them, in order to compete with the natural forces as understood by the eminent American manager. The vivacity of the sky, for instance, is almost unparalleled, and light no sooner goes out in one corner than it peeps out in another. The very earth opens and shuts and there is apparently not an inch of canvas in his theatre which does not "palpitate," as the reviewers say, "with actuality!" But it is all so admirably carried out and so pleasing to the eye that, quite honestly, one wishes as little said as possible. An author who wished to keep pace with ingenuity of this kind must condense his meaning and must be simple, because it is not a dumb show, and it is not pantomime. I think Mr. Belasco is on the right track in the simplification of his subject matter. I should like to see his method applied to a piece dealing with modern life and familiar scenes. His presentment of "Zaza" followed the French original closely, and it cannot be regarded as an English or American production at all.

I have the most sincere admiration for the work of our chief dramatic authors, but is there one of whom we can say, as the greatest French critic of the last century said of Béranger—that he expressed the soul of France as a race and as a nation? His good sense as a man kept him from insincerity as a poet. We all know the dangers of the poetical temperament in the direction of sentimentality. Have we a serious writer who expresses, in dramatic form, the soul and the life of the English people? Yet how can that soul be expressed while managers persist in the view that the public—and that means the English people—are densely stupid, vulgar, and unimaginative. The view is foolish, and its foolishness is proved by the fact that, in America and in England, clap-trap is no longer tolerated by those who pay for their seats. When I see a full house applauding balderdash, I wonder how many of the enraptured have bought their tickets with hard-earned money. So far our strictly national theatrical art is found in Gaiety comedy and Drury Lane melodrama—these things are racy, thoroughly English and representative. There is nothing in the least resembling them elsewhere. The dialogue in Drury Lane melodrama is life-like—there may be violence in the situations, but the talk is at least human speech as we often hear it. As for Gaiety comedy and comedy at Daly's, I am never weary of praising them, and, as a national entertainment of a light class they stand on the highest plane in the world. There is nothing comparable to these productions in New York, Berlin, Paris, Munich, St. Petersburg, or in the East, and the reason is because it has not yet been sterilized, cramped, and ruined by traditions. It is a growing art. It is now at a very high point of prosperity, and it may begin to decline under the stress of a change in the popular mind, changes which occur in every department with almost mathematical precision. But when we turn to the drama proper, we find writers and players alike bound down by the fantastic notions of what will or what will not carry across the footlights.

I maintain that sincerity will carry anywhere, and that the curled little finger must inevitably fail. If I wished to condense my view of the present situation in England of theatrical affairs, I should say, with the eminent surgeon I have quoted, that all the little fingers were curled. The conventions have grown into affectations, and, until they are thrown aside, we shall have titterings in the auditorium and bitter complaints among authors, and bitter scenes among that lonesome and mysterious race known as "the backers."

Traditions, I admit, are useful, and they ought to be respected, but the two points in regarding any tradition of the stage are these:—In the first place, how shall it be understood, and, in the second place, how far shall it be maintained? Many traditions which suited the popular education twenty, or ten, or even five years ago, are really out of the question to-day. We may describe popular opinion as being in a transition stage on most subjects, and experiments must be tried. I do not recommend experiments in the way of dolorous and ignoble studies of humanity, but I do wish to urge experiments in the direction of greater naturalness in the written dialogue, and greater simplicity in the actor's business. There are two ways of being simple: one can be true to life or true to art. Sometimes it is possible to be true to both, and then we get the triumph of an actor or of an author, but such triumphs occur but seldom in the course of a whole century. We will not soar toward such ambitions. But I am speaking now of the good, workable, straightforward play about people as they are, or, if we are inclined to romance, people as they would wish to be if all things were equal. These can, at least, be true to life. Let us give Art a rest for a little. I think Art can take care of herself. I have always thought so. She never came to anyone for the asking, and in all her ways she is as capricious as Fortune. In this attention to life and the observation of humanity as opposed to the study of defunct canons of stage craft and obsolete sham heroics, I see all the hope for the British drama.

My entreaty, then, is not to write plays in imitation of other plays, and not to compare plays with other plays, but to test each separate play and every performance by the truths of life and experience.

The Far East—Books to Read Now

JAPAN AND CHINA.

By Captain F. BRINKLEY,

For many years Special Correspondent of The Times at Tokyo.

PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED.

Only a limited edition available for the United Kingdom, viz. :—500 Library Edition in 12 vols., at 14s. net per volume, and 35 Edition de Luxe at 42s. net per volume.

Ten Volumes now ready.

"Enormously in advance of all existing literature on the subject."—The Athenæum.
"Promises to be the standard work on the subject for a long time to come."—The Times.

DETAILED PROSPECTUS ON APPLICATION.

London: T. C. & E. C. JACK, 34, Henrietta St., W.C.; and Edinburgh.

JAPAN. JAPAN. JAPAN.

FAIRY TALES FROM FAR JAPAN. Translated by Miss BALLARD, of St. Hilda's Mission, Tokio. With a Prefatory Note by Mrs. ISABELLA L. BISHOP, F.R.G.S. Illustrated by 47 Engravings from Japanese originals. Fcap. 4to, 2s. 6d., cloth gilt.

STORIES ABOUT JAPAN. By ANNIE R. BUTLER. With 12 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 1s., cloth gilt.

RAMBLES IN JAPAN: the Land of the Rising Sun. By the Rev. Canon TRISTRAM, D.D., LL.D. With 45 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, gilt top, 10s. 6d., cloth gilt.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, 4, BOUVERIE STREET, E.C.

INDIA IMPRESSIONS.

By C. F. KEARY.

"If anyone wishes to read a distinguished piece of writing, which pleases the artistic sense, places the India of the Indians before him in an unhackneyed style, contains some practical words and many details, yet also the mystery and glamour of the East, let him take up this modest booklet."—Bookman.

Letters from John Chinaman

SIXTH THOUSAND.

"A very remarkable and exceptionally able book."—Pall Mall Gazette.

1s. net. R. BRIMLEY JOHNSON, Adam St., Strand. 1s. net.

Just Published.

STANFORD'S NEW MAP OF THE SIBERIAN RAILWAY.

Scale, 110 miles to an inch. One sheet, 46 in. by 30 in. Prices:—Sheet, 10s. 6d.; mounted to fold in case, 15s. mounted on rollers and varnished, 18s.

STANFORD'S MAP OF EASTERN CHINA, JAPAN, & KOREA.

Scale, 110 miles to an inch. Size, 22 in. by 30 in. Prices:—Coloured sheet, 3s.; mounted to fold in case, 5s. List of the best Books and Maps bearing upon the Far Eastern Crisis and other Eastern Questions post free on application.

London: EDWARD STANFORD, 12, 13, & 14, Long Acre, W.C.
Geographer to His Majesty the King.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS.

Cambridge Historical Series.

Edited by G. W. PROTHERO, Litt.D., LL.D.

The Expansion of Russia, 1815-1900.

By F. H. SKRINE, F.S.S., H.M.'s Indian Civil Service (retired). Crown 8vo. With 3 Maps. 6s.

Pall Mall Gazette.—"The best account yet printed in England of the growth of Russia during the last century. . . . This book will not only be useful to the general reader, but it forms a handy reference-book which any student of the Eastern Question will be glad to have within easy reach."

LONDON:

C. J. CLAY & SONS, Cambridge University Press Warehouse, Ave Maria Lane.

KOREA and TIBET.

KOREAN SKETCHES: A Missionary's Observations in the Hermit Nation. By the Rev. JAMES S. GALE. With 8 Illustrations. 3s. 6d.
THE BOOKMAN.—"Mr. Gale has lived for years among the Hermit people, and his pictures of the life of one of the quaintest and oldest of living races are most entertaining and instructive."

WITH THE TIBETANS IN TENT AND TEMPLE. A Narrative of four years' Residence on the Tibetan Border, and of a Journey into the far Interior. By SIRIE CARSON RIJNHART, M.D. With 14 Illustrations. 6s.
THE TIMES.—"Mrs. Rijnhart's narrative of her four years' residence amongst the Tibetans is as pathetic as anything in literature. It is a tale of enterprise, suffering, tragedy, and heroic endurance, which deserves to be widely read."

OLIPHANT, ANDERSON & FERRIER, 21, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.; & EDINBURGH.

ASIA and EUROPE.

Studies presenting the conclusions formed by the Author in a long life devoted to the subject of the relations between Asia and Europe.

By MEREDITH TOWNSEND.

New and Cheaper Edition with an additional chapter. Crown 8vo. Price 5s. net.

A. CONSTABLE & Co., Ltd., WESTMINSTER.

JUST PUBLISHED.

Things Chinese:

OR, NOTES CONNECTED WITH CHINA.

BY

J. DYER BALL, M.R.A.S., M.N.C.B.R.A.S., H.M. Civil Service, Hong Kong; Author of "Cantonese Made Easy," "How to Speak Cantonese."

Fourth Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Demy 8vo, 12s. net.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

A United States Senator on the Far Eastern Situation.

THE RUSSIAN ADVANCE.

By the Hon. ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE.

With Maps. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d.

An important work, treating of a subject of universal and timely interest and of grave international significance.

HARPER & BROTHERS, 45, Albemarle Street, W.

THE BOOK OF THE HOUR

THE PATH OF EMPIRE.

By GEORGE LYNCH.

Up-to-date on Questions Russian, Japanese, Korean, Manchurian. 90 Illustrations and a Map. Large demy 8vo, 10s. net.

"No one has given so admirable a picture of Russian activity."—Athenæum.
"Absolutely necessary for the understanding of the Far Eastern question."—Daily Mail.

"Just at this moment the very highest interest belongs to the new book by Mr. George Lynch."—Vanity Fair.

FEUDAL AND MODERN JAPAN.

By ARTHUR MAY KNAPP. Two vols., with 24 Photogravure Illustrations of Japanese life, landscape, and architecture. Small fcap. 8vo, 4-bound, white cloth, blue sides, gilt top. 8s. net.

DUCKWORTH & Co., 3, Henrietta Street, W.C.

SPECIAL WAR EDITIONS.

THE STORY OF JAPAN.

By DAVID MURRAY, Ph., LL.D. Late Adviser to the Japanese Minister of Education.

With 34 Illustrations and a Map. Story of the Nations. Cloth, 5s.

THE STORY OF RUSSIA.

By W. R. MORFILL, M.A. Reader in Russian and other Slavonic Languages.

With 60 Illustrations including Maps. Story of the Nations. 5s.

London: T. FISHER UNWIN, London, E.C.

QUEER THINGS ABOUT JAPAN.

By DOUGLAS SLADEN.

Forty pages coloured and uncoloured illustrations by the famous Japanese artist HOKUSAI.

Declared by the whole press to be the most amusing picture of Japan ever penned.

21s. net; in special Japanese binding, 25s. net.

OUT IN CHINA.

By Mrs. ARCHIBALD LITTLE. 1s.

ANTHONY TREHERNE & Co., Ltd., 3, Agar St., London, W.C.

Continued on page 91.

GAY & BIRD'S LIST.

REBECCA must be a pretty good story, as many publishers have approached the Author recently, one guaranteeing sale of 40,000 Copies.

REBECCA is by the foremost American woman of letters, Kate Douglas Wiggin.
—San Francisco Post.

REBECCA is just delightful.
BARON DE BOOK-WORMS.

REBECCA is thoroughly refreshing.
BARON DE BOOK-WORMS.

REBECCA bubbles over with delicate humour and tender pathos.—Daily Telegraph.

REBECCA will be read and re-read. Tears and laughter will greet her.
—Glasgow Herald.

REBECCA is a clever and most attractive story.
—Birmingham Post.

REBECCA is a story which, by its gaiety, its tenderness, and its wit, deserves a place on the shelf that holds Mrs. Ewing's "Six to Sixteen."—Spectator.

REBECCA is one of the most attractive children we have ever met in a book.
—Manchester Guardian.

REBECCA is, indeed, a character to be remembered. . . . From the perusal of such books the reader rises stimulated and refreshed.—Liverpool Courier.

REBECCA is a story where insight and sympathy, the delicate touch and merry laugh, are blended with true artistry.
—Outlook.

REBECCA is now in its 100th thousand in America and 11th here, and is published at 6s. by GAY & BIRD, 22, Bedford Street, London, W.C.

JAPAN AND THE JAPANESE. THREE OF THE BEST BOOKS PUBLISHED.

Demy 8vo, bound in silk, with attractive side design, 12s. 6d. net; postage 3d.

JAPANESE GIRLS AND WOMEN.

By ALICE M. BACON.

New Edition, Revised and Enlarged, with 12 Full-Page Illustrations in Colour and 50 Outline Drawings by the distinguished Japanese Artist, KEISHU TAKENOUCHI.

Sir EDWIN ARNOLD says: "The chapters she has penned are delightful."

Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 5s. post free.

A JAPANESE INTERIOR.

By ALICE M. BACON.

New Edition, crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s. net; postage 3d.

KOKORO.

By LAFOADIO HEARN.

JUST PUBLISHED, crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net; postage 3d.

POEMS OF POWER.

By ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

This New Volume of Poems contains THE QUEEN'S LAST RIDE, MY SHIPS, &c., and will become as popular as her "Poems of Passion" and "Poems of Pleasure."

NOW READY. Price One Shilling net.

THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY.

JANUARY.

Mr. CLEMENT SHORTER says:—"The Atlantic is one of the very best of our magazines, English or American."

London: GAY & BIRD, 22, Bedford Street, Strand.
Agency for American Books. New List post free.

ELLIOT STOCK'S New Publications.

SECOND EDITION, REVISED. In crown 8vo, tastefully printed in old-faced type, 6s. net.

MANX NAMES; or, The Surnames and Place Names of the Isle of Man. By A. W. MOORE, C.V.O., M.A., Speaker of the House of Keys. With a Preface by Professor RAY.

"Mr. Moore has done, and done well, a kind of work which is, so far as we know, unique in its class."—Notes and Queries.

"The pages teem with matter that is suggestive and interesting to the student of archaeology and anthropology."—Antiquary.

In demy 8vo, handsomely bound and illustrated, price 6s. net.

BYGONE LONDON LIFE:

Pictures from a Vanished Past. By G. L. APPERSON, I.S.O., Author of "An Idler's Calendar." With many illustrations.

"The book is fascinating from the first page to the last. The antiquarian, no less than the general reader, will find it all that he could desire."—Sunday Sun.

"A series of sketches and portraits which will afford genuine instruction to the student of London."—Daily Graphic.

In crown 8vo, price 1s. net.

A WOMAN'S WORK AND HOW TO LIGHTEN IT.

By SOPHIA H. E. LANGMAID.

In foolscap 8vo, vegetable parchment, 2s. 6d.

JUNIUS LETTERS.

The Author-Mystery Cleared. By VICARIUS.

Thirty-nine names have been put forward, and yet neither one of these can bear away the palm. Let them all rest quietly, the author-mystery is now cleared up.

THIRD AND REVISED EDITION.

Much enlarged. In crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

THE HOME NURSE.

A Handbook for Sickness and Emergencies (formerly known as "Sick Nursing at Home"). By S. F. A. CAULFIELD, Author of "The Lives of the Apostles," "True Philosophy," "Restful Work for Youthful Hands." Co-Author of "The Dictionary of Needlework, Lace and Textiles, House Motives and Inscriptions."

CHEAP AND REVISED EDITION.

In large crown 8vo, handsomely bound in cloth, and fully illustrated, price 7s. 6d. net.

SWEET HAMPSTEAD AND

ITS ASSOCIATIONS. By Mrs. CAROLINE WHITE. With numerous illustrations of Eminent Persons, Historic Houses, and Picturesque Localities.

"Hampstead is extraordinarily rich in literary associations, which Mrs. White chronicles with a charm of style born of true enthusiasm."—Outlook.

NEW VOLUMES OF VERSE.

In crown 8vo, cloth, bevelled boards, gilt lettered, price 2s. 6d.

AFRICAN ITEMS: A

Volume of Verse. By PERCIVAL GIBBON.

"The book is full of vigour."—British Weekly.

"Will, no doubt, rank high in the poesy of the year."—Western Mail.

CHEAP EDITION. In crown 8vo, paper cover, price 1s. net.

POEMS.

By ELIZABETH M. ALFORD.

"Those poems are admirable of their kind, being touched with fine thought and flavoured with high sentiment and tenderness of feeling."—Glasgow Herald.

ELLIOT STOCK,

62, PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

MACMILLAN & Co.'s NEW BOOKS.

VOLS. I. AND II. NOW READY.

A HISTORY OF MODERN ENGLAND.

By HERBERT PAUL.

In 5 vols. Vols. I. and II. 8vo, 8s. 6d. net each.

VOLUME IV. JUST PUBLISHED.

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH PEOPLE.

By J. R. GREEN. Illustrated Edition. In four vols. Edited by Mrs. J. R. GREEN and Miss KATE NORGATE. With 1,400 illustrations. Super Royal 8vo, 7s. 6d. net each.

EDITION DE LUXE OF THE WORKS OF RUDYARD KIPLING. NEW VOLUME

JUST SO STORIES FOR LITTLE CHILDREN.

Illustrated by the Author. Medium 8vo, saten cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

ENGLISH MEN OF LETTERS.—New Series.

JEREMY TAYLOR.

By EDMUND GOSSE, M.A., LL.D. Crown 8vo, gilt top, 2s. net.

THOMAS HARDY'S DRAMA.

THE DYNASTS: a Drama of the Napoleonic Wars.

In Three Parts, Nineteen Acts, and One Hundred and Thirty Scenes. By THOMAS HARDY. Part First. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

THE DIVINE VISION, and other Poems.

By A. E. Crown 8vo, 3s. net.

NEW EDITION IN ONE VOLUME.

The Complete Poetical Works of CHRISTINA G. ROSSETTI.

With Memoir and Notes, &c., by W. M. ROSSETTI. Crown 8vo, green cloth, 7s. 6d.

NEW VOLUME OF POEMS BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE MAN FROM SNOWY RIVER."

RIO GRANDE'S LAST

RACE, and other Verses. By A. B. PATERSON. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE BEST NEW 6s. NOVELS.

F. MARION CRAWFORD.

The Heart of Rome.

H. G. WELLS.

Twelve Stories and a Dream.

CHARLES MAJOR.

A Forest Hearth.

STEPHEN GWYNN.

John Maxwell's Marriage.

ROSA N. CAREY.

A Passage Perilous.

GWENDOLEN OVERTON.

The Captain's Daughter.

Macmillan's Edition of Thackeray.

LATEST ADDITION.

CRITICAL PAPERS IN LITERATURE.

With illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 3s. 6d.

MACMILLAN & Co., Limited, London.

The Academy and Literature

No. 1655. Established 1869. London: 23 January 1904.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17/6 a year.]

Literary Notes

THERE are many of us who have heard the East a-calling but who have not been able to accept the invitation to visit the far-distant lands of China, Korea and Japan. For us unfortunates, therefore, books have to suffice, and by good fortune there are few lands to which so many admirable writers have devoted themselves. Chamberlain, Lafcadio Hearn, Brownell, Mrs. Fraser, Huish, La Farge, Morse, Parsons, Sladen, Mrs. Bishop, Oliphant, Colquhoun, Douglas, Mrs. Little, Mitford, Rein, and a host of other names come gratefully to the memory of those who have read the literature of the Far East.

It may be questioned, however, if anyone, even of those who have dwelt among them, has ever really fathomed the minds of the Oriental races. Eastern people think differently to Westerns upon almost every subject of importance; the standpoint from which they view this life and the next is far other than ours. Many of their customs and habits, which to us seem unreasonable, are to them perfectly logical. The upside-downness of Japanese life is easily understood when we put ourselves in their place, endeavouring to look as far as may be upon affairs with their eyes and to judge them with their understanding. Who shall say whether East or West is right? "Put yourself in his place" is an admirable motto when attempting to see the sweet-reasonableness of the conduct of those of another race and clime. Actual experience is the best teacher, but literature lingers not far behind. A short list of "Far East" books is given on pages 93 and 94 of this issue of THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE.

THE writer of fiction is wont to order his weather in accordance with the incidents of his story, which is surely neither true to nature nor artistic. Many a deed of blood has been perpetrated beneath a summer sky and is all the more ghastly by reason of the contrast; many a kindly action done in darkness and bitter cold. Nature has no sympathies. The novelist's thought runs, I imagine, in hereditary tracks, in ways trodden bare by remote ancestors who saw portents in the storms and signs and wonders in the heavens. This is only one of the many things in which we act irrationally despite all the advances achieved by increased knowledge.

THERE are many series dealing with the lives of great writers; but one more might be started with advantage. I have in mind a series of volumes containing no written words save the legends to the pictures, which would consist of reproductions of engravings and photographs of places of interest in the writer's life and of pictures and illustrations depicting events and the places where those events took place in the writer's works. The very excellent Bookman series most nearly approaches this idea, which could surely be carried out with profit to publisher and purchasers alike.

THE Tauchnitz format has often, and rightly, been matter for praise; how is it that no publisher has succeeded in acclimatising it over here? Would it not prove a pleasant change from the usual "manner" of our cheap reprints? There are many biographies, autobiographies, travel books, and so forth which might well be re-issued cheaply in this form. British books are too often clumsy and uncomfortable to the hand as well as unseemly to the eye; America has set us many a good example in this matter.

MR. ERNEST WILLIAM HORNUNG

[Photo, Frederick Hollyer, Kensington.]

It was argued recently that in course of time the daily newspaper would for the mass of the people take the place of books, of fiction at any rate. It is impossible to deny that there is some truth in this point of view, if to the daily press we add the numberless weekly papers of a more or less "tit-bitty" character. The present generation is apparently anxious to have their reading done for them and to depend for their knowledge of at any rate new books upon reviews, "Books of the Week" with copious extracts, and so on. This is the age of "extracts," meat extracts and literary too; good, sound, all-round readers are becoming exceptional, and the spread of education has only increased the thirst for knowledge at second hand.

THE romance by Dr. Max Nordau, "Morganatisch," appearing in the "Kölnische Zeitung," will conclude about the end of March, and will be published in volume form, in the autumn, when also Alfred Schall, of Berlin, will issue a volume by the same writer called "Mahâ Rôg."

PROFESSOR MAHAFFY must surely be one of the hardest workers of the day; his volume on Trinity College has recently been issued, and he is now at work upon "The Ireland of Charles II.," a companion volume. The "Particular Book of Trinity College," containing accounts and entries made by the college officers, 1595-1660, in facsimile, with an introduction, will probably see the light during the summer. Professor Mahaffy has accepted an invitation from the Education Committee of the St. Louis Exhibition to deliver an address on Greek, a similar invitation with regard to English literature having been declined by Professor Dowden, who does not feel strong enough to face the journey; a double compliment to Irish scholarship.

A CORRESPONDENT sends a copy of a sale catalogue, issued in a famous city in Scotland, containing the following quaint entry: "Salmond (Professor S.D.F.), The Christian Doctrine of Immorality." This unique work fetched only two shillings and twopence!

THE catalogue of Messrs. Mudie's Library must now be ranked among our most useful works of literary reference. The general works are carefully classified, but it is the portion of the volume devoted to fiction that is most elaborate; there are lists of novels under titles and under authors, and—a very useful feature—a selection of standard and recent works of fiction classified "historically, topographically, and topically." There are eighteen novels under the heading Japan, Korea is absent, and over seventy under Russia.

BOTH in this country and in America it is now the fashion for illustrated magazines to alter their cover from month to month. Publishers, of course, know all that is to be known about their business, but I feel sure that I am not solitary in being annoyed by the difficulty that now presents itself of picking out one's favourite magazine on the bookstall or the library table. Old acquaintance are apt to be forgot when they are continually changing their appearance.

JUDGING by the first number, Messrs. Newnes' new magazine "Technics" bids fair to become really useful to a large public. Of the contents we may note as particularly interesting the articles on Radium and Present Day Mural Decoration. The illustrations are numerous and practical.

THE "Quarterly Review" steadily pursues its mistaken course, as many think it, of signed articles. Curiously enough, in the article upon the late Lord Salisbury's contributions to the Review, it is pointed out that the writer's work is all the more interesting in that he was free to express his real and full views, being covered by the shield of anonymity. In reviews such as the "Quarterly" and the "Edinburgh," just as in The Times, it is realised by the public that the cover of anonymity will not be abused, while it leaves distinguished public men at liberty to express their views upon current affairs. The present issue of the "Quarterly" is somewhat dull, while, on the other hand, the "Edinburgh" is singularly bright and interesting. In the latter the article upon the "Folklore of Human Life" is suggestive and admirably written. The Quarterlies may not be quite wells of English undefiled, but in the present day of rapid and too often slipshod writing they are usefully dignified and, in the good sense of the word, academic. Another most suggestive, and, in passages, illuminating, article is that upon the work of Robert Herrick; altogether the "Edinburgh" may be said to contain much sound meat for the reader hungry for good things.

A QUITE delightful portrait in colour of Mr. Charles Dana Gibson, from a drawing by Mr. G. T. Tobin, forms the frontispiece to the January number of "The Lamp" (New York). In fact the whole number is good fare. Professor Brander Matthews discourses "Concerning the Quatrain," quoting among other lines these by Mr. Frank Dempster Sherman:—

Hark at the lips of this pink whorl of shell
And you shall hear the ocean's surge and roar;
So in the quatrain's measure, written well,
A thousand lines shall all be sung in four!

Then Mr. J. M. Bulloch writes suggestively of "Have Free Libraries Killed Literature?" Personally he does not seem inclined to answer his question in a pessimistic tone, thinking that the large number of reprints of English classics absorbed by the public shows that taste in literature is not declining. It is a difficult point to prove one way or the other; our forefathers had no opportunity of showing whether they cared to spend their shillings and sixpences on "good works," nor to-day have we any figures to teach us whether the number of readers of English classics is increasing satisfactorily in proportion to the increase of population and of those who can read.

It is understood that the autobiography which the late Sir Herbert Oakeley left behind him, being unrevised and incomplete, will not be published as it stands, but will be made the basis of a memoir of the composer from the pen of his brother, Mr. Edward Oakeley. This may be looked for shortly.

At the meeting of the English Goethe Society, at the Medical Hall, Chandos Street, on January 18, Mr. W. Irvine, I.C.S., in the chair, Mr. Iselin read a very interesting paper on two Swiss writers of the latter half of the nineteenth century as yet but little known in England. Conrad Ferdinand Meyer's historical novel, "Der Heilige," represents Thomas à Becket in a new light; whilst Gottfried Keller's "Martin Salander," written after his retirement from the post of Secretary of State, contains profound and good common sense on political subjects, although to thoroughly appreciate it the reader requires much general knowledge of Swiss public life.

MR. AND MRS. EGERTON CASTLE'S "Incomparable Bellairs" will be published on March 7.

BOOKSELLERS' Catalogues Received :—Mr. C. Richardson, Manchester (Ancient and Modern); Messrs. Probsthain & Co., Bury Street (Oriental Catalogue, No. 3; India and Indian Languages); Mr. Bernard Quaritch, Piccadilly (General); Mr. Albert Sutton, Manchester (Shakespeare and Drama); Mr. Charles Higham, Farringdon Street (Theological); Mr. Charles Goodspeed, Boston, Mass. (First Editions); Mr. William Downing, Birmingham (Chaucer's Head Book Circular); Messrs. Henry Sotherton & Co., 140, Strand (Literature, Science and Art); Messrs. Pickering & Chatto, Haymarket (First and Early Editions); Messrs. A. Maurice & Co., Bedford Street (Biography, Travel, History, &c.); Messrs. Myers & Co., High Holborn (Rare Pamphlets, &c., relating to America, and General).

FORTHCOMING BOOKS, ETC.

MESSRS. ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & Co. have ready for immediate publication a new volume by Mr. John Garstang, F.S.A., entitled "Some Tombs of the Third Egyptian Dynasty at Raqânah and Bêt Khallâf." The book, which is fully illustrated, contains an account of the archaeology of a very early period, and in particular of the results of the writer's own excavations during 1901-2 in the district north of Abydos.—Dr. M. Aurel Stein has undertaken, with the official sanction of the Secretary of State for India, a complete account of the results of his researches in Chinese Turkestan. The book, which the Oxford University Press will publish probably in the spring of 1905, will be in royal quarto form, of about 500 pages, and will be fully illustrated with upwards of seventy separate collotype plates, and with a very large number of other illustrations, both as separate plates and throughout the text.—Mr. T. Fisher Unwin is including in his "Lives Worth Living" series a re-issue of "Captain John Brown of Harper's Ferry," by Mr. John Newton.—"Kitty Costello," the last novel written by the late Mrs. Alexander, will be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin on Monday, January 25. The volume will contain a brief memoir of Mrs. Alexander by her friend Miss Iza Duffus Hardy, and a few verses which were found among Mrs. Alexander's papers, and are an interesting expression of her outlook towards life.—Mr. John Lane announces that he will publish, on January 26, a new novel by Mr. Henry Harland, author of "The Cardinal's Snuff-Box." The title of the new book is "My Friend Prospero." The scene is laid at an old castle in Italy, and Prospero is an up-to-date young Englishman, of a whimsical nature, who has gone thither in quest of freedom and fresh air.—Mr. E. S. Boulton, of the Merchant Venturers' Technical College, Bristol, has prepared a "Geometry on Modern Lines." It contains many diagrams and will be published by Messrs. Methuen.

THE February part of "The Magazine of Art" includes among the principal contents reproductions, in colour, of Turner's "Totnes" and Whistler's wonderful unknown etching of his Mother's Portrait. The latter is from a unique proof in the collection of Mr. Menpes, which has never before been reproduced. This was sold for £250 recently. There are articles on "Town Houses," by Raffles Davison; "Good Furnishing and Decoration of the House: the Bedroom," by Aymer Vallance; "The Picture Sales of 1893," by W. Roberts; "A Chapter from an Artist's Reminiscences: The Oxford Circle," by Val C. Prinsep, R.A.; and "Art Forgeries and Counterfeits," by M. H. Spielmann, F.S.A. All these papers are profusely illustrated.

Continued from page 87.

The Far East— Books to Read Now.

KOREA.

By ANGUS HAMILTON.

Profusely Illustrated from Photographs by the Author. 1 Vol. 15s. net.

Mr. Hamilton, who was the special correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette in the Far East, examines in this important and timely work the political and economic conditions of the kingdom. There are chapters on the possibilities of the commercial development of the country, on the manners and customs and laws of the people, and, as a whole, the book may be considered to contain the latest and most authentic information upon the Russo-Japanese dispute.

RUSSIA,
JAPAN,
AND
KOREA.

London: WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

ENGLAND AND TIBET.

By A. HENRY SAVAGE LANDOR.

With a Map and 250 Illustrations. Cheaper Edition, 7s. 6d. net.

"A valuable storehouse of information on Southern Tibet and its people."—Daily Chronicle.

London: WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

THE PAUPER INVASION.

THE ALIEN IMMIGRANT.

By Major W. EVANS-GORDON, M.P.

With Illustrations from the Author's Photographs. 6s. net.

"Those who want a clear statement of the problem of the alien immigrant cannot do better than turn to this book."—Daily Telegraph.

London: WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

Nearly Ready.

A NEW AND COMPLETELY REVISED EDITION OF

The Imperial Russian Navy : ITS PAST, PRESENT, AND FUTURE.

By FRED. T. JANE,

Author of "All the World's Fighting Ships" (Naval Annual).

With over 150 Illustrations from Sketches and Drawings by the Author and from Photographs. Royal 8vo, cloth extra, 25s. net.

W. THACKER & Co., 2, Creed Lane, E.C.

THE BOOK OF THE MOMENT.

JAPANESE PHYSICAL TRAINING.

The System of Exercise, Diet, and General Mode of Living that has made the Mikado's People the Healthiest, Strongest, and Happiest Men and Women in the World.

By H. IRVING HANCOCK.

Fully Illustrated. crown 8vo, cloth extra, 5s. net.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS,
24, Bedford Street, Strand, London; and New York.

Bibliographical

"WHILE there is little if anything we would wish away, there are some we would desire to have had included." Thus wrote THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE last week concerning "Songs of the Vine," and I should like to associate myself with that expression of opinion. I am grateful for what Mr. Hutchison has brought together in his volume, but I miss in it some favourites of my own. I think, for instance, that he might well have reprinted the drinking song in Sara Coleridge's "Phantasmion," beginning—

Never ask where knaves are mining
While the nectar plants are twining;
To pull up the vine
They never incline,
With all their deep designing.

I note that Mr. Hutchison reproduces Thackeray's "The Pope he is a Happy Man," but there is much more of the convivial spirit in Charles Lever's version of the same original (which may be found in chapter 43 of "Harry Lorrequer"). Again, I do not see how Mr. Hutchison is to be forgiven for omitting from his collection the "Word for Champagne" which figures in Whyte Melville's "Tilbury Nogo" (chapter 13). This, surely, is a classic in its way:—

Then give me champagne! and contentment be mine!
Women, wealth, and ambition—I cast them away;
My garlanded forehead let vine-leaves entwine,
And life shall to me be one long summer's day,
With the tears of the clustering grape for its rain,
And its sunshine—the bright golden floods of champagne!

Another omission for which Mr. Hutchison must be solemnly censured is that of "My Old Complaint: its Cause and Cure," a song in Harrison Ainsworth's "Flich of Bacon":—

I never indulge in fanciful stuff,
Or idly prate, if my flagon be full:
Give me good Claret, and give me enough,
And then my spirits are never dull.
Give me good Claret and no restraint,
And I soon get rid of my Old Complaint!

Talking of champagne, I think Mr. Hutchison might have found room for Edmund Yates' celebration of a famous brand:—

Blessedest of drinks,
Welcome, Pommery Gréno!

And is there not a genuine enthusiasm for beer in the "Fons Burtonensis" of H. Savile Clarke?

The yellow hand that Allsopp rears,
His cognizance on wood or glass,
I honour; but more fair appears
The scarlet pyramid of Bass.

Finally—lest the discourse grow more bibulous than bibliographical—let me express surprise that Mr. Hutchison has ignored Professor Blackie's "metaphysical song," "Concerning I and Non-I," in which the singer shows how, when he drinks,

—the object
Is lost in the subject,
Making one entity
In the identity
Of me, and the wine in my veins!

The fact that Dr. Robertson Nicoll has thought it worth while to issue a "Charles Kingsley" number of "The Bookman" would seem to suggest that, in his opinion, Kingsley's name is still one to conjure with. Only the publishers of Kingsley's works, and the custodians of free libraries, could give us a really trustworthy idea of the extent to which those works are nowadays read. That some of them sell well may be gathered from the number of new editions (apart from Messrs. Macmillan's authorised ones) issued during the last few years. I find that in the case of "Westward Ho," there were three in 1898, six in 1899, four in 1900, one in 1901, and four in 1902. That is a remarkably good record. Then, in the case of "The Heroes," there were new editions in 1899, 1901, 1902, and

THE RIGHT REV.: ABBOT GASQUET

[Photo. The Studio, Neurgate Street.]

1903; of "Alton Locke" in 1899 and 1902; and of "Hypatia" in 1900. Of "Two Years Ago" there were no fewer than four new editions in 1899. Of course, the expiration of copyright often leads to numerous reprints of popular fictions.

The late Miss Hannah Lynch touched literature most closely, in her "George Meredith: A Study" (1891). She was also responsible for a couple of solid little books called "Toledo: The Story of an Old Spanish Capital" (1899) and "French Life in Town and Country" (1901). What appears to have been her first work of fiction—"Through Troubled Waters"—dates from 1885. After that came "Prince of the Glades" (1891, in 2 vols.), "Rosni Harvey" (1892, in 3 vols.), "Daughters of Men" (1892, reprinted in 1899), "Denys D'Auvrillac: A Story of French Life" (1896), "Dr. Vermont's Fantasy" (1896), "An Odd Experiment" (1897), "Jimmy Blake" (1897), "The Autobiography of a Child" (1899), and "Clare Munro: The Story of a Mother and Daughter" (1900).

Messrs. Pickering and Chatto have just issued "English Literature, noted Bibliographically and Biographically: a Catalogue, with Prices Affixed, of a very extensive Collection of the First and Early Editions of Ancient and Modern English Literature." This is very much more than a bookseller's catalogue of the ordinary sort. It runs to 504 large well-printed pages, and, apart altogether from the biographical and bibliographical particulars, is calculated to be of very much service to bookmen. The only drawback to it lies in the fact that there are 112 pages of "Addenda" (also arranged alphabetically); so that the book really contains two catalogues, both of which invite consultation.

THE BOOKWORM.

The Far East

Books about China, Japan, Russia and Korea

It is only natural that there should be at the present moment a large demand for books about the Far East—books new and old, books dealing with politics, race questions, national resources, manners, religions, and topography. There is perhaps too great a tendency to study politics in preference to topography, manners and customs rather than the inner life of the people. But in order to understand the aims, ideals and hopes of statesmen it is necessary to understand also the people whom they represent. Japanese, indeed all Oriental, are far different from Western ideals, and this must be borne in mind by all those who would grasp the meaning and the probable future of the history that is now being made in the Far East.

The following list of books, with occasional comments, does not pretend to approach completeness, but it is given in the hope that it may prove useful to those of our readers who desire to increase their knowledge of the Far East.

JAPAN.

HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT:—

- "Japan in Transition," by S. Ransome. (1899. Harper.) A comparative study of its progress since the war with China; a sound, useful work.
- "Advance, Japan," by J. Morris. (1895. Allen.) General history and present condition, social and military.
- "The New Far East," by Arthur Diósy. (1900. Cassell.) Useful for the understanding of political conditions.
- "A History of Japan," by Sir F. O. Adams. (1874. King. 2 vols.)
- "The Real Japan," by Henry Norman. (1893. Fisher Unwin.)
- "The Story of Japan," by David Murray. (Fisher Unwin.)
- "Japan," by Dr. David Murray. (1894. Story of Nations Series. Fisher Unwin.) Only the later chapters are "topical."
- "Japan, our New Ally," by A. Stead. (1902. Fisher Unwin.)
- "Japan and China: Their History, Arts, Science, Manners, Customs, Laws, Religions, and Literature," by Captain F. Brinkley. (1903-4. To be completed in 12 volumes. T. C. & E. C. Jack.)
- "Feudal and Modern Japan," by Arthur May Knapp. (1898. 2 vols. Duckworth.)
- "A Maker of the New Japan: The Life of Joseph Hardy Neesima, Founder of Doshisha University, Japan," by Rev. J. D. Davis, D.D., Professor in Doshisha. (Revell.)
- "A Maker of the New Orient—Samuel Rollins Brown," by W. E. Griffis. (Revell.)
- "What will Japan Do?" by J. Morris. (1898. Lawrence and Bullen.)

THE JAPANESE POINT OF VIEW:—

- "Japan and the Pacific," by M. Inagaki. (1890. Fisher Unwin.)

JAPANESE SOCIAL LIFE:—

- "Things Japanese," by Basil Hall Chamberlain. (1902. Murray.) May be counted as an "essential" book.
- "Japanese Homes and their Surroundings," by E. S. Morse. (1888. Sampson Low.) A fascinating book.
- "Japanese Girls and Women," by Alice Mabel Bacon. (Gay and Bird.)
- "Glimpses of Unfamiliar Japan," by Lafcadio Hearn. (1902. Kegan Paul. 2 vols.)
- "Kokoro: Japanese Inner Life," by Lafcadio Hearn. (1902. Gay and Bird.)
- "Out of the East: Studies in New Japan," by Lafcadio Hearn. (1902. Kegan Paul.)
- "Kotto: being Japanese Curios," by Lafcadio Hearn. (1902. Macmillan.)
No one can understand Japan and the Japanese who has not read Lafcadio Hearn.
- "Queer Things About Japan," by Douglas Sladen. (Second edition, 1904. Treherne.) A picturesque account of Japanese life and manners.
- "The Soul of the Far East," by Percival Lowell. (Houghton Mifflin, and Gay and Bird.)
- "Unbeaten Tracks in Japan," by Mrs. Bishop. (1900. Newnes. 2 vols.) A brilliant book; a peep into the "interior."
- "The Heart of Japan," by C. L. Brownell. (1902. Methuen.) A clever view of Japanese daily life.
- "The Evolution of the Japanese, Social and Psychic," by Sidney L. Gulick, M.A. (Revell.)
- "Japanese Physical Training," by H. Irving Hancock. (1904. Putnam.) Shows how the system of exercise, diet, and general mode of living has made the Japanese one of the healthiest, strongest and happiest races.

THE ART OF JAPAN:—

- "The Ideals of the East," by Okakura. (1903. Murray.)
- "An Artist's Letters from Japan," by J. La Farge. (1897. Fisher Unwin.) Admirably written; pictures seen with the eye of an artist.
- "Japan and its Art," by M. B. Huish. (1888. Fine Art Society.) An excellent book in every way.

GENERAL BOOKS OF TRAVEL:—

- "From Far Formosa: The Island, its People and Missions," by George Leslie Mackay, D.D. (New and cheaper edition. Oliphant, Anderson.)
- "The Gist of Japan: The Islands and their People," by the Rev. R. B. Peery. (Revell.)
- "Japonica," by Sir Edwin Arnold. (1891. Osgood.)
- "Seas and Lands," by Sir Edwin Arnold. (1894. Longmans.)
- "Japan As We Saw It," by M. Bickersteth. (1893. Sampson Low.)
- "Around the World through Japan," by Walter Del Mar. (1903. Black.)
- "Gleanings from Japan," by W. G. Dickson. (1889. Blackwood.)
- "On the Coasts of Cathay and Cipango, Forty Years Ago," by William Blakeney, R.N. (1902. Elliot Stock.) A record of surveying service; most useful for the understanding of the naval situation. Good charts and maps.
- "Lotus Time in Japan," by H. Finck. (1895. Lawrence and Bullen.)
- "A Handbook of Modern Japan," by Ernest W. Clement. (1903. McClurg.)
- "Handbook for Travellers in Japan," by Basil H. Chamberlain and W. Mason. (1903. Murray.)

ANGLO-JAPANESE LIFE:—

- "A Diplomatist's Wife in Japan," by Mrs. Fraser. (1900. Hutchinson. 2 vols.) Very good and informative.
- "First American Envoy in Japan," by T. Harris. (1895.) The beginning of the New Japan.
- "Eight Years' Work and Travel in Japan," by E. G. Holtham. (1883. Kegan Paul.)
- "Half-Hours in Japan," by Rev. H. Moore. (1900. Fisher Unwin.)
- "Rambles through Japan," by A. Tracy. (1892. Sampson Low.)
- "Rambles in Japan," by Canon Tristram. (1895. Religious Tract Society.)
- "On Short Leave to Japan," by F. E. Younghusband. (1894. Sampson Low.)
- "Three Rolling Stones in Japan," by G. Watson. (1903. Arnold.)
- "Japan and Her People," by Anna Hartshorne. (1904. Kegan Paul.)
- "Among the Gentle Japs," by Rev. J. L. Thomas. (1892. Sampson Low.)
- "Verbeck of Japan," by W. E. Griffis. (1900. Revell.)

Fiction

- "The Stolen Emperor," by Mrs. Hugh Fraser. (1903. Long.)
- "A Japanese Marriage," by Douglas Sladen. (1902. Black.)
- "Kakemonos," by W. C. Dawe. (1897. Lane.)
- "A Sugar Princess," by A. Ross. (1900. Chatto.)
- "Kotaka," by J. Morris. (1885. Wyman.)
- "My Japanese Wife," by C. Holland. (1895. Constable.)
- "Mousmé" (sequel), by C. Holland. (1896. Constable.)
- "Wooing of Wistaria," by O. Watanna. (1903. Harper.)
- "Out in China," by Mrs. Archibald Little. (1903. Treherne.)
Mrs. Archibald Little tells one of those minor tragic tales which happily are not all tragedy. It begins with a misunderstanding—a case of mistaken identity—which time in conjunction with an Eastern setting nearly succeeds in developing into an unpleasantly familiar type of story of domestic infelicity. We need hardly add that the "local colour" is true to fact.
- "Fairy Tales from far Japan," by Miss Ballard, with Notes by Mrs. Bishop. (Religious Tract Society.)

KOREA.

- "Corea," by Dr. W. E. Griffis. (Allen.) New and revised edition, bringing history up to 1897. A standard chronicle of Korean development. Ancient and mediæval history; political and social life; modern and recent history.
- "Korea and Her Neighbours," by Isabella L. Bird (Mrs. Bishop). (1898. Murray. 2 vols.) A narrative of travel, with an account of the recent vicissitudes and present position of the country. Needs no commendation.
- "Korea and the Sacred White Mountain," by Captain A. E. J. Cavendish. (1894. Philip.) An account of a journey in 1891.
- "Life in Corea," by W. R. Carles. (1888. Macmillan.)
- "Korean Sketches," by the Rev. J. S. Gale. (1898. Oliphant, Anderson.)
- "Corea, or Cho-Sen, the Land of the Morning Calm," by A. H. S. Landor. (1895. Heinemann.)
- "Quaint Korea," by L. J. Miln. (1895. Osgood.)
- "A Forbidden Land," by Ernest Oppert. (1880. Sampson Low.) Corea, with an account of the geography, history, and commercial capabilities of the country.
- "Korea," by Angus Hamilton. (1904. Heinemann.)
- "Every-Day Life in Korea," by the Rev. Daniel L. Gifford. (Revell.)
- "Chosŏn: The Land of the Morning Calm" (Korea), by Percival Lowell. (Houghton Mifflin, and Gay and Bird.)

BOOKS ON THE FAR EAST (giving valuable statistics and information relative to Korea, Japan, &c.) :—

- "The Awakening of the East," by P. L. Beaulieu. (1900. Heinemann.) Siberia (Railway, &c.), Japan, China, &c.
- "The Far Eastern Question," by Valentine Chirol. (1896. Macmillan.)
- "Problems of the Far East," by Lord Curzon. (1896. Constable.) Japan, Corea, and China. Most useful.
- "A Brief History of Eastern Asia," by J. C. Hannah. (1900. Fisher Unwin.)
- "Peoples and Politics of the Far East," by Henry Norman. (1895. Fisher Unwin.) England, France, and Russia in the Far East, with chapters on Corea and Japan. Full of information.
- "The Progress of India, Japan, and China in the 19th Century," by Sir Richard Temple. (1902. Chambers.)
- "From Sea to Sea," by Rudyard Kipling. (1900. Macmillan & Co. 2 vols.)
- "The Path of Empire," by George Lynch. (1903. Duckworth.) The author was present at Japan's last naval review, crossed over to Korea, to which he devotes several chapters. His books deals mainly with the Siberian Railway.
- "The Story of Russia," by W. R. Morfill. (Fisher Unwin.)
- "The Russian Advance," by the Hon. Albert J. Beveridge. (Harper.)
- A work on the conflict of the various national interests in the Far East. Senator Beveridge has made an extended tour through China, Japan, Siberia, and European Russia, studying people and methods. His observations on the development of Russian and German influence have a significance for traders, and he is unsparing in his criticism of the apparent apathy of both the Anglo-Saxon Powers in relation to the vast political and commercial problems of Asia.
- "In the Uttermost East," by Charles H. Hawes. (Harper.)
- An account of investigations among the natives and Russian convicts of the Island of Sakhalin, with notes of travel in Korea, Siberia, and Manchuria. The author is the first English traveller to explore the northern interior.
- "Asia and Europe," by Meredith Townsend. (New Edition, with an additional chapter. Constable.)
- Studies presenting the conclusions formed by the author in a long life devoted to the subject of the relations between Asia and Europe.
- "Things Chinese: or, Notes connected with China," by J. Dyer Ball. (1904. Fourth Edition, revised and enlarged. Murray.)
- "The Expansion of Russia, 1815-1900," by F. H. Skrine. (C. J. Clay and Sons, Cambridge University Press.)
- "The Imperial Russian Navy: Its Past, Present, and Future," by Fred. T. Jane. (A new and completely revised edition, 1904. Thacker)

- "The Break-Up of China," by Admiral Lord Charles Beresford. (Harper.) An account of its commerce, currency, waterways, armies, railways, politics, and future prospects.
- "China in Transformation," by Archibald Ross Colquhoun. (Harper.)
- "The 'Overland' to China," by Archibald Ross Colquhoun. (Harper.)
- "China's Only Hope." An appeal by Chang Chih Tung, Viceroy of Liang Hu, with indorsement by the present Emperor. Translated by the Rev. S. I. Woodbridge. Introduction by the Rev. Griffith John, D.D. (Revell.)
- "China in Convulsion: The Origin; The Outbreak; The Climax; The Aftermath." A survey of the cause and events of the recent uprising, by Arthur H. Smith. (Revell. 2 vols.)
- "Korean Sketches." By the Rev. James S. Gale. (Revell.) A Missionary's observations in the Hermit Nation.
- "East of the Barrier, or Sidelights on the Manchuria Mission," by J. Miller Graham. (Oliphant Anderson.) Social habits and national characteristics.
- "Stanford's New Map of the Siberian Railway." Scale, 110 miles to an inch. (1904. Stanford.)
- "Stanford's Map of Eastern China, Japan, and Korea." Scale, 110 miles to an inch. (1904. Stanford.)

KOREA. By Angus Hamilton. (Heinemann. 15s. net.)

A TIMELY book, a well-considered, matured, and informing work by a man who knows the country from end to end and can put pictures on paper with consummate ease. Under his guidance Korea opens before us as a land of mystery and marvel—the "Hermit Kingdom" in very sooth. The Court, the country, the people, the princes, the trade, and the native temperament are so simply and straightforwardly described that henceforward Korea would seem to be almost as familiar—outwardly—as St. James's Street. No small credit is due to Mr. Hamilton in this matter—a more elaborate and erudite work would probably have failed in its object—but by its very frankness and directness the book is convincing and obviously right. Korea naturally has become a centre-point of interest, and the enquirer who has read the literature of the land turns up the index and almost involuntarily asks himself, "What has this man to say about McLeary Brown"—that "amiable and uncouth Sphinx" as a former Korean writer has described him. Mr. Hamilton is quite sound on Mr. Brown. He takes it to be understood that Brown's dictatorship is a matter of course, and that Korea without Brown would be Hamlet without the moody Dane. But this sketch of the man is illuminating, happy and quite polite. Mr. Brown could surely wish for no better eulogist. "A number of Englishmen are employed in the Korean Customs, their services contributing so much to the splendid institution which Mr. McLeary Brown has created that one and all are above criticism. Mr. McLeary Brown would be the first to acknowledge how much the willing assistance of his staff has contributed to his success." No one who has studied Korean matters can be blind to this truism. Seoul boasts an Electric Car Company, an Electric Light Company, and a Fresh Spring Water Company; all these are due to American enterprise, and Mr. Hamilton, quite fairly, attributes more success to American mercantile than to American missionary enterprise, although the two are occasionally curiously combined. The opening chapter of the book is by way of introduction to a bird's-eye view of the present state of affairs as between Japan and Russia. There are some excellent statistical tables, which have been compiled nearly up to the latest moment, and an entirely new map which is invaluable to all students of the present position. The illustrations are throughout good; the book cover, a portion of the ceiling of the Imperial Palace at Seoul, being quite beautiful in design. Altogether a thoroughly good book, full of information, well-written, and practically indispensable to those who are following affairs in that part of the world.

Reviews

A Vast Venture

THE DYNASTS: A DRAMA OF THE NAPOLEONIC WARS. In Three Parts, Nineteen Acts, and One Hundred and Thirty Scenes. By Thomas Hardy. Part First. (Macmillan. 4s. 6d. net.)

THE astonishing title which we reproduce sufficiently indicates the ambitious and vast (there is no other word but "vast") scope of Mr. Hardy's latest venture in the regions of poetry. It is a great canvas upon which he seeks to unroll, after the fashion of a panorama, the whole drama of the Napoleonic wars. And this volume, reaching from the attempted invasion of England which ended in Trafalgar to the close of Napoleon's supreme battle—Austerlitz—is but the first instalment of it. With a project thus immense before him, we can well understand why Mr. Hardy has so long neglected novel-writing. The two were incompatible. A Shakespeare, a Dante, would have his entire powers engrossed by a scheme of such spaciousness. We understand, and regret it. Mr. Hardy's chief contentions we more or less admit. We believe that the time is come when the poetic drama should develop into a distinct species from the stage-drama, should frankly appeal to the reader rather than the spectator, the closet rather than the boards; we believe that in this way it could put forth potentialities scarce recognised as a purely literary form. We believe also that such a theme as the Napoleonic wars might furnish a grandiosely dramatic subject for such a work; a theme which should unite dramatic situation with no less than epical spaciousness. But—there is a but.

It would demand a poet of the largest power, the most uncompromising individuality, with the most practised and triumphant executive gift. Here it is Mr. Hardy fails. We can discern in him a great conception, an epical idea, which commands our respect. If it were worked out in that medium of the novel wherein he is master, we might have an imposing and enthralling trilogy of novels. Assuredly he has shown himself, by his previous verse, not without innate and authentic poetic gift. But he has not had the lifelong intimacy with the poet's craft which alone could confer on him the flexibility and dexterity, the range and ease of executive accomplishment demanded by so colossal an achievement as that on which he has adventured. In plan he has essayed originality most daringly. To extreme dramatic realism he has added abstract personifications which recall the most sculptural Greek tragedy, and are in fact (it should seem) designed to fulfil the functions of the Greek chorus. But the elements do not blend. These personifications are sometimes incongruously aloof, in their dignity, from the every-dayness of the dialogue which surrounds them; sometimes, in the realism of their speech, equally incongruous with the dignity of their own elemental abstraction. And again, while the whole poetic majesty of the drama resides in the historic issues, the instinct of the novelist has been unable to resist the temptation of a domestic sub-plot, which complicates and intensifies the bizarre effect of the whole. Lastly, the execution falls fatally short of inspiration. While there are numerous passages which rise to the level of a poetised rhetoric, not unworthy of the subject-matter, and occasional passages which exhibit Mr. Hardy's gift of romantic description, as a whole the dialogue is the prose of the novelist cut into lengths. Nay, it is a fact that Mr. Hardy is vastly more poetic as a novelist using his accustomed vehicle of prose. We can only say, with a sigh, that we would give many such dramas for one "Return of the Native."

A Forgotten Romance

VIEUX ÉCHOS D'UNE ÉTERNELLE CHANSON (L'ASTRÉE). Par Quill. (Paris: Clot.)

No one nowadays, except perhaps the student of literature, reads the lengthy romances in six, eight, or ten folio volumes that delighted Mme. de Sévigné, Dorothy Osborne, and Mrs. Pepys. And yet, if we had but the leisure, they would not be altogether unprofitable reading. The original edition of "Astrée," published in five volumes between 1609 and 1617, consists of about 5,800 pages. It had an immediate and enormous success and passed through innumerable editions. We are told that Richelieu said, "He was not to be admitted in the academy of wit who had not been before well read in 'Astrée.'" Huet, Bishop of Avranches, did not dare to open "Astrée," because he knew if he did he would be compelled to read it through again from beginning to end, and La Fontaine pronounced it an exquisite work.

Let us, then, state briefly some of the reasons for the great popularity of "L'Astrée de Messire Honoré d'Urfé où par plusieurs histoires et sous formes de bergers et d'autres sont déduits les divers effets de l'honneste amitié." In the first place it was a love story in which, for the first time in French literature, sincere love was regarded less as a weakness than as a virtue, and the most difficult of all the virtues to practice. For has not a great romantic poet well said, "Ce qu'il y a de plus difficile au monde, c'est se marier d'amour." Celadon was a more perfect specimen of the lover and hero than had as yet been portrayed; indeed, he incarnated the immortal type of lover who was a slave of love and faithful till death, and he thus became an ancestor of Werther and René and Saint-Preux and Des Grieux. Then it is an idealistic romance: it aspires to a world where society is purer, a world in which affairs of the mind and of the heart hold a larger place. The contemplative and sentimental life was a new thing in French literature, and was destined to prove attractive. A very real appreciation of external nature is manifested, again a new thing in French letters: the scenes constantly change; the love adventures have as background, now the grassy banks of a stream, now a rocky cave or druidical forest, a fantastic palace, or a battle-field. The romance does not lack variety; for besides the main theme of the loves of Celadon and Astrée, there are five or six other "intrigues galantes" after the manner of Sidney's "Arcadia," perhaps the only English work with which "Astrée" can be compared. The style, too, is charming; there is an harmonious rhythm about the prose that delights the ear. These, then, are some of the qualities that made "Astrée" the fruitful source of nearly all the French seventeenth century romances, that caused authors for thirty years or more to delve into it for subjects and that rendered it one of the books most loved and most read in France.

Therefore we owe much gratitude to the accomplished lady who, under the pseudonym of "Quill," has extracted from "Astrée" the story of Astrée and Celadon, and enshrined it, freed from all objectionable matter, so that it may be put into the hands of young people, in a beautiful quarto volume, decorated with black and white drawings of her own design. We heartily recommend the book to all who care to lose themselves for awhile in the joys and sorrows of old-world romantic adventures of love.

The Saints in Art

LIVES AND LEGENDS OF THE ENGLISH BISHOPS AND KINGS, MEDIEVAL MONKS, AND OTHER LATER SAINTS. By Mrs. Arthur Bell. (George Bell. 14s. net.)

THIS beautiful volume is the third and last of "The Saints in Christian Art," and Mrs. Bell has merited well of all lovers of a bygone age by the labour which, out of a full heart, she has bestowed upon it. For that she has a real feeling for her subject is evident. She writes, indeed, with a certain detachment, drawing a clear line of demarcation between what may fairly be deemed historical and what, to a mind shaped like hers upon later scientific principles, is incredible; yet always with a lingering fondness for an aspect of the world that has been folded away like a beautiful vesture that the change of fashion has left obsolete. Our world of immutable law and established order is dull by comparison with this, in which heaven was only just out of sight; in which neighbourly courtesy between celestials and the sons of earth were almost of daily occurrence. Here you have the Blessed Virgin presenting St. Ildefonsus with a beautiful new chasuble. "What, for me?" the saint, in Murillo's picture, seems to ask; and a kindly angel standing by explains on behalf of Our Lady that his treatise on her prerogatives had won quite a vogue. St. Isidore of Madrid was a poor ploughman. His master grudged the moments he spent in devout contemplation beneath the sky. He was astonished rather at his own lack of foresight than at any inherent improbability, when with his own eyes, he saw going lightly down the furrow behind his oxen, a gay and buoyant angel. The hind in the foreground gazes upwards; a lowly angel does not particularly interest him. The angel as naturally serves the servant of the Lord as the storks serve St. Agricola, or the eagle St. Bertulphus; as the waves and the winds obey the word of the righteous.

In the first part of this book considerable space is assigned to St. Dunstan, St. Alphege, Lanfranc and St. Anselm. Paulinus and Aidan, Wilfrid, Chad and Cuthbert are treated at large, though with regard to the last Mrs. Bell does not seem to be aware of the remarkable results of the latest inquiries into the history of his body. Similarly she reaches only the penultimate stage of the history of the relics of St. Edmund the King, when she records their late translation to this country with a view to their enshrinement in Westminster Cathedral. In the second part the great reformers of the eleventh and twelfth centuries are treated—the Italian contemporaries of Giotto, Fra Angelico and Fra Bartolommeo; and so forward to the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries and to SS. Ignatius of Loyola, Charles Borromeo, Francis Borgia, Philip Neri and John of God. The fifty-three illustrations are for the most part admirably chosen, but the modern specimens are rather out of place. We particularly dislike Ford Madox Brown's picture of the Baptism of St. Edwin, in which St. Paulinus seems to be trying to confirm, to absolve, to say Mass, to bestow a papal blessing and to preach a sermon to the world at large, all in one supreme gesture, but to have quite forgotten the hypertrophied barbarian waiting patiently in the bath.

Burns

BURNS' PASSIONATE PILGRIMAGE; OR, TAIT'S INDICTMENT OF THE POET, WITH OTHER RARE RECORDS. By David Lowe. (Glasgow: Frederick W. Wilson & Co. 5s. net.)

ROBERT BURNS. By T. F. Henderson. (Methuen. 3s. 6d.)

MONDAY next will be the anniversary of that day when "a blast o' Janwar win' blew hansel in on Robin," and thousands of Scottish throats, fortified for the occasion by haggis and whisky, will strain themselves in proclaiming that "We'll a' be proud o' Robin." And here, just on the eve of the annual Saturnalia, comes Mr. Lowe, who professes himself an ardent admirer of the Scottish poet, with a volume which shows, if it shows anything, that Burns' lapse from sexual morality took place, a theory rejected by Mr. Henley, earlier than his other biographers have believed. As Mr. Lowe's compatriots would say, it's ill done of him. Does he not think that proposers of "The Immortal Memory" have a task already difficult enough on its apologetic side without the introduction of new charges calling for defence? Who is the accuser? One Saunders Tait, a tailor with a rough tongue and a faculty for versification, a man filled with inexplicable but bitter rancour against the poet's father (of whom everybody else spoke in terms of highest praise) and of quite explicable spite against the poet, his rival for local popularity. In revenge for a slighting remark of David Sillar, Burns' "brither poet," Saunders wrote some ribald verses in which he described his two juniors as the most incontinent youngsters in the parish; and it is these verses that Mr. Lowe has exhumed and has put in a suitable historic setting. We do not find them quite convincing, and even if they were, what does it matter? The greatly sinning, greatly repenting, and greatly aspiring poet must be taken as a whole, and a sin more or less need not affect the estimate that erring fellow-mortals have any call to make. The real student, the judicious admirer, of Burns, will feel gratitude to Mr. Lowe for the volume, and not least for the careful demonstration of the untenability of Mr. Henley's very characteristic allegation that Highland Mary was a mere "light-skirts." He will, indeed, be hard of conviction who, after reading the closing chapters, does not share the author's belief that "the relationship between Burns and Mary extended over a period of several years, and that it was neither a squalid nor an ignoble relationship, but one on which the muse of Burns could dwell in after years with the fondest reverence."

The collaborator of Henley in the preparation of the Centenary Edition of Burns' works, the man to whom "in memory of much difficult yet satisfying work, his fellow in Burns" is dedicated the much discussed essay, is in danger of being suspect by the "common Burnite." Let us say at once that this rather touchy individual will find nothing to offend him in the latest addition to the Methuen series of Little Biographies, which is, indeed, a model of its kind. To a plain unvarnished narrative, informed with sympathy for the man in the hard fortune that pursued him from the cradle to the grave, and with just admiration of his work, is added a discriminate and sane treatment of the controverted episodes of the poet's career. Mr. Henderson will not recognise "Highland Mary" as a "very paragon of womankind"; but he does not suggest that she was a "light-skirts"; nor does his collaborator's alternative theory that she was a Scottish Mrs. Harris appear to find favour; for he says that Burns' silence as to the earlier portion of his route to Inverary "suggests that one reason for his tour was a desire to visit the relatives of Mary Campbell." He defends Jean against the detractions of Chambers and Stevenson; and asserts that "there is no sufficient ground for supposing" that Burns' "constitution had been quite undermined by his excesses"—a condition more likely due to early hardships. A brief bibliography affords sufficient direction for the would-be student of Burns' works, and a dozen illustrations increase the value of the book.

MEDIEVAL ENGLAND: 1066-1350. By Mary Bateson. ("Story of the Nations." Unwin. 5s.)

MISS BATESON in this book avowedly takes different ground from that adopted in the other volumes of the "Story of the Nations" series, to which it is the latest addition. To put it briefly, she substitutes social for political history. It is a frequent modern attitude towards history; and is an attitude which naturally commends itself with peculiar favour to the woman's mind, who cares much for men and their intimacies, little for politics and policy and the large hurly-burly of history. But though it be an important historical aspect, with much to be said for its adoption, we may be permitted to think it a misfortune that in a series seemingly planned—and at any rate executed—on the lines of political history, one volume alone should break the unity of purpose and be written with an entirely different aim. A series of social histories would be valuable: one social history in midst of a political series seems merely a solution of continuity. The feminine standpoint would appear again apparent when the writer says (with regard to the Middle Ages) that “we are apt to view with a half-pitying contempt the great folios of their theologians, philosophers, and legists, because for very wariness of the flesh we cannot read them.” We doubt whether most serious students of the present day would share that contemptuous pity, however slight their natural sympathy.

But let us not be supposed to share the view (once held) that women are sexually incapacitated for the serious writing of history, much less to allege any such incapacity against Miss Bateson. The opinion just cited is a casual detail; her choice of historical aim at most a flaw in judgment. She has given to the series a careful and sedulous volume, which more or less attempts to be like the famous chapter in Macaulay's history, a cross-section through historical England. We wish we could attribute to it any measure of Macaulay's brilliancy. Unfortunately it is in the style of a plodding antiquarian compilation. The chapter on “Dress,” for example, one feels to be elaborate gossip about the costume of our mediæval ancestors; and withal dry gossip. The detail is interesting enough; but the author has not the art of arranging and putting it interestingly. We have everything searched out for us: we are even told that a bishop ascribed the beard of Rufus' time to osculatory convenience—lest the stubbly chin should prick the lips of kissing damsels. There were fine free-spoken ecclesiastics in those days—though they considered somewhat too curiously. But it does not tempt us: we have a sense of the disturbing of dead bones, and they are not clothed with flesh. One would as soon read six hundred years hence the fashion-article in a ladies' paper of to-day—and sooner, for it would have touches of contemporary character and actuality. So is it throughout; a useful, a very commendable compilation and résumé, to which much knowledge and labour has gone, but scarce to be read for pleasure. Therein it differs from many previous volumes, which have united historical care with artistic handling. Largely, no doubt, this arises from the disadvantage of the subject-matter; and it is the only reproach we have to bring against the volume.

L'ÉMIGRÉ PAR SÉNAC DE MEILHAN, PUBLIÉ par MM. Casimir Stryienski et Franz Funck Brentano. (Fontemoing. 7fr. 50c.)

WHEN Sainte-Beuve in 1854 made Sénac de Meilhan, as the author of certain quasi-philosophical works like “Considérations sur l'esprit et les mœurs” (1787) and “Portraits et Caractères du XVIII^e Siècle” (1795), the subject of one of his “Causeries du Lundi,” he mentioned that M. de Meilhan had also composed a novel in four volumes entitled “L'Émigré” which he had not been able to find, nor had he ever met anyone who had seen it. Writing two years later on the Marquise de Créqui, he tells how a friend of his had met with the book at Berlin and had sent it him. “L'Émigré” was published at Brunswick in 1797, and owing doubtless to the date and place of publication is an exceedingly rare book; only seven copies of it can, so far, be accounted for. The library of the Louvre possessed one which was burnt in 1871, the Bibliothèque Nationale has acquired one since 1854, and five others are known to be in the possession of private collectors.

The period of the French Revolution has always the greatest attraction for biographer, historian, novelist, dramatist, and similarly for the reader. But a novel by one who was contemporary with, and an actor in the events described, produces a distinctly new sensation. Gabriel Sénac de Meilhan was the son of Jean Sénac, Louis XV.'s physician. He had close relations with the Court, and held several important offices, chiefly in the provinces. In 1789 he was in Paris, and witnessed the events of June and October. The following year he emigrated, and after visiting nearly every country of Europe, died at Vienna in 1803.

The real interest of “L'Émigré” is historical rather than romantic. The period of the novel which, following the fashion of the time, is epistolary in form, is 1793, and the hero, a young French soldier of noble birth, fighting in the Prussian army, being wounded, finds shelter in a castle on the banks of the Rhine. There he falls in love with a fair lady, and after a number of vicissitudes is on the point of marrying her when he is taken prisoner and condemned to die on the scaffold, a disgrace he averts by suicide. Thus it will be seen that in the narration itself there is nothing original or striking. The value and interest of the book reside in the setting of the story. Meilhan was a born observer, and the pictures and scenes and persons described in the pages of “L'Émigré” are worthy to rank beside the best memoirs of the time. It is indeed a real historical study: under cover of his fictitious personages the author gives his personal impressions of the great events he witnessed. What is most striking, perhaps, is the curiously passive state of mind of the Parisians during the Revolution; with aristocrats and bourgeois alike there seems to have ruled “une barbare tranquillité.” On the night of October 5, the date of the king's entry into Paris, M. de Meilhan found himself at a party among the élite of Paris. Here is his account of the conversation: “Avez-vous vu passer le Roi?—Non, j'ai été à la Comédie.—Molé a-t-il joué?—Pour moi, j'ai été obligé de rester aux Tuileries, il n'y a pas eu moyen d'en sortir avant neuf heures.—Vous avez donc vu passer le Roi?—Je n'ai pas bien distingué, il faisait nuit.” The cannon is heard: “Le Roi sort de l'Hôtel-de-Ville; ils doivent être bien las.” And yet these were the same men and women who would willingly have died at the King's feet. Another interesting feature of the book is the incidental light thrown on the treatment awarded the emigrants in the different countries of Europe. They were not invariably accorded a warm welcome.

The romance is considerably abridged, but the editors have done their work so well that nothing material seems to have been lost.

OLD TESTAMENT PROPHECY. By the late A. B. Davidson, D.D. Edited by J. A. Paterson, D.D. (Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark. 10s. 6d. net.)

THIS work by the late Professor of Hebrew in New College, Edinburgh, which is ably edited by his successor in the same chair, represents more than one series of lectures on this important subject. It is in fact an amalgam of many courses, in one of which one, in another another, facet was especially elaborated. It represents, therefore, a formative influence upon the minds of the present generation of Scottish clergy. And it is especially interesting because it elaborately develops the present attitude of a conservative school towards the Scriptures read more or less reluctantly in the light of a revolutionary and audacious criticism. To our forefathers the prophecies of the Old Testament, except so far as they prefigured with a more or less striking picturesqueness incidents in the life of Christ, were left involved in obscurity. That they had some reference to the current complications of the people of Israel was conceded; but that was not the side of them which was felt to concern the Christian man. Between this attitude towards the utterances of the Hebrew prophets and that more modern one which excludes every supernatural and mystical sense, the orthodox expositors of to-day steer tentatively a difficult course. Dr. Davidson elaborately distinguishes the race of Hebrew prophets from the corresponding classes among other primitive peoples. He considers, only in order finally to reject them, the explanations of the prophetic mind which have been put forward by sceptical philosophy; and in that august series of which Elijah, for the fulness of his perception of the Lord as the One, is taken as the first and Jesus of Nazareth as the crowning example he discerns, mingled with the occasional and the temporary, a revelation of the Infinite and the Absolute.

To him it seems that by the mouths of the prophets a revelation was indeed given, but a revelation of a progressive and germinating character. It was given mediately, through the forms and occasions of a personal and national life. Thus are objections over-ruled such as that which is urged against Psalm ii., wherein the Messiah is painted as a warrior breaking the nations with a rod of iron. "All that incongruities of description prove is that the writer, though referring in his own mind to the coming King, was not enabled in all respects to conceive Him as He came, but conceived Him as if He had come perhaps in relations like or liker those of his own time."

But the book is a book for the specialist. That there is little parade of extrinsic authorities rather bears witness to the completeness with which Dr. Davidson had assimilated the vast quantity of speculation which, particularly in Germany, has been made articulate, than to any neglect of contemporary work. And if we dare not believe his work to possess the virtue of finality, that is only because, on the still shifting sands, permanent stability is in the nature of things hardly to be so much as dreamed of.

THE PRINCIPLES OF MORAL SCIENCE. By the Rev. Walter McDonald, D.D. (Dublin: Browne and Nolan.)

WHATEVER may be said against Confession, as sacramentally practised in the Roman Catholic Church, it must be acknowledged that we owe to it a living tradition in the principles of moral science by which the most stalwart Lutheran may usefully check his own conduct. Dr. McDonald's essay is for the most part too technical to be of general interest. He has been for many years a professor of moral theology at the venerable College of Maynooth. His close attention to Gury and Lehmkühl, and comparison of them with the older theologians upon whom these text-books are founded, have convinced him that in the fundamental tractates "Of Human Acts" and "Of Conscience" there are points of the received teaching which are inconsistent with the conclusions drawn in the treatises dealing with special subjects. But this is for the specialist. For the general public we take a single point which is of intelligible interest to everybody. As is well known, Catholic theologians are more strict in the prohibition of lying than are others. The most truthful of Protestant Englishmen occasionally finds himself in a position which seems to him to justify him in saying point blank the thing which is not. The Catholic theologian recognises, indeed, that there are times when it is expedient or even obligatory to mislead; but in such circumstances he cannot find justification for more than equivocation, or at the most for the practice of mental reservation. Into the respective merits of the two systems—the battle-field of Newman and Kingsley—we need not enter. We merely note that our author on the one hand notes a serious flaw in the utilitarian argument of Mill, and on the other finds not wholly convincing the argument of St. Thomas Aquinas, founded on a certain lack of order or harmony inseparable from the use of words for any purpose but one—to express certain ideas. A necessity is conceivable which would justify one in turning into lime the Apollo Belvidere; what is a word more than a statue that it should not be applied, where necessary, to the benefit of man? But this does not satisfy him either, and finally he would seem to leave the question very much as he found it.

On the whole the book leaves on the mind of a layman a notable conviction of the thoroughness of the Scholastic methods and a sincere respect for the pains and acumen brought by the theologian to bear upon these difficult problems of daily life.

AN INQUIRY INTO THE CHARACTER AND AUTHORSHIP OF THE FOURTH GOSPEL. By James Drummond, LL.D. (Williams and Norgate. 10s. 6d.)

WE may as well say at once that in the Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, is found a strong defender of the Johannine authorship of the Fourth Gospel. The fact seems to be realised with something of surprise by himself; so we gather from the tone of his introduction. For, as he tells us, his two principal teachers in theology were the Rev. J. J. Tayler and Dr. Martineau; men who, opposed in temperament, were equally confident in rejecting the Johannine authorship. But yet it must be said in justice to the present author that his view seems not to be the resultant of any violent reaction; that he approaches the evidence, to all appearance, in an eminently judicial frame, and that he marshals the forces for the defence with no less temper than spirit.

Against the authenticity of the fourth evangelic record, the position of Baur marks the extreme swing of the pendulum. Baur, some fifty years ago, tried to show that the whole document is an unfolding of the dogmatic idea of the Logos formulated in the proem, and that the deviations from the facts truthfully narrated by the Synoptics are due to this cause. Presupposing the reconciliation of Jewish Christianity and Paulinism, and transporting the reader into the times of Gnosticism, Montanism and the Paschal controversy, the book could not, according to Baur, be of earlier date than the second half of the second century. Twenty years later Keim, though a strenuous opponent of the genuineness of this Gospel, conceded that it had been used by Justin Martyr, and brought back its date to the days of Trajan, 100–117 A.D.; he supposed the author to be, not a Gentile, but a Jew. There was a tendency to meet this view from the conservative camp, while the Johannine authorship was still maintained, by an acknowledgment that the purpose of the composition was not primarily historical. And this is the position that Dr. Drummond very ably supports. He neither admits that, if the book is John's, it must be strictly historical, nor the converse, that if it be not historical it cannot be John's. He goes so far as to confess himself unable to believe that such miracles as that of Cana and the raising of Lazarus were really performed. And such lapses from accuracy (if lapses they are to be accounted) cannot, he confesses, be instances merely of an old man's failing memory. Thus he is forced to the hypothesis of a deliberate construction of the narrative as a pictorial embodiment of spiritual truth. Such an hypothesis, he reminds us, is not out of harmony with ancient views of the nature of history, and is supported by the traces of an original belief that the Gospel was not so much a chronicle as a theological treatise in the guise, more or less, of allegory. Plato gives us a picture of Socrates founded, indeed, we may suppose, on genuine reminiscence, but still presented through a series of ideal scenes. May not an apostle, it is not unreasonable to ask, have portrayed the master of his heart's devotion in colours drawn from half a century of vivid experience of his indwelling spirit, and have blended together the actual and ideal in lines which are no longer separable? That there is a truth higher in the order of thought than any record of objective realities no one would care to deny.

Fiction

THROUGH SORROW'S GATE. By Halliwell Sutcliffe. (Unwin. 6s.) Mr. Sutcliffe knows and loves his Yorkshire moors, and the moor is the best part of his story. With artistic skill and restraint, the author suggests its many moods, from the desolation of the untrodden snows to the wide jubilation of purple heather beneath the sunlight. When he comes to this human drama, he is less successful. We miss the strenuous passion, the brooding mystery of "Shameless Wayne," in this tale of Griff Lomax and his penance. Griff, labouring solitary at his "intake"—the redeeming of wild land from the moor—is an impressive figure, but when he is drawn back into human relationships his stature dwindles. His life tragedy, told at length in an earlier book, is here given in glimpses, with the result of making his penance seem disproportioned to his crime, and his crime foreign to his nature. Nell Nethercliff, the woman whose love brings peace to the lonely man, is not strongly individualised, and her motherhood is a thing altogether incredible. It was a cardinal mistake to endow her with a child, since its passing out of her life in so tragic a manner leaves so little mark. Far more vital and moving than the main story is that of Hester Royd's frustrate love. But the book touches "the sense of tears" in one scene and one only, that where Joshua Royd dies among his cattle, in dumb, faithful service to the dumb things he loves. Indeed, Mr. Sutcliffe's four-legged creatures are always delightful, as witness Trash, the dog, who brings about his master's happiness. "Through Sorrow's Gate" is sane and sweet with moorland winds, but we expect stronger work from the chronicler of the Waynes and Ratcliffes.

JOHN BLANKSETT'S BUSINESS. By Joseph Clayton. (Brown, Langham. 6s.) John Blanksett at twenty-two is one of the unemployed; the gates of the iron-works are closed against him by reason of his share in promoting a strike which fails. At forty-five, John Blanksett has a large income derived from his business—money-lending. He is head of the Accommodation Loan and Deposit Bank, and finds it profitable as far as his income is concerned. But otherwise he derives no pleasure from it, his wife and children have their own interests, their large establishment is kept up for the purpose of dispensing hospitality to people he does not care about. Sitting in his library on his forty-fifth birthday, John Blanksett "pondered these things, and doubts that had long lurked in his mind concerning his business began to assume definite expression." He is not elected to a seat on the town council because some undesirable facts connected with his business are published in the local paper. His only brother he finds living in the lowest depths of poverty, the daughter dead of starvation, and another worse than dead through falling into a fellow money-lender's clutches. John Blanksett is not the usual grasping hard-hearted money-lender, but he has hitherto failed to see the many tragedies for which his loans pave the way. The book is full of hard facts about John Blanksett's business, pitiful scenes of poverty and weakness are disclosed, horrible pictures of vice yielding profitable returns are drawn. The whole is a tragedy of money, written simply but with force, a faithful study of life which holds our unflagging attention. We cannot too highly praise the restraint and simplicity with which the story is told.

TOR GODS. By Percival Pickering. (Long, 6s.) "Toy Gods" is an interesting book that just stops short of high attainment. The story opens well and claims instant attention, but towards the end the interest is somewhat relaxed. Amelia Bradshaw is the offspring of an unequal marriage, that of a distinguished Admiral who late in life marries his cook. Of course the Admiral's family refuses to countenance the marriage, and when the Admiral dies leaving no provision for his widow, Amelia and her mother return to their own level. When the story opens Melia is an assistant at a small drapery establishment in the Edgware Road. She is pretty but vulgar, showily dressed, and speaks with a terrible Cockney twang. One night she borrows a pantomime dress with little or no skirt and boldly forces her way into her half-sister's house when there is a fancy dress ball. She thus attracts her sister's not very favourable attention, and is politely requested to retire. Subsequently, however, the sister rescues Amelia, and as an experiment has her educated and brought to her own house. The character of Amelia is carefully and truthfully drawn, her treatment of her two lovers is amusing and full of clever touches. But Amelia, vulgar and pert, is more amusing than Amelia with a veneer of refinement. There is humour and insight in the author's sketches of her life at the draper's, of her aunt, Mrs. Burgess, who does "close" and odd jobs, and of her room-mate, Mab Higgins, which is somehow lacking in the description of Amelia's transition to Albert Gate.

There is also a tendency to touch and retouch a picture until the workmanship becomes too apparent, and a too great insistence on personal appearances. But the book in spite of its faults is well worth reading; it is clever, bright, and often original.

REAPING THE WHIRLWIND. By George S. Astins. (Drane. 3s. 6d.) Fifty years ago this novel might have been called a "shocker." To-day its well-worn artifice is pathetically powerless to cause a tremor. The plot depends on the extraordinary resemblance between an actor and a clergyman, which favours a monstrous deception. The villains of the piece—"piece" is a diplomatic word—are the actor and the clergyman's wife. Between them they break the sixth, seventh, and eighth commandments, and even the patient clergyman "blurts out" that the actor's "conduct" is "reprehensible." Mr. Astins' heart is liberally on the side of the angels, but his natural politeness is such that he "Misters" his male villain in the hour of his exposure and when the brand of Cain is on his brow.

Short Notices

Some Recent Verse

THE DIVINE VISION AND OTHER POEMS. By A. E. (Macmillan. 3s. net.) GUIDO AND VERONICA AND OTHER POEMS. By Kaufmann C. Spiers. (David Nutt.) POEMS AND IDYLLS. By John Cullen. (Elliot Stock. 4s. 6d.) FRONDES CADUCEÆ. By Montagu Lomax. (H. J. Glaisher. 3s. 6d. net.) SONGS OF LOVE AND LABOUR. By Sir William Allan. (Brown, Langham & Co. 6s.) From this sheaf of books in verse two stand prominently forth. One is the latest volume of the Irish poet who is known under the pen-name of "A. E." It shows the writer to be developing more and more exclusively in the direction of specific mysticism. We have not encountered in it anything with quite so much of intimate poetry as was possessed by his most successful previous verse. As in the case of a brother-poet, Mr. Yeats, there seems a tendency to overweight his work with mysticism; in the eager pursuit of its intellectual conceptions, and the desire to expound—or rather embody them, the emotional element suffers somewhat for the sake of the intellectual idea. The pure poetry is partially clouded and thickened. By which we do not intend to accuse "A. E." of obscurity; though that charge will doubtless be brought by the general reader. At the same time there is much of poetic fancy, and that dreamy note of regret and desire common to most poets of the "Celtic movement." The book is, indeed, steeped in an atmosphere of dream. But, as a whole, it misses somewhat of that elusive magic proper to such work; the quality which (we have said) this writer's best poems have shown. Even this comes by fits and gusts. A peculiar feature is the extent to which the poet is dominated by two or three ideas. These are repeated and turned about, from various aspects, in poem after poem. It is all work of distinction and refinement, with an individuality upon it. The other book with a voice of its own is Mr. Spiers' "Guido and Veronica." It is very slender: the title-poem occupies near some half the volume, and there are but half-a-dozen poems besides. But in some of these there is a real poetry. This is evident in the narrative-poem which gives name to the book; but it appears with more concentration in some of the longer lyrical poems which adopt the irregular metre of the ode, though they cannot be called odes. "Watch-Night," a kind of prothalamion (one might call it) sung by a maiden waiting for her bridegroom, is full of a true and rich fancy, striking imagery, and choice diction. These are throughout Mr. Spiers' qualities at his best. Sometimes the diction is somewhat over-wrought or even (but more rarely) fantastic. Nor is Mr. Spiers very careful of form and proportion; his poetry is rather vagrant and apt to sin by diffuseness. In his smaller and slighter lyrics he is less distinguished, more nearly commonplace. But at its best his poetry has the colour and glow of youth. Of the remaining volumes let it suffice to say that one (though in a third edition) is ambitious and obvious, another obvious and unambitious; while the third, "Frondes Caduceæ," merits mild commendation. If nowhere rising to the height of original poetry, it is cultivated in expression and modestly unpretentious. But none of these last volumes call for serious attention.

BROWNING'S ESSAY ON SHELLEY. Edited with an Introduction by Richard Garnett, C.B., LL.D. (Moring. 2s. 6d. net.) This is an attractive reprint of the essay prefixed by Browning in 1852 to the forged letters of Shelley, published by Moxon, a volume which is now a prize of book-collectors. Dr. Garnett, with his accustomed fullness of knowledge and sound judgment, tells in his introduction the story of that publication. It may be stated with confidence that Browning had not seen the originals of the forged letters—so Mr. Wise was informed by Browning himself. The attribution to Browning of the "Life of Strafford" is, on the other hand, expressed too strongly by Dr. Garnett; Browning could hardly have praised as "subtle and eloquent" work of which he was himself the author. That Browning's feelings towards Shelley changed is a statement which does not rest only on Mrs. Orr's testimony. He wrote in 1835 to Dr. Furnivall, "I painfully contrast my notions of Shelley, the man, and Shelley, well, even the poet, with what they were sixty years ago." He had been unfavourably impressed by a letter from Harriet Shelley to Hookham, shown to him, the real significance of which was not apparent without the examination of other letters which Browning had not seen. As to Shelley's poetry, Browning, in his elder years, thought much more of accepting our human limitations and making the most of which lies within them than he did in earlier years. The author of "Ferishtab's Fancies" could not value the poetry of Shelley as highly as the author of "Paraselsus" had valued it.

THE STORY OF PET MARJORIE (MARJORY FLEMING). By L. Macbean. (Simpkin, Marshall. 6s.) To have lived a month less than nine years, and yet in that space of time to have earned a place in the "Dictionary of National Biography," to have provided material for two separate biographies, and to have inspired in John Brown's pamphlet "the best book about a child that ever was written," is a fate that is surely unrivalled. Marjory Fleming's fate does not transcend her desert. Mr. Macbean's book was not necessary to prove this, but the volume should be read by everyone who has made the acquaintance of the little maid through John Brown, and by everyone who has not. For Maidie's friends and admirers have conspired to make it a definitive edition of her "life and works," complete in every detail, and embellished by illustrations that really illustrate, including five portraits of the little poetess-moralist. Here we have her 200-line "epic" on Mary Stuart, a wonderfully concise and accurate summary of the leading events in Mary's troubled life; and her briefer rhymed history of the Scottish Jameses, embracing one example of Maidie's amusing treatment of difficult rhymes. James II., we are told,

"Was killed by a cannon splinter
In the middle of the winter;
Perhaps it was not at that time,
But I could get no other rhyme."

But Majorie's letters and her four journals (written to improve her penmanship) are the "real self-revelation of a human soul in the shaping, charged with her piquant personality." From them we learn of her joys and her sorrows, her loving nature and her ebullient temper, her Calvinistic gloom and her mild profanities, her literary tastes and her love affairs! To those who would know perhaps the most attractive child of whom record has been written, we say: Read this book. But first read, or re-read, John Brown's essay.

THE NIEBELUNGS: A Tragedy in Three Parts. From the German of Friedrich Hebbel. By H. Goldberger. Illustrated by G. H. McCall. (A. Siegle.) To the student of German dramaturgy the name and the works of Christian Friedrich Hebbel are so well known that it has always seemed curious that, beyond some excerpts in a school book published in 1852, nothing of his should have been translated into English. For the man was an interesting personality, and did some rather fine work. Born in 1813 at Wesselburn in Holstein, the son of a very poor bricklayer, with a genius for telling Märchen, he grew up in the direst need, and until he went to Hamburg as a lad he practically educated himself. Once launched, however, as poet, dramatist, and journalist, his fame grew rapidly. Among his best known plays are "Michael Angelo," "The Diamond," "Moloch," "Judith," and the "Rubin"; of his many detached poems the "Sacrifice of Spring" is of especial beauty. His great compilation, or free rendering into modern German of the Niebelung legend, was first produced in the Grand Ducal Theatre at Weimar on May 16, 1861. The author's wife, a well-known actress, played the leading part, and a contemporary critic said of the trilogy, "No one hitherto has collated the whole dramatic treasure of the Niebelung legends and made it playable on the modern stage." As a matter of fact it is, within certain limitations, a very fine work, especially considering the somewhat narrow times in which it was written and played. The translation now published is adequate and painstaking. The translator has chosen to be merely matter of fact and straightforward. He gives us practically a literal translation without the slightest attempt to reproduce the poetry, the glamour, or the verbal fascination of the original. He is content to be bald and accurate; in places indeed his accuracy leads him into pitfalls of something nearly approaching bathos. For students and those who desire to possess what is really a "crib" to Hebbel, this most excellently bound and printed volume may be recommended.

CONFESSION AND ABSOLUTION: THE TEACHING OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND AS INTERPRETED AND ILLUSTRATED BY THE WRITINGS OF THE REFORMERS OF THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY. By T. W. Drury, B.D. (Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.) The Principal of Ridley Hall, Cambridge, in this volume has linked together a catena of authorities sufficient to demonstrate finally, we think, the limits of what, with regard to the ordinance which before the Reformation was called the Sacrament of Penance, may be held in "our pure and reformed Church." We do not suppose that his well-intentioned work will go far towards modifying the practice of High Church clergymen. If this voluntary and partial confession, this seeking of advice, this declaratory absolution are all that is comprised in the ordinance, it is simply not worth fighting for; they are the obvious natural right of any man who desires them. As to the English Reformers, they are simply held of no account when found in opposition to the rather vague entity to which such of their descendants apply the name "Catholic Church." If there is any sacramental ministry of reconciliation, it is that (it seems to them obvious) defined by the Council of Trent. If, on the other hand, the ministry is not sacramental but merely natural, no wonder that in the Fulham Conference, "with few exceptions, the acute differences which arose turned on the expediency of making a more or less frequent use of private confession." But we should do Mr. Drury less than justice if we left it to be supposed that he goes no further than is indicated by his professed purpose. The Reformers built upon the New Testament and the writings of the primitive Fathers; and it is, of course, not difficult to gather out of this latter storehouse enough matter to constitute a strong case against the fully developed doctrine of Rome. This they did; and this, following his leaders, Mr. Drury has done in a perfectly temperate and cogent way that should commend his book alike to those of his own school of thought and to those of another way of thinking who can appreciate the value of straightforward and scholarly controversy on burning questions.

THE EXPOSITOR. Vol. VIII. Edited by W. Robertson Nicoll, LL.D. (Hodder and Stoughton. 7s. 6d.) It is not easy to give any sort of just idea of a volume of "The Expositor," concerned as it is for the most part with difficult and intricate problems of criticism or philosophy treated by practised hands with sublime disregard of the convenience and limitations of the "general public." It is not possible barely to enumerate the contents of the present volume, but let us hasten, in the first place, to render thanks to Professor Garvie for his exposition and criticism of the theory of the value-judgments which play so leading a part in that Ritschlian theology which at the present time is dominant in Germany. His article (in four papers) ends on a note of faith: "Only if we believe that God has so revealed Himself to us that in the light of our knowledge of Him we can understand the meaning and worth of all finite existence as otherwise we could not, can we confidently make our consciousness of God regulative of all our thought"; only so subordinate that science, of which the object is the world, and the philosophy of which ourselves are the object, to theology, which is "the vision of God as revealed in Jesus Christ." The authorship of "Hebrews" is treated by Professor Vernon Bartlett; whose conclusion is that the epistle was written from Italy by Barnabas, of whom, in a previous number of "The Expositor," he had maintained that he was in the eyes of his contemporaries a greater figure than is recognised to-day. The date he assigns is the spring of A.D. 62; and the occasion a tendency among communities of Jewish Christians to a practical apostasy due to a habit of mind which failed to do justice to the Gospel as the absolute form of religion, to which Judaism was but preparatory. Dr. Denny treats of the new facet of the doctrine of Atonement which the modern mind has learned to perceive and reverence; and akin to his paper is the Rev. G. S. Streatfeild's on "The Fatherhood of God." Points of critical scholarship are treated by the Rev. Arthur Carr (John vii. 52), Professor Driver (Jerem. xxii., xxiii.), and Mr. Goodspeed (that mysterious harbour of Crete that looked κατὰ λίβαν κατὰ χάρπον). The many disciples of Martineau will read with interest the Rev. J. Hoatson's inquiry into the influence exercised upon him by Frederic Robertson. Professor Bennett's experimental reading of the life of Christ from the pages of St. Mark alone arrests attention. Of high technical value are Professor Moulton's "Notes from Papyri"; the essay on "The Name of Jehovah in the Abrahamic Age," by the Rev. C. H. W. Johns; and Dr. Moffatt's résumé of "Recent Foreign Literature on the New Testament." The Rev. David Smith begins, with "The Evangelic Testimony," his examination of the evidence for the Resurrection, and Professor Zahn concludes his "Missionary Methods in the Times of the Apostles."

Reprints and New Editions

a. THE NATIONAL SPORTS OF GREAT BRITAIN. With fifty coloured plates by Henry Alken. b. THE ANALYSIS OF THE HUNTING FIELD. Illustrated by Henry Alken. ("The Illustrated Pocket Library of Plain and Coloured Books." Methuen. 4s. 6d. net and 3s. 6d. net respectively.) These additions to an admirable series of reprints are in every way worthy of their predecessors. In "National Sports" one can read all about racing, the points of a horse and its training, fox-hunting and its excitements, coursing, shooting, angling, fly-fishing, prize-fighting and other forms of sport. All keen sportsmen who have not the books already should certainly buy them in this handy form.

KING'S LETTERS: FROM THE DAYS OF ALFRED TO THE COMING OF THE TUDORS. (King's Classics. Moring. 2s. 6d. net.) This volume, edited by Mr. Robert Steele, is not merely a reprint of Halliwell's Letters of the Kings of England, but includes many new letters, and the whole has been carefully revised and compared with the original documents. To those who already know the King's Classics, this present volume will need no introduction. It is tastefully bound, well printed, and makes a valuable addition to the series.

a. AN EMERSON TREASURY. b. A TREASURY OF TRANSLATIONS. By William E. A. Axon. (Broadbent. 3d. each.) Tasteful booklets issued at a moderate price. A selection of thoughts from Emerson requires care and considerable ability, otherwise the result is unsatisfactory and scrappy, as is the case with the present booklet.

a. A CALENDAR OF LYRICS IN 1904. b. DR. JOHNSON'S CALENDAR FOR 1904. (O. Anacker. Each 1s. net.) The first is quite the most charming little almanac we have seen this year; beautifully bound and beautifully printed; an admirable gift for a dainty lover of dainty books. The Dr. Johnson is suitably bound in staid brown paper cover and printed in old-world type.

New Books Received

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL

- Drummond, M.A. (James), An Enquiry into the Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel.....(Williams and Norgate) 10/6
Montagu (Lily H.), Thoughts on Judaism.....(Brimley Johnson) 2/6
Swete, D.D. (Henry Barclay), Studies in the Teaching of Our Lord.....(Hodder and Stoughton) 3/6

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES

- Wilcox (Ella Wheeler), Poems of Power.....(Gay and Bird) net 3/6
Tattersall (John), The Lost Paradise and Other Poems.....(Morton) net 2/6
Chase (Wilfrid Earl), Poems.....(Chase, Madison, Wis.) 50c.
Grein (J. T.), Dramatic Criticism, Vol. IV., 1902-1903.....(Nash) net 3/6
Paterson (A. B.), Rio Grande's Last Race and Other Verses.....(Macmillan) 6/0
Butterfield (F. W. L.), The Crevasse: A Dramatic Study.....(Parker) net 2/6

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY

- Paul (Herbert), A History of Modern England, Vols. I. and II. (Macmillan) net 8/6
Morris (Henry), The Life of Charles Grant.....(Murray) net 12/0
Ford, B.L., Ph.D. (Guy Stanton), Hanover and Prussia, 1795-1803: A Study in Neutrality.....(King) net 8/0
Lee, Ph.D. (Guy Carleton), The True History of the Civil War (Lippincott) net 10/6
Curtis (William Elroy), The True Abraham Lincoln.....() net 10/0
Wright (Thomas), The Life of Edward FitzGerald, 2 vols......(Richards) 24/0
Gosse (Edmund), Jeremy Taylor. (English Men of Letters Series.).....(Macmillan) net 3/0

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY

- Fountain (Paul), The Great North-West and the Great Lake Region of North America.....(Longmans, Green) net 10/6
White (Stewart Edward), The Forest.....(Grant Richards) net 7/6
Hamilton (Angus), Korea.....(Heinemann) net 15/0

ART

- Witt (Mary H.), The German and Flemish Masters in the National Gallery.....(Bell)
Halsey (Ethel), Gaudenzio Ferrari. (Great Masters Series).....(Bell) net 5/0
Sketchley (R. E. D.), Watts. (Little Books on Art Series).....(Methuen) net 2/4
Great Masters, Part VII.....(Heinemann) net 5/0

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY

- Leighton, M.D., F.R.S.E. (Gerald R.), The Life-History of British Lizards.....(Morton) net 5/0

EDUCATIONAL

- Loos (Beatrice A.), History in Biography, Vol. I., King Alfred to Edward I......(Black) 2/0
Webb (Sidney), London Education.....(Longmans) net 2/6

MISCELLANEOUS

- Flora and Sylva, Vol. I., 1903.....(Robinson)
Head (Brandon), The Food of the Gods: A Popular Account of Cocoa.....(Brimley Johnson) 3/6
The Survey Gazetteer of the British Isles, with Maps and Plans, Part I., edited by J. G. Bartholomew, F.R.G.S.(Newnes) net 0/7
Northcroft (George J. H.), How to Write Verse (Smith's Publishing Company) 2/6

MISCELLANEOUS—cont.

- The "Daily Mail" Special Map of the Far East.....(Philip) net 1/0
Pleasure Guide to Paris for Bachelors.....(Nilsson) net 2/6
Report on the Budget of the Empire for 1904.....(Imperial Academy of Science, St. Petersburg)
Bardswell (Mrs. F. A.), The Book of Town and Window Gardening (Lane) net 2/6
Roundell (Mrs. Charles) and Roberts (Harry), The Still-Room.....(Lane) cloth, net 3/0; leather, net 4/0
Kechie (W. J.), Protection and the People.....(Dicks) 0/6
Letts's Office Diary and Almanac, 1904.....(Casell) 10/0
The Freehold Farm, No. 1.....(Reeves) 0/6

FICTION

- "Entrapped," by Alice M. Diehl (Long), 6/0; "Devastation," by Mrs. Coulson Kernahan (Long), 4/0; "Four Red Roses," by Sarah Tytler (Long), 6/0; "Monsigny," by Justus Miles Forman (Ward, Lock), 6/0; "The Foolish Virgins," by Alfred Sutro (Chatto and Windus), 1/0; The Ways of the Millionaire, by Oswald Crawford (Chapman and Hall); "The Little Afrikaner and the Great Queen," by Maynard Butler (Sonnenschein), net 1/0; "The Sirdar's Oath," by Bertram Mitford (White), 6/0; "A Magdalen's Husband," by Vincent Brown (Duckworth); "Slaves of Passion," by Helen Baylis (Long), 6/0; "A Canadian Girl," by Lieut.-Colonel Andrew Haggard (Long), 6/0; "A Criminal Crepuscule," by George Griffith (Long), 6/0; "My Friend Prospero," by Henry Harland (Lane), 6/0.

JUVENILE

- "Boys' Second Book of Inventions," by Ray Stannard Baker (Harper), 6/0.

NEW EDITIONS

- "A Short History of the English People," by John Richard Green, Part 40 (Macmillan), net 0/6; "The Life of Robert Burns," by John Gibson Lockhart, edited by J. M. Sloan (Hutchinson), net 1/0; "The Faston Letters, A.D. 1122-1503," edited by James Gairdner, Vol. 2 (Chatto and Windus), net 12/6; "Poems and Idylls," by John Cullen (Stock), 4/6; "Sam Shick the Clockmaker," by Judge Haliburton (Routledge); "Black Sheep," by Edmund Yates (Routledge); "Tom Bulkeley," by R. Montague Jephson (Routledge); "The Mysteries of Udolpho," by Ann Radcliffe (Routledge); "Whitefriars," by Emma Robinson (Routledge); "The Compleat Angler of Isaac Walton and Charles Cotton" (Methuen), net 3/6; "The Heart of Japan," by Clarence Ludlow Brownell (Methuen), 6/0; "The Poetical Works of Christina Georgina Rossetti, with Memoir and Notes," by W. M. Rossetti (Macmillan), 7/6; Bryan's "Dictionary of Painters and Engravers," Vol. II., D-G, edited by G. C. Williamson, Litt.D. (Bell), net 21/0.

PERIODICALS

- "Our Poultry," "Animal Life," "Church Quarterly Review," "Independent," "International Journal of Ethics," "Edinburgh Review," "English Historical Review," "Girl's Realm," "Photo Miniature," "Lippincott's," "Technics," "Smart Set," "The London," "Mind," "North American Review," "Journal of Theological Studies," "Review of Reviews," "Atlantic Monthly," "Pall Mall Magazine," "Woman at Home."

"THE TIMES" LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

A Special Literary Supplement is published with The Times on Friday. This Supplement is an impartial and authoritative organ of literary criticism and a comprehensive and trustworthy medium of literary intelligence.

It can be had with The Times of Friday alone.

Subscriptions, inclusive of postage, for The Times of Friday:—

	3 Months.	6 Months.	12 Months.
Inland ...	3s. 3d.	6s. 6d.	13s. 0d.
Foreign ...	4s. 4d.	8s. 8d.	17s. 4d.

CONTENTS OF FRIDAY, JAN. 22, 1904.

Literature.

- The Vatican and the Abbe Loisy II.
A History of Modern England.
Sir James Willcocks's Autobiography.
Caesar's Conquest of Gaul.
Conduction of Electricity through Gases.
The Psalms in Human Life.
Edward FitzGerald.
Some Recent Verse.
Between the Acts—Judaism as Creed and Life—Julius Ferry.

Fiction.

- Toy Gods
John Blanksett's Business.

Correspondence.

- Old Masters at Burlington House

Art.

- Lady Diana Beauclerc.
Whistler.
French Painting in the 16th Century.

Drama.

- The Duke of Killiecrankie.

"THE TIMES" LITERARY SUPPLEMENT is also sold with the Mail, or
"THE TIMES" WEEKLY EDITION, upon payment of an additional penny.

Address THE PUBLISHER, The Times,
Printing House Square London, E.C.

The Centenary of a Blue-Stocking

THE centenary of the death of the author of "The Female Quixote" ought not to be overlooked. Few now read that rococo novel, but Charlotte Lennox does not depend solely on her own fame for remembrance; she "shares the triumph and partakes the gale" of Dr. Johnson's swelling progress.

She was the daughter of Colonel Ramsay, Lieutenant-Governor of New York, and came to England at the age of fifteen to be trained by a "well-to-do aunt." Before she put her girlish foot on our shores the well-to-do aunt had taken leave of her wits, a calamity that was soon followed by the death of her father on the other side of the Atlantic. Charlotte deserved the pity of two hemispheres. Happily she was taken up, we know not how or why, by Lady Rockingham, and to some extent by the Duchess of Newcastle. Better still, she began to earn money by her pen. All of which sounds like a novelette in being. It is true that she did not marry her publisher, he being married already, but she accepted his assistant, a Mr. Lennox. "Mr." Lennox lives in history as the husband of Charlotte Lennox. Charlotte soon detected the romance in her lot, and wove it into her first story, "Harriot Stuart."

By this time she had joined that select circle of ladies who basked in the smiles and growls of Dr. Johnson. From first to last Johnson was partial to her, and the fuss he made about the launching of "Harriot Stuart" is literary history. The book was ready in the spring of 1751. Johnson proposed to his friends at the Ivy Lane Club that they should celebrate the birth of "Mrs. Lennox's first literary child" by a supper and an all-night carouse. Hawkins, who tells the story, weakly objected that he had never been out of bed a whole night in his life, but being answered by the Doctor that he "would find great delight in it," he promptly gave in. The supper was ordered at the Devil Tavern, Fleet Street, for eight o'clock. Mrs. Lennox and her husband, and a lady friend, together with some twenty others, sat down in great good humour, and the Doctor carried all before him. He had ordered a magnificent apple pie, which he insisted on decorating with bay leaves. After this and other ceremonies he crowned Mrs. Lennox with a wreath of laurel. The night passed "in pleasant conversation and harmless mirth," Johnson being at his best at five o'clock in the morning, when his face "shone with meridian splendour." By this time most of the company were helpless, and only the daybreak put them in mind of their bill; but the waiters were overcome with sleep, and not until the street door opened at eight o'clock was the twelve hours' festivity ended.

With "Harriot Stuart" Mrs. Lennox "arrived." Thenceforth she lived the literary life, still helped and trumpeted by Johnson. She edited, she translated, she dramatised, and she justified much of the attention she received by writing "The Female Quixote: or the Adventures of Arabella." Fielding thought this novel "a most extraordinary and most excellent performance" and a "work of true humour." It is concerned with a lady whose sensibility and dignity would not permit her to listen to any declarations of love. "I do not know," she says to her would-be lover, "what sort of ladies they are who allow such unbecoming liberties; but I am certain that Statira, Parisatis, Clelia, Mandane, and all the illustrious heroines of antiquity, whom it is a glory to resemble, would never admit of such discourses." So Arabella resembles and Glanville dissembles, and in a comedy of distance and respect the novel progresses to a happy ending. The book was a great success. Not so her drama "The Sisters." Epilogued by Goldsmith and produced by Colman, it fell flat at Covent Garden, but was plagiarised by General Burgoyne in his "Heiress" to an extent at once shameful and complimentary. To name Mrs. Lennox's other works would be only to demonstrate how much she is a forgotten author in her own right. Who has read "Philander: a Dramatic Pastoral," who "Euphemia, a Novel," who the Duchess de la Vallière's "Meditations and Penitential Prayers, with some Account of her Life"?

In the "Ladies' Pocket Book" of 1778 are engraved nine female figures, each—of course—in the character of a Muse. They are Elizabeth Carter of "Epictetus" fame; Mrs. Barbauld, who wrote many books, and lives by one short poem; Angelica Kauffman; Mrs. Sheridan; Mrs. Montagu, the original blue-stockings; the saintly Hannah More; Mrs. Macaulay, whose "History of England" was such a flash in the pan; Mrs. Griffith, whose "Letters of Henry and Frances" had their day; and last, but not least, the lady whom Johnson crowned at the Devil Tavern. One night in his last year the Doctor dined at Mrs. Garrick's house in Adelphi Terrace with Elizabeth Carter, Hannah More, and Fanny Burney. "Three such women," he told Boswell, "are not to be found: I know not where I could find a fourth, except Mrs. Lennox, who is superior to them all." A few months later he passed away, and Mrs. Lennox soon found that she was out-living not only her friend, but her fame. She knew poverty, sickness, and neglect, and died a pensioner of the Royal Literary Fund on January 4, 1804.

Egomets

I HAVE recently been browsing in bed upon "Barchester Towers" and "The Three Clerks." How old-fashioned these stories of Trollope are compared with those of some of his contemporaries, say with those of Thackeray and Dickens. The immortals never grow old; it is to be feared then that Trollope will not prove to be an immortal; in fact I fancy he never thought that he was such. To him letters were a mere means of earning money: he had no artistic emotions that drove him to express himself by means of his pen. Had he been able to paint pictures that would sell or to compose music that would prove acceptable he would doubtless have done such work for a consideration.

For many years I refused to read Trollope, for I had refused his ineffable life of Thackeray in the "English Men of Letters." It angered me, as it must have done—did in fact—everyone who loved and honoured Thackeray. Who was this bourgeois, jog-trotting Trollope, that he should set himself up to preach upon idleness with Thackeray's life as text? Every genius is in his own way industrious, but every man of industry is not a genius—Trollope for one. Another work that angered me was his Autobiography, in which indeed he did himself scant justice. He was not altogether the money-seeking hack he there made himself out to be.

He can be quite amusing, as for example in the character and adventures of Charley Tudor in "The Three Clerks"; he can touch sentiment deftly and pathos deeply on occasion, as is shown by some of the incidents and descriptions in "Barchester Towers." But his moments are few and far between, and if his work have a value for future generations it will not be as fiction but as fact, for he painted the manners of his time very truly and minutely. He lived in an interesting era, the parting of the ways between the old days and the new; in his pages we travel by train and by coach; duelling is a mode of days near past; the telegraph is an innovation; the country round London then is suburban now, and so forth.

But he is old-fashioned, and much as I love many old fashions and many old-fashioned writers, Trollope annoys me. Thackeray can call a pause, preach to his readers and chat of his puppets, without disturbing our equanimity or destroying the illusion of the narrative; Trollope jars upon me rudely when he plays such pranks and he plays them only too frequently. Then when Trollope is in need of a name for a medical man he will probably call him Dr. Cureall, or by some such title; a hard-up baronet will be Sir Penniless Lackall; a profligate peer, Lord Moraless; a talkative landlady, Mrs. Manywords, and so on! This trick I can forgive in Dickens—I could forgive him almost anything, save the, to me, unreal sentiment of some of his death-bed scenes and his straw-stuffed gentlefolk. I suppose it comes to just this, that I can forgive much to those I love and little to those I dislike, or do not love. Trollope I do not love, and I fear me never shall do so, much as I should like to be at peace with all writers.

It is of course wrong of me to allow dislike for the personality of a writer to influence me in my judgment of or liking for his work. But though this may be the best of all possible worlds for a bookman, it is not perfect. Trollope is a thought too good in his own opinion, a little too much of a would-be saint to be lovable to this sinner. Thackeray and Dickens I love for their broad humanity and their soft hearts; I am sure either of them would have lent me a guinea if I had gone to them in my trouble. Trollope would have looked me up and down through his spectacles, would have demanded if my way of life were thoroughly methodical, and on receiving my truthful answer would have written me down a miserable sinner. Sinner I am, but not miserable. I verily believe he could have found it in his heart to have forgiven any sinner an he had been a man of method.

E. G. O.

Science

The Love of Truth

WHEN a Darwin, or a Huxley, or a Spencer dies, it is commonly and properly asserted of him that his leading characteristic was a love of Truth. And if you listen to those who are, for one reason or another, in opposition to such men, you will hear that to claim a love of Truth as a man's leading characteristic is to insist on the obvious, all healthy-minded people being endowed, as a matter of course, with some measure of this high passion. These critics are prepared to maintain that, in all decent persons, themselves included, there is the love of Truth: by which phrase we mean a dominating affection, so that to have learned the real facts in the course of an argument affords far more satisfaction than to have proved your opponent wrong, and so that it causes a grief of soul to see the thing that is not offered in the guise of the thing that is, even to a schoolboy at the Antipodes or a savage in Fiji.

But I think it can be shown that this belief in the widespread prevalence of a love of Truth is by no means confined to the protagonists on one side in the conflict between science and dogmatic theology. Let me quote, for instance, from a French educationist, M. Laisant, who is referring to the teaching of religion and ethics in schools:—

L'éducateur habile, en stimulant dans l'esprit de son élève le culte de la vérité, en tirant parti de tous les exemples, de toutes les observations, de l'expérience quotidienne, arrivera sans peine à façonner graduellement cette conscience d'enfant pour en faire une conscience humaine.

The reviewer in last week's "Nature," quoting this sentence, says that it will commend itself to and will gain the assent of most men of science.

Now it appears to me that this sentence implicitly contains at least one very questionable assumption. The author appears to regard a love of Truth as a natural appanage of a schoolmaster. His pupils are constantly to see this passion exalted above all others and are thereby to obtain a firm foundation in ethics. I believe, on the contrary, that it would be a terrible—perhaps the most terrible of disasters, if the formal and explicit teaching of morality—or of religion, for is not that "morality touched by emotion"?—were to cease from within our schools. I do not for a moment believe that the love of Truth, displayed either overtly or covertly by the teacher could ever be a substitute for this, and I gravely question the assumption that such a love of Truth may be taken for granted as a necessary ingredient of the teacher's temper.

On the contrary, I humbly subscribe to the opinion of Spencer that love of Truth is one of the rarest of virtues. I know the struggle within myself when, as in controversy, the love of Truth is in conflict with self-esteem, with the love of appearing to be on the side of Truth. You may say that I am particularly unfortunate, and that my case does not furnish an adequate argument against the exclusion of formal ethical teaching from our schools. I do not think so. Is not the difficulty with which the average man acknowledges himself to be wrong simply notorious, and is not such an acknowledgment just exactly a homage to Truth? Yet, if we loved Truth as we think we do, the mere demonstration of our error would be unable to cause any emotion of chagrin, for the emotion of joy in having found Truth, our heart's desire, would utterly possess us.

And, finally, I think it may easily be shown from our present educational system that the great majority of us prefer Convenience and Ease to Truth. A recent writer, for instance, urges that the time has now come for the facts of Organic Evolution to be taught in schools. It seems a reasonable proposition, does it not? Organic evolution is infinitely more certain—since it is derived from evidence of a totally different order—than is the accuracy of any single historical fact. It has been part of Truth any time these forty years; it had received final proof when most of the parents of the present generation of school-children were themselves at school. Yet so far are men from loving Truth, so far are they from even mere expediency in this matter, that there is absolutely no desire worth mentioning amongst parents that their children should be taught this great and significant Truth. I say expediency, since it seems to me to be better that a child should be taught the truth about human origins, and be taught it with some appreciation of its glorious implications for the future, than that the child, now adolescent, should learn from the Rationalist Press Association that man is a monkey and may as well swallow the fact without making a wry face.

One other proof of my contention that the love of Truth is not common property. I assert, as an astounding and to me utterly incomprehensible fact that there do exist—and you will not believe me, I know—in this present year and in this land of England, a whole host of parents who do not believe in the historical accuracy of Adam and Eve and who repudiate the doctrine of eternal torment, the most immeasurably horrible and inhuman of all human conceptions, who yet consciously permit their children to be taught and to believe in the literal truth of that Babylonian legend and of a dogma which conceives of Deity as the very opposite to a God of justice.

C. W. SALEEBY.

Dramatic Notes

THE theatre-going public is divided into two distinct classes, by far the larger consisting of those who thirst merely for entertainment and the smaller of those who wish to be spectators of plays which transfer to the stage the problems and difficulties of life. The problem play has unfortunately come to mean a piece that deals with one problem only of life, an important one undeniably, but at the same time one of which it is easy to exaggerate the importance, and which also cannot be discussed candidly in public. Readers may be divided similarly into two classes, those who resort to literature simply for amusement, for that end demanding light works of fiction, anecdotal biographies, adventurous works of travel and "tit-bitty" newspapers and periodicals; the few, on the other hand, turning to books for the consolations and stimulations of literature. The writer of serious books, even if his public be comparatively small, can count upon a certain public for support and can reasonably expect, if his work be of good quality, to find a publisher. With the writer of plays which deal with the realities of life, serious and comic too, it is far otherwise; he can indeed count upon a certain measure of public support, but his chance with the managers of our playhouses is but small. Why?

WELL, in the first place the manager cannot fairly be blamed, he is a business man and has to make his business pay. Where, then, is the fault? With the public? Scarcely, for the public has never shown any reluctance to support true tragedy or true comedy; but they refuse rightly to pay for seats to witness plays which are serious only in the fact that they do not amuse. They neither interest nor entertain. If we want mere entertainment we are provided with plenty of fare. I spoke recently of the excellent entertainment supplied by "The Country Girl," and would now draw attention to "The Orchid" at the Gaiety Theatre. This piece does not stimulate thought, makes no call upon our critical faculties, does not anywhere touch life, but it does entertain. The music is bright if not distinguished, some of the songs capitalily written, the dresses artistic, in colour wonderfully so, the dancing, though there is too little of it, first rate, the acting and the singing most of it good, though the funny men depend rather too much upon buffoonery. But in such entertainments as these I seem to see, as does Mrs. Craigie, the possible beginnings of a new form of theatrical entertainment—new and national. It is a gradual growth from the formless and senseless musical comedies of a few years ago; it is still formless, and probably will remain so, but it is beautiful to look at, pleasant to listen to, and it may develop, evolve, into something as clever and as national in spirit as the satires of Aristophanes. Only Aristophanes is lacking, but he may be in our midst though unrecognised. There is hope then for the comic drama.

MR. GEORGE EDWARDES is responsible for the quite delightful revival (referred to in Musical Notes) of "Ib and Little Christina" at the Lyric Theatre. Captain Basil Hood has written a touching and sympathetic "book," Signor Franco Leonis has composed music which taken as a whole is dramatic and melodious, and the manager has provided a cast of extraordinary excellence, including Mr. Ben Davies and Miss Susan Strong. This is light opera at its very best, and if Mr. Edwardes can bring his various forces into line, he may prove to be the founder of a new and good school of musical pieces, filled with good humour, good writing and good music.

ON the serious side of the stage the outlook is not so bright. With the solitary exception of "Cousin Kate," recently withdrawn, the past year produced nothing which approached true comedy; serious drama or tragedy was entirely absent from the boards. Of tawdry melodrama decked out in fine feathers we were given only too much. Mr. Barrie's fairy tales stand in a class apart. "Letty," which has not proved altogether a success from the managerial point of view, was the most interesting example of a serious play which attempted to deal with the verities of life. In the cause of its failure may, I think, be found the whole cause of the present depressed condition of dramatic literature. As I sat and watched the adventures of Letty and her lovers I was not, who could be, interested in her or them, but merely in studying the workmanship and the skill of Mr. Pinero. I did not feel that the characters were anything else than well-dressed puppets, whose emotions were no more real than those of marionettes. The cleverness of the acting was enjoyable, but one pitied the actors who had to struggle to make unrealities appear realities. In brief, the play did not ring true, its comedy was superficial and its tragedy untrue; it was all studied, but not from nature. The smaller public, of whom I have spoken, stand aloof from the theatre of to-day because dramatic literature and nature have parted company; until they are once more joined together they will stand aloof. I do not ask for the nastiness of some modern French writers or for the pessimism of Germany and Norway, but I do ask for flesh and blood men and women, and tragedy and comedy based on human nature.

OTHER sides of this question are the bad plan recently grown up of engaging actors and actresses merely for the run of the piece—which means that performers grow into a groove and are called upon to play merely one specific type of character—the heavy rentals that have to be paid for theatres, the large salaries that have to be given to popular performers, and the vast expense of the gorgeous scenery and dresses that are called for to cover the dramatic nakedness of our plays. Various schemes have been put forward for remedying this state of affairs, but all unfortunately ignore the practical politics of the theatre. The only scheme that seems to me to hold out any hope of success is that the London County Council should build upon land belonging to them a moderate-sized not over-decorated playhouse, which they could let at a reasonable rental, representing, say, five per cent. on the capital outlay and on the loss of rent for the land which would otherwise have been let. The playhouse could be let on certain terms, which would include a veto upon musical pieces, the representation of a certain number of Shakespeare's plays and the production of a certain number of new dramas and comedies per annum. The manager could doubtless provide his Shakespearean and other old dramatic fare by aid of the Benson, Tree and other travelling dramatic companies, assisted by some of his own players, of whom he could engage a competent company at yearly salaries. His own company could play country engagements while the boards of his own theatre were occupied by others. And—why should there not be a subscription season in the summer and in the autumn? Among other subscribers I would suggest the metropolitan newspapers. This is the scheme in outline; with the details I hope to deal later.

THERE was an interesting revival at Toynbee Hall on Saturday evening last, when Addison's "Drummer" (originally produced in 1716) was presented by the Balliol House players for the first time for over a century. To be precise, the last London performance was at Drury Lane in 1794.

THE latest, and quite the most charming of little children's plays, was performed for the first time on Saturday last by half-a-dozen remarkably clever youngsters at a juvenile party in Lowndes Square. It is called "The Legend of the Lazy Gardener," and is by Mrs. Stepney Rawson, who has given so many other hostages to literary fortune. The play is of the simplest, half-prose, half-verse, and Miss Muffet plays a part therein; the scene is in Jack Melon's garden, and his two assistants, Tomato and Potato, together with the Golden Archer, the Frog, and the Dew Fairy, tell a pretty tale of childish sympathy with flowers and garden life. It is a charming conceit, and should be seen in print for the enjoyment of generations of children and parents.

THE Hebbel Society at Heidelberg lately gave a performance of Marlowe's "Dr. Faustus" in the Elizabethan manner, without scenery. The effect was excellent, and the actors scored a distinct success.

A NEW play by Felix Philippi, "Der Grüne Zweig" (The Green Branch), has been produced at the Royal Theatre, Berlin. Leaving aside the somewhat stormy melodrama he usually affects, Philippi endeavours here, but, we think, with doubtful success, to be symbolic and poetical. Only a succès d'estime attended the representation of August Strindberg's historical drama "Gustav Adolf," at the Berliner Theatre.

A DATE in April has been fixed for the production of Mrs. Craigie's "The Flute of Pan," by Miss Olga Nethersole and a special company.

THE Stage Society's second production this season will be Brieux's "Les Bienfaiteurs," which has been christened "The Philanthropists." The performance takes place on February 2 at the King's Hall, Covent Garden. Early in March the Society intend to produce "A Soul's Tragedy," by Robert Browning, and a one-act play by Frederick Fenn and Richard Price, entitled "Op o' my Thumb."

Musical Notes

THE Philharmonic Society's programme for the coming season is not wildly exciting. The performance of a choral work in the shape of Brahms's Rhapsody for contralto solo and male choir will indeed be something of a novelty at a Philharmonic concert, but otherwise the season promises no very remarkable features. Sir Charles Stanford's new clarinet concerto should, however, be worth hearing, as should Mr. Edward German's "Rhapsody on March Themes," while Mr. A. von Ahn Carse's symphonic prelude to Byron's "Manfred" will serve to introduce a younger composer, who is, however, despite his name, also of native origin. Richard Strauss will be represented, I notice, by his "Tod und Verklärung," though one of his less familiar works, "Don Quixote," or "Also sprach Zarathustra," for instance, would surely have been a preferable choice. Perhaps the directors may be disposed to reconsider their decision in this regard.

THE revival of "Ib and Little Christina" at Daly's Theatre, with an excellent cast, including Mr. Ben Davies, is an experiment of quite exceptional interest, especially if it be true, as has been stated, that it constitutes the first step in the direction of a much bolder scheme in Mr. George Edwardes' mind, having for its end something very little short of permanent English opera. The idea at present, it seems, is to get together a repertory of works adapted to a smaller theatre than Covent Garden; but from this to operas of a bigger class would obviously be merely a step—though a step which would certainly be rendered all the easier if the further rumour of ultimate co-operation in this particular enterprise on the part of Mr. Edwardes and Mr. Manners should prove well founded.

Who knows but that while some are clamouring for the State-endowed opera, which they are never likely to get, the foundations may have been laid already of an enterprise the ultimate development of which may disprove the necessity of any such appeal at all? At the same time I cannot avoid certain misgivings as to the wisdom of this suggested policy of building up a repertory piece by piece. If one thing seems more firmly established than another, it is that an opera cannot hope, as a rule, to attract audiences night after night as ordinary pieces do, and the instances in which they have done this in London—Sullivan's "Ivanhoe" was one such, while Humperdinck's "Hansel und Gretel" was another—have simply gone to show, in my judgment, that Londoners would prove in reality quite an exceptionally good opera-going public if they once were given the chance.

At the same time it would be injudicious to the last degree to repeat the late Mr. D'Oyly Carte's mistake by building upon this assumption and taking it for granted that any work good enough for inclusion in a repertory should be good enough also to stand the ordeal of a run. There are any number of operas worthy of occasional performance, but unsuited for continuous representation; wherefore it would be deplorable if a promising project were once again to come to grief through neglect of this obvious truth. "Ib and Little Christina," for instance, is a charming little opera, which is being most admirably given at the present time, and which is certainly well worth seeing. But, frankly, it is not a work which I for one should expect the general public to run after. And if, therefore, it does not enjoy a success of any great length, it would certainly be absurd to argue from this that English opera on repertory lines would not attract support.

I CANNOT quite understand, indeed, why, while he was about it, Mr. George Edwardes did not choose an opera of assured and established popularity instead of a comparatively unknown work, and make his initial experiment with that. Perhaps, however, this will be his next step. But the essential point is, that no single opera, however popular, can hope to enjoy a prolonged run. A repertory of some extent or other is absolutely the first condition of success, so far as the establishment of anything like permanent English opera is concerned, and enterprises started in defiance of this fact are far more likely to prejudice, by failure, the whole idea, and deter others embarking on like ventures, than to achieve any more useful purpose.

THE proposed new Concert-goers' Club should fulfil quite a useful function if the scheme is carried out on the lines talked of. Indeed, the announcement of the project follows on the very heels of a suggestion which I recently let fall in these columns to the effect that some such body would do much good by bringing music lovers together and thereby stimulating, perhaps, their patronage of concerts. Undoubtedly people are much more ready to go to concerts if they know that they are likely, when doing so, to meet friends and acquaintances, while if in addition they had in prospect a lively debate on the works heard at the subsequent meeting of the "Concert-goers," who shall say how their interest might not thereby be stimulated? The society should form a useful meeting ground, too, for the discussion of musical topics of the day, from the exclusion of unpunctual concert-goers, to the misdeeds of the musical critics, and in other ways should prove a useful body.

THE reported recent discovery of a long-lost Bizet score is pleasant news, though it must be confessed that reports of this nature which get into the daily papers are usually to be received with a certain amount of suspicion. If, however, it should turn out that a work by Bizet, hitherto unknown, has really been discovered, the fact is certainly one of interest. The work is hardly likely, indeed, to prove a second "Carmen"—what a gold mine it would turn out for someone if it did! But Bizet was one of those children of genius whose slightest creations are worthy of attention, and a posthumous opera from his pen would assuredly attract uncommon attention.

"THE fall of the Spanish Cabinet at an early date is probable as a result of the campaign of anti-ministerial songs." Thus a recent telegram from Madrid. It is not the first time, of course, that street ditties have proved powerful political weapons. "Ça ira," whereby such execution was done, in more than one sense of the word, at the time of the French Revolution, and "Lilliburlero," which contributed not a little towards the revolution of 1688 in our own land, are, of course, the classical instances under this head. It was of the latter doggerel that Dr. Percy, of "Reliques" fame, remarked that it had exercised "a more powerful effect than either the philippics of Demosthenes or Cicero," though it is exceedingly likely that Purcell's brisk and catchy tune had a good deal more to do with the success and popularity of the song than Lord Wharton's words. The latter refer to King James having nominated the Earl of Tyrconnel to the Lieutenancy of Ireland in 1686. Afterwards many other songs, political and otherwise, were written to the same tune, which makes a capital quick-step march.

In the case of "Ça ira" the words in this case are said to have been suggested to a street singer called Ladré by General Lafayette, who remembered Franklin's favourite saying at each successive stage of the American insurrection. The tune, on the other hand, which was the work of a certain Bécour, a side-drum player at the opera, had enjoyed previous popularity under the title of "Carillon National." The refrain of the ditty was sufficiently sanguinary:—

Ah! ça ira, ça ira, ça ira!
Les aristocrat' à la lanterne
Ah! ça ira, ça ira, ça ira!
Les aristocrat' on les pendra.

The Spanish songs referred to, the singing of which the Government has, it seems, vainly endeavoured to suppress, are directed, it would appear, against certain returned clericals from the Philippines who had been given preferment at home against the wishes of the people. Do our own politicians make as much use of music as they might? A song called "John Bull's Store" is, indeed, said to be enjoying considerable vogue in relation to the Fiscal controversy, but I have heard no vocal Free Trade counterblast.

Art Notes

THE honours and the excitement of the week have been with Rodin and the International Society of Sculptors, Painters and Gravers. There have been dinners and speeches and junketings. Monsieur Rodin was met at the station, feasted, interviewed; students unharnessed the horses from the great sculptor's carriage and dragged him in triumph; and they have sent him off again to France amidst enthusiasm. And now, out of the whirl, one begins in the cold light of the calmer day to ask what was said concerning art, that was suggestive or illuminating or helpful; and what impression has been left, apart from the well-merited ovation to Rodin? Well, first of all, one is again struck by the strange incapacity of a great artist to express himself intelligibly in speech about the inner meaning of his art. One sits and broods and wonders as before at this great man's self-bewilderment in trying to define art and to give a message to art students: one is surprised that he also, who killed the academic law as to the need for sculpture to be in calm repose, should allow himself to be harassed by the weight of these early school-taught catchpennies about the Beautiful. Rodin, like Whistler and the rest, can show us what is art in and through that art alone. When they come to write or speak about it they mouth and grimace—they are dumb or they are garrulous—but they seem unable to yield the key of the mysteries. Here is Rodin talking vague platitudes about "art and nature, the real source of all beauty," and so on. They will do it—they all do it. But what does he mean? The fact is that Rodin knows full well that the masterpiece which dominates all else amidst the work of his fellows in this exhibition in London to-day, a masterpiece which holds one, grips one, keeps one in homage before it, is the huge and wonderful figure that sits in that great central hall, crouched in thought, Le Penseur—The Thinker. And he knows as well that this superb thing has no particular claim to Beauty. It is far greater than that. It has a dignity, a greatness, a vast power of emotion that is majestic and thrilling. But beauty as such it holds neither in its vastness nor in the glorious modelling. Emotion it holds to a colossal extent, and thereby stands out as the majestic thing it is. Amidst all this speech-making and large talk, the man who got nearest to this great truth, and he was the last man from whom I should have expected it, was Mr. Edmund Gosse—he did not say in explicit terms that beauty was not art, but he did not repeat the cant that it was. He showed that, since Rodin came, the academic fallacy as to great sculpture necessitating a dignified repose was dead; and in saying that very true and very revolutionary thing, he not only gave Rodin the name of greatness, but he showed that the old Greek tradition of the Beautiful was in its death-throes. It was the only illuminating essay at the dinner; and it was the speech that showed where Rodin's great position and power lay. Rodin has grasped, in the creative part of him, that art is the speech of Emotion. He brings to the making of his great art the most remarkable combination of exquisite gifts—his sense of composition is enormous, clean-cut, definite; his modelling is eloquent and large as it is subtle; his mastery remains in his fingers to the utmost finish—and his last finished touch is as fresh as his vigorous sketch. But his highest achievement lies in the majestic grip of the Emotions. In Beardsley we had one of the greatest masters of eloquent musical line that the world has ever seen; but he never became a great artist, for he never expressed the great emotions. In Rodin we have a sculptor who has the most exquisite feeling for form, but he is also a great artist, for above all things he expresses in terms of sculpture the great human emotions. Go and stand before that huge statue of "The Thinker," and you can hear the majestic figure thinking—it grows into a live thing, glows in a strange vital way. I am not mad fool enough to try and write down what it expresses, for Rodin alone can do that, and not in words but in the sculptured form. Indeed, I would suggest to the Council of this Society that when the bronze statue is set up in the hall, the plaster should not be taken away, but should be set up at the other end of the hall, for the white plastic mass takes and gives out lights and reflections and marvellous beauties that no metal ever approaches, just as the gem-like colours of porcelain can never be approached by any other paint for translucency and brilliancy. It is good to hear that this majestic bronze has been secured for the South Kensington Museum. It is to be hoped, for the benefit of the Academy students, that the plaster may be secured for the Royal Academy. And I should like again to call attention to the simple fact that in the midst of all the enthusiasm concerning this fine Society, I should like to have seen a more handsome tribute paid to the man whose fertile brain and dogged energy created it—Mr. Francis Howard. Mr. Swann, R.A., said it was “a great work to bring together the best artists of all countries”—but with academic magnificence the name of the man who has done it was “keerfully kept from us.”

JEAN LÉON GÉRÔME is dead. To the art student of Paris this means much more than that one of the most dramatic of French painters has gone out of Bohemia; for Gérôme's keen interest in the students and all his fierce enthusiasms were an important part of the breath that bred the hot discussions of the Quartier Latin and the Hill of Montmartre. His genial spirit was largely concerned in the rollicking pageants of the students' quarter; and the men of his studio were amongst the most original of them that danced and revelled in the Bals des Quatre Arts. His grey soldierly head will be seen in his beloved Paris no more—his “boys” will take their troubles to him no more—his fierce partizanship for the arts he loved, and his keen criticisms of the arts for which he had no sympathy, are alike silenced. His wild enthusiasm for Phidias, his contempt for Donatello, his abomination of Canova's lions at St. Peter's, Rome, his hatred of the insincerity of Raphael, whose genius alone saved him from being detestable as an artist, but could not even save him from being a detestable example to the student; his caution to the young students that Michael Angelo was a master to admire, not to imitate; his passionate adoration of Rembrandt—all his praise and blame are spoken for the last time, and the young students of his school must turn to other masters. Gérôme was a man who made an inspiring teacher, for he believed in the spirit of the age to create as fine art as was ever produced in the past; he very rightly, and, for so academic a painter, surprisingly rightly, held that there was no virtue or power in the Old Masters that should not be, and indeed was not, present in the modern man; and he would hold up Menzel and Raffet and Gavarni and Doré as fine masters in their own province, and, had he known English art better he might have added Turner. Had his eyes been as clear in old age as in youth he might have added Rodin and Whistler and Sargent and others to-day; but in his old age his belief in his generation grew cold, and the lost fire left his heart gloomy for the future. The revolutionary movements in art that broke up many accepted academic conventions, movements largely due to the discovery of Velasquez, instead of rousing his admiration only alarmed him. Everything, said he, was become topsy-turvy; it was all a turning of art upside down, a distortion, a madness—the youngsters are all trying for garish short-cuts to fame; the one ideal is to be Original, to stand out eccentrically from the others; but they have not the elements of training in them, and their work is nerveless by consequence, and without substance, and devoid of foundation. So he would rail against Manet's paint and arrangement, sneer at Monet's impressionism and shrieking gaudinesses, thunder against Rodin. In fact, Gérôme was bred on the distorting idea that mistook beauty for Art, and it landed him in the great morass which prevented him from seeing that even his own greatest successes were dependent not on beauty but on the emotions evoked by the accident of his literary attitude to art and of his bias towards historic incident as motive for his masterpieces. For, make no mistake about it, he achieved masterpieces. His “Death of Marshal Ney” recorded that disgraceful political crime (which even the courage of Wellington shrank from preventing), with a simple power and a feeling for the mood of the thing that makes a fine achievement—the dead figure of the great heroic man who lies on his face before the dingy wall, done to ignominious death by the squad of men who march away musket on shoulder careless of the villainy and of the broken justice that ought to have seen them hanged on the first lamp-post; the grey sombre note of tragedy; the sense of a disgraceful act and of the ignominy of France in the doing; all these things are emotionally rendered in terms of colour, and this being so, they reach fulfilment in the masterpiece. His “Bellona,” that shrieks the red-mouthed lust of war, and his beautiful “Tanagra,” showed him a fine sculptor. And not the least part of his immortality, if indeed he be of the immortals, will be the memory, as with so different a genius as Whistler, that he treated our solemn Academy with some contempt; and who shall say him nay to his thunders, for was he not himself an academic man and a member of that august body, and ought he not therefore in some fashion to know?

At the general assembly of the Royal Society of British Artists, held for the special election of six water-colour painters to that body, there were elected as members: C. Horsley, Edward Brown, W. H. Allen, Arthur Richardson, Walter Tyrwhitt, and George Carline; and the two miniature painters, Hugh Nicholson and Cecil Quinell, were also elected at the same time.

It is an excellent move on the part of the Board of Education, and of the Society of Arts, to organise, at the South Kensington Museum, an exhibition of engravings produced by mechanical means, including specimens of colour-printing. Their most instructive display of engraving and etching, and all that pertained thereto, last summer, makes the promise of the coming show a bright one. A committee has been formed with Sir William Abney as chairman.

MR. ROBERT GORDON HARDIE, the well-known American portrait painter, has died at Battleboro in Vermont. His wife had died three days after the birth of a son, and Mr. Hardie had returned home but a few hours from her grave, overwhelmed with grief, when he fell dead. He was a pupil of Gérôme's in Paris, and his master has died also within a few hours of him. He was a member of the Society of American Artists. Tragedy was his to the full at the last.

“THE BURLINGTON MAGAZINE” for January contains an excellent article on John Sell Cotman as a painter in oils, by Mr. C. J. Holmes, with at least two very finely reproduced pictures that convey Cotman's manner and brushing marvellously well. Mr. Holmes has also a convincing little article as to the genuineness of the Gassiot Constable, showing that the present picture overlies a tentative sketch for the now well-known “Salisbury,” which in many details it much resembles. The papers on the Normanton collection, by Mr. Max Roldit, are concluded in the number, a good reproduction being given of Titian's "Venus and Adonis" amongst other masterpieces. How Titian could paint a woman! The change of ownership of "The Burlington Magazine" promises a more interesting and less precious review of art matters. Mr. Holmes's co-operation in the editorship must be of value to the brilliant group of men who form the consultative committee; and his knowledge of process and reproduction in "The Studio," and his taste in placing the illustrations on the printed page, promise well for the future of the venture.

MESSRS. MULLER AND Co., of Amsterdam, send me the catalogue of their sale of drawings by the old masters; there ought to be some good work going under the hammer.

University Extension

A New Development

TO the many who pass odd moments of regret at having been deprived, as was Charles Lamb, of the "sweet food of academic institution," any opportunity of making amends, in however minor a key, for that "defrauding" of their earlier years will come with especial meaning. For the last thirty years the University Extension Movement has been doing capital work in providing this means of giving something, at least, of that esteemed "institution" to those to whom it was denied in its full "academic" form.

"Centres" are now developed all over England, from the University towns themselves to the smallest villages; Toynbee Hall stands as a monument of fine work in the East End of London; and a glance at the list of lectures arranged by the Extension Board will at once show the large number of courses both in the London suburbs and in the Home Counties.

But lectures do not necessarily mean either attendance or attention. A scheme of work, emanating from the highest authorities in the kingdom, and partaking of so extensive a nature, should possess more unity than it does at present.

Here I propose to restrict myself to Extension work in London. Since the movement has come under the ægis of the University of London it may be said to have entered upon a new phase. Indeed it is recognised that the work of the Extension is becoming so important that special means must be taken to canvass it. It is with this object that a new Association has been formed, to which reference was made in last week's ACADEMY.

The new Association is primarily concerned with the central courses of lectures, but its work will have a considerable influence on the Extension Movement as a whole, and what can be called the unique course pursued at the opening meeting will no doubt lead to other centres adopting similar "tactics." It is worth putting on record a brief summary of the proceedings on January 6, when the Association was inaugurated. This meeting was held at the University of London, and the programme contained the first germs of the work proposed to be accomplished by the new body, in so far as Dr. R. D. Roberts, Registrar of the University, as chairman, gave a general introduction on the scope of the forthcoming courses on "The Humanities," and the lecturers themselves followed with brief anticipations of their individual spheres in the course of study. I would make it clear that these addresses were not résumés in any sense, but rather were put forth as succinct prefaces to the ultimate matter.

Surely this is a unique idea in the history of lecture work?

In truth, such a new force in the University Extension work must produce some stimulus toward a serious course of study and, most important of all, help to develop the proper spirit in which the lectures should be taken up. Dr. Emil Reich expressed the matter clearly when he said that the object of the new Association was to induce the student to take an active interest in the lectures, not merely to be a passive listener.

The Association can well feel satisfaction at the start that has been made, but the campaign it has entered upon is not yet fully developed. What may be called the next move and an outcome of the formation of this body is a "Bibliographical Visit" to the British Museum on January 30. This will be conducted by Dr. Reich (whose conception it was), who on this occasion (for this is only the preliminary to a projected course of such demonstrations) will ask for questions from the students on subjects connected with "any science whatever," by which means, with special facilities granted him by the Museum, Dr. Reich proposes to demonstrate the underlying principles of bibliography. I hope to have an opportunity of referring again to so interesting and important a scheme.

I may add that it has been decided to invite local associations, committees, and other bodies interested in the Extension Movement to become affiliated to the Central Association. The Hon. Sec., Mr. Max Judge (7, Pall Mall), can supply any further information.

Correspondence

Keats' Grecian Urn

SIR,—It appears somewhat strange that any man of apparent intellectuality, such as Mr. L. P. Patten appears to be, should take exception to what is practically one of the most graphically correct lines in English poetry. To "low at the skies" is certainly the characteristic action of the heifer, and I invariably think of Keats' line whenever I see and hear one in the act—neck outstretched upwards, eyes somewhat dilated, and nostrils quivering. Keats was a veritable master at such word-pictures—indeed, they constitute not the least part of his eternal charm—and he would be the last to make a mistake with so simple a circumstance.

Mr. Patten thinks the ode over-rated; possibly it is. Shakespeare frequently suffers from the same complaint. Yet, to those of us who love Keats, it remains a singularly beautiful expression of that consolation with which the spirit of everlasting beauty tempers the consciousness of change, and the evanescence of all earthly things. Mr. Patten says "there is a fashion in poetry . . . and Keats happens to be in vogue to-day," a statement which is very wide of the truth. Keats never was, is not, or ever will be, the "fashion" or the "vogue" either. He is deeply loved by those who can appreciate good verse, that is all. And they are singularly few. He is more successful than "popular," and one must be "popular" to be the "fashion."

The statement that Matthew Arnold and Lord Houghton "discovered" Keats raises a smile. If anyone "discovered" him it was himself.—Yours, &c.,

Hampstead,
January 16, 1904.

ARTHUR COLES ARMSTRONG.

SIR,—The Parthenon frieze contains two, if not three, figures of cows being led to sacrifice that bear witness to the accuracy of Keats' lines. Of course if Mr. Patten is prepared to assert that Pheidias overlooked this falsification of nature, there is really nothing more to be said.

For my part, I consider those who elevate Keats to the position of master and refuse to see any blemish in his work as somewhat less ridiculous than that of those who indulge in quibbling criticisms and vague depreciations.—Yours, &c.,

K. DE WATTEVILLE.

SIR,—The "ridiculous Keats" (God save the mark!) has, as authority for his exquisite lines, 1 Samuel vi. 12; and Doré's illustration confirms the "lowing at the skies," as must every other witness that has seen a heifer low. That this is "prayerful exercise" none ever imagined till your correspondent wrote. It is he that has "falsified nature," not Keats.—Yours, &c.,
JOHN B. TABB.

The Odyssey

SIR,—Mr. Kettle and Mr. Hale do me too much honour in speaking of "Andrew Lang's Odyssey." They might just as well say "Henry Butcher's Odyssey," as except in one book, there is perhaps not a sentence in the volume which is not a mosaic of Mr. Butcher's version and of my own.—Yours, &c.,
A. LANG.

"Academy" Questions & Answers

Questions and Answers for this column must be addressed to THE EDITOR, THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, 9, East Harding Street, London, E.C. The envelope to be marked in the top left-hand corner "A.Q.A." Full name and address must be sent, not necessarily for publication. Each Question or Answer must be written on a separate sheet of paper and on only one side of the paper. The editor will not undertake the forwarding of any correspondence. Questions must be confined to matters of Literature, History, Archaeology, Folk-lore, Art, Music, and the Drama. The Editor reserves the right of deciding whether or not any Question or Answer is of sufficient interest to be published.

COMPETITION

Until further notice, four prizes, of the value of 5s. each, will be awarded weekly for the two best Questions and the two best Answers contributed to "Academy Questions and Answers."

The Editor's decision must be considered absolutely final and no correspondence whatever will be entered upon with regard to the awards. The prizes will go to those Questions and Answers which are deemed to be of the greatest general interest, and briefly in all cases will count as a merit.

The names and addresses of prize-winners will not be published, but the winning Questions and Answers will be indicated by an asterisk (*).

The prizes will consist of 5s. worth of books to be chosen by the several prize-winners. The name and address of the booksellers where the book or books can be obtained will be given.

Each prize-winner in the United Kingdom will be advised that a credit note has been sent to a bookseller as early as possible in his (or her) immediate neighbourhood, and that on demand he (or she) may choose a book or books to the value of 5s. Winners outside the United Kingdom will receive a cheque for 5s.

Non-adherence to the rules and regulations of "Questions and Answers" will imply disqualification.

No Questions or Answers received after Monday will be considered eligible for the current week's competition.

No competitor can win a prize more than once in three months.

Questions LITERATURE

AUTHORS WANTED:—

(a.) For poem beginning—

"When the gloom is deepest round thee,
And the chains of grief have bound thee,
And in loneliness and sorrow
By the poisoned springs of life
Thou sittest, yearning for the morrow
That will free thee from the strife."

(b.) For German ballad (? Die Befreiung von Wien) beginning—

"Ein Falke vom dem Felsenest
So weit so weit ins Land,
Er späht nach Ost, er späht nach West
Hinab hinauf den Strand."

The quotations are from memory, and are probably not quite exact.—C.

Where can I find the poem in which the following couplet occurs:—

"When the Rudyards cease from Kipling
And the Haggards ride no more?"

I should like the whole poem, or information as to where it may be found.—C.

THE "ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA" IN JAPAN.—It was recently stated that 1,500 copies of The Times "Encyclopædia Britannica" were sold in Japan. Captain Basil Hall, in his well-known "Account of a Voyage of Discovery" (published 1818) describes a visit paid by a Korean chief to H.M.S. "Lyra." On entering the cabin one of the chief's attendants "appeared desirous of passing for a literary character; and observing us hand the books about in a careless manner, ventured to ask for one, by drawing it towards himself with a begging look. As he happened to select a volume of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' I was under the necessity of refusing; but offered in its stead a less valuable, though more showy book, which he accepted with much gratitude." Are there any other instances in early times of an interest shown by the Far East in this work?—H. W. M.

"LORDS OF HELL."—Tennyson's "In Memoriam," Section LIII., last line:—

"Hold thou the good: define it well:
For fear divine Philosophy
Should push beyond her mark, and be Procress to the Lords of Hell."

Is the expression "Lords of Hell" intended to be a translation of di inferi?—A. T.

LEE PRIORY.—Can anyone tell me what became of the great collection of books at Lee Priory, owned by Henry Oxenden? I have some Aldines and other books bought at the sale in 1834, but I can find no trace of the Lee Waryl books. It is said most were bought by Sir Egerton Brydges; has a catalogue of this sale been heard of in recent years?—K. M.

THREE-VOLUME NOVELS.—What were the first and last novels issued in three-volume form, and what were the respective dates?—Smudie.

"JOSEPHI SCALIGERI OPUS DE EMENDATIONE TEMPORUM."—What is known of an edition of this work said, in the "Dictionnaire Bibliographique," to have been printed at Cologne in 1623, in folio? Is this not a mistake? I have an edition in folio of the same date, but printed at Geneva, "typis Roverlanis," and I do not believe in the other edition existing.—K. M.

ENIGMATIC DATE.—A copy of the "Fasciculus temporum," containing 97 leaves, folio, without name of printer, has the following date in its colophon—mccccirca. This has been queried as 1484. Can anyone explain this, or prove the attributed date is wrong?—W. P. (Bristol).

"ALDUS."—Is the edition of "In Epistolas M. Tullii Ciceronis," with the date of 1582, the same as that of 1579, which I have, with merely a fresh date, or is it a different edition?—K. M.

"RASSELAS."—How did Dr. Johnson obtain the title-name of his "Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia"? The name is a plausible corruption of "Ras-Alula" now current, also with a Sultan Alula, and there was a Ras-alu in the Punjab. Ras means "head," and is applied to generals and chieftains; there is also "rais," the ship's-captain; but what is Alula?—Quertit.

"VINCENT OF BEAUVAIS."—Is there any modern edition of "The Sermons of Vincent of Beauvais," and, if so, by whom edited and where published?—M. C. N.

PROVERBS.—Can anyone refer me to a book dealing with "the history and derivation of proverbs"?—E. A. E.

"MUSIC AT THE CLOSE."—Can any of your readers give me the French version by Madame Necker, of the verses quoted in THE ACADEMY some weeks ago entitled "Music at the Close," translated by G. Du Maurier, or say where I could find them?—C.

THEATRE

JAPAN ON THE STAGE.—Apropos of the production of "The Darling of the Gods" at His Majesty's Theatre, I should like to find out when and at which theatre the first play dealing wholly or in part with the subject of Japan was produced in London.—E. N. S.

*"VANITY FAIR."—In chapter fifty-one of "Vanity Fair," in which the charades are acted, we read that the captain's coat-tails fly about as if in the wind, and that when he leaves go of his hat it flies off in the gale that is supposed to be blowing. Has the effect of the wind ever been reproduced on the stage proper in a serious manner, such as the whirling of leaves on the ground, the swaying of trees, &c.?—M. J.

GENERAL

CROMWELL'S STATUE.—Can anyone supply the name of the sculptor of the Westminster Cromwell statue, unveiled about two years ago by Lord Rosebery?—Signature illegible.

"PANATTONK."—This is an Italian cake prepared for Christmas only. What is the etymology?—A. H.

PELIGREE AND GENEALOGY.—I am trying to trace the pedigree of the W. Dawkins who was English Minister at Florence in 1822, and got the order for Shelley's remains to be given up to Trelawney for cremation. Again, I am trying the same as to Francis Eyre, who wrote "Remarks on the History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," &c. Again, the same as to Huntingdon Plumtree, who wrote "Epigrammaticum Opusculum," &c., in 1629. Can anyone give me references?—K. M.

"PARIS VAUT BIEN UNE MESSE."—What is the origin and meaning of this often-quoted French phrase?—Sapsa.

*"THE OX WITH THE CRUMPLED HORNE."—In Aubrey's "Remaines of Gentilisme," 1686-7, it is stated that on Twelfth Night, when they wassail, the ploughmen "goe into the Ox-house to the oxen, with the Wassell-bowle and drink to the ox with the crumpled horse that treads out the corne." Why was an ox with a crumpled horn chosen for this purpose of threshing, and why was it the only beast wassailed?—H. M. Batson.

Answers

LITERATURE

APULIUS.—The Bipsatina notes; 1510, Parisina I, in quarto. 1512, Parisina II, folio notidippina: "Metamorphoses cum Iulippi Beroaldi Commentariis," &c., ap Jo-Philippi Magistram. "Metamorphoses sive de Asino Aureo," Libri xi., is the right title.—Dr. M. Maas (Munich).

QUOTATION FOUND.—

"The lyart veteran heard the word of God
By Cameron thundered, or by Renwick poured
In gentle stream."

These lines, whose author's name is asked for by "W. H. O." in THE ACADEMY of 2nd January, are in the Rev. Jas. Grahame's poem "The Sabbath." The lines are given in Chambers's "Cyclopedia of English Literature," Vol. 2nd of the edition of 1860.—A. A.

"SIR WALTER SCOTT'S GRAMMAR."—Shakespeare has:—"All debts are cleared between you and I."—"Merchant of Venice," III., 2, 321. E. A. Abbott ("Shakespearean Grammar") says that the inflections of personal pronouns are frequently neglected or misused by Shakespeare, and that "I, 'Tween you and I" seems to have been a regular Elizabethan idiom. Is it not a fact that archaisms of grammar and orthography lingered in the correspondence of persons even of high position long after their disuse in printed books? Surely Sir Walter merely intends to reproduce the epistolary style of the period.—M. A. C.

[Similar reply received from E. A. Innes (Oxford).]

*"THE BOOK OF THE FOUNDATIONS."—This is one of the writings of Santa Teresa, the Spanish mystic (1515-1582). In it she describes with much shrewd wit and passionate devotion her travels, and the travail of her soul, in visiting, governing, and reforming the convents of the Carmelite order. Froude tells her story in one of the papers included in his "Spanish Story of the Armada, and other Essays." Dr. Alexander Whyte's little book "Santa Teresa" is very informing and sympathetic; but translations of Teresa's own writings, including "The Foundations," can be obtained for a very modest sum.—F. P.

GENERAL

"MARDY," "MAUDY."—"Mardy" a spoiled child. See under "Mar" (3), Dr. Joseph Wright's excellent "English Dialect Dictionary."—Joseph Knight.
[A similar reference is given by Oomestor Oxoniensis.]

* "THE HOUSE THAT JACK BUILT."—The Hebrew Passover hymn from which this is adapted runs as follows:—

"This is the kid that my father bought for 2 zuzim (= 3d)
 "This is the cat that ate the kid, &c.,
 "This is the dog that bit the cat . . .
 "This is the stick that beat the dog . . .
 "This is the fire that burnt the stick . . .
 "This is the water that quenched the fire . . .
 "This is the ox that drank the water . . .
 "This is the butcher that killed the ox . . .
 "This is the angel of death, that slew the butcher." . . . &c., &c.

This dates from the age of the cycle-year ruled by the Pole-star god, and Basque and Talmudic versions of it are said to be still in existence.—H. M. W.

"THE HOUSE THAT JACK BUILT."—The original of "The House that Jack Built" is presumed to be a hymn in "Sepher Haggadah," fol. 23. The historical interpretation was first given by P. N. Leberecht, at Leipsic, in 1731, and is printed in the "Christian Reformer," vol. xvii., p. 28.—W. P. (Bristol).

"THE LION AND THE UNICORN FIGHTING FOR THE CROWN."—In Geener's "Historie animalium" (1581-87) we read—"The unicorn and lion are always like cat and dog, and as soon as a lion sees his enemy he betakes him to a tree. The unicorn, in his blind fury running pell-mell at his foe, darts his horn fast into the tree, and then the lion falls upon him and devours him." Also referred to by Spenser in his "Faery Queene" (ii. 5).

"Like as a lyon, whose imperial power
 A proud rebellious unicorn defies."

And by Shakespeare, in "Timon of Athens," iv. 3. "Wert thou the unicorn, pride and wrath would contond thee, and make thine own self the conquest of thy fury."—W. P. (Bristol).

"THE LION AND THE UNICORN FIGHTING FOR THE CROWN."—The lion and the unicorn in the Royal Arms signify England and Scotland. The popular interpretation of the supporters of the Crown probably had its origin in the distinction between the two, and their racial animosity, quoted by Spenser in the "Faery Queene." The Unicorn was first represented in the Royal Arms under James I. Previously the place had been filled by a greyhound, a dragon, a bear, a bull, and an antelope, the family badges of the respective monarchs.—S. C.

"THE MAN IN THE STREET."—In "Literature and Dogma," Matthew Arnold refers to certain persons who talk as familiarly of God as if He were "a man in the next street." May not the phrase in question, which came into use some time after the publication of the above-named work, have had its origin in an imperfect recollection of this passage?—Index.

"THE MAN IN THE STREET."—Emerson, writing about 1840, uses the expression "the man in the street" in his essay on "Self-Reliance." He does not use inverted commas, as his custom is, when quoting from others.—Sapsa.

"FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY" not only applied to George Washington, but has also been given by the Dutch to Prince William of Orange (1533-1584). They called him "Vader des Vaderlands." See preface to Putnam's "William the Silent, Prince of Orange," 1895.—D. S. (Amsterdam).

"GEORGE WASHINGTON."—The title of "Pater Patrie" was first bestowed on Cicero on the suppression of the conspiracy of Catiline, and subsequently on Julius Caesar, and on the Emperor Augustus. Afterwards other Emperors obtained it, few because they deserved it, as Fucciolati trenchantly observes.—Harmatopogus.

"GEORGE WASHINGTON."—It is difficult to find the first use of the title "Father of his Country" in connection with George Washington. Other characters in history who bore the name, and many of whose virtues were represented in Washington's character, are Cicero, Julius Caesar, Augustus, Cosmo de Medici and Andrea Doria. The legend is inscribed on the base of Doria's statue at Genoa.—S. C.

"HENRY'S VI'S COOK."—In Ashmole's "Berkshire" (1718), Vol. II., pp. 480-1, I read of Cookham Church:—"Against the North side of the Chancel is erected a large Altar Monument of Grey Marble, upon the Stone set within, against the Wall, has been [sic] Plates of Brass, Bearing the Figures of a Man and a Woman, and an Inscription under their Feet, but now torn off [sic]. On the top stone there yet remain Plates of the Figures of a Man in Armour, and a Woman in her usual Habit, under whose Feet is this Inscription [In black letter except for the names and figures in italics] "Of Your Charite pray for the Soules of Robert Pecke, Esq; sumtyme Master Clerke of the Spycey with King Harri the Sixt, and Agnes his Wyfe. Robert deceased the 14th Day of January, in the Yere of our Lord God, a Thousand CCCC. and XVII. Whose Soules and all Cryston Soules, Jhesu have Mercy."—Harmatopogus.

"MALBROUK."—I am glad to tell "Comestor Oxoniensis" that the name of "Malbrouk," as designating a certain kind of monkey, has completely disappeared from the French language, if it were ever in use. Not only is it quite unknown to-day, but even in the contemporaries of Cuvier, I never met with it. The only trace the great English general left in French folk-lore is the celebrated popular song "Malbrouk s'en va-t-en guerre." This was not intended to be a comic song at all, but a sentimental and pathetic one.—P. Forné, M.A. (Paris).

"SO LONG."—I venture to suggest that this is derived from the Norwegian, "Saa Længe," a common form of farewell, equivalent in meaning to "au revoir," and pronounced like "so long" with the "g" softened. There was a fair number of Norwegians among the settlers in America, as also in this country, to judge by names, and it is quite likely the phrase was picked up from them. It is in general use among the Dutch out here, but though given in several Taal vocabularies as a translation of "good-bye," I can find no trace of it in High Dutch.—W. K. (Johannesburg).

"THURROCK" AND "NAILBOURNE."—Thurrock, early Modern English, also thorrock from M.E. thurrock, the hold of a ship, from A.S. thurric, a small boat, also probably the hold of a ship, also, according to Lye, a drain (canalis)—but see Thurrock. Thurrock—a further variation of furrow, or else a variation and particular use of thurrock. The A.S. thurric, defined by Lye as a canal or drain (canalis) does not appear to have had that sense. Nailbourne—formerly also naylbourn, from nail + burn, burn, a stream—an intermittent spring in the Cretaceous, and especially in the Lower Greensand. . . . The running of one of these bournes was formerly considered "a token of derthe, or of pestilence, or of great batayle." Also called simply bourn and bourne both in Kent and Surrey; also bourne and winterbourne in Hants and turtel west.—M. A. C.

"LIVES OF THE SAINTS."—Replies also received from L. Liebich and M. M. S.

WILLIAM UPCOTT.—Replies also received from W. P. (Bristol), C. R. S. (Bury) and A. Abrahams.

"KICKSHAWS."—Replies also received from G. H., H. B. C., M. M. M. S., W. D., K. M., and M. M. Dobree.

"CHRISTMAS BOX."—Reply received from M. M. D. bree.

"OTHERGATES," "OTHERGUESS."—Replies also received from W. D., Comestor Oxoniensis, A. R. S., Bertram, and Wyclif.

"WALTHAM DISGUISES."—Reply also received from W. G. H.

"BABY."—Replies also received from E. S. W., W. D. (Ayr), Harmatopogus, Comestor Oxoniensis, and M. M. Dobree.

"ANDREA FERRARA."—Replies also received from B. M. G. and H. T. B. (Beckenham).

NOTE.—Some misconception seems still to exist among contributors as to the scope and object of this page. Questions have been received without name or address; this is against the rules. One enquirer asks for the words of two perfectly well-known and easily found folk-songs; another wishes to know the value of certain old engravings and books; and, again, "Young Hopeful" desires to be informed "authoritatively" whether a blank-verse play by a new writer stands the least chance of being considered on its merits at any of the leading theatres. Such questions are entirely outside the design of this page, and can only be ignored. There are special publications to which they might well be addressed. Certain foreign and provincial contributors fear that owing to the time taken by the post they lose their chances of prize-winning. This is not so. The prizes are awarded quite independently of priority of receipt of answers, and contributions too late for the current issue are held over for the next.

PRIZES.—The asterisks denote the two questions and two answers to which prizes have been awarded. The winners can obtain, on application at the following booksellers, Five shillings' worth of books. Notices have been despatched to the several winners and to the four booksellers whose names follow:—

Mr. James Hewetson, 11 and 12, High Street, Hampstead, N.W.

Mr. H. T. Harding, 35, Bartholomew Street, Newbury.

Mr. W. Gammell, 35, High Street, Camden Town, N.W.

Messrs. Clarkson and Griffiths, 162, Deansgate, Manchester.

GRUNDPROBLEME DER RELIGIONSPHILOSOPHIE: ACHT VORTRÄGE. Von D. Dr. A. Dorner. (Berlin: Schwetschke.) This is a little volume of a kind common enough in Germany, yet almost unknown in this country, where it is rare to find any work dealing with religion that is at the same time uncontroversial and dispassionate. The eight lectures here printed were delivered before a large audience of educated men and women, and are intended to give information about the principal questions with which the religious thought of the present day is occupied. Dr. Dorner begins by describing the different systems of religious philosophy, and the different views taken of the condition of religion. He then treats of "religion and religions," and of the development of religion, dealing with subjective belief and the specific expression of belief through sacrifice, vows, revelation, prayer, religious art, religious doctrine, dogma and unfettered knowledge, religious ethics and the religious community. The concluding lecture discusses religion in its relation to morals, to science and art, and expresses a firm conviction of the all-embracing strength of faith in every department of life. The book is most fascinating, and the breadth of view will best be understood when we state that it begins with a long quoted passage from Hegel, and that in the list of authorities we find such names as Kant, Fichte, Schleiermacher, Von Hartmann, Max Müller and Haeckel. It is well worth reading and pondering.

FREE ADVERTISEMENTS

OF

Books, Fine Art Publications and Musical Compositions

FOR SALE OR WANTED.

EVERY ANNUAL SUBSCRIBER to The ACADEMY AND LITERATURE can receive it free of postage and has now also the right to insert, once per month, an advertisement for a Book, Fine Art Publication, Print, &c., or Piece of Music, Wanted or for Sale.

The only Conditions are:—

1. The Coupon on page 3 of Cover, filled in, must accompany the Advertisement (which must not exceed four lines or 20 words, including the address). No replies can be received at or forwarded through our Office. For every additional 5 words, 3d. must be prepaid.
2. The Book, Fine Art Publication, Print, &c., or Piece of Music to be advertised (except in the case of odd volumes or numbers of a magazine to complete a set), shall not have been issued during the last 12 months and so easily obtainable from the Publishers or through a local Bookseller.
3. The Editor retains the right to exclude any advertisement.
4. Advertisements for the week's issue must reach this Office by Wednesday morning, first post.

The Far East—Books to Read Now

JAPAN AND CHINA.

By Captain F. BRINKLEY,

For many years Special Correspondent of The Times at Tokyo.

PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED.

Only a limited edition available for the United Kingdom, viz.:—500 Library Edition in 12 vols., at 14s. net per volume, and 35 Edition de Luxe at 42s. net per volume.

Ten Volumes now ready.

"Enormously in advance of all existing literature on the subject."—The Athenæum.
"Promises to be the standard work on the subject for a long time to come."—The Times.

DETAILED PROSPECTUS ON APPLICATION.

London: T. C. & E. C. JACK, 34, Henrietta St., W.C.; and Edinburgh.

THE EXPANSION OF RUSSIA, 1815-1900.

By F. H. SKRINE, F.S.S., H.M.'s Indian Civil Service (retired). Crown 8vo. With 3 Maps. 6s. (Cambridge Historical Series).

Pall Mall Gazette.—"The best account yet printed in England of the growth of Russia during the last century. . . . This book will not only be useful to the general reader, but it forms a handy reference-book which any student of the Eastern Question will be glad to have within easy reach."

LONDON:

C. J. CLAY & SONS, Cambridge University Press Warehouse, Ave Maria Lane.

EDWARD STANFORD'S NEW MAPS.

JUST PUBLISHED.

MAP OF PART OF TIBET, including SIKKIM, the CHUMBI VALLEY, and BHUTAN, showing the Routes between DARJILING and LHASA. Size, 34 in. by 27 in. Scale, 8 miles to an inch. Prices:—Coloured sheet, 5s.; mounted in case, 8s.

MAP OF THE SIBERIAN RAILWAY. Scale, 110 miles to an inch. One sheet, 46 in. by 30 in. Prices:—Sheet, 10s. 6d.; mounted to fold in case, 15s.; mounted on rollers and varnished, 18s.

List of the best Books and Maps bearing upon the Far Eastern Crisis and other Eastern Questions post free on application.

London: EDWARD STANFORD, 12, 13, & 14, Long Acre, W.C.
Geographer to His Majesty the King.

INDIA IMPRESSIONS.

By C. F. KEARY.

"If anyone wishes to read a distinguished piece of writing, which pleases the artistic sense, places the India of the Indians before him in an un-hackneyed style, contains some practical words and many details, yet also the mystery and glamour of the East, let him take up this modest booklet."—Bookman.

1s. net. R. BRIMLEY JOHNSON, Adam St., Strand. 1s. net.

EVERY-DAY LIFE IN KOREA.

By Rev. DANIEL L. GIFFORD. Illustrated, 3s. 6d. net.

"For an entertaining account of the personal traits of the Koreans there has been hardly anything better than this. The author gives a concise history of the country, and an outline of recent political history."—The Advance.

THE TURK AND HIS LOST PROVINCES—GREECE, BULGARIA, SERBIA, BOSNIA.

Sketches and Studies of Life and Travel in the Land of the Sultan. By WILLIAM ELMEROY CURTIS. With numerous Illustrations, 7s. 6d. net.

"His book, written brightly and vigorously, is a happy combination of history, politics, and descriptive writing, and bears on the questions which are of most immediate interest."—Daily News.

FLEMING H. REVELL COMPANY, London and Edinburgh.

JAPAN. JAPAN. JAPAN.

FAIRY TALES FROM FAR JAPAN. Translated by Miss BALLARD, of St. Hilda's Mission, Tokio. With a Prefatory Note by Mrs. ISABELLA L. BISHOP, F.R.G.S. Illustrated by 47 Engravings from Japanese originals. Fcap. 4to, 2s. 6d., cloth gilt.

STORIES ABOUT JAPAN. By ANNIE R. BUTLER. With 12 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 1s., cloth gilt.

RAMBLES IN JAPAN: the Land of the Rising Sun. By the Rev. Canon TRISTRAM, D.D., LL.D. With 45 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, gilt top, 10s. 6d., cloth gilt.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, 4, BOUVERIE STREET, E.C.

QUEER THINGS ABOUT JAPAN.

By DOUGLAS SLADEN.

Forty pages coloured and uncoloured illustrations by the famous Japanese artist HOKUSAI.

Declared by the whole press to be the most amusing picture of Japan ever penned.

21s. net; in special Japanese binding, 25s. net.

OUT IN CHINA.

By Mrs. ARCHIBALD LITTLE. 1s.

ANTHONY TREHERNE & Co., Ltd., 3, Agar St., London, W.C.

CHINA. JAPAN. KOREA.

THE PEOPLES AND POLITICS OF FAR EAST.

By HENRY NORMAN, B.A.,
Author of "The Real Japan."

FOURTH THOUSAND. Cloth, 7s. 6d.

London: T. FISHER UNWIN, E.C.

THE BOOK OF THE HOUR.

THE PATH OF EMPIRE.

By GEORGE LYNCH.

Up-to-date on Questions Russian, Japanese, Korean, Manchurian. 90 Illustrations and a Map. Large demy 8vo, 10s. net.

"No one has given so admirable a picture of Russian activity."—Athenæum.
"Absolutely necessary for the understanding of the Far Eastern question."—Daily Mail.

"Just at this moment the very highest interest belongs to the new book by Mr. George Lynch."—Vanity Fair.

FEUDAL AND MODERN JAPAN. By ARTHUR MAY KNAPP. Two vols., with 24 Photogravure Illustrations of Japanese life, landscape, and architecture. Small fcap. 8vo, 4-bound, white cloth, blue sides, gilt top. 8s. net.

DUCKWORTH & Co., 3, Henrietta Street, W.C.

A United States Senator on the Far Eastern Situation.

THE RUSSIAN ADVANCE.

By the Hon. ALBERT J. BEYERIDGE.

With Maps. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d.

An important work, treating of a subject of universal and timely interest and of grave international significance.

HARPER & BROTHERS, 45, Albemarle Street, W.

JUST PUBLISHED.

IMPRESSIONS OF JAPAN.

By G. H. RITTNER.

Illustrated by a Series of beautiful Photographs taken by the AUTHOR. Square demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

CONTENTS:—I. THE NATURAL BEAUTIES OF THE COUNTRY—II. THE ART OF JAPAN—III. THE PEOPLE AND THEIR HOMES—IV. BATHING, PRIVATE AND PUBLIC—V. CHILDREN, OLD AND YOUNG—VI. THE GEISHA—VII. THE STAGE—VIII. CIVILIZATION—IX. MISSIONARIES AND RELIGION—X. THE TEMPLES AND THEIR GODS—XI. SAYOUBARA.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

ASIA and EUROPE.

Studies presenting the conclusions formed by the Author in a long life devoted to the subject of the relations between Asia and Europe.

By MEREDITH TOWNSEND.

New and Cheaper Edition with an additional chapter. Crown 8vo. Price 5s. net.

A. CONSTABLE & Co., Ltd., WESTMINSTER.

Continued on next page.

Continued from previous page.

The Far East—Books to Read Now

THE BOOK OF THE MOMENT.

JAPANESE PHYSICAL TRAINING.

The System of Exercise, Diet, and General Mode of Living that has made the Mikado's People the Healthiest, Strongest, and Happiest Men and Women in the World.

By H. IRVING HANCOCK.

Fully Illustrated. crown 8vo, cloth extra, 5s. net.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS,

24, Bedford Street, Strand, London; and New York.

KOREA.

By ANGUS HAMILTON.

Profusely Illustrated from Photographs by the Author. 1 Vol. 15s. net.

Mr. Hamilton, who was the special correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette in the Far East, examines in this important and timely work the political and economic conditions of the kingdom. There are chapters on the possibilities of the commercial development of the country, on the manners and customs and laws of the people, and, as a whole, the book may be considered to contain the latest and most authentic information upon the Russo-Japanese dispute.

London: WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

RUSSIA,
JAPAN,
AND KOREA.

IN THE FORBIDDEN LAND.

By A. HENRY SAVAGE LANDOR.

With a Map and 250 Illustrations. Cheaper Edition, 7s. 6d. net.

"A valuable storehouse of information on Southern Tibet and its people."—Daily Chronicle.

London: WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

CONTENTS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY AND AFTER For FEBRUARY.

LORD WOLSELEY'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY. By the Right Hon. the EARL OF CROMER, G.C.B., G.C.M.G., K.C.S.I.

THE GERMAN AT WATERLOO AND ANGLO-GERMAN RELATIONS. By Sir ROWLAND BLENNERHASSETT, Bart.

A COLONIAL COMMENT ON THE REPORT OF THE WAR COMMISSION. By Brigadier-General Sir EDWARD BRABANT, K.C.B.

JAPANESE RELATIONS WITH KOREA. By JOSEPH H. LONGFORD (late H.M. Consul at Nagasaki).

PRIMARY EDUCATION IN AUSTRALIA. By the Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP OF NORTH QUEENSLAND.

THE NEBULÆ. By the Rev. EDMUND LEDGER (Gresham Lecturer on Astronomy).

THE RELIGION OF THE GREEKS. By HERBERT PAUL.

BEHIND THE FISCAL VEIL. By MONTAGUE CRACKANTHORPE, K.C.

A FORGOTTEN VOLUME IN SHAKESPEARE'S LIBRARY. By Sir EDWARD SULLIVAN, Bart.

AN EX-PRISONER ON PROFESSIONAL CRIMINALS. By H. J. B. MONTGOMERY

SERMONS AND SAMUEL PEYS. By the Rev. D. WALLACE DUTHIE.

THE SCHOOLS OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF ARTS. By FRED. A. EATON (Secretary).

THE STATE REGISTRATION OF NURSES. By Lady HELEN MUNRO FERGUSON.

RELIGIOUS APOLOGUES. By the Rev. Dr. GREGORY SMITH.

FREE TRADE AND BRITISH SHIPPING. By W. H. RENWICK.

LAST MONTH: (1) By Sir WEMYSS REID. (2) By EDWARD DICEY, C.B.

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & Co., Ltd.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN,
ALBEMARLE STREET, PICCADILLY, W.

THURSDAY NEXT, FEBRUARY 4TH, at Five o'clock, A. D. HALL, Esq., M.A., first of Three Lectures on "Recent Research in Agriculture." Half-a-Guinea the Course.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6TH, at Three o'clock, CHARLES WALDSTEIN, Esq., Litt.D., Ph.D., first of Two Lectures on (1) "The Study of Style in Greek Sculpture;" (2) "Culture and Sculpture." Half-a-Guinea.

To all the Courses in the Season, Two Guineas.

The History of China

By DEMETRIUS C. BOULGER,

Author of "Chinese Gordon."

Illustrated with Portraits and Maps. Two vols., demy 8vo, 24s.

The Second Volume contains a full History of China and her connection with European Nations, and includes the Chino-Japan War, and its Diplomatic consequences.

W. THACKER & Co., 2, Creed Lane, E.C.

AN IMPORTANT BOOK TO READ.

In 2 vols., royal 8vo, 420 Illustrations, 8 Coloured.

Price TWO GUINEAS net.

CENTRAL ASIA AND TIBET

Towards the Holy City of Lassa.

By SVEN HEDIN,

Author of "Through Asia," &c.

HURST & BLACKETT, Limited, 13, Great Marlborough Street, W.

MY JAPANESE WIFE.

(A Japanese Idyll.)

By CLIVE HOLLAND.

Twelve Editions of this book have already been printed, and the thirteenth is nearly out of print. Cr. 8vo, with Coloured Frontispiece, price 3s. 6d.

LORD CURZON IN INDIA.

By H. C. LIPSETT. With Portraits.

A Sketch of his Career, with Chapters on the new Frontier Provinces, Famine Administration, &c.

"We have never," a Hindu Prince has said of him, "had a Viceroy so anxious to learn the real wishes of the children of the soil, so scrupulous in giving a patient hearing to their grievances, so full of schemes for the development of the resources of the Empire."—Morning Post.

London: R. A. EVERETT & Co., Ltd., 42, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

"THE TIMES" LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

A Special Literary Supplement is published with The Times on Friday. This Supplement is an impartial and authoritative organ of literary criticism and a comprehensive and trustworthy medium of literary intelligence.

It can be had with The Times of Friday alone.

Subscriptions, inclusive of postage, for The Times of Friday:—

	3 Months.	6 Months.	12 Months.
Inland ...	3s. 3d.	6s. 6d.	13s. 0d.
Foreign ...	4s. 4d.	8s. 8d.	17s. 4d.

CONTENTS OF FRIDAY, JAN. 29, 1904.

Literature.

The Vatican and the Abbé Loisy. III
Korea.
A Queen of Tears.
Jeremy Taylor.
A History of Classical Scholarship.
Doctors and their Patients.
Trinity College, Dublin.
The Poems of Charles Wolfe.

Fiction.

An American Prisoner.
Through Sorrow's Gates.
My Friend Prospero.

Correspondence.

Montaigne's Travels.

Drama.

"The Dynasts"—A Suggestion.

"THE TIMES" LITERARY SUPPLEMENT is also sold with the Mail, or

"THE TIMES" WEEKLY EDITION, upon payment of an additional penny.

Address THE PUBLISHER, The Times,
Printing House Square, London, E.C.

Mr. Andrew Melrose's List.

SECOND EDITION Now Ready.

MEN OF THE COVENANT.

By ALEXANDER SMELLIE, M.A. Medium 8vo. gilt top, 480 pp. With 37 Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE:

"The enthusiasm which rings through these pages is as genuine and almost as intense as though the author himself had lurked by moss and moor and listened to the fiery denunciations and pleadings of James Renwick and Richard Cameron. . . . These brief character-studies . . . give a real impression of those dour and heroic realists who fought and preached beneath the Banner of Blue."

SECOND EDITION Now Ready.

THE GROWTH OF THE SOUL.

By AMORY H. BRADFORD, D.D. Price 5s.

THE METHODIST RECORDER:

"Whether or not the reader can follow this alluring guide to the highest reaches of his hopes and aspirations, he will come back with a new conviction of the greatness and immortality of the soul for which Christ has died."

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS.

The English Edition of Dr. Lyman Abbot's New Work, which has attracted so much attention in America.

THE OTHER ROOM.

Tokens of Immortality.

By LYMAN ABBOT, D.D. Price 5s.

THE POPULAR "SPURGEON."

CHARLES HADDON SPURGEON.

A Biographical Sketch and an Appreciation.
By "One Who Knew Him Well."
Cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

The following New Editions of Important Books are issued this week.

THIRD EDITION.

THE TEMPTATION OF JESUS.

A Study of Our Lord's Trial in the Wilderness.

By the Rev. A. MORRIS STEWART, M.A.
Price 6s.

FOURTH EDITION.

THE CROWN OF SCIENCE.

The Incarnation of God in Mankind.

By the Rev. A. MORRIS STEWART, M.A.
Price 3s. 6d. net.

FIFTH EDITION.

HENRY DRUMMOND.

A Biographical Appreciation.

By CUTHBERT LENNOX. Price 2s. 6d. net.

FOURTH EDITION.

JAMES CHALMERS OF NEW GUINEA.

Missionary Pioneer.

By CUTHBERT LENNOX. Price 2s. 6d. net.

NOW READY.

A Second Edition of the book which Dr. Watson (Ian MacLaren) has made a topic of the hour.

THE NEXT GREAT AWAKENING.

By JOSIAH STRONG, D.D.
Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

A Copy of Mr. Melrose's Catalogue will be sent post free on application.

London: 16, PILGRIM STREET, E.C.

THE ART JOURNAL

PRICE 1/6 MONTHLY NET.

THE FEBRUARY NUMBER CONTAINS IMPORTANT ARTICLES ON:

THE 'INTERNATIONAL' EXHIBITION

RUDOLF DIRCKS
BY and
FRANK RINDER

47 ILLUSTRATIONS, including

A FULL-PAGE PHOTOGRAPHURE OF

WHISTLER'S

"SYMPHONY IN WHITE."

RODIN'S "LE PENSEUR."

"LA DÉFENSE."

"BELLONA."

ETC., ETC.

HENRI LE SIDANER

AND HIS WORK.

By LADY COLIN CAMPBELL.

15 ILLUSTRATIONS

(ONE OF WHICH IS IN COLOURS).

London: VIRTUE & Co., 7, City Garden Row, City Road, N.

THE TATLER

EDITED BY

CLEMENT SHORTER.

The Lightest, Brightest,
and most Interesting
SOCIETY

AND

DRAMATIC PAPER
EVER PUBLISHED.

THE

TATLER

An Up-to-Date Society Paper.

Society and the Stage Richly Illustrated Week by Week.

The Best Printing.

The Best Paper, The Best Contents of any Paper of its kind.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY.
PRICE SIXPENCE.

Can be obtained of all Newsagents,
and at all Bookstalls.

Offices: GREAT NEW ST., E.O.

MACMILLAN & Co.'s NEW BOOKS.

VOLS. I. AND II. NOW READY.

A HISTORY OF MODERN ENGLAND.

By HERBERT PAUL.

In 5 vols. Vols. I. and II. 8vo, 8s. 6d. net each.

Mr. JUSTIN MCCARTHY, in the Daily Chronicle.—"I do not think I am indulging in any very venturesome prophecy when I predict for the book now opened by these two volumes an enduring and an authoritative place in historical literature."

HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS SERIES.
New Volume.

SUSSEX. By E. V. LUCAS. With Illustrations by FREDERICK L. GRIGGS. Extra Crown 8vo. With flat back and gilt top. 6s. [Tuesday.]

EDITION DE LUXE OF THE WORKS OF RUDYARD KIPLING.
New Volume.

JUST SO STORIES FOR LITTLE CHILDREN. Illustrated by the Author. Medium 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

ENGLISH MEN OF LETTERS.—New Series.
JEREMY TAYLOR. By EDMUND GOSSE, M.A., LL.D. Crown 8vo. gilt top. 2s. net.

THOMAS HARDY'S DRAMA.

THE DYNASTS: a Drama of the Napoleonic Wars. In Three Parts, Nineteen acts, and One Hundred and Thirty Scenes By THOMAS HARDY. Part First. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

THE DIVINE VISION, and other Poems. By A. E. Crown 8vo, 3s. net.

Daily News.—"A book of beautiful verse. . . . 'The Divine Vision' is full of beautiful, angust suggestion and gentle music. It is one of the few blossoms in the literary garden of last year."

NEW EDITION IN ONE VOLUME.

The Complete Poetical Works of
CHRISTINA G. ROSSETTI.
With Memoir and Notes, &c., by W. M. ROSSETTI. Crown 8vo, green cloth 7s. 6d.

NEW VOLUME OF POEMS BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE MAN FROM SNOWY RIVER."

RIO GRANDE'S LAST RACE, and other Verses. By A. B. PATTERSON. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Gwendolen Overton's New Novel.

THE CAPTAIN'S DAUGHTER.
Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s.

February Numbers Now Ready.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.
Price 1s. Annual Subscription, post free, 12s.

TEMPLE BAR.
Price 1s. Annual Subscription, post free, 12s.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

ILLUSTRATED.

Price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, post free, 16s.

The FEBRUARY Number contains:—
THACKERAY'S FRIENDSHIP WITH AN AMERICAN FAMILY.—IV. Unpublished Letters. By W. M. THACKERAY.
IN THE ALPS ON A MOTOR-BICYCLE. By JOSEPH BARNELL. Pictures by the Author.
ROMAN VILLAS.—By EDITH WHARTON.
THE SEA-WOLF.—II. By JACK LONDON. Author of "The Call of the Wild," &c.
And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE FOR CHILDREN.

ST. NICHOLAS.

Price 1s. Annual Subscription, post free, 12s.

The FEBRUARY Number contains:—
ALLIGATOR HUNTING. Sketch. By FRANK R. STOCKTON.
JACK LONGSHORT. Story. By GEORGE HUNT-INTON.
A COMEDY IN WAX. Serial Story. By B. L. FARJEON.
And numerous other Stories for the Young.

MACMILLAN & Co., Limited, London.

SMITH, ELDER & Co.'s NEW BOOKS

Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. have pleasure in announcing the Publication, on February 1st, of a SIX-SHILLING Popular Edition of Mr. Sidney Lee's Life of Queen Victoria.

ACADEMY.—"Perhaps no book of its kind, dealing with a great personality and a great period, and published, as it were, in the heart of that period, has ever been so simple, so frank, so free from excessive adulation or petty gossip."

QUEEN VICTORIA: A Biography.

By SIDNEY LEE, Editor of the "Dictionary of National Biography." With Portraits, Maps, and Facsimile Letters. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready February 1st.]

A RECORD OF TRAVEL IN THE APENNINES.

JUST PUBLISHED, with 36 Illustrations from Photographs, and a Coloured Map 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

HILL TOWNS OF ITALY.

By EGERTON R. WILLIAMS.

New Edition of "Collections and Recollections."

TENTH IMPRESSION (SEVENTH EDITION).

NOW READY. WITH A NEW PREFACE. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

COLLECTIONS AND RECOLLECTIONS.

By GEORGE W. E. RUSSELL.

LEGAL T LEAVES. By EDWARD F.

TURNER, Author of "T Leaves," "Tantler's Sister," "More T Leaves," &c. Crown 8vo, 5s.

WORLD.—"Will be found an equally agreeable companion by lawyers and laymen."

BRITISH WEEKLY.—"Exceedingly clever and amusing, and written from intimate personal knowledge."

London: SMITH, ELDER & Co., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

THE DE LA MORE PRESS QUARTOS

Limited to 600 Copies on Hand-made paper and 50 copies on Japanese vellum for sale in England and America. The First Volume now ready.

BEN JONSON'S ALCHEMIST.

Edited, with Introduction and Glossaries, by H. C. HART. Title-page Vignette of David Garrick as Abel Druggier. Fcap. 4to, 7s. 6d. net; on vellum, 21s. net.

The Daily News says:—"It is excellently edited, and the glossaries are the most copious, careful, erudite, and interesting that ever were put in book. Mr. Hart has done his work admirably."

NEW VOLUMES OF "THE KING'S CLASSICS." NOW READY.

KINGS' LETTERS.

Letters of the Kings of England, from Alfred to the coming of the Tudors. Newly edited from the originals by ROBERT STEELE, F.S.A. With a Portrait of Henry V. as Frontispiece. 2s. 6d. net; quarter bound vellum, 3s. 6d. net.

BY PROF. SKEAT. CHAUCER FOR MODERN READERS.

CHAUCE'S KNIGHT'S TALE; OR, PALAMON AND ARCITE.

Done into Modern English by the Rev. Prof. SKEAT, Litt.D. With Frontispiece. 1s. net; quarter bound vellum, 2s. 6d. net.

NOW READY.

BROWNING'S ESSAY ON SHELLEY.

His Introduction to the spurious Shelley Letters. With an Introduction by RICHARD GARNETT, C.B. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

The Times says:—"This is the essay which Browning wrote at Mozon's request for the collection of Shelley's letters published in 1852, which were subsequently proved to be forged. Though Browning neglected his proper duty as an Editor, we owe to his neglect his one important prose composition, which expounds his views on the objective and subjective elements in poetry, and testifies to his appreciation of Shelley. Dr. Garnett discusses the essay in an introduction."

JUST PUBLISHED.

ALL ABOUT SHIPS AND SHIPPING.

A popular handbook of nautical information. By FRANCIS MILTON. With six Coloured Plates and many Illustrations in the text. 5s. net.

* * * In addition to chapters dealing with many branches of nautical knowledge, this valuable little volume contains a list of the ships of the Royal Navy and the fleets of the principal Shipping Companies, illustrated by small drawings indicating the various types of vessels.

"In every way this is one of the most complete little manuals of the sea and the sea services we have seen."—Lloyd's Weekly.

ALEXANDER MORING, Ltd., 298, Regent Street, W.

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS

FROM KABUL TO KUMASSI.

By Brigadier-Gen. Sir JAMES WILLCOCKS. With Illustrations, numerous Maps, and a Portrait of the Author, &c. Demy 8vo, 21s. net.

THE HOUSE OF QUIET. By AN ANONYMOUS

WRITER. Square demy 8vo, 8s. net.

"The House of Quiet" is a book of an exceptional kind. A Government official, forced by his health to live in retirement in the country, relates the story of his childhood and education and his early religious experiences. The remainder of the book consists of extracts from his diaries, sketches of local characters and the attempts he made to be useful to his neighbours. The motto of the book is to present the possibilities of dignity and beauty that exist in the simplest and least ambitious life.

LUCRETIA BORGIA. According to Original Documents and Correspondence of Her Day. By FERDINAND GREGOROVICUS. Translated by JOHN LESLIE GARNER. With Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Ready next week.]

RUSKIN IN OXFORD, and other Studies. By the

Very Rev. G. W. KITCHIN, D.D., Dean of Durham. With Illustrations. Square demy 8vo, 12s. net. [Ready next week.]

A POLITICAL SATIRE DEALING WITH CURRENT AFFAIRS.

THE MARVELLOUS HISTORY OF KING

ARTHUR IN AVALON AND OF THE LIFTING OF LYONESSE.

A Chronicle of the Round Table. Communicated by GEOFFREY OF MONMOUTH. Edited with an Induction and Notes by GEOFFREY JUNIOR. Square demy 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. [Ready next week.]

RECENT EXCAVATIONS IN THE ROMAN

FORUM, 1898-1904. A Handbook. By E. BURTON-BROWN. With a Preface by Comm. BONI, Director of the Excavations. Illustrations and Plans. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net. [Ready next week.]

IMPRESSIONS OF JAPAN. By G. H. RITTNER.

Illustrated by a Series of beautiful Photographs taken by the Author. Square demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THINGS CHINESE: Or Notes Connected with

China. By J. DYER BALL, H.M. Civil Service, Hong Kong, Author of "Cantonese Made Easy," "How to Speak Cantonese," &c. Fourth Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Demy 8vo, 12s. net.

PHOEBE IN FETTERS: A Novel. By Mrs. BAILLIE

REYNOLDS, Author of "The Dream and the Man." Crown 8vo, 6s.

GOOS AND FIGHTING MEN. The Story of the Tnatha De Danaan and of the Fianna of Ireland. Arranged and put into English by Lady GREGORY, Editor and Translator of "Cuchulainn of Muir-themne," "Poets and Dreamers," &c. Large crown 8vo, 6s. net.

WORKS by the late Rev. GEORGE SALMON, D.D.,

Provost of Trinity College, Dublin.

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE STUDY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. Crown 8vo, 9s.

LECTURES ON THE INFALLIBILITY OF THE CHURCH. Crown 8vo, 9s.

SOME THOUGHTS ON THE TEXTUAL CRITI- CISM OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

CATHEDRAL AND UNIVERSITY SERMONS. Second Edition, Revised, with Two New Sermons. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

The Academy and Literature

No. 1656. Established 1869. London: 30 January 1904.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter Foreign Subscribers, 17/6 a year.]

Literary Notes

SIR WILLIAM ANSON, M.P., delivered a suggestive address at the fifteenth annual meeting of the National Home Reading Union, held at the Mansion House on January 20. Among other things, the truth of which cannot be denied, he pointed out that many people regarded education as a little book-learning acquired in early life, which might be forgotten without much loss. Although this is called a practical age it is saddening to mark how few there are who realise the practical value of general education. There has been so much talk lately of technical that general education has been thrust somewhat into the background. The reading of history, biography, books of travel, and poetry is looked upon by busy men as the unprofitable luxury of the leisured few, much to the loss of the busy man. The wider the cultivation of a man's mind the wider his outlook on life, and his ability to grasp the essentials of questions that come before him and to understand the thoughts and motives of those with whom he has to deal.

But the temptations to scrappy, desultory and unprofitable reading are many and strong. The daily press is the greatest of all tempters in this matter; the average man believes he has no time for serious reading, and is too easily contented to learn about books at second hand. How many—or rather how few—have read a chapter or a line of Herbert Spencer? Yet how full are his works of practical knowledge. The National Home Reading Union is engaged, therefore, on a most worthy work, and the larger the scope of that work the better will it be for this generation and the next. University Extension is another line of progress in education that calls for the strenuous support of all those who would see our country in the forefront of those races who realise that general is as essential to prosperity as technical and business education.

Two of the evil results of desultory reading and the perusal of "tit-bits" are the accumulation of inaccurate information and mental indigestion of accurate information, which, owing to the many methods of acquirement, cannot be properly assimilated and therefore add no strength to the mind. For the former bad effect the best cures are provided by the courses of the University Extension Movement and the Home Reading Union; for the latter, some system of memory training is extremely useful. Of such there are many, and probably most of us have some simple system of our own, probably not entirely adequate, though more useful than the old-fashioned knot in the handkerchief. Of the many advertised systems of memory training, that of Mr. Pelman seems to be quite one of the best, having met with much practical success and being founded upon scientific principles. It is, I understand, used in many of the higher educational institutions on the Continent, and, indeed, memory training might well be added to the ground covered by our own school and college courses.

MR. COSMO HAMILTON

[Photo. Langher.]

DEAN KITCHIN's collection of papers written during the past five years is now ready for publication (by Mr. John Murray) under the title "Ruskin in Oxford and Other Studies." The Dean of Durham is preparing for the Victoria History of the Counties of England a paper on the Saint Cuthbert relics at Durham, and an article from his pen on the Romanticist era of English Literature will appear in the "Saint George's Magazine."

MR. COSMO HAMILTON has written a "novel" version of his play "The Wisdom of Folly," which will be issued towards the end of next month. A serial in dialogue by the same writer will appear in "Black and White" under the title "According to Cocker."

It is good news that Mrs. Sarah Grand is so far recovered from her recent serious illness as to be at work again and that she is at present engaged upon a short novel and a play. It is always pleasant to hear of a writer of established reputation devoting time to the art of the playwright and it inspires hope that the great comedy (or tragedy) may some day see the footlights.

Two of the most interesting of the Dante Society's lectures should be those on "Dante and the Traveller," by Mr. Maurice Hewlett, on February 10, and on "The Art of Portraiture: Dante and Goya," by Mrs. Craigie, on April 13.

MR. JOHN MURRAY announces many highly interesting works for immediate publication, among which I may mention "The House of Quiet," by an anonymous writer who really desires to remain anonymous; "Ireland in the New Century," by Sir Horace Plunkett, who has almost entirely rewritten the book consequent on the changed condition of affairs brought about by the recent Land Bill and other political changes; "William Shakespeare: His Family and Friends," by the late Mr. Charles I. Elton, who brought his expert knowledge to bear upon various incidents in the dramatist's business life; and "Impressions of Japan," by Mr. G. H. Rittner.

On February 4, Messrs. Chatto and Windus will issue "V.C.: A Chronicle of Castle Barfield and of The Crimea," by Mr. David Christie Murray, a writer who has hardly done justice to his gifts. Perhaps—? The same firm will publish, on February 11, "British Violin-Makers," by the Reverend W. Meredith Morris, with numerous illustrations, portraits and facsimiles.

To the number of about forty, the members of the Elizabethan Literary Society and their friends assembled at the Salisbury Hotel, on the 22nd, for their annual dinner; the President, Mr. Sidney Lee, being in the chair. The guest of the evening was Mr. W. J. Craig, whose enterprise in devising editions of Shakespeare for every conceivable form of pocket was commended by the chairman. Appropriate songs and scenes from Marlowe, Dekker and Vanbrugh, enlivened the after proceedings. The company included Mr. A. H. Bullen, Professor W. P. Ker and Mr. Thomas Seccombe.

THE "hangers" of the Royal Scottish Academy are at present engaged in adapting to their space the works which have been sent in for the exhibition which will open about a week hence. Several important loans have been obtained, including examples of Whistler's work, difficult to get, just now, when everybody is worshipping the once-neglected master. The show of the Royal Glasgow Institute, which rivals in importance the older body in the "capital of the other side of Scotland," will, owing to change of habitation, not be opened till the first of March, a good deal later than usual. The loan collection here promises to be of unusual excellence.

At a meeting of the Gaelic Society of Inverness the other day, extreme differences of opinion found expression regarding the decay of the language, one speaker asserting that it was dying out, while another viewed matters more hopefully, but urged that the Education Department should be called upon to give more practical assistance in disseminating a knowledge of Gaelic among children. On the historic side of Celtic investigation there is no lack of industry in Scotland. Last year, Dr. Magnus Maclean published the first series of his Glasgow University Maccallum Celtic lectures, and now the second series is announced by Messrs. Blackie. "The Literature of the Highlands," as it will be named, will deal largely with the Gaelic literature of the Highlands after the '45, which, it seems, is the golden age of Highland poetry. Professor Kuno Meyer, of Liverpool, is at present delivering his course of Maccallum lectures in succession to Dr. Maclean.

THEN Messrs. Blackwood announce a work on "The Celtic and Scandinavian Antiquities of Shetland," by Mr. Gilbert Goudie. This book deals with the archaeology of the Shetland Isles from the earliest times, and its author is a recognised authority on all Shetlandic matters, being the possessor of a wonderful collection of Northern literature and curios.

WHATEVER the origin of the Scottish clan—whether it was patriarchal, or whether, as has been suggested, the owner of the largest number of cows, who was also a good fighter and speaker, imposed himself upon the tribe as its legal father—it is evident that nowadays a clan which has no natural head must elect one. So, when the scattered remnants of the Clan Macmillan gathered themselves into a modern society for preservation of their name and history, they turned, in default of a hereditary chief, to one of the two sons of the Arran peasant-farmer who had founded the great publishing business of Macmillan & Co. But age and infirmity were upon Alexander Macmillan, and the Rev. Dr. Hugh Macmillan was selected as first chief of the re-embodied clan. On his retirement, however, Mr. George Macmillan, the son of Alexander, succeeded to the Chiefship, and last week he presided over the annual meeting of the Clan, devoting his address mainly to a eulogy of the work of his predecessor, who died last year. It is a far cry from the belligerent cow-owner of old days to an author and a publisher as successive heads of a Clan Society; but few will deny that here the last state is better than the first.

DR. DUNCAN writes:—"Having been entrusted by the late Mr. Herbert Spencer with the writing of his biography, I shall be greatly obliged to persons who may possess letters from him of interest or value, if they will kindly lend them to me for the purpose of such biography. All letters addressed to Dr. Duncan, c/o H. R. Tedder, Esq., Secretary, The Athenæum, Pall Mall, London, S.W., will be carefully preserved and returned in due course to their owners." Interesting as is the autobiography, there are many things to be said of Herbert Spencer which he could and would not say himself. Dr. Duncan's book should prove valuable and interesting, and readers of THE ACADEMY who can assist him will be facilitating a good work.

THE sale of the original MS. of the first book of Milton's "Paradise Lost" ended in the "lot" being bought in at £5,000. The following note was given in the auctioneer's catalogue:—"This manuscript is the property of Henry Clinton Baker, Esq., of Bayfordbury, and it has been in his family since 1772, when it was inherited by his great-great-grandfather, William Baker, from Richard Tonson, brother of the younger Jacob Tonson. William Baker was the eldest son of Sir William Baker, M.P. for Herts, who married Mary Tonson, daughter of the younger Jacob Tonson, in 1742." The highest bid was £4,750; blessed are the dead authors!

As already announced, it was decided at a meeting recently held in Dublin, "that it is desirable to commemorate the services rendered to letters and to history by the Right Hon. W. E. H. Lecky, and that to this end a Committee be formed to promote a public memorial in Ireland." A committee has now been formed, which has been joined amongst others by Sir Edward Carson, M.P., Professor Dowden, Professor Mahaffy, and the Lord Chancellor of Ireland. Subscriptions should be sent to the Honorary Secretaries, The Lecky Memorial Committee, 36, Molesworth Street, Dublin, or per The Editor, THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, 9 East Harding Street, London, E.C.

Bibliographical

THE other day I expressed in this column the hope that the then forthcoming "Poetical Works of Christina Rossetti" would be a complete collection, pointing to the fact that the volume of Miss Rossetti's "Verses" published in 1893 was issued, not by Messrs. Macmillan, but by the S.P.C.K. I am glad to see that the "Works" as now brought out in one substantial volume by Messrs. Macmillan are really complete, or at least as complete as one could rationally desire. Arrangements have been made by which the "Verses" of 1893 are included; and not only that—Mr. W. M. Rossetti, the editor, has reproduced no fewer than thirty-two pieces from the privately printed "Verses" of 1847. He has likewise included in the "Works" eleven pieces not hitherto put in type. Of these last, only one, called "Downcast" (page 328), is more than a trifle; even "Downcast" is a fragment only. Personally I should have been well satisfied had Mr. Rossetti contented himself with reproducing the volumes of 1862, 1866, 1872, 1881, 1893, and 1896; but as he has thought fit to present us with forty-three pieces in addition, it would be churlish to make objection. Here at any rate are all the poems by Christina Rossetti which were deliberately given to the world.

In arranging the "Works" Mr. Rossetti has put aside the strictly chronological method, preferring a method of his own, by which the book starts with "The Longer Poems" ("Goblin Market," "The Prince's Progress," &c.), and then sets before us in succession the "juvenilia," the Devotional Poems (grouped according to subjects), the General Poems, the Poems for Children and Minor Verse, and, lastly, the Italian pieces. Each piece is, where possible, dated. Further, Mr. Rossetti, who is nothing if not thorough, supplies a list of the contents (in order) of the collected edition put together by Miss Rossetti herself; also a list of the poems by Miss Rossetti still extant in manuscript only; and thirdly, a list of the published poems grouped under the head of the seven "leading themes or key-notes of feeling" which he believes he detects in those poems. Then there are thirty-six pages of notes to the poems, full of interesting information.

Lastly, to the collected poems Mr. Rossetti prefixes a memoir of his sister, running to twenty-six pages. This is notable as furnishing, for the first time, some details of the two "affairs of the heart" which made so marked an impression upon Miss Rossetti; a list of her chief friends and acquaintances; a description of her personal appearance; a list of the portraits of her; and finally, a sketch of her character, temperament and habits. Altogether, this volume (barring the last two paragraphs of the preface, which seem unnecessary, and the question whether the volume of 1847 and the manuscript poems should have been touched at all) is a model of its kind and a very great boon to the admirers of Miss Rossetti's poetry. I may add, however, that in my opinion it does not render at all superfluous the "Life of Christina Rossetti" which Mr. Mackenzie Bell published in 1898—a work which contains much biographical matter not supplied by Mr. Rossetti's memoir, and which, moreover, includes a very useful bibliography from the pen of Mr. J. P. Anderson.

The "fine and large" edition of Ben Jonson's works which the Oxford University Press intends to give us will be welcome, obviously, to those who propose to give their nights and days to the study of "rare Ben." That the number of such students will ever be very great I take leave to doubt. It is true that currency has just been given to two editions "de luxe" of "The Alchemist"—one in this country and one in the United States; but enterprises of that kind have no bearing upon the general popularity (or the reverse) of any classic. For the average reader of Jonson there are the well-known three volumes in the Mermaid Series; these contain all the Jonson plays which can be said to be alive. Editions of the poet's lyric verse are not, curiously enough, numerous, and might well be increased. For those desirous to possess the "Works" within a moderate compass and at a moderate price, there is the three-volume issue—still obtainable, I believe—of the edition which Lieut.-Col. Cunningham based on that of William Gifford.

The prose introduction which Mr. Swinburne has written for the Collected Edition of his poems will assign to that edition a peculiar value, rendering it necessary that the edition should be acquired even by those who are so lucky as to own a complete set of his successive publications. I confess, however, that I should like to see something done for the popularising of Mr. Swinburne's poetry. The Collected Edition will probably be, in price, beyond the reach of the average book-buyer, and it is not absolutely certain that it will find its way into many of the Free Public Libraries. Apart from what those libraries contain—and I doubt if Mr. Swinburne is fully represented in any one of them—what chance has the ordinary young man of literary tastes of making acquaintance with Mr. Swinburne's poetical works? The volumes containing those works are all issued at a price absolutely prohibitory in the case of slender purses. The experiment of a cheap edition of Mr. Swinburne's poems (omitting his dramas) has, so far as my information goes, never been tried.

To be sure there is a volume of "Selections from the Poetical Works" of Mr. Swinburne, issued originally in 1887, and I believe, still on sale. But anything more inadequate for its purpose it would be difficult to conceive. It would be interesting to know by whom this selection was made. Should any other Selection be contemplated in future, the task of making it should be assigned to some independent critic, with a knowledge of the public's wants in this direction. I am quite sure that a Selection made on broad popular lines would be a pecuniary as well as an artistic success.

I notice in the list of the forthcoming "Dryden House Memoirs" the "Memoirs and Travels of Count de Benyowski." This work is by no means a rarity, seeing that it was reprinted by Mr. Fisher Unwin in 1893. It was written by William Nicholson and first printed in 1790. It has more than a literary interest. Kotzebue based a drama upon it—"Count Benyowsky, or the Conspiracy of Kamtschatka"—and on that drama were based two plays in English, one which is attributed to Charles Kemble, and another which was put together by James Kenney and duly performed at Drury Lane. Kotzebue's drama was also twice translated into English—by the Rev. W. Render in 1798 and by Benjamin Thompson in 1800.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews

"Fitz"

THE LIFE OF EDWARD FITZGERALD. By Thomas Wright. With 56 plates. 2 vols. (Grant Richards. 24s.)

NEXT to Lamb (whom he called "the dear fellow") FitzGerald, of all the literary men of the nineteenth century, ranks in the twentieth as the most popular, even the most loved. The reason is, perhaps, a little difficult to discover. Lamb was loved for his misfortunes; but FitzGerald had a sound mind (for all he spoke of "the FitzGerald madness") in a sound body, sound despite his "grisly abstinence" (as Tennyson called it) and his vegetable diet—the diet of worms. He had a balance at his bankers; and the first copies of his adaptation of "Omar Khayyam" might be hawked for a penny without leaving him a penny the foolisher. True he had not a successful first wooing; but this was a well-in-hand passion, for Caroline Crabbe "continued to be his friend"; and, when, at the age of fifty, he did marry Lucy Barton (with the same tale of years), only to go through a parting with her as inexplicable as the form of union, all is unexpected even to the absence of anything like tragedy on one side or the other. The parted couple continued to make kind inquiries after each other, Mr. Wright rather naïvely records to clear the air.

FitzGerald, then, has "no pageant of a bleeding heart" to draw men and women after him. That vaunt—it was almost a vaunt—about the family madness marked him off from Lamb, who had to endure the abominable thing, unmentionable because there—in the very room with him. Nor is the endearing quality of Lamb's literature to be found in FitzGerald's; he is not our mind's playmate; there is nothing of the "frolic and the gentle" in the verses, nor even in the letters. Greater men than Lamb or FitzGerald have less of our love; we do not make an intimate of Wordsworth, though his poetry is with us all our days. Not by right of suffering, not by supremacy of genius, FitzGerald yet rules. Perhaps some worship is given him—the paradox may be adventured—on account of his own refusal of worship for things unworthy, or even for things merely conventional. He never could have written Tennyson's letters to Queen Victoria; and it is something of a key to his character, and to its influence on his habits and manners, that, whereas Tennyson and he held very much the same creed, Tennyson's personality, in all memorials, is associated with abbeyes, crosses, a coronet, croziers and bishops-in-lawn; FitzGerald's with the Suffolk shore, the old boatman Posh (the "greatest of men"), his yachts, and the very titles of his yachts, a hundred simple and natural things, and, finally, a disappointment about a crematorium.

One suggestion remains: peradventure some of FitzGerald's hold on the young men who came after him was kin with that which religious leaders and teachers wield. The nineteenth century stands for perplexity in religion; and he, in verse of majesty, in verse that almost reared itself a cathedral ("architecture is frosted music," someone says), gave voice to that perplexity. The pot spake to the Potter by the mouth of FitzGerald, High Priest. Not Kingsley, not Maurice, not Newman himself—with his eye turned towards "those many young men, whether I know them or not, who have never been disloyal to me by thought or by deed"—had a flock of "acolytes" greater than this unconscious man, who never counted his people. He gave them their hymn. He put their question—flamboyant in form, but one in spirit with the line which devout Catholic poetry addresses to its Creator:—

Come to our ignorant hearts and be forgiven!

Yet we hesitate when we begin otherwise to estimate the influence of FitzGerald as a man of letters. We do not find ourselves following Mr. Wright in all the opinions put forward in his two entertaining and sympathetic volumes. His is a book breezy with pleasant breezes, pleasant even when they blow you out of breath, as these now and again do.

It is curious to notice how, almost without demur, scholars have accepted his verdicts. There is a general tendency to regard his pronouncements on the authors who have stood at his bar as absolutely final. Where would Crabbe now be but for FitzGerald? He said "Admire this author," and men admire him, some of them, perhaps, making wry faces. He said: "Newton's 'Letters to a Wife' is a great book," and people echo that it is a great book. He saw little worth in Tennyson's later poems, and it is more than the critic dare do to see anything better in them than "The Lady of Shalott." He set up this idol and toppled down that. What a tyrant it is!

This is all a little too innocent. Take the following sentence from a letter of FitzGerald's to Lord Houghton and where lurks the final word of criticism?

I wonder Messrs. Browning, Morris, Rossetti, can read Keats's hastiest doggerel and not be ashamed at being trumpeted as great poets by the "Athenæum" and elsewhere.

FitzGerald may persuade local enthusiasm to include Crabbe among great poets, but his preference for Keats's doggerel—the worst in the world—over the abiding work of Rossetti or of Browning must remain an eccentricity. Indeed instances could be multiplied to show what a very random critic FitzGerald commonly was. Not as a critic does he hold firm empire over the hearts of men.

Mr. Wright's volumes are packed with topics on which there is here no room to touch. Where there is so much it seems churlish to suggest there should be any more; but the notice of Lucy Barton-FitzGerald seems to be inadequate without the quotation of an article about her contributed to THE ACADEMY by Mr. E. V. Lucas. Mr. Wright's collocations want occasional mending, but his general style fits admirably with his vivacious treatment of his subject.

WILFRID MEYNELL.

A Great Work

THE CAMBRIDGE MODERN HISTORY. Planned by Lord Acton; Edited by A. W. Ward, G. W. Prothero, and Stanley Leathes. Vol. II.: The Reformation. (Cambridge University Press. 16s. net.)

THIS volume is a fresh reminder of how much England lost when Lord Acton died. It would have been greatly enriched by the chapter on the Council of Trent which he had intended to write. Even if one be not of the Ancient Faith, one would fain have in any account of the Reformation some sign of how that series of great episodes appeared to a Catholic so highly educated and so gifted as the scholar who planned the Cambridge History. As things are, one feels that the Catholic side of the subject may not have been quite adequately presented. For aught we know, some of the contributors may be of Lord Acton's faith; but, even if that be so, it can hardly be said that they have scope and verge enough. Although the Reformation, like all great changes, sprang from feelings common to many thousands of men rather than from the agitations of one man, or of two or three, it is prominently, and permanently, associated with the propositions of Martin Luther and of John Calvin; and these the Editors entrusted to the exposition of the Rev. T. M. Lindsay, Principal of the Glasgow College of the United Free Church of Scotland, and the Rev. A. M. Fairbairn, Principal of Mansfield College, Oxford.

Necessarily, then, it is the Protestant view of the Reformation that dominates this history. That is to say, there are thousands of scholars by whom the work cannot be regarded as the last word on the subject. We make this point, however, not in order to depreciate the value of the work, but rather to explain one of the difficulties under which the writing of history must always labour. Who could be a perfectly judicial appraiser of the Reformation? Probably no such person lives. Even as the Protestant is biassed the Papist would be biassed also; while the Agnostic would be a judge equally open to question, inasmuch as his theory of the universe raises in him what may be an unfounded distrust of all interpretations of Christianity whatsoever. Still, whilst, from the very nature of man, all histories involving religious disputations must be prejudiced, some are less so than others; and on the whole the writers of this volume are as fair-minded as it is in mortal man to be. Here and there, perhaps, Dr. Fairbairn, in his ardour, forgets that he is a judge, not an advocate: as when, for example, he remarks of Calvin that "there is nothing more pathetic in the literature of the period than his hesitations and fears" when recalled to Geneva, where, at the instigation of his teaching, a man had been put in the pillory for card-playing and a hire-woman and a mother and bridesmaids had been arrested for having adorned a bride too gaily: but as a rule one does not feel, on reading any of the seven hundred pages of this work, that the history is a partisan performance.

On the contrary, one is astonished to find, even in the chapters written by professional Protestants, what a very great deal of cogent reasoning Catholic dialecticians had, and still have, to present. Besides the portions alluded to, there are chapters which, between them, overtake all the countries that were affected by the revolt from the Papacy and by the romantic movement in literature. Medicean Rome is dealt with by the late Professor F. X. Kraus; Hapsburg and Valois, and Poland, by Mr. Stanley Leathes; the national opposition of Germany to Rome, the social revolution and the Catholic reaction in Germany, the conflict of creeds and parties there, and the religious war, as well as the Reformation in England under Edward VI., by Mr. A. F. Pollard; the Reformation in France, by Mr. A. A. Tilley; the Helvetic Reformation, by the Rev. J. P. Whitney; the Catholic South, by the Rev. W. E. Collins; Henry VIII., by Mr. James Gairdner; Philip and Mary, by Mr. James Bass Mullinger; the Anglican Settlement and the Scottish Reformation, by Dr. F. W. Maitland; Scandinavia, by the Rev. W. E. Collins; the Church and Reform, by Mr. R. V. Laurence. It will thus be seen that the subject has received categorical and comprehensive treatment. The only chapter which strikes us as being cramped or incomplete is the closing one, on the Tendencies of European Thought in the Age of the Reformation. Probably that is because the writer, our facile Dr. Fairbairn, was very narrowly limited as to space. So is the present reviewer; yet three more lines must be seized in order to express very high appreciation of the style of this instalment of the Cambridge History. At a time when so much writing is ecstatic, or "smart," or otherwise slipshod, the simplicity, accuracy, and strength of the style in which the historians have presented their learning and their thoughts are an invigorating delight.

W. EARL HODGSON.

Jeremy Chrysostom

JEREMY TAYLOR. By Edmund Gosse. (Macmillan. 2s. net.)

THIS contribution to the "English Men of Letters" series is a worthy monument to one of the greatest of Anglican divines. Bishop Rust's funeral sermon, Heber's memoir prefixed to the collected edition of Taylor's works, afterwards revised and annotated by the Rev. C. P. Eden, and the Rev. R. A. Willmott's history of Taylor and the English Church in the seventeenth century are the inadequate attempts to supply the gap in the personal records of the Anglican Church which in this volume Mr. Gosse has, we think, finally filled.

He approaches his subject in a frame of mind at once sympathetic and detached, as a man of letters, not as a theologian. One dare not think of the kind of polemical pamphlet that he might have made of the matter, and of the way in which the human interest of the subject might easily have been swamped in apologies of auricular confession, or the real presence or the real absence, or the divine right of bishops, or in denunciations of the Pope. It is rightly with his present biographer a small matter what precise shade of opinion was held by Taylor of the varieties that still fight for predominance in the Established Church, and a matter of vast importance that he contributed greatly to the building up of the English language and added an imperishable treasure to its literature. His character is of greater interest than the policy of which he was an instrument; his quiet days of retreat among the Welsh mountains than the few and evil years he spent in the endeavour to force upon Presbyterian Ulster the yoke of a detested episcopacy.

It was in Wales, in the retreat furnished for him by Lord Corbery during the years that followed the failure of the King's cause and the rule of the Protector, that he gained at once the knowledge of the intimate life of men and women and the discrete sympathy with nature that transformed him from the mere pedant of the "Liberty of Prophesying" to the clairvoyant of "Holy Living" and "Holy Dying." This was the season during which he learned to look for the illustrations that studded and bejewelled those homilies that even now men read and marvel at, beyond the shelves of his library into the fields, the river and the sky. His was a genius that fed on pictures and impressions. For example:—

He writes with extraordinary happiness about light and water. Nothing would be easier, if we had the space, than to produce an anthology from his works, and confine it scrupulously to those two themes. He is quick, beyond any other man then living, in observing the effects of flashes of lightning in a dark room, of beams of the sun breaking through the vapour of rain, and divided by it into sheaves of rays, of wax candles burning in the sunshine, of different qualities of beautiful radiance in the eyes of a woman, of a child, of a hawk. Light escaping from, or dispersed by, or streaming through, a cloud, is incessantly interesting to him. But perhaps it is in all the forms of water that he most delights: water bubbling up through turf, or standing in drops on stone, or racing down a country lane; the motion and whisper of little wandering rivulets; the "purls of a spring that sweats through the bottom of a bank, and intemperates the stubborn pavement till it hath made it fit for the impression of a child's foot." He seems to have been for ever watching the eddies of the Towy and the windings and bubblings of its tributaries, and the music of those erratic waters passed into his speech.

The end of his life was in sufficiently striking contrast with its opening years. Then he had suffered hunger and thirst for the Church; even bonds and imprisonment. He had been the centre of a circle of admirers among the shining lights of his day and of his country. The night closed in amidst an unwilling flock, upon whom, with a staff of alien hirelings, he had been forced by a high-handed ill-advised Government. The young Fellow of All Souls in his "Liberty of Prophesying" had gone dangerously far ahead of his age in his advocacy of general tolerance; the Bishop of Down and Connor preached the gospel of episcopacy at push of pike. He felt, as no other man perhaps of his contemporaries would have felt, the bitterness of the task: he begged more than once to be released from it. But the Government, if wise in nothing else, at any rate justly reckoned that in the eloquence, the devotion and the personal charm of their ecclesiastical representative they had instruments upon which, if upon any, they might rely for the issue. And so, cut off from those of his valued friends who still survived, it was his lot to die, as indeed in some sense he had for the most part lived, in exile.

Worth While ?

SONGS ASCRIBED TO RAFTERY: being his Fifth Chapter and his Songs of Connaught, now for the first time collected, edited, and translated. By Douglas Hyde, LL.D. (Dublin: Gill & Co. 3s. 6d.)

We yield to no man in our admiration of Dr. Douglas Hyde as a poet and man of letters. As a poet, it is but little to say of him that his metrical adaptations of songs and stories are often very much better worth attending to than the translations of the Gaelic rhymesters whose verses he so sedulously collects. As a man of letters, he has not merely done useful work in his "Literary History of Ireland," but by his heroic insistence on the merits of the minstrelsy of the Irish provinces, more particularly of Connaught, and his zeal in publishing its remains, he has enabled the enthusiast and the blasphemer alike to say with equal knowledge both what these remnants of popular Gaelic poetry are, and what they are not, worth.

Our quarrel with Dr. Hyde—for in spite of our admiration we have a quarrel with him—is neither as poet nor man of letters, but as editor and annotator. Since he chooses to narrow his mind to the lower office, he must be content to be judged by the lowlier but withal more exacting standard applicable to his choice. We may think that so much of Raftery's work as was really worth printing has already been sufficiently illustrated by the "Aithreachas" of the blind musician of Mayo, already published in Dr. Hyde's "Religious Songs of Connaught," and that what is now added has no particular merit. But that is not our point at present. Our objection is twofold. It is, firstly, that the poems are in many cases not Raftery's, and cannot be even reasonably ascribed to him; and, secondly, that the notes and illustrations supplied by the editor are in many cases historically inaccurate. We will give some illustrations of our meaning. As to the first point of our objection:—there is a poem in the book called "The Drowning of Annach Doon," page 147. It describes the capsizing of an old boat with a number of people on board on its way to the fair of Galway in 1828. We say nothing of the merit of the verses in their English form; and we do not understand the Irish. But here is Dr. Hyde's account of the origin of the version he prints: "Raftery said that he would leave a remembrance for ever on the story, and he put it into verses. I got the greater part of these verses from Frank O'Connor, who heard them from an old woman who was born in Annaghdown herself, and who well remembered how the misfortune came about, and some more from a blind man near Tuam. Conyn had them by heart, too, and there are some of them in the manuscript in the (Royal Irish) Academy. I put it together as well as I was able, but it is greatly mixed up, and the order in which I have placed the verses is only conjectural. One or two of the verses come in twice under a different dress, as different people had them, but I did not like to leave them out. It is certain that it did not come from Raftery's mouth as it stands now, but that it was more neatly shaped." One admires Dr. Hyde's candour, enthusiasm and loyalty to his author. But is it not obvious that we have more of Hyde than of Raftery in the poem?

The verses entitled "The Whiteboys," page 195, refer to a once eminent and unpopular personage in the West of Ireland, the Hon. Denis Browne (not, as Dr. Hyde spells it, Brown), who was High Sheriff of co. Mayo in the year when the well-known desperado, "Fighting FitzGerald," was hanged. Dr. Hyde writes as follows: "Denis Brown is not forgotten in the county Mayo yet.

He was High Sheriff over the unfortunate county in the 'year of the French.' . . . He hanged his enemy FitzGerald. The rope broke and FitzGerald fell to the ground. He opened his eyes, looked round and said, 'I am saved.' 'You are not,' said Denis Brown, 'if there is another rope to be had in the county of Mayo!' and he hanged him again. It was small wonder that the people detested him." This is picturesque; but it is mostly apocryphal. Denis Browne was High Sheriff in the year FitzGerald—the nephew of an English peer—was hanged for a savage murder. And the rope broke at the executioner's first attempt. But the other details have no foundation. The story of FitzGerald's romantic life and tragic death has been twice told. First with fulness and sympathy by the author of "Legends of Connaught," a book published as long ago as 1839; and, secondly, in a careful article in the "Dublin University Magazine." There is no warrant in either narrative for Dr. Hyde's statement. On the contrary the writer goes out of his way to refute in a note the popular rumour that the Sheriff had a reprieve for his prisoner in his pocket at the moment of his execution.

Our last example of Dr. Hyde's editorial inaccuracy shall be neither critical nor historical, but etymological. It is surprising to find Dr. Hyde astray in this field. He notes at page i., "The Irish for Dublin is Bally Athcliath." This is not the case, except in the sense in which it would be true to say that the Scotch for Edinburgh is "Auld Reekie." Athcliath—"the ford of the hurdles"—is the old name for the point at which the Liffey was crossed in pre-Danish times, before any town had been built. And Dublin is referred to in the annals of the Four Masters for the year 795 A.D. as Bally-Athcliath. But Dublin is, literally, Dubh (black) linn (pool or pond), and signifies the inlet formed by the junction of the Liffey with its tributary, the Poddle, which in old days formed the harbour of Dublin.

Couleur de Russe

THE RUSSIAN ADVANCE. By Albert J. Beveridge. (Harper. 10s. 6d.)

MR. BEVERIDGE has had a great opportunity and has made very little of it. As an American, he was given a chance of seeing Russian methods as they are, of accumulating materials for a book on the Asiatic advance of Russia with the assistance of officials, and of bringing an impartial judgment to bear on the facts. For Russia is governed by a bureaucracy and the bureaucracy by traditions. One of these traditions, formulated in the time of Nicholas I., if not before, is that the United States are to be encouraged and favoured as a counterpoise to the traditional enemy, Great Britain. This tradition is out of date now that the two Anglo-Saxon Powers are one in maintaining the policy of the "open door" in Manchuria, and resisting the monopolising and encroaching methods of Russia. Even a bureaucracy changes with the times, and it is probable that the next American who travels over Siberia and the Russian Far East will not be allowed to see so much as Mr. Beveridge saw, or could have seen if he had chosen.

He saw and has described very much; and his book is therefore interesting. But he seems to have seen very little for himself, and to have refrained from exercising his own judgment. He saw what the Russian officials showed him, and he has repeated what they told him. Further, he has a very slovenly literary style. He splits his infinitives more often than not and his grammar is casual in the extreme. He stars his pedestrian journalistic manner with patches of "fine writing" of the American newspaper pattern. To sum up the character of his book, he had the chance of being an observer and a judge, and has chosen to be a phonograph.

For all that, his work is worth reading. It contains a good many facts that may help us to understand the ideals of the Russian officials and soldiers in their gigantic visionary plan of making all Asia Russian. Mr. Beveridge has been brought into contact with Pobyedonostseff, Tolstoi, Witte, Admiral Alexeieff, and other great men of modern Russia, and he has faithfully reproduced their views and aims. It is, indeed, rather amusing to listen to Pobyedonostseff's eulogies of autocracy. He, above all men, must know how the gilded weathercock that crowns the social edifice of Russia is blown about by ministerial gales. But the Procurator of the Holy Synod admired "the late Charles A. Dana, of the New York 'Sun'," and so must be taken with due seriousness.

A characteristic instance of Mr. Beveridge's passive mental attitude may be seen in the chapter called "The Red Day of Blagovestchensk," most of which, by the way, has nothing to do with that famous massacre. Mr. Beveridge makes a great parade of impartial inquiry, and then reports the events of the "Red Day" in the baldest outline, which Russophobe and Russophil alike would accept, except, perhaps, in his estimate of the number of unarmed Chinese driven by the Cossacks into the Amur. His excuse for the butchery is, practically, that the Russian inhabitants of Blagovestchensk were in a state of panic terror owing to the "Boxer" rising and the ineffectual fire opened by the Chinese across the river. Their fear made them cruel, and that is Mr. Beveridge's justification or palliation of the massacre. "Call you that backing of your friends?"

Perhaps Mr. Beveridge's style of reasoning may be best exemplified by a brief passage on the Ussuri district. "A curious phenomenon has occurred in this region. On the advent of the Russian, it was occupied by Chinese agriculturists. These were driven out, not by force, but as an inferior race naturally disappears before a superior people. And yet within the last few years the Chinese farmer has been re-invading the Ussuri littoral—very humbly, modestly, inconspicuously, it is true." And the author refers to "the well-grounded fear that he" (the Chinaman) "will in time, by his thrift and more intelligent industry, oust the Russian farmer." In that case I suppose Mr. Beveridge would regard the change as an instance of a superior race naturally disappearing before an inferior people.

ARTHUR R. ROPES.

IDÉES VIVANTES. Camille Maclair. (Paris: Librairie de l'art ancien et moderne.)

THE space of a "Quarterly" article would scarcely suffice to do justice to the ideas set forth in this book of essays. M. Maclair discusses the sculpture of Rodin, Eugène Carrière and the psychology of mystery, classicism and academism, the religion of the orchestra, the scientific spirit and contemporary letters, the identity and fusion of the arts. We propose here only to say a few words about the two last. Certain French scientists, chiefly the great chemists, declare that science is slowly but surely gaining the moral and material direction of society. M. Maclair does not entirely support that view, but he believes that literature should regard the new scientific spirit with sympathy, that it is the task of men of letters to transpose into the domain of expression the new ideas of scientific symbolism, and instances the authors J.-H. Rosny as those who have profited most by science. Science should be considered the natural ally of letters; instead of antagonism there should be agreement between them. In fact literature should go out to meet the knowledge that reconciles æsthetics, metaphysics and ethics. Since newspapers and the pseudo-literary press have paralysed the influence of books of real worth, and no one now reads a deep or serious book, literature has nothing to oppose to the careful and methodical organisation of science; instead, then, of beating it back from her gates, she should arise and welcome it in. Up to a certain point M. Maclair is right, perhaps, but to us it seems that though an art may be influenced by science, it can never under any circumstances submit to the same sorts of rules that prevail in the sciences. Inspiration and experiment do not hang together. M. Maclair very cleverly tries to show the relations between the theory of the solar spectrum and the impressionism of Claude Monet, but, all the same, we feel sure that had the theory of the solar spectrum never been discovered we should still have had Monet's paintings.

In the last essay he seeks to prove that the identity of the arts is not necessarily the fusion of the arts. Wagner attempted the fusion of the arts in his music-dramas, but without success, for, admirable as is the principle, it is not to be realised. The arts are identical in so far as the sensations they impart are equivalent: the bronze and the colours are no more sculpture and painting than the score and the book are music and poetry. Baudelaire, Beethoven, Donatello, Rembrandt, each use a particular sign by which they give expression to their ideas. M. Maclair concludes with the conviction that it is the duty of the critic to teach us each time we contemplate a particular work of art how it is identical with the other arts. And that reflection leads him to animadvert on the decadence of contemporary criticism which has sunk to the level of a trade advertisement. The critic, he considers, is in no way inferior to the creator. The ideal critic is a man who knows, who is acquainted with all the arts, all the sciences, and yet a man who can still say to himself, "I shall learn." To criticise rightly is to understand rightly, and to understand rightly is to love greatly. But until the semi-commercial criticism which is the order of the day falls into disrepute, that ideal is, M. Maclair fears, unlikely to be realised.

AN ANGLER'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY. By Frederic M. Halford. With an introduction by William Senior. (Vinton & Co. 21s. net.)

MEMORIES of halcyon days will crowd upon the mind of every fisherman who reads the apologia pro vita sua with which "Detached Badger" has completed his "Dry Fly Series." Mr. Halford has erected to himself a monument more enduring than bronze in this masterly tetrad. "Dry Fly Entomology" established his reputation as a scientific observer. In "Dry Fly Fishing" he became the patient and kindly teacher of the most advanced school. "Making a Fishery" showed him as a practical pisciculturist. But great as was the debt under which he had placed the angling world by these contributions to its literature, this volume of reminiscences was demanded with its universal voice. "An Angler's Autobiography" is the most engrossing work that has been added to the angler's library since Francis Francis wrote his immortal "Book on Angling." It is a record—a homely and modest record withal—of the triumphs of the dry fly. A diorama of scenes from the banks of the Test, the Itchen, the Kennet, made the more vivid by photogravure reproduction of photographs, for the most part by Major Cooke Daniels, himself a famous fisherman, passes before our eyes, recalling to most of us memories of days when the victory remained for the most part with the finny Trojans of those famous streams. There is a grim satisfaction to anyone who has essayed the hopeless task of beguiling "travellers" on the Itchen, in reading of contests when heavy toll was taken of them by these masters of the craft. Not that these records are by any means all couleur de rose. Now and again we read of days when not even the most perfect patterns were of any avail, of days when fish after fish was missed or lost, a comforting reminder that even masters are mortal, and an example of veracity which fishermen would do well to emulate. Mr. Halford pays a loving tribute to the memory of, perhaps, the greatest fisherman who ever lived, George Selwyn Marryat, the stories of whose prowess read like a fairy tale to all but those who have had the privilege of seeing for themselves his marvellous watercraft. Mr. Halford is perhaps a laudator temporis acti in his memories of fishermen and fishings, but while he mourns the loss of so many good men and true and the decline of so many streams, he does not preach a gospel of despair. He is accused of being a purist, but that there is sound sense in his most advanced theories can hardly be denied in the face of the proofs he adduces. Education has not advanced merely among men. The trout of to-day, taught by hereditary traditions, trained by, it may be, painful experience from their babyhood, exact a degree of skill and a nicety of method not dreamt of twenty years ago. But the tyro need not despair. Mr. Halford's story of his first perch and his sea-fishing days—he used a sea-rod in 1864, surely here, too, a pioneer?—may give heart of grace to the humblest votary. "An Angler's Autobiography" is a classic.

W. MORRIS COLLES.

TWO CENTURIES OF COSTUME IN AMERICA. By Alice Morse Earle. (Macmillan. 21s. net.)

MRS. EARLE has made a close study of her subject, not only in America, but in England during the two centuries covered by her research. The book traces carefully the changes in costume from the ruffs, jewelled robes and farthingales of Queen Elizabeth, the stays, stiffened waists and stuffed breeches of her courtiers, through the pseudo-classical scantiness of the Empire period. To those interested in technical detail the book is a treasure house of obsolete fashions and quaint phraseology, descriptive of the customs, habits and whims of our forbears. We have the evolution of French hoods and steeple crown hats, the adoption by women "of doublets and jerkins as men have buttoned up the breast, and made with Wings, Welts and Pinions on shoulder points as men's apparel is for all the world, and though this be a kind of attire appropriate only to man, yet they blush not to wear it." We learn of the glamour of lace "whisks," the amplitude of "virago sleeves" and the social elegance of "night rails." From contemporary journals we have descriptions and enumerations of ward-robes to rival the pages of that small-souled, keen-eyed diarist Pepys, and from sermons and sumptuary laws learn the proneness of woman nature to succumb to the pomps and vanities of this wicked world, albeit fortified by the faith of Puritans, Saints or Quakers. The book, so crowded with detail, is saved from dullness by Mrs. Earle's wide historic outlook and by her sympathy with the human dramas of the wearers—long since dust—"samares," "potto-foo petticoats" and "yellow lace doulas."

Mrs. Earle begins with the dress of American Puritans, which she finds less stamped by austerity than is popularly accepted, the vagaries of fanatics having been oftener reproduced than the sensible Colonial dress, which was that of prevailing English modes adapted to the demands of a more rigorous climate. In the modification of dress from the exaggerated forms and extravagant costliness of Tudor times to the grace and harmony which characterised the costumes both of the Cavaliers and ladies of the court of Charles I., the author recognises the influence of Van Dyck. At the time of protest against the cumbersome unsightliness of inherited modes, the artist gave creative touch to the costumes of his courtly sitters. Fashions crossed quickly from the Mother Country, and the aristocratic Governors of the Colonies kept up a semi-regal state. The "sad coloured" raiment of the Puritans allowed, according to the author, many æsthetic tints—dull green, dead-leaf, and orange; and scarlet hooded cloaks flashed colour across the sombre seemliness of Puritan congregations. The portraits reproduced bear out the claim for a sense of beauty and a recognition of fashion not only among Colonial dames, but on the part of governors, soldiers, and statesmen. Even the Reverend Cotton Mather, the typical Puritan gospeller, appears in full, flowing robe, and elegant curled periwig. The letters, both from New England and Virginia, written to friends in England, evince an ardent interest in the changes of fashion, and even Quaker caps, bonnets, and shawls, attested, in slight variations of form or folding, feminine allegiance to the sway of style.

Following out her theory that dress is a symbol language of the age, the author finds the stamp of Hanoverian dullness on the costumes and social usages of both Mother Country and the Colonies during the reign of the Georges. The American Revolution, in rousing protest and patriotic enthusiasm, influenced the mode towards a national independence and self-expression, as witness the graduation of the Harvard class in 1768 in home-spun, home-made suits, that "they might take their degree dressed in the manufactures of the country."

Space forbids following out the subject through the violent changes wrought by the French Revolution in efforts to obliterate class distinctions in dress, and the reactionary affectations of the Empire. The charm of the book is in its sense, through mask and fan and sword-knot, of human life and love; love frailer than the bride's veil centuries folded in the cedar chest, love more evanescent than the scent of musk which lingers faintly sweet in the bride's yellowing brocade.

L. STUDDIFORD MCCHESENEY.

ENGLISH AND INDIAN LAW OF TORTS. By Ratanlal Ranchhoddas and Dhirajlal Keshavlal. Second Edition. (The Bombay Law Reporter Office. 9s. net.)

THIS book claims notice for more than one reason. In itself it appears to be an excellent treatise on the subject; as carefully compiled and clearly expressed as might be expected from an English text-book writer. But, as a matter of fact, we believe that neither of the joint authors has even visited this country. Their familiarity with the language and their knowledge of the law have both been acquired at Bombay. They belong to that class of native practitioners of whom little is known in England, who rise to large practise in the Indian Courts, and not infrequently to a seat on the bench, without ever attempting to qualify as barristers at an Inn of Court. Their proper title is that of vakil, which comprises the humblest lawyer in rural practice and the High Court advocate who earns an income estimated in lakhs of rupees. They have taken the fullest advantage of the educational system in India, and of the field opened to them by the impartial administration of justice. In other professions, including Government Service, Indians had for the most part failed to realise the expectations that have been formed of their character and ability. But in law they find a subject adapted to the subtlety of their minds, and it is only just to add that no suspicion has been breathed against their integrity on the bench. The three Hindu judges who have successively sat in the Bombay High Court—Telang, Ranadé, and Chandavarkar—have been alike distinguished for legal acumen, general scholarship, and force of character. But to return to the subject immediately before us. The English law of torts, or civil wrongs, being based upon general principles, but little modified by statutory enactments, has been adopted in India almost in its entirety. It is, however, interesting to observe that in certain cases the rigour of the common law has not been followed. Two examples may be given. From very early days English judges have laid down the doctrine that "tort merges in felony," which is interpreted to mean that a party wronged by a crime cannot sue for damages in a civil action until public justice has been vindicated by prosecution of the criminal. The High Courts of Madras and Bombay have refused to accept this hard doctrine. So, again, with the maxim of English law that no right exists to undisturbed privacy, so as to prevent a neighbour from opening a new window looking into another's courtyard. Indian judges have allowed such an easement to arise from local custom, founded on the Oriental seclusion of women. Finally, we may quote the headnote of a case which is eminently characteristic of Indian litigation: "Where the plaintiff enjoyed the exclusive right of breaking a curd-pot in a temple on a certain day it was held that the breaking of another curd-pot in that temple on the same day by the defendant was a violation of right entitling the plaintiff to damages."

WAITING UPON GOD. By the late A. B. Davidson, D.D. Edited by J. A. Paterson, D.D. (I. and T. Clark. 6s.)

THE sermons of the late Professor of Hebrew in the University of Edinburgh differ widely from the type most generally represented by the volumes sent to us for review. The tendency of the modern preacher is more and more to give voice to the communis sententia that floats in the air of the time. He is popular in proportion as he is able articulately to express what the regular churchgoer of his persuasion has vaguely felt, and as he is more or less successful in adducing reasons to support it. The Bible is no longer to the average British citizen the treasury of the Divine oracles. The august traditions of the Hebrew patriarchs are a cheap and easy jest to the music hall. The popular preacher appeals to them, if at all, only by way of illustration. Dr. Davidson approached the Scriptures in another spirit. He was before everything else an exegete. He was not unaware of the progress of the world; modern thought was familiar to him, and it is a matter of course that he had read the modern books. But he possessed in a wonderful way the power of detachment and almost of voluntary isolation; there is nothing about him of that elusive quality, which in a man's own day counts for so much and for so little with posterity, which has been examined under the title of "modernity." A man who lived his life in an atmosphere of criticism, he preserved intact a reverence that would have seemed more natural in one of an earlier generation. His spirit is the spirit of an Augustine or an Aquinas alike in the unfaltering faith which accepts and in the devout concentration which examines and deduces. These sermons are for the most part upon subjects taken from the New Testament; Isaiah and Job also furnish texts. The sermon on "The Power of Christ's Resurrection" gives the reader an insight into his view of Pauline Theology, and that on the Apocalypse is remarkable both in grasp and content. The style of the sermons is simple and scholarly, but they demand of the reader a close attention.

Fiction

MONSIGNY. By Justus Miles Forman. (Ward, Lock. 6s.) In his latest book this popular American writer has placed the action of the story, or should we say play, in a beautiful old château near Versailles. If it were a play, and it reads very like one, we should praise the mounting of the piece: it is pretty and graceful. But the play itself is none of the best, sometimes the action of the piece is almost unintelligible, and the actors conduct themselves with little reason and less sense. The attractive heiress, Isabeau de Monsigny, the most beautiful woman in Europe, is the daughter of an English viscount by a French wife. At twenty Isabeau has "an endowment of beauty probably as extraordinary as any woman in Europe could boast, and with a knowledge of the world—or at least such aspects of the polite world—as a girl may safely see." Naturally, she is not long without a lover, who appears in the person of an Englishman, once the co-respondent in a famous divorce case. He is invited to the château and there meets as a fellow guest the woman who figures in the divorce case, now living under an assumed name and anxious to marry Isabeau's widowed father. Then the action of the play commences, and for motives we have love and jealousy. The motives are sometimes rather mixed and some of the scenes are not well knit together, but the action moves along briskly with frequent "curtains." We are sure from the beginning that the nice Englishman will emerge without a stain on his character, which proves to be the case. "Where is the 'tristesse' that hung over Monsigny?" "Oh! gone, my queen, gone, gone." Here the final curtain falls, and the author meets with a mixed reception when responding to his "call."

A CANADIAN GIRL. By Lieut.-Colonel Andrew Haggard. (Long. 6s.) The book opens with the burning of St. John, New Brunswick, in which the heroine, Phyllis Frere, loses her father and with him their affluent living. Henceforth she is the poor but pretty heroine, and her adventures are many. She is courted and loved by a millionaire, who is coveted by her girl friend, a handsome unscrupulous French-Canadian with a taint of Negro blood in her veins. The latter tricks him into marriage and the desertion of the poor but pretty Phyllis. The heroine, bereaved of her mother by death and her lover by perfidy, becomes a ballet girl in New York. The reader will by this time guess that by an accident which happens to the bright particular star of the piece, Phyllis, at a moment's notice, takes her part with immense success. Jewels are thrown into her lap, cheques arrive by every post, and she lives in a veritable bower of bouquets. Then it is that she meets the unfaithful lover, who by this time has realised the trick played by his wife, and explanations ensue. Intrigue follows intrigue, everybody is more or less entangled, and the tangle can only be straightened by the death of several of the principal characters. Lovers of incident will revel in this very melodramatic novel; it is long, but it will not be too long for them, for every chapter has its surprise, most of the characters come to unexpected ends, and in the conclusion the game is won by "The Odd Trick."

FAMILIE P. C. BEHM. Roman von Ottomar Enking. (Dresden: Reissner. 6 m.) While Frenssen's "Jörn Uhl" circulates by thousands Enking's novel attracts probably only some hundreds of readers. And yet the latter possesses some qualities entirely lacking in the former. Enking is less diffuse, and he understands the art of selection far better than Frenssen does. The milieu is much the same, Frenssen depicting the tillers of the gound, Enking the toilers in the small towns of Schleswig-Holstein. The main figure is a girl, Anna Behm, the daughter of commonplace parents. Anna unhappily possesses an individuality of her own, and yet is without the strength that would enable her to break away from her narrow home. The family history and circumstances are inextricably mingled with her strivings after free development, they prove too strong for her, and that way lies the tragedy of her life. Her old father, P. C. Behm, had been a peddler, and now, too old to bear the fatigue, had set up a little shop which was looked after by his wife, Anna doing the necessary housework. Frau Behm was devoted to her husband and her children; her one desire was to make them all as materially comfortable as the scanty income would allow. P. C. Behm employs his leisure in indulging his patriotic strivings; he founds a society for the purpose of raising Koggenstedt, his native village, into an important seaport, and to that end begins to write an interminable letter to the Emperor, parts of which he reads aloud to his friends whenever he gets the chance. There is a delightful Pickwickian vein about this. Bernhard, the son, is a small assistant in the post-office, and is the type of the subaltern, absolutely contented with himself, taking a purely philistine joy in life. In such surroundings Anna grows up. She becomes acquainted through her brother with Dr. Körting, a young physician, who seems to her a denizen of another world. They fall in love in somewhat idyllic fashion and Anna develops fast under Körting's refining influence. Their intercourse—on the ice in the skating season, and later in the pleasant spring time, with the stolen steamer excursion—is delightfully described. But all is spoiled when Körting unwillingly accepts an invitation to spend an evening with the family of his betrothed. The scene is full of humour and of the pathos that ever lies near true humour. Poor Anna suffers terribly from the conjunction of Körting and her people, and oppressed by them she appears to Körting an entirely different creature from the girl with whom he skated on the ice or walked the country lanes. With their separation ends the first and best part of the book. Things then go from bad to worse. Anna marries a worthless man whose fraudulent speculations bring the whole family to ruin: he decamps, the old people do not long outlive the disgrace of bankruptcy, Anna attempts suicide, but is not of those who succeed even there, and, crippled for life, carries on as best she can her mother's little shop. Put thus briefly, the story amounts to little enough, but Enking's sincerity and humour, his simple narrative style, make the characters live, and they haunt us with a strange persistency long after we have laid aside the book. The tendency of the later chapters is undoubtedly pessimistic, but it is not the pessimism of the problem-monger, it is rather the pessimism of a lover of mankind who at the same time realises how hard a thing it is for the average man or woman to burst the iron bands of circumstance.

Short Notices

THE TRUE HISTORY OF THE CIVIL WAR. By Guy Carleton Lee, Ph.D., of Johns Hopkins University. (Philadelphia and London: Lippincott. 10s. 6d. net.) The title of this work is, as the author owns, rather pretentious, and he is careful to state in his preface that it is due to his publishers. What he means by "true" is "fair," and he has striven to enter into the feelings of the combatants on political or military fields of battle, and present each side of the case rather than the frigid judgment of a neutral. This is a method which enables the reader to understand the importance once attached to particular events and disputes far better than if these were presented as they appear now to cool and unbiassed observers. Dr. Lee has quoted a good deal—for the size of his book a great deal—from speeches, pamphlets, newspapers, and other contemporary material. This is a good way of making his work "true" in the sense of rightly reflecting the state of opinion at the time of which he writes; it is a very bad way of compiling a "true" history in the sense of accuracy. His book can claim no higher credit than being an unprejudiced and interesting popular sketch of a great epoch. The military part of the story is the most defective. The account of the fall of Fort Donelson is given as if it was due entirely to an assault planned by General Grant. "Had Floyd made a sally before Grant strengthened his thin line . . . it might have been successful," Dr. Lee writes. Floyd did make a sally, and it was successful, and the Confederate force might have escaped; but no preparations had been made for evacuating the fort, or rather entrenched camp of Donelson, and Grant was allowed to re-occupy his lines and restore the investment, having meanwhile broken through the Confederate earthworks by a counter-attack at a weak point. Dr. Lee quotes a spirited description of this attack, but never mentions the early Confederate success of the day, which had been gained by stripping the fort of defenders. The illustrations in the volume, chiefly portraits of leading men in the conflict, are well reproduced. The maps are less satisfactory, as they try to show too much on a small scale. There is one rather curious insertion of a picture of the "Battle of the Crater," the murderous and mismanaged assault on Lee's lines at Petersburg, made on July 30, 1864, after exploding a mine. Dr. Lee does not mention this affair at all in his text.

CENTRAL ASIA AND TIBET: Towards the Holy City of Lassa. By Sven Hedin. (Hurst and Blackett, Ltd. 2 vols. 42s. net.) Four times has Sven Hedin penetrated to the interior of Asia, and this, the record of his last journey, which began on Midsummer Day, 1899, and terminated on June 27, 1902, is, in its way, the crowning point of his adventurous career. Previous Central Asian and Thibetan travellers (with two notable exceptions) have told us in their subsequently published books strange tales of hardships, stress, and hair-breadth escapes, which stretched the imagination to the verge of incredulity. Sven Hedin tells a plainer tale with no literary adornment, little or no attempt at picturesque description, and only sufficient word-painting as came naturally to a man of culture recording strange sights and little-known peoples. He had his adventures too, some of them of a decidedly drastic character, but his infallible good luck, his tried experience as an explorer, and his ready resource enabled him to return safely to Europe with his notes, sketches, maps, and invaluable store of interesting information intact. These two solid heavy volumes are enriched with 420 illustrations from drawings and photographs; eight full-page coloured illustrations from paintings, and five maps, mostly by the author. The maps in themselves are a storehouse of new facts about almost unknown districts, such as Tibet and Eastern Turkestan, the Tarim river, and the Taklamakan desert. The illustrations throughout are excellently reproduced, the coloured ones in particular (an idyllic journey down the Tarim, for instance) having considerable beauty and refinement. The work, in so far as the English and American editions are concerned, is dedicated to the Viceroy of India, to whom, as well as to King Oscar of Sweden and Norway, who "with his accustomed generosity and enlightenment made possible the inception of the undertaking," and the Czar of Russia, the author offers his thanks for assistance "such as money alone could not repay." The translation of the book by Mr. J. T. Bealby, who also translated Sven Hedin's "Through Asia," is a model of what a translation should be, a thoroughly sound piece of work.

MEMOIRS OF M^{LE}. DES ÉCHEROLLES; being Side-lights on the Reign of Terror. Translated from the French by Marie Clothilde Balfour, with an introduction by George K. Fortescue. (John Lane. 5s. net.) The first edition of this book was published in 1843, under the title "Quelques Années de ma Vie pas Alexandrine des Écherolles." It was republished in 1879 and re-christened "Une Famille noble sous la Terreur," which is fully descriptive of the matter, but conveys no idea of the unconventionality and convincing simplicity of the style. The story of the French Revolution is told by a passive and unwilling actor therein, who was also very nearly a victim. Mademoiselle des Écherolles was only a girl of thirteen at the beginning of the Revolution, but her perception was acute, her education excellent, and her memory marvellous. She was one of the few persons capable of describing what they saw, who witnessed the whole of the revolutionary torrent which swept over Lyons, from the murder of the officers of the Royal Polish Regiment in September 1792 to the end of the period of judicial murder in the spring of 1794. Lamartine said that we owe to the pen of this authoress "some of the most dramatic and touching episodes of the siege." She herself writes: "I can only tell what I myself saw or heard, without attempting to thread the mazes of politics, which were beyond my age and understanding. I relate the effects, though I was ignorant of their causes." The translation by Miss Balfour is fluent, simple, and artistic. It could not be better done.

ARCHIV FÜR REFORMATIONSGESCHICHTE. TEXTE UND UNTERSUCHUNGEN. Herausgegeben von Walter Friedensburg. 1 Jahrgang. Heft 1. No. 1. (Berlin: Schwetschke. 4m. 40pf.) This is the first number of a new serial publication issued in connection with the Society for the History of the Reformation. Its purpose is to print the text of documents relating to that period which are not easily accessible, to publish the results of critical research by qualified scholars, and to give general information as to what is being done in the way of research and criticism in this particular department of historical study. The number before us contains two papers: the first, by P. Kalkoff, deals with "Die Vermittlungspolitik des Erasmus und sein Anteil an den Flugschriften der ersten Reformationszeit"; and the second by Paul Tschackert is entitled "Antonius Corvinus ungedruckter Bericht vom Kolloquium zu Regensburg 1541." (German publications of this kind contain mines of information for the historical student.)

ST. PATRICK'S CATHEDRAL, DUBLIN, by J. H. Bernard, D.D. ("Bell's Cathedral" Series. 1s. 6d. net.) A very welcome addition to the series, which is too well known to need any recommendation. The history of the cathedral and the description of its various architectural features are more than adequate for the enjoyment of the visitor, and the illustrations are admirable.

Reprints and New Editions

THE COMPLEAT ANGLER OF IZAAK WALTON AND CHARLES COTTON. The Illustrated Pocket Library of Plain and Coloured Books. (Methuen. 3s. 6d. net.) The note which prefaces this volume is somewhat misleading, assuredly unintentionally so. It says "this issue is founded on the second edition, published by John Major in the year 1824." At a casual glance, to many people it would seem that the present edition is founded on the second edition of the Compleat Angler, but this is not so. It is founded on John Major's second edition of the book, a very different matter. This point once settled we can praise the general get up and printing, which leave nothing to be desired. Quite the most delightful reprint of this most delightful book.

NEW ENGLAND ROMANCES (THE SCARLET LETTER, THE HOUSE OF THE SEVEN GABLES, THE BLITHEDALE ROMANCE). By Nathaniel Hawthorne. (Newnes. 3s. 6d. net.) Such a volume as "New England Romances" would have considerably astonished our grandfathers. Here are three books between two covers and the volume none of the thickest. The lightness and smallness of the book is amazing even in these days of thin paper editions. The frontispiece portrait of the author is charming, as is, indeed, the whole reprint. Quite the best possible way in which to place Hawthorne on our shelves.

THE CUP. By Lord Tennyson. With Introduction and Notes, by H. B. Cotterill, M.A. (Macmillan. 2s. 6d.) "The Cup," in some respects the most successful of Tennyson's dramatic pieces, is here reprinted with an excellent introduction. The notes are interesting and well written, and although half the slender volume is occupied by Mr. Cotterill's sketch of Tennyson's life and remarks about the acting of "The Cup," and the source of Tennyson's inspiration, we are well content.

New Books Received

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL

- Fry, D.D. (Rev. T. C.), Old Testament History for Schools (Arnold) 2/6
 Todd (Rev. J. C.), Politics and Religion in Ancient Israel: An Introduction to the Study of the Old Testament (Macmillan) 6/0

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES

- Howard (Newman), Savonarola: A City's Tragedy (Dent) net 4/6
 Pollock (W. Herries), Animals that have Owned Us (Murray) 5/0
 Hyde, LL.D. (Douglas), edited and translated by, Songs Ascribed to Raftery (Gill, Dublin) net 3/6
 Bowen (Chas. Inniss), The Wandering Jew (Walter Scott) 1/6
 Ellis (Havelock), A Study of British Genius (Hurst and Blackett) net 7/8
 Pertwee (Ernest), compiled by, The Reciter's Treasury of Verse (Routledge)
 Rossetti (D. G.), translated by, Dante's "La Vita Nuova" (Ellis and Elvey)

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY

- Ely, D.Lit. (Talfourd), Roman Hayling: A Contribution to the History of Roman Britain (Taylor and Francis)
 Vignaud (Henry), The Real Birth-Date of Columbus, 1481 (Stevens, Son, and Stiles) net 6/0
 Jacks, LL.D. (William), The Life of His Majesty William II., German Emperor (MacLehose) net 9/0
 Men and Women of Soho: Famous and Infamous, by the Rev. J. H. Cardwell, etc., etc. (Truslove and Hanson) net 6/0

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY

- Garnett (Lucy M. J. G.), Turkish Life in Town and Country (Newnes) net 3/6
 Rapallo, Past and Present: Walks and Excursions, by P. I. A. (Phillip) net 2/8
 Williams, Jr. (Egerton R.), Hill Towns of Italy (Smith, Elder) net 10/8

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY

- The Geographical Journal, Vol. XXII. (Royal Geographical Society)

EDUCATIONAL

- Mason (late H. C. F.), edited by H. H. West, Compositions and Translations (Cambridge) net 3/6
 Flather, M.A. (J. H.), edited by, Kenilworth (Cambridge) 2/6
 Atherton, M.A. (R. P.), Bell's French Course, Part II. (Bell) 1/6

MISCELLANEOUS

- Palmer, B.A. (W.), edited by, Hazell's Annual for 1904 (Hazell, Watson and Viney) net 3/6
 Wo Chang, Leaves from the Notebook of: England through Chinese Spectacles (Cotton Press) 3/6
 Liverpool Cathedral (Church House, Liverpool) 0/3
 Miller (G. G.), Business Success (Walter Scott) 1/0
 "One and All" Gardening, 1904. (Agricultural and Horticultural Association) 0/2
 The Antiquary, Vol. XXXIX. (Stock) 7/6
 Willoughby, Ph.D. (Westel Woodbury), The Political Theories of the Ancient World (Longmans) net 6/0
 The Wimbledon and Merton Annual (Trim) net 2/6
 Smith (Bartholomew), Chamberlain and Chamberlainism (Long) net 1/0
 Cassell's Cabinet Cyclopedia, Part I. (Cassell) net 0/6

FICTION

- "Stromboli and the Guns," by Francis Gribble (Ward, Lock), 3/6; "The Captain's Daughter," by Gwendolen Overton (Macmillan), 6/0; "Iphigene in Fetters," by Mrs. Baillie Reynolds (Murray), 6/0; "His Little World: The Story of Hunch Balaun," by Samuel Merwin (Barnes, New York), $1.50; "The Boss, and How He came to Rule New York," by Alfred H. Lewis (Barnes), $1.50; "The Circle in the Square: The Story of a New Battle on Old Fields" (Barnes), $1.50; "Tennessee Todd: A Novel of the Great River," by G. W. Ogden (Barnes), $1.50; "Countess Ida," by Fred Whishaw (Long), 6/0; "Nurse Charlotte," by L. T. Meade (Long), 6/0; "In Steel and Leather," by R. H. Forster (Long), 6/0; "The Story of Tonty," by Mary Hartwell Catherwood (Grant Richards), 3/6; "The Rise of Roderick Clowd," by Josiah Flynt (Grant Richards), 6/0; "The Mark," by Aquila Kempster (Hutchinson), 6/0.

JUVENILE

- "Uncle Ranger's Yarns: Tales of a Spirit," by A. H. Biggs, M.A. (James), 1/0.

NEW EDITIONS

- "Handy Andy," by Samuel Lover (Ward, Lock), 0/6; "Courtship," by Hawley Smart (Ward, Lock), 0/6; "Caleb Williams; or, Things as They Are," by William Godwin (Newnes), net 3/0; "The Scarlet Letter," "The House of the Seven Gables," "The Blithedale Romance" (in one vol.), by Nathaniel Hawthorne (Newnes), net 3/6; "Clear Round: A Story of World-Travel," by E. A. Gordon (Sampson Low), 2/6; "Air, Food, and Exercise: An Essay on the Predisposing Causes of Disease," by A. Rabagliati, M.D. (Belliere, Findall), net 7/6; "Lovely Woman," by T. W. H. Crosland (Grant Richards), net 1/0; "The Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table," by Oliver Wendell Holmes (Blackie), 2/6; "Essays in Verse and Prose," by Abraham Cowley (Methuen), net 1/6; "Essays," by Thomas Carlyle (Blackie), 2/6; "Harry Lorrequer," by Charles Lever (Blackie), 2/6; "Caxtons," by Lord Lytton (Blackie), 2/6; "The Pathfinder," by J. Fenimore Cooper (Blackie), 2/0.

PERIODICALS

- "Pictorial Comedy," "Jewish Quarterly Review," "Cassell's Magazine," "Magazine of Art," "Longman's Magazine," "Leisure Hour," "Sunday at Home," "Girl's Own Paper," "Boy's Own Paper," "Friendly Greetings," "Home Management," "Connoisseur."

Foreign

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES

- Vivien (Renée), La Vénus des Aveugles (Paris: Lemerre) 3 frs.

MISCELLANEOUS

- Bognaud (Paul), L'Origine des Idées Éclairées par la Science du Langage (Paris: Alcan) 1fr. 50c.
 Dumas (F. G.), Almanach des Gourmands (Nilsson) 5fr.

MISCELLANEOUS—cont.

- Borrmann (Richard) and Neuwirth (Joseph), Geschichte der Baukunst (Seemann) 8 marks 50 pf.
 Mitteilungen der Altertums-Kommission für Westfalen, Heft III. (Aschendorff) 10 marks.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY

- Du Terrage (Baron Marc de Villiers), Les Dernières Années de la Louisiane Française (Paris: Guilmoto) 15 frs.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS, ETC.

Dr. JOHN SCHMITT has edited "The Chronicle of Morea" and it is to be issued in Messrs. Methuen's series of Byzantine Texts almost at once. In the series of Books on Business published by the same firm will be issued immediately Mr. Douglas Owen's "Ports and Docks." Mr. H. C. Minchin has written the introduction and notes for an edition of "The Essays of Abraham Cowley," to be published in Messrs. Methuen's Little Library this week. The first serious attempt at historical romance by Mr. Eden Phillpotts will be issued by the same firm in a day or two under the title of "The American Prisoner." It deals with the Great War Prison on Dartmoor and the life of that famous limbo during the early years of the last century. History has not been departed from, and scarcely an incident among all the remarkable ones recorded but has foundation upon fact. The story itself is a love story of self-sacrifice.—In connection with Rita's attacks upon the "smart set" will be published early in February "Sandford of the Smart Set, or Sin and Scandal," by Belinda Blinders. The book is to be "edited" by Desmond F. T. Coke, and Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall & Co. are to publish it at 1s. net.—A memoir of the late Rev. Walter Senior will be published immediately by Mr. Elliot Stock under the title "A Faithful Minister." With the memoir will be included some representative sermons preached at Dewsbury, Durham and Margate.—On Tuesday, February 1st, Mr. T. Fisher Unwin will publish a new novel by Mrs. Amelia E. Barr, entitled "Thyra Varrick." It is a tale of "The Forty-Five" and "Bonnie Prince Charlie."—The two next volumes of the Mermaid series (to be issued by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin on February 1st) will supply a want which has long been felt, viz., that of an edition of Dryden's best plays. The volumes, which have been edited by Professor Saintsbury, who contributes an introduction and notes, will contain the following plays: "Almanzor and Almahide, or the Conquest of Granada," "Marriage à la Mode," "Aureng-Zebe," "All for Love," "The Spanish Friar," "Albion and Albanus," and "Don Sebastian." Dryden's own prefaces will be given in full.—The delegates of the Clarendon Press are making arrangements for a thorough revision of Liddell and Scott's "Greek-English Lexicon," quarto edition. They have obtained a promise from Mr. Arthur Sidgwick to undertake the active duties of editorship as soon as he is free from certain other literary engagements, and the collection of materials has been begun. Several scholars have sent, and some have promised to send, the corrections or additions which they have accumulated, and it is hoped that any other scholars who are willing to give similar help will communicate with the secretary to the delegates, Clarendon Press, Oxford.

"FOR SPORTSMEN, BY SPORTSMEN" will be the keynote of a new illustrated monthly magazine, devoted to sports and outdoor life, which Messrs. Newnes will shortly publish under the editorship of Mr. C. B. Fry. Not confined to any one or two of its branches, the periodical will deal authoritatively and popularly with the whole field of recreation, as well as with its physical and educational aspect. The need of such a magazine, priced at a figure within the limits of sportsmen of all classes, has long been apparent, and its forthcoming fulfilment will doubtless excite considerable interest.

The Salad in Literature

... and after that they yede about gadering
Pleasaunt Salades which they made hem eat,
For to refresh their great unkindly heat.

THAT the eating of green meat is and always has been closely bound up with healthy human life is a fact which needs no demonstration; but the constantly recurring references to it in the literature of all ages would seem to point the moral in so far as salads must always have appealed peculiarly to those leading a more or less sedentary life.

In a serious biblical commentary of the eighteenth century, Baron von Vaerst, a German savant, refers to Nebuchadnezzar's diet of grass as a punishment which did not in any way consist in the eating of salad, but in the enforced absence of vinegar, oil, and salt. That salad adds a zest to life is proved by St. Anthony, who said that that pious old man, St. Hieronymus, lived to the green old age of 105, and during the last ninety years of his life existed wholly upon bread and water, but "not without a certain lusting after salad." This is confirmed by St. Athanasius.

In Shakespeare's "Henry VI." Jack Cade remarks that a salad "is not amiss to cool a man's stomach in the hot weather." Cleopatra, too, refers to her "salad days, when she was green in judgement, cool in blood." In "Le Quadragesimal Spiritual," a work on theology published in Paris in 1521, these lines occur:—

La Salade moult profitable
Signe la parole de Dieu
Qu'il faut ouyr en chascun lieu.
Pêcheurs, entendez ce notable!

All writers agree as to the cooling properties of salads, and particularly lettuce, on the blood. In his "Acetaria: a Discourse of Sallets" (1699), John Evelyn says that lettuce: "though by Metaphor call'd Mortuorum Cibi (to say nothing of Adonis and his sad Mistress) by reason of its soporiferous quality, ever was and still continues the principal Foundation of the universal Tribe of Sallets, which is to Ccol and Refresh. And therefore in such high esteem with the Ancients, that divers of the Valerian family dignify'd and enobled their Name with that of Lactucinii."

Another quaint book on Salads is entitled "On the Use and Abuse of Salads in general and Salad plants in particular," by Johann Friedrich Schütze, Doctor of Medicine, and Grand-Ducal Saxe-Coburg-Meiningen, Physician at Sonnenburg and Neuhaus: Leipzig, 1758. The learned doctor adopts the classical division of humanity into the Temperamentum Sanguineum, or warm and damp, the Cholericum, or warm and dry, the Phlegmaticum, or cold and damp, and the Melancholicum, or cold and dry. To each of these classes a particular form of Salad applies, and none other.

When Pope Sixtus the Fifth was an obscure monk he had a great friend in a certain lawyer who sank steadily into poverty what time the monk rose to the Papacy. The poor lawyer journeyed to Rome to seek aid from his old friend the Pope, but he fell sick by the wayside and told his doctor to let the Pope know of his sad state. "I will send him a salad," said Sixtus, and duly dispatched a basket of lettuces to the invalid. When the lettuces were opened money was found in their hearts. Hence the Italian proverb of a man in need of money: "He wants one of Sixtus the Fifth's salads."

Charles Kingsley describes many varieties of salads in olden times: "And behold in the kitchen beyond, salads in stacks and faggots; salad of lettuce, salad of cress and endive, salad of boiled coleworts, salad of angelica, salad of scurvy-wort, and seven salads more; for potatoes were not as yet;" but even some of these strange salads are eclipsed by the following recipe for a sallet, temp. Richard II.: "Take parsel, sawge, garlyc, chibolles, oynons, lettes, borage, mynte, poirettes, fenel, and cressis; lave and waishe hem smalle wyth thynne honde, and myng hem wel wyth rawe oyl, lay on vynegar and salt and serve ytt forth."

Fourcroy and Chaptal, notable chemists of the end of the eighteenth century unite in praise of salads, and have written disquisitions on the dressing thereof. Rousseau says that a perfect salad must be dressed by a maiden between 15 and 18 years old, of course with her fingers; whence the familiar French saying which remains in the language to this day. Rabelais opines that the best salad-dressing is Good Humour, which is just the sort of thing that one might expect from him.

Everyone knows the tale of the French emigré who went about to noblemen's houses mixing delicate salads at a high fee. Most authorities refer to him as one d'Albignac, but Grenville Murray, who generally knew what he was writing about, says that his name was Gaudet. To come to more recent times few people nowadays read Mortimer Collins' "British Birds by the Ghost of Aristophanes" (1872), a delightful poetic tourney for the Laureateship of Cloud-Cuckooland, the subject of which is Salad. This is the best known verse:—

Take Endive—like love it is bitter,
Take beet—for like love it is red;
Crisp leaf of the lettuce shall glitter,
And cress from the rivulet's bed:
Anchovies, foam-born, like the Lady
Whose beauty has maddened this hard;
And olives from groves that are shady;
And eggs—boil 'em hard!

Many salads have been mixed on the stage; the most famous perhaps is the Japanese salad which occurs in Alexandre Dumas fils' "Francillon" (produced at the Théâtre Français 17th January 1887). It is not orthodox, and, even when deftly mixed, not particularly nice, the flavours being coarsely blended.

A few years ago Mr. Charles Brookfield mixed an admirable salad on the stage of the Haymarket in the course of his clever monologue "Nearly Seven." On January 31st, 1831, "La salade d'oranges, ou les étrennes dans la mansarde," by M.M. Varin and Desvergers was played at the Palais Royal. The first-named author was a sort of gastronomic playwright, for he wrote plays called "Le cuisinier politique," "J'ai mangé mon ami," and others. Finally, in Beaumont and Fletcher these lines occur:—

Three several salads have I sacrificed
Bedewed with precious oil and vinegar,
Already to appease thy greedy wrath!

These extracts, picked at random from casual reading, have been put together merely to show that salad has not lacked in honour throughout the tale of centuries. Authors and quotations might be centupled and the total meed of praise would not even then be cited. Which, after all, is only just and proper, for the salad is one of the necessary luxuries of life.

Egomet

THE hour, the place, and the book, all must be in accord if I am to appreciate rightly the worth of any writer's work. I remember, for example, that I made several attempts to read "Lavengro" before I succeeded in making way with that fascinating book. It was not the fault of the book or mine; it was simply that the hour, the place and the book were never in accord until that third or fourth triumphant effort. I recall well the occasion. It was upon a dank, dreary, muddy November day in London; I had been to pay a visit to a sick friend and had walked from his house, through dripping streets, to the club; the pavements were slippery, the horses splashed the mud around, the wind was cold and raw, the lights shone dimly through the mistiness.

How very welcome were the warmth and bright cheerfulness of the club library. I turned over the magazines on the big round table, glanced at the new books, peered out of the window at the foggy river and the dim line of lamps along the Embankment, shrugged my shoulders at the old member who was peacefully snoring before one of the blazing fires, and turned to look over the nearest shelves. There stood the works of George Borrow, not many, but how much. Again will I attack "Lavengro," said I to myself, and picking out the volume I went across the room and settled down before another fire, well out of the ear-shot of Mr. Snorer.

I read steadily from the beginning and soon to my delight was caught in the toils. East Anglia, Ireland, Scotland, highways and byeways, London. Dinner was no interruption for I took my book with me. Each time as I re-read "Lavengro" I endeavour to decide which passages are most fascinating; at that first reading the portions concerning the adventures in London most appealed to me. With "Lavengro" I struggled and toiled, with him I hated that overbearing publisher, delighted in the company of the young man about town, was mystified by that curious Eastern merchant, sat with him upon London Bridge and talked of Defoe and Moll Flanders; with him I trod the streets I know so well, and now sometimes as I walk them I fancy that great, burly man is by my side. I am a weakling and therefore, perhaps, admire the strong and sturdy. What a glorious fellow he must have been, despite his moods and tempers. I might have known him; I may have passed him in the street, rubbing shoulders with him unknowing.

I love the country in a way, but I love the town better. Country books appeal to me, but none so greatly as those of George Borrow. I never met a gipsy, I never dwelt in a dingle, I never rode a horse, of my fists I know not the use save for the purpose of holding a pen. Yet I love George Borrow, admiring him this side of idolatry. Not so long ago it was suggested that a statue of the man should be placed in Norwich. Why? I am not a lover of monuments of writers; to my mind they build in their books their own monuments, which each one of us can have upon our shelves, ever with us. If I visit the places where great writers have lived and worked, to me the atmosphere there is full of them, I look for no statue or monument, I desire none, I avoid them where they exist. Who wants a statue of Thackeray, or Dickens, or De Quincey, or George Borrow in London town? Not I for one. I lay down my pen and again take up "Lavengro," offering up a book-lover's words of gratitude to a whole-hearted, whole-souled writer of great books.

E. G. O.

Science

Tolstoi and the Babies

PERHAPS it is worth while to consider the attitude of modern science and the philosophy based upon it toward an idea with which we are all familiar—the idea that the "fever called living" is not worth while. Universal suicide has been suggested as a remedy; a tyrant of the past desired, whatever his motive, that mankind had but one collective neck, which he might sever; and a modern poet has made his hero, with a hint of the same idea, ask "What if the world should end to-night?" And two modern thinkers have approached the same question, each from his own point of view. Huxley declared, as he surveyed the lot of his time, that if there were no better prospect in store he would welcome as a desirable consummation the advent of some kindly comet, which should sweep the whole affair away. And Count Tolstoi, as I understand, has his own grounds for wishing the present generation to be the last.

Without discussing the attitude of these various men, and whilst recognising that, whatever their conclusions or ours, the stream of babies, at the rate of some seven per minute, will certainly persist, we may try to make some impartial inquiry into the question, as a purely academic exercise. "What if the world should end to-night?"

The question we might put to ourselves, I suppose, would centre upon the relative proportions of happiness and pain in human life. If there be more sorrow than joy in the world to-day, and if there be no reason to suppose that the ratio is likely to alter in time coming, then why not end it? Take your "last ride together," like Browning's lover, and let the world end to-night. If, on the other hand, there be a preponderance of joy in human life, then let "the great ages onward roll." Omitting all question as to some "far-off Divine event to which the whole Creation moves"; omitting all consideration of another life than this, and taking the question as a purely rational and terrestrial one, what course would we pursue, had we the power?

Well, I think it might be shown that men are disposed on one side or other of this question according to temperament. I almost fancy that the theologians, the poets—Keats, "here, where men sit and hear each other groan"; Tennyson "never morning wore to evening, but some heart did break," and the Hellenists would incline to the view that there is a balance of sorrow in human affairs, and that there is no present indication that that balance is in process of redress. As to the last point, on the other hand, we have a representative scientist like Tyndall declaring that the history of humanity is a history of amelioration, and that the lot of each generation is happier than that of any of its predecessors. With all my heart do I believe in this latter view. But let us look at the history of humanity—as the biologists and not the historians call history.

Man as we know him is the latest product of a long series of lower forms, whose capacity for suffering—and for happiness—was smaller than his own. I will not attempt to answer the question whether the life of a cow, let us say, is or is not happier, on the whole, than the life of a typical East-ender. Nor will I attempt to decide whether civilised man is happier, on the whole, than savage man, with his much smaller capacity for physical pain and his entire mental ease. But I do certainly believe that if we take the history of civilisation, Tyndall's words are justified. Perhaps we owe our happier lot, as compared with the Middle Ages, to the ethical ideal of the Church, perhaps to other causes. But whatever the verdict of Tolstoi or anyone else on human society as it is at present, I fancy that a healthy man would rather be alive than dead, rather human than simian or vegetable. It is not begging the question to say a healthy man, for disease as a great factor in human affairs is assuredly doomed. Tuberculosis and malaria, the two most deadly of known maladies, may be disposed of whenever the race pleases.

But you will tell me that disease is relatively a very unimportant matter; that the evil in the world is not material but moral; that "highways of smooth electrical ease" and pure milk are hardly enough to end the Weltschmerz; that if you probe the malady to the bottom it is human nature that the All-Good Father has made "desperately wicked"—as the theologians assure us; and that human nature is the same in all ages, so that any millennial dreams may be discounted forthwith. And I agree with all but your last assertion.

If there is any popular error which modern knowledge and wisdom have totally and finally exposed, it is that "human nature is the same in all ages." We believed that glib assertion up to the time of Comte. The man to whom alone we owe the assertion and proof that human nature is not the same in all ages is Herbert Spencer, though a serious monthly magazine, in the number published after his death, began its first page with that shallow and hopeless lie.

Human nature was once simian, once amphibian, once much lower still. The ridiculous assertion which many of us still believe—and quote, as if it were wisdom—is historically coeval with the ridiculous chronology of Archbishop Usher. If man was indeed created, as a learned divine has calculated, at nine in the morning, on the twenty-first of October, in the year 4004 B.C., then certainly we cannot demonstrate much alteration in human nature during the past six thousand years. But that has gone the way of all myths, and has been replaced by a gospel of hope: hope not merely for the individual but for the race. And it is because human nature is responsible for humanity's greatest evils, and because I know that human nature is ever climbing "the world's great altars, that slope through darkness up to God," that I believe Count Tolstoi—who despises and denies Evolution and its exponents—to be wrong. I give you the one artist that, so far, has discovered Evolution:—

Red of the Dawn!

Is it turning a fainter red? so be it, but when shall we
The Ghost of the Brute that is walking and haunting us lay yet, and be free?

In a hundred, a thousand winters?

Ah, what will our children be,

The men of a hundred thousand, a million summers away.

If life is not worth living to-day, it will be then: so we welcome the babies, Tolstoi notwithstanding.

C. W. SALEEBY.

The Provost of Trinity College

DEATH has been busy of late with the most eminent of Irish intellects. Yesterday it was Lecky, to-day it is Dr. Salmon. But though the former, in spite of an eminently retiring disposition, had a much more familiar reputation among the general public, the latter is a far greater loss to the internal intellectual life of Ireland and particularly of the Irish capital. Dr. Salmon's was one of those great academic figures whose greatness is infinitely more than academic. As Provost of Trinity College he dominated his colleagues as admittedly, and was in himself as truly the essence of the institution over which he presided, as the late Master of Balliol was the foremost figure in the Oxford of his day. But the power of Dr. Salmon's masterful, yet singularly winning, personality was exhibited in a larger world, and won a wider conquest. He was not merely a profound master and teacher in the two dissimilar sciences to which he contributed, respectively, his "Geometry of Three Dimensions" and his "Historical Introduction to the New Testament." He was also a great man of affairs. The same gifts of strength, sagacity and humour which enabled him to rule the smaller world of Trinity College with an authority which has never been surpassed and a popularity which has never been equalled, made Dr. Salmon, quite apart from the splendid service of his theological writings, the foremost Irish churchman of his day. It was the same in the world of Dublin society. No one could have expected of a man who had lived almost up to his seventieth year the life of a scholar and a student, that on assuming the headship of the college he would exhibit not only the qualities of a successful ruler, but those of a brilliant conversationalist, a delightful after-dinner speaker, and the most charming of hosts. Yet such was the verdict unanimously passed when, in 1891, it fell to Dr. Salmon's lot to take the lead as Provost in the festivities which celebrated the Tercentenary of the University of Dublin. And such was the position which he enjoyed, without seeking it, in the far from homogeneous society of Dublin. Yet to all these qualities were united the strongest of wills, the most steadfast principle, and the most unflinching courage. Dean Bernard, in his admirable appreciation from the pulpit of St. Patrick's on Sunday last, most happily illustrated his controversial vigour when he applied to the Provost what Goldsmith said of Dr. Johnson: "If his pistol missed fire, he knocked you down with the butt of it."

In even so brief a notice as this it is not inappropriate to the pages of a literary journal to note that among the chief of Dr. Salmon's relaxations was an insatiable delight in novel-reading. Few men have had so wide or so familiar an acquaintance with English fiction. While his chief allegiance was given to the older novelists of the last century, especially to Scott and to Miss Austen, he had an unusual familiarity with the earlier Victorian novelists of the second rank. Among these Anthony Trollope was a special favourite.

Dramatic Notes

CHARLES LAMB complained that artificial comedy had been killed by sentimental comedy, and we of the present day may add our complaint that it has not been resuscitated. Mr. Henry Arthur Jones is a writer who might, as he would, render the stage this service, for a service it would be, but he is fatally tainted with the sad seriousness of to-day and will not dare to let his genuine gifts have free play. A notable example of his fearfulness is the new comedy at the Haymarket Theatre "Joseph Entangled," in the third act of which he has introduced that good character, that single gush of moral feeling, that revulsion of the judgment to actual life and actual duties, at which Lamb points the critical finger of scorn as ruinous to artificial comedy. It is the real pump and the real water, which in its surroundings not only is unreal itself but upsets the balance of the play.

The first two acts of "Joseph Entangled" are quite first rate artificial comedy; the dialogue is witty and amusing, the characters well drawn, the situations well devised. Lady Verona Mayne, a highly irresponsible person, and Sir Joseph Lacy, a light-hearted lady-killer, are accidentally led into a compromising situation, from which quite logically arise a series of entanglements which we watch with glee, for never for one moment do we take them or the characters of the comedy as real. Then in the fatal third act, Mr. Jones sounds the jarring note of reality, he appeals to our sentiment and to our morals, the house of cards collapses, and the play, becoming drama, stinks in our nostrils. The pity and the needlessness of it! Mr. Jones might have continued on his merry way to our great contentment, for he was under no compulsion to adopt the plan he has followed, the third act might have been as artificial as those preceding, and the husband of Lady Verona as high a comedy character as the husband of Lady Teazle. In fact Mr. Henry Arthur Jones has come very near to giving us a present day "School for Scandal," so near as to make me, for one, bitterly regret that he has fallen at the last fence.

I HAVE said that the characters of "Joseph Entangled" are well drawn; indeed they compare favourably with the very high standard he has set himself in those brilliant comedies "The Crusaders" and "The Liars." Sir Joseph Mayne is the entertaining modern counterpart of Joseph Surface, Lady Verona a metropolitan twentieth-century Lady Teazle, Jermyn Pyecroft a flâneur, with a slightly too disagreeable cynicism, Professor Tofield an amusing caricature of a philosopher who overstrains his philosophy when he applies it to everyday affairs, and the two servants, Knapman and his wife, are splendid creations. The actors, one and all, with the single exception of Mr. Herbert Waring, whose failure was no fault of his, gave us a fine example of modern comedy-acting at its best. Even where everyone was so good it may be permitted me to praise especially Mr. Frederick Volpé and Mrs. Charles Calvert: as the two above-named servants they created two characters which will linger long in the memory and in which they sink their own individualities so entirely that we remember the characters not the players.

CAPTAIN ROBERT MARSHALL'S "The Duke of Killicrankie" is founded upon a central idea strong enough for a one-act farce, but not so for a three-act farcical romance. Remembering with pleasure the same writer's "His Excellency The Governor," "A Royal Family" and "The Second in Command," I watched, and came away from "The Duke of Killicrankie" with a sense of disappointment. Captain Marshall has certainly not done himself justice in his latest production; the first and third acts are mere talk and that none of his best, the intermediate act has some action, utterly improbable and not touched with that whimsical fancy which this writer has led us to expect from him. Such a piece as this can only be saved from failure by brilliant dialogue; unhappily this has not been provided. Rudeness is not witty; we do not want blows from a bludgeon, but thrusts from a rapier. Two ladies, social antagonists, are brought together at the table of the Duke, and they indulge in a royal battle of words, which, but for their costumes, would appear to be a "slanging match" between fishwives; the claws of cats without the soft furry sheaths. Captain Marshall can do so much better than this that it is our duty to speak plainly and ask him to give us of his best. The acting as a whole was neither finished nor persuasive, with the exception of Miss Eva Moore, whose performance was excellently pretty.

TO-MORROW (Sunday) Mr. J. H. Leigh will lecture the playgoers upon "Reading versus Acting." This club is doing good service to the stage by its discussions, and there is surely some hope for the future of the drama when dramatic art is seriously discussed by playgoers?

A NEW comedy by Franz von Schöthan, "Maria Theresa," won the approval of the audience at the Berliner Theatre, Berlin.

GUTZKOW'S "Uriel Acosta" has been revived at the Schiller Theatre, Berlin. Forty years ago—the play was written in 1846—it aroused the greatest enthusiasm among the playgoing public, but to-day its influence is less strong, and the success of the revival is mainly due to the admirable acting. Still, it is a moving story and technically an excellently constructed drama. Some few years ago it was rumoured that Mr. Beerbohm Tree intended to produce it, and doubtless he would give us striking pictures of 17th century Amsterdam and its Jewish Synagogue, and find in the martyred hero a part exactly to his taste.

THE new "musical comedy" for Daly's Theatre, to replace "The Country Girl," which ends this week, is in active rehearsal, and will probably appear about the end of February. The authors and composers are the same as that of the piece just ending. The part of the Baboo lawyer, Chambhuddy Ram, taken by Mr. Huntley Wright, has been revised by "F. Anstey," the creator of Jaggerjee, while Mr. Rutland Barrington is appropriately massive and dignified as a Kandyan noble, Boobhamba by name. Native festivities are to be a striking feature of the second act.

SHAKESPEARE'S LONDON: THE DUTCH CHURCH, AUSTIN FRIARS

[Photo. Booker and Sullivan, Chancery Lane.]

Musical Notes

A BODY which ought to be better known, and whose labours ought to be more actively supported, is the Folk Song Society, concerning which I notice some correspondence in a contemporary. As Mr. Fuller Maitland observed at the second of his interesting lectures at the Royal Institution last week, it becomes yearly more imperative for the old tunes scattered about the country to be collected and noted down if they are not to be lost or changed beyond recognition, and this is the work to which the Society in question addresses itself. Unfortunately, while several hundreds of beautiful old songs have been rescued, want of funds has so far prevented their publication. This should not be. Perhaps, on the other hand, the Society, whose vice-presidents are Sir Hubert Parry, Sir A. C. Mackenzie, and Sir Charles Villiers Stanford, might push its claims a little more energetically with advantage. Many readers of THE ACADEMY would, I am confident, be glad to further such an excellent cause if put in the way of doing so.

It is not very clear why the Hallé band should be brought from Manchester to play at the Elgar Festival at Covent Garden in March next. If Manchester were to give a festival and the Queen's Hall band were to be sent there for that purpose, Manchester folk would be the first to exclaim at such an arrangement—and rightly. The Hallé band is a very good one, but no one can pretend that it is superior to orchestras which we possess in London; wherefore its importation in the manner proposed seems quite unnecessary. It is true, of course, that Dr. Richter is to conduct, which is doubtless the explanation of the arrangement; but this will hardly mitigate the natural soreness of London orchestral players which is likely to be engendered over the matter. But perhaps after all London has largely herself to blame. Our neglect of Elgar has been Manchester's opportunity, and this is one of the results. The Hallé band and the Hallé chorus know their Elgar; London instrumentalists and singers do not.

It must be agreed, however, that the forthcoming festival will do much to redeem London's reputation in this regard. Perhaps, indeed, no other composer has ever been the subject of quite such a remarkable tribute as that which this festival, organised by Mr. Schulz-Curtius and the Grand Opera Syndicate, will constitute, and it will be highly interesting to note the amount of support which it secures. In a way it was an odd sort of venture for the syndicate to embark on, since neither "The Dream of Gerontius" nor "The Apostles" can be reckoned a work exactly in their line, or as calculated to make any very particular appeal to their supporters. None the less, it is apparently assumed, judging from the scale of charges, that the fashionables will cheerfully flock to the festival (as a kind of solemn prelude, perhaps, to the brighter glories of the season proper), and I sincerely hope that they will. For musicians the production of Dr. Elgar's first symphony seems likely to prove the most interesting feature of the festival.

As to the opera season proper, many will be disappointed to learn that no "Ring" cycles are to be given this year. But doubtless we may look for single representations of "Die Walküre" and "Siegfried," as usual, while compensation is promised also in a series of special performances under Richter which may well prove even more interesting than a repetition of the "Ring." Performances of "Die Meistersinger" and "Tristan" under Richter would, for instance, be well worth hearing, while if a little extra attention could be given also to Mozart, even if we do not actually get to the length of that long-delayed "Mozart Cycle," this would be matter also for satisfaction.

THE Eolian Hall, opened last week, constitutes an acceptable addition to London's smaller concert rooms. It will not serve to take the place of St. James's Hall, when the building goes (if it ever does) its threatened way, but it is of a size admirably adapted to recitals and less important concerts, and since it is also conveniently situated, and has, moreover, been most tastefully decorated and equipped, it may be expected to become very popular. The room holds 400, and is thus of about the same size as the Bechstein Hall. At the concert with which it was opened Miss Parkina, Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies and Mr. Johannes Wolff had no difficulty in showing that its acoustic properties are excellent, while Mr. Max Schulz excited general admiration by his deft manipulation of the pianola.

Has the modern orchestra yet reached its limits? Or must it see the addition of still further instruments? Such was the subject of a recent interesting discussion in the columns of a contemporary. The conclusion came to was, I think, that nothing like finality in this matter has yet been reached, which in view of past experience and present tendencies certainly seems reasonable, even though it must become more difficult than ever to give orchestral concerts at a profit if their bands are thus to be continually increased in size. Even as it is the works of the more modern masters, including in this term Richard Wagner as well as Richard Strauss, can seldom be given precisely in the manner intended.

PERHAPS composers of the future will find a way out by resorting rather to a greater variety than to a greater number of instruments. In which event they might gain ideas perhaps from some of those ancient instruments of Hawaii, of which current report tells in connection with an orchestra in formation at Honolulu. The ahu, or nose flute, for instance, described as possessing (perhaps mercifully) a compass of something less than an octave, suggests infinite possibilities in the hands of, say, Richard Strauss, while the kilu, to the construction of which it seems a coconut is essential, sounds like another instrument which might confidently be relied upon to do execution.

If Miss Paula Szalit, the new pianist, has any sense of humour she must have been considerably amused by the diverse judgments of two of her critics last week. Thus in the "Daily News" one found the usually hypercritical "E. A. B." rhapsodising as follows:—

She is mistress of her instrument in every respect; she understands its genius. As far as technique in the ordinary sense goes she has nothing to learn. . . . Her phrasing had the quality of inevitableness, which can never be the effect of the mediocre mind in music. . . . Miss Szalit has also the mind that grasps the inner meaning of the art; the spirituality that sees in it more than sensuous tonal beauty.

On the other hand hearken unto the judgment of the "Pall Mall Gazette":—

Miss Szalit attacked the work with a free sense of irresponsibility, and evidently was not distracted by any possible subtleties which might have existed in the intention of Beethoven. She played like an extremely clever school-girl.

It is only just, however, to Miss Szalit to add that the majority of her critics leaned much more to the "Daily News" than to the "Pall Mall Gazette" estimate of her powers. By almost universal consent she has been recognised as an artist of quite exceptional attainments.

Art Notes

THE appointment of Mr. Clausen, A.R.A., to the Professorship of Painting at the Royal Academy has already borne good fruit; and the attendance at his lectures, to say nothing of the sudden enthusiasm amongst the students and others to attend lectures on painting, and the space devoted to those lectures by the press must be a welcome change in that room where so much voluble cant has flowed. Now, at any rate, the student, hearing good talk, ceases to yawn; and it is good to read that Mr. Clausen's mention of Whistler roused thundering applause from the youngsters—a cheer which showed a good example to many an Academician. The Academicians who attended the lectures, however, as given by the press, seem to have been just the men that least required them—I should like to have seen, for instance—Ah! but there are so many immortals who want their art furbishing, and it seems invidious to name one or two. The advice to the students to study the old men, “but not too systematically and not as a task,” was excellent. I was glad to see Mr. Clausen daring to speak of an artist's sentiment and poetry in these days when scarcely a critic realises that there are such things, far less realises that they are the basic essence of art; indeed so far from realising it, do they not actually pride themselves on eliminating the essence out of art? Mr. Clausen's lecture on Titian, Rembrandt and Velasquez was most sound. I would only say that I think Whistler was quite as fine an etcher as Rembrandt in actual technique—indeed there are some etchings of Whistler's that it would be impossible to surpass in thrill and nervous feeling and in the emotional statement which is the essence of art. In his lecture on Lighting and Arrangement I was glad to see that Mr. Clausen dwelt strongly on the absolute need to put the general statement of the picture before perfection in the rendering of the details. No student can have this truth drilled into him too often—and still more into her. The general arrangement, (what for want of a better phrase we call in the studios the black and white of the thing,) enters into how few of the brains of such as write letters after their names on the official roll-call of art to-day! But when you get a man who sees the picture as a whole, men like Sargent and Whistler, Clausen himself, Edwin Abbey, Howard Pyle, Steinlen, Guthrie, how their work stands out and sets them into the rank of those that reach the best achievement of their time! Mr. Clausen, speaking of the development of Turner's artistic eye, praises his ever-increasing worship of light, his “growth of perception of the beauty of light.” That seems to me a rather canting and foolish phrase—surely he means the emotion of light! But we are all the slaves of cant, the most revolutionary of us, nay, did not even Swinburne get one of his most superb effects with a sublime use of cant in his sonnet to Cromwell—“the Enthroned republic, more kinglier than a king, spoke; and its voice was Cromwell”! Still, this misuse of the word beauty was all the more strange, coming from the man who, in his next lecture, stated that “the expression of colour may be defined as the emotional side of art, the expression of form by drawing as the intellectual side.” Here is a man at last, a remarkable artist, who sees that his art is not beauty but emotion—and it accounts for his pronounced mastery in the realm of colour. Year by year Clausen's grip upon colour has increased—year by year his gamut has become larger, the harmony more splendid, the music more resonant. When he speaks of colour being the emotional side of art, he of course only speaks of the art of painting. If the colour is not used to express the mood of the picture, it is at best but merest fireworks. But, whilst in a way, it is illuminating to that statement to say “as drawing is the intellectual side of art,” it would be more proper to say “as drawing is the intellectual side of painting”; for drawing is just as much an emotional statement of life as is colour. The line of a Beardsley is absolutely musical, emotional, rhythmic—it transfers the emotion of Beardsley's art as definitely and as beautifully as any amount of colour could. Altogether the Academy is to be congratulated on its Professor of Painting, and in nothing more cordially than in that he has pointed the students' gaze to the fact that colour is the statement of human emotion and temperament, not a thing to be acquired by the use of academic line and plummet, that it is a personal statement, and that colour is not an actuality but an emotional statement, and relative in its values to the thing stated, not a mere copying of the colours of nature.

It is most sincerely to be hoped that Mr. Clausen will publish his lectures in book form and with good reproductions of his illustrations—say a book in quarto shape, and at a reasonable price. It would and should have a good influence in every art school throughout the country. I am judging before the series is finished; and I would suggest some reproductions from his own best work, and a few colour reproductions from his sketches. He requires editing, to prevent his own work being under-stated.

MR. ANDREW LANG in an article on “Art and Civilisation” in the “Morning Post” very rightly shows the wrongness of Dr. Grosse's theory that when a barbaric people are in the hunting stage they produce finer art than when they settle down into the agricultural and more civilised stage. As a matter of fact, no section of the community has worse taste all round, no section of the community has produced less really good art than the sportsman. It is a strange and curious fact that the men who live the out-of-door life, who see Nature in her most exquisite moods, should be the most indifferent observers and recorders of her moods, whilst a Turner comes out of a barber's dingy house in a shabby London street and creates masterpiece after masterpiece of colour—to be laughed at by the sportsman—when the said sportsman does not gaze at it in dumb bewilderment.

THE foundation stone of the cathedral of Liverpool is to be laid this summer; and the city is to be congratulated on the architects whom she has chosen to create the masterpiece. The Cathedral Committee chose Mr. Bodley, R.A., and Mr. Norman Shaw, R.A., as Advisory Architects, who, out of the competitors, selected five men for the final competition—Messrs. Austin and Paley, Mr. Nicholson, Mr. Gilbert Scott, Mr. Malcolm Stark and Mr. Tapper; and from the resulting competition Mr. Gilbert Scott came out triumphantly with the “best design and finest conception” as to the cathedral's “real effect,” “the dimensions and proportions of its different parts,” “its practical aspect,” its “fine and noble proportion combined with an evident knowledge of detail,” and above all in his grip of “that power combined with beauty that makes a great and noble building.” The Committee thereupon appointed Mr. Bodley, R.A., and Mr. Gilbert Scott to be the joint architects of the new cathedral, thus securing the experience of the greatest modern exponent of Gothic architecture and the brilliant talents of Mr. Scott. And I am bound to say that, judging by the sketches in the pamphlet issued by the Committee, the judgment of the cathedral experts is likely to be well rewarded.

EVERY vessel that beats up the Mersey will see arising from the midst of the city, high above its topmost habitation, a vast cathedral, the two mighty towers of which will stand sentinel over the great water-gate of England; for there is to be built upon the hill that dominates the city a mighty and imposing edifice whose great height and lofty transepts will make it stand out with majestic symbolism above the everyday life of her busy thoroughfares. It is full time that so splendid a city as Liverpool should be crowned with the emblem of her spiritual life. And from the designs it would almost seem as though she were about to come into possession of a lofty edifice that will have as glorious a site as Durham Cathedral, and much of the massive grandeur of that great cathedral that is the pride and the glory of Paris.

MR. M. H. SPIELMANN delivered an address at the London Institution the other evening on "British Sculpture of To-day"—a sound, sensible estimate of the modern school. It is sincerely to be hoped that he will publish it, with full illustrations from his slides. But there is one part of it in particular which I should like to see in the possession of the public; and I think Mr. Spielmann owes it to us all to publish it, with its illustrations—his description of the Queen Victoria Memorial. It is useless to criticise the business when it is done; whilst criticism of the plans and designs might not only prevent blunders, but is often of the greatest value in the making, especially where a number of details have to be kept in dependent harmony the one on the other. At any rate, it is satisfactory to know from so good a judge as Mr. Spielmann that Mr. Brock's work is so excellent in the sketch state. I was glad to see also that Mr. Spielmann had done justice to Leighton's "Sluggard" and "Athlete struggling with a Python," two works in which the genius of Leighton almost reach its highest achievement.

MR. DERWENT WOOD is a sculptor who made his mark early by winning a travelling studentship out of the Academy schools; and he has now won in the competition for the marble statue of the great preacher Spurgeon. His torso of a woman at the International Society is a very exquisite and beautiful piece of work; and the rhythm of its line and form suffer nothing even in the presence of the master work of Rodin hard by.

THE Women's International Art Club, at the Grafton Galleries, shows some excellent examples of the achievement of woman in the arts of painting and of sculpture. Such vigorous strong work as Helène von Beekerath's "En Bretagne" would make its mark in any exhibition; and at the Grafton Gallery it stands out with remarkable power—the jesting, talking group about the table with the light of the lamp sending a warm glow over their bucolic faces, are painted with rare dash and power, and the whole mood and atmosphere of the event finely rendered. Miss Bethia Clarke's "The Watcher" is another good, well balanced piece of work. Miss Emmeline Halse's modelling in her small sculpture of "A Victim to Art" is full of character, a rare gift amongst women-artists, as well as being very beautifully rendered; and Miss Gwendolen Williams' marble of "Dawn," were it not for that dreadful tree-trunk, is a very exquisite study of a young girl in that difficult period of awkward beauty—the early teens. Miss Alice Robertson's "La Mère Marie," Miss Knapping's "The Bridge," Miss Garrido's "Household Cares," Miss Boughton-Leigh's "Barrington," Miss Gertrude Leese's "The Mother," stood out from amidst much good work; whilst Miss Labouchere's sketch "Perseus" was one of the finest pieces of colour in the whole place, even beside her own excellent "Le Petit Cour" and "Church Interior."

IMPORTANT Art exhibitions have been thrown open to the public in such numbers during the last week or two that I am putting off the survey of the details of two of them until next week; but I would just jot down for the art-lover's guidance meanwhile that the "International" at the New Gallery has added a couple of Whistlers to its strength; that Mr. Baillie, at Hereford Street, is showing work by Mr. Counard which no one should miss; that the Pastel Society is open at the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours in Piccadilly; that Mr. Grosvenor Thomas has an exhibition at the Woodbury Gallery in Bond Street, as also has Mr. Elgood at the Fine Art Society's; and that the Hon. Walter James has a show of his work at the Ryder Gallery in Albemarle Street.

THE first number of the new art quarterly, "The Artist and Engraver," is out; and it will be interesting to see whether a magazine at such a high price will repay Messrs. Macmillan for their venture. Its claim upon our seven-and-sixpences is that it is a quarterly magazine of Original Work. And, high as the price may seem, it must be remembered that we get for our money, in number one, the work of A. Legros, a fine etching if somewhat weak; an example of C. H. Shannon, a dainty wood engraving; an original of Mr. Strang, in the shape of an engraving on copper which is studiously clumsy in the modelling, yet a fine thing; an example of Joseph Pennell in the shape of an excellent lithograph full of airiness and movement and breeziness; and an etching by D. Y. Cameron in his markedly individual style. No man can call this expensive fare for seven shillings and sixpence, yet the price is undoubtedly a high price, and I doubt if Messrs. Macmillan will find the effort a paying one. However that may be, the portfolio contains some very beautiful work; and it has this claim to existence that it is original creative work and not reproductions in engraving from the paintings of others. The general effect left upon me, however (and I say this though I am an admirer of each of the men whose work appears), is a feeling that they have not given of their most characteristic work; and I think this is nearly always the case in such ventures. Mr. Pennell's work is the most characteristic; yet if Pennell had sent his superb "Segovia" from the International, for instance, how much more telling would have been his contribution. There is throughout, to me, a sense of thinness in the efforts of each contributor; and it is a relief to turn to one or two Gordon Craigs that lie about my room and breathe their strength and their enthusiasm—it is a change of artistic climate. Nevertheless a book of beautiful things is this new art magazine. Mr. Binyon's enthusiasm for original engraving as against mere reproductions from the paintings of others is founded on the more solid ground, since the engraving of reproductive work has now no reason for existence, for the photogravure can state the picture perhaps more accurately whilst it retains much of the velvety mezzotint quality.

University Extension

The Position of Oxford and Cambridge

UNTIL the reconstitution of the University of London in 1900 the University Extension Movement in London had been organised by a society founded in 1876, soon after the original idea of "extension" had taken root at Cambridge. Cambridge was the first to take up in a practical way suggestions originally put forth at the Oxford Commission of 1850. Oxford followed the example of the sister University and the extension work of the two Universities has since been carried on, at Cambridge under a syndicate, at Oxford under a delegacy, both being the direct outcome of the University. Thus, until lately the extension work of the ancient universities had been on a different footing from that carried out in London. Now, however, it seems that London is going to become the centre of the movement, under the University of London, and such a development may be the ultimate means of binding together the various branches and making for that unity which is felt to be lacking at present.

But if London is to take up this position of central authority Oxford and Cambridge must not drop behind. Their work remains just as important. Without it they would lose much of their national character which the extension movement has done so much to recover.

Since 1876 the scope of the intellectual influence of both Oxford and Cambridge has become considerably widened. Successful courses of lectures have led to the foundation of permanent University Extension Colleges—at Exeter and Colchester for instance, and the growth of local colleges of university rank (colleges instituted entirely by private enterprise and munificence) in the large industrial towns cannot wholly be explained without some reference to the influence of university extension. The University Extension College at Reading was the first of its kind, and is now affiliated to Oxford University. So too is the University College at Sheffield.

But it is easy to see that the real work of university extension will not be effected by the formation of local colleges. The work in the smaller towns cannot have such an outcome, and indeed it is not wanted; neither is it the underlying idea of the movement, which primarily concerns those to whom, from a multitude of reasons, a university career is impossible. But that does not mean that there should be no other opportunity of benefiting from the methods and character of university teaching. There is a great deal to be done in the development of class-work as a necessary supplement to the lectures, and in the direction, too, of individual reading. The students attending the centres scattered over the kingdom must be made to feel that they are part of a scheme—that the organisation does not emanate from each separate town but from the universities themselves.

It will be interesting to watch if the recent stimulus given to the movement in London will have any echo in Oxford or Cambridge. For there is opening for much more to be done in the way of organisation. Apart from the "Summer Meetings" it can hardly be held that the extension movement is one of a general influence or that its modus operandi is any too widely known.

Correspondence

Clough and Tennyson

SIR,—With regard to the Clough and Tennyson parallel, I am inclined to think, for it is of course only possible to speak conjecturally, that Clough had heard the couplet in MS. and perhaps unconsciously echoed it. As you are aware, the sections of "In Memoriam" in which it occurs—indeed, it occurs twice, were written some years before they were published, and Tennyson was in the habit of reading the MS. sections to friends as they were composed. Among those friends were several who knew Clough, and Clough himself. I expect that is the solution of the problem.—Yours, &c.,
J. C. COLLINS.

"Shakespeare and Bacon"

SIR,—As a Baconian who has studied the "Shakespeare Problems" for many years, will you allow me a little space to answer Dr. Engel, whose book you reviewed recently.

You say: "Engel brings forward some new arguments to show how slight was Bacon's general culture." Against Engel's "new arguments" I place the "old argument" of Edmund Burke—whose "arguments" were not made in Germany, like Engel's—when he asks, "Who is there that hearing the name of Bacon, does not instantly recognise everything of genius the most profound, of literature the most extensive, of discovery the most penetrating, of observation of human life the most distinguishing and refined?" No "culture" in Bacon! May I ask Dr. Engel where "the man of Stratford" got his "culture"? For, according to Dr. Engel, the London actor seems to have been the only man of "culture" of the Elizabethan age—had it been "agriculture," his verdict might have been allowed to pass without comment.

Then you say: "Nowhere does he [Bacon] mention the great English writers who were his contemporaries or forerunners. We hear nothing in his writings of Chaucer or Spenser, or Sidney, or More, or Achan, and as little of the great names of European literature—Dante or Petrarch, or Ariosto or Tasso." Where had he the opportunity of doing this in his works? Did Shakespeare refer to them in any of his plays? And if Shakespeare did not, why should Bacon be expected to do otherwise. Bacon and Shakespeare appear to have been so wrapped up in their own affairs that no other author had any interest for either of them.

Again you assert: "According to Engel, even his [Bacon's] claims as a man of science rest on slippery ground." This is absolute nonsense—even when given as the dictum of a German critic.

I would be sorry to appeal to Germany for an opinion of Bacon as a man of science. Dr. Engel says Bacon "borrowed his science." Can he inform me where he borrowed the science in the "Novum Organum" (section 36), of which Professor Fowler says: "This paragraph does great credit to Bacon's sagacity, and is one of those which give him a claim to be regarded as a pioneer of science. He ought to have the credit of having detached the conception of attraction from that of magnetism."

This opinion of Bacon as a man of science—an original man of science—is confirmed by Professor Tyndall, Professor Gardiner, Professor Playfair, Professor Adamson, Dean Church, Mr. Morley, and others, who are as competent judges as Dr. Engel, though they are not Germans.

In conclusion, I notice that you say: "Bacon was no poet is clear to all who read him . . . and Engel is probably right when he says that more poetry may be found in Bismarck's speeches and letters than in Bacon's works." The German who can find no poetry in Bacon's works needs an English education, and disagrees on this point with Shelley, Lord Lytton, Landor, Spedding, Taine, and others. Dr. Engel may know a lot about Shakespeare. He knows precious little, however, about Bacon, when he says Bacon borrowed his science and was not a poet.—I am, &c.,

GEORGE STRONACH.

Keats' Grecian Urn

SIR,—Let me drive yet another nail into Mr. L. P. Patten's coffin. Has he never seen the little wooden carvings of cows wrought for the summer tourists by the Swiss cowherds on their long winter evenings? I would undertake (for adequate consideration) to provide him with a thousand examples of heifers with necks outstretched and eyes raised to the zenith, "lowing at the skies," from the hands of these craftsmen familiar with bovine habits from their cradles.—Yours, &c.,

G. S. LAYARD.

An Error Corrected

SIR,—In the appreciative notice of the "Burlington Magazine," published in your issue of the 23rd inst., you pay me the compliment of identifying me with the well-known editor of "The Studio." In the interests of the "Burlington Magazine," I ought, perhaps, to leave the mistake uncorrected, but possibly Mr. Charles Holme might think differently. As I am not personally responsible either for my Christian name or my surname I can only hope that he will bear me no ill-will for their resemblance to his.—Yours, &c.,

CHARLES JOHN HOLMES,

17 Berners Street, W.

(Managing Director of the "Burlington Magazine" Limited.)

THE Directors of the London, City, and Midland Bank, in their half-yearly report just issued, declare a dividend at the rate of 19 per cent. After making provision for bad and doubtful debts and depreciation of consols, a balance of £118,319 12s. 9d. is carried forward. The paid-up capital is £3,000,000, with a reserve of equal amount.

"Academy" Questions & Answers

Questions and Answers for this column must be addressed to THE EDITOR, THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, 9, East Harding Street, London, E.C. The envelope to be marked in the top left-hand corner "A.Q.A." Full name and address must be sent, not necessarily for publication. Each Question or Answer must be written on a separate sheet of paper and on only one side of the paper. The editor will not undertake the forwarding of any correspondence. Questions must be confined to matters of Literature, History, Archaeology, Folk-lore, Art, Music, and the Drama. The Editor reserves the right of deciding whether or not any Question or Answer is of sufficient interest to be published.

COMPETITION

Until further notice, four prizes, of the value of 5s. each, will be awarded weekly for the two best Questions and the two best Answers contributed to "Academy" Questions and Answers.

The Editor's decision must be considered absolutely final and no correspondence whatever will be entered upon with regard to the awards. The prizes will go to those Questions and Answers which are deemed to be of the greatest general interest, and briefly in all cases will count as a merit.

The names and addresses of prize-winners will not be published, but the winning Questions and Answers will be indicated by an asterisk (*).

The prizes will consist of 5s. worth of books to be chosen by the several prize-winners. The name and address of the booksellers where the book or books can be obtained will be given.

Each prize-winner in the United Kingdom will be advised that a credit note has been sent to a bookseller as early as possible in his (or her) immediate neighbourhood, and that on demand he (or she) may choose a book or books to the value of 5s. Winners outside the United Kingdom will receive a cheque for 5s.

Non-adherence to the rules and regulations of "Questions and Answers" will imply disqualification.

No Questions or Answers received after Monday will be considered eligible for the current week's competition.

No competitor can win a prize more than once in three months.

Questions

LITERATURE

"GLASTONBURY."—What justification is there for those writers who identify Glastonbury with "Insula Pomorum," and deduce from the last name the well-known Arthurian Avallon, or Avilion, through the Welsh afal = apple? William of Malmesbury is not a credible chronicler. Is it entirely to him that we owe the inception of this theory?—A. S. B.

COMMA.—When, and in what work, did the comma make its appearance?—W. P.

MARITAL LOVE.—Can any of your readers point to passages in Roman literature which give substantial evidence to the existence of a strong love, apart from mere affections, existing between man and wife?—M. T.

LITERARY GODFATHERS.—Recently there has been a notable increase in new editions of standard authors "introduced" by well-known critics. When did this custom first come into vogue, and is any writer generally credited with its initiation?—E. N. S.

* "HUMPHREY HOUR."—What is the explanation of the following dialogue between Richard III. and his mother, in Shakespeare's "Richard III., Act iv., Scene iv. :—

Duchess of York.—What comfortable hour canst thou name,

That ever grac'd me in thy company?

Richard.—Faith none, but Humphrey Hour, that call'd your grace

To breakfast once, forth of my company.

The folio of 1623 reads "Humphray Hower." The commentators do not get beyond the well-known expression of "dining with Duke Humphrey"; but it does not seem likely that Richard would have suggested that his mother would have left him in order to go without her breakfast; such a retort would lack point.—H. C.

"OHNE PHOSPHOR KEIN GEDANKE."—I believe this expression was used by Goethe. Can any of your readers inform me in which of his works it is to be found?—H. C.

RABELAIS.—Is there any key, in English, to the many cryptic allusions in the works of Rabelais?—H. D. B.

"PROSERPINA."—

"O, Proserpina!

For the flowers now that, frighted, thou let'st fall

From Dis's waggon!"

—Winter's Tale, Act iv., Sc. iii.

Can anyone tell me the exact source of this allusion? One knows the myth alluded to, but does anyone know if this is merely a poetic fancy, or what was Shakespeare's authority, and what the exact legend from which he took the idea of Proserpina's dropping the wreath of flowers as she was conveyed away?—C.

HISTORY

CALIGULA.—Can any reader help me to a reference about a dream of Caligula (or possibly some other Roman emperor) to the effect that "the sea came up and spoke to him"?—A. W.

WATERLOO.—An old book of reminiscences, "Sunterings in London," 1853, refers to "the famous house at the corner of Kink Street (St. James's Square), from the steps of which George IV., on the night of 20th June 1818, proclaimed the news of the victorious battle of Waterloo." Of course 1818 is a mistake, but is it on record that the King publicly proclaimed the victory? If so, what are the contemporary references? Curiously enough this corner house is only three doors from that in which Napoleon III. lived many years afterwards.—S. S. S. (Yeovil).

POPE'S NAMES.—Why do popes assume new names on coming to the papacy? Giovanni de' Medici became Leo X. and the present pope Pius X., though the former was not named Leo nor the latter Pius before becoming pope.—M. R.

MUSIO

AMBROSE AUSTIN.—An MS. I am editing alludes to this gentleman's "annuals"—meaning concerts at St. James's Hall or elsewhere. Query: geographical details.—W. H. C.

GENERAL

* "NOT FIT TO HOLD THE CANDLE TO HIM."—Is this a pure colloquialism, or can it be found in standard writers? In my own reading I have come across an incident which may throw light on the subject. "Being call'd into his Majesty's closet when Mr. Cooper, the rare dinner, was crayoning of the King's face and head, to make the stamps for the new mill'd money now contriving, I had the honour to hold the candle whilst it was doing, he choosing the night and candle-light for the better finding out the shadows." "The Diary of John Evelyn," January 1662.—Clericus.

"COUNTING-OUT" VERSE.—Can anyone tell me the origin of the children's "counting-out" rhyme—

"Ene, dena, diner, duse,
Cattler, weeler, wiler, wuss,
Spit, spot, must be done,
Twiddleum, twaddelum, twenty-one—
O-u-t spells "out"
Out goes He—"

—A. M. S. (Paddocke).

Answers

LITERATURE

* "LORDS OF HELL."—I would suggest that "Lords of Hell" is intended to be a translation of di inferni; but like most expressions of any worth it has other meanings and suggestions. Taken with its context the term signifies and includes any form of evil insidious and dominant in high places in defiance of sober opinion and right judgment elsewhere. Such evil could not flourish but that it is fed upon victims supplied by the base for gain; the large acceptance of the "philosophic mind" must not so confound good and evil as to encourage laxity because it is sometimes seen that past sin does not render generous goodness impossible. If it does so it is actually helping to sustain secret evil and weakening the total moral force which it is the "divine" mission of philosophy to strengthen.—S. C.

"SIR WALTER SCOTT'S GRAMMAR."—Whatever it may be, the phrase cited from "Peveril of the Peak" is not an "excruciating transatlanticism." "Between you and I" is very commonly used everywhere in Britain. It will be found scattered all over Dickens' works, and is twice used in a couple of consecutive sentences by the little lawyer in Chapter X. of "Pickwick."—H. R.

"RASSELAS."—The name "Rasselas" was probably taken from Lobo's "History of Abyssinia," from Ras Sela Christos, printed Rassela Christos, page 102.—N.

* "MUSIC AT THE CLOSE."—The original French poem is entitled "L'Agonie," and is by Sully-Prudhomme. Du Maurier translated only a part of this, which in the original runs to 48 lines. The poem appears in "Specimens of Modern French Verse," by H. E. Berthou, published by Macmillan. The French publisher is Lemerre, passage Choiseul, Paris. I wonder how these lines came to be ascribed to Madame Necker. Did she write a similar poem?—Young Hopeful.

QUOTATION FOUND:—

"When mankind shall be delivered
From the clash of magazines,
And the inkstand shall be smothered
Into countless smithereens:
When there stands a muzzled stripling
Mute, beside a muzzled bore:
When the Rucyards cease from kipling
And the Haggards Hide no more."

From J. K. Stephen's "Lapsus Calami" (1891 edition, page 3).—A. R. B.

[Similar replies received from A. M. E. Seeley (Torquay), M. L. B. (Malvern), M. S. (Oxford), F. (Cambridge), T. E. T. (Heaton), Sapsa, M. S. (Paddocke), W. H. C., M. A. O., and W. B. L.]

PROVERBS.—See King (W. F. H.), "Classical and Foreign Proverbs," 1887; Christy (H.), "Proverbs of all Ages," 2 vols., 1888; Middlemore (G.), "Proverbs in Various Languages," 1899; Webster (W. G.), "Quotations, Words and Proverbs rendered into English"; Webster's "International Dictionary."—F. (Cambridge).

PROVERBS.—See Isaac D'Israeli's "Philosophy of Proverbs." There are also the collections of Prose, Ray, and Fuller, and incidental treatment of much interest is to be found in the writings of Trench and the authors of "Guesses at Truth."—S. C.

PROVERBS.—The best book in English on the history and derivation of proverbs is "Proverb Lore," by F. E. Hulme (Elliot Stock, 1902). The origin of some English proverbs will also be found in Bohn's "Handbook of Proverbs," 1867, pages 197-225. See also "Sprichwörter der germanischen und romanischen Sprachen," by Rheinsburg-Duringsfeld (1872-75).—W. P.

PROVERBS.—Consult Archbishop R. C. Trench's "On the Lessons in Proverbs: Five Lectures," 1853, and "The Handbook of Proverbs" in Bohn's Antiquarian Library, 1840.—A. R. B.

GENERAL

"PARIS VAUT BIEN UNE MESSE."—Henry of Navarre—less conscientious than our James II., who lost three kingdoms for a mass—said "Paris is well worth a mass." Never a bigoted Huguenot, Henry IV. of France abjured the Protestant faith, and was solemnly received into the bosom of Holy Church on July 23, 1593, by the Archbishop of Bourges in the Abbey Church of St. Denis.—A. R. B.

[Replies also received from H. P. Humphry, A. H. W. F. (Cambridge), and Harmatopogon.]

"PANATONE" is not "prepared for Christmas only," at any rate in the Italian Lake district. It is a simple kind of currant loaf, and is eaten all the year round. Its derivation is from the Latin panis, through the Low-Latin, panetarius or panatarius (baker), and is akin to Italian, panatillo (a little loaf).—Harmatopogon.

"MALBROUK."—M. Forné, who says that this name, as applied to a kind of ape, "has completely disappeared from the French language, if it were ever in use," and "is quite unknown to-day," will find, in the "Nouveau Dictionnaire Encyclopédique" of Jules Troussot (Vol. III., s.e. "Guenon") the following:—Le genre guenon, dont le nom scientifique est ceropitheque, comprend une trentaine d'espèces, dont les principales sont: le talapoin, la mone, l'ascagne, le monstac, le grivet, le callitriche, le vervet, le malbrouk et le patas. Surely the loose general statement (it seems to be no more) of Cuvier's note on Pliny (H.N. VIII., 21, 30) cannot be the sole justification for this specific application of the name? But what did Cuvier say?—B. M. G.

PRIDGEE AND GENEALOGY.—References to all three surnames—"Dawkins," "Eyre" and "Plumptree"—will be found in "The Genealogist's Guide," by Dr. George W. Marshall (Rouge Croix), of which there has recently been a new edition.—A. R. B.

NOTE.—Further replies referring to "Mardy," "Maudy," and to the "Lives of the Saints" have been received from A. L. G. (Leek) and C. B. (Bristol). Also several inquiries which are inadmissible.

PRIZES.—The asterisks denote the two questions and two answers to which prizes have been awarded. The winners can obtain, on application at the following booksellers, Five Shillings' worth of books. Notices have been despatched to the several winners and to the four booksellers whose names follow:—

Young's Library, 36 Kensington High Street, W.
John Lawrence, 466 Great Western Road, Hillhead, Glasgow.
Edward North, 30 Church Road, Hove, Brighton.
Bray & Co., 48 St. Peter's Street, Derby.

The Far East—Books to Read Now

JAPAN AND CHINA.

By Captain F. BRINKLEY,

For many years Special Correspondent of The Times at Tokyo.

PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED.

Only a limited edition available for the United Kingdom, viz. :—500 Library Edition in 12 vols., at 14s. net per volume, and 35 Édition de Luxe at 42s. net per volume.

Ten Volumes now ready.

"Enormously in advance of all existing literature on the subject."—The Athenæum.
"Promises to be the standard work on the subject for a long time to come."—The Times.

DETAILED PROSPECTUS ON APPLICATION.

London: T. C. & E. C. JACK, 34, Henrietta St., W.C.; and Edinburgh.

SPECIAL WAR EDITIONS.

THE STORY OF JAPAN.

By DAVID MURRAY, Ph.D., LL.D. Late Adviser to the Japanese Minister of Education.

With 34 Illustrations and a Map. Story of the Nations. 5s.

THE STORY OF RUSSIA.

By W. R. MORFILL, M.A. Reader in Russian and other Slavonic Languages.

With 60 Illustrations including Maps. Story of the Nations. 5s.

London: T. FISHER UNWIN, London, E.C.

THE BOOK OF THE HOUR.

THE PATH OF EMPIRE.

By GEORGE LYNCH.

Up-to-date on Questions Russian, Japanese, Korean, Manchurian. 90 Illustrations and a Map. Large demy 8vo, 10s. net.

"No one has given so admirable a picture of Russian activity."—Athenæum.
"Absolutely necessary for the understanding of the Far Eastern question."—Daily Mail.

"Just at this moment the very highest interest belongs to the new book by Mr. George Lynch."—Vanity Fair.

FEUDAL AND MODERN JAPAN. By ARTHUR MAY KNAPP. Two vols., with 24 Photogravure Illustrations of Japanese life, landscape, and architecture. Small fcap. 8vo, 4-bound, white cloth, blue sides, gilt top. 8s. net.

DUCKWORTH & Co., 3, Henrietta Street, W.C.

An English Traveller on Russian Administration in the Far East.

IN THE UTTERMOST EAST.

By CHARLES H. HAWES.

With upwards of 70 Illustrations and 3 specially-prepared Maps, pages xxx and 478. Demy 8vo, 16s.

HARPER & BROTHERS, 45, Albemarle Street, London, W.

ASIA and EUROPE.

Studies presenting the conclusions formed by the Author in a long life devoted to the subject of the relations between Asia and Europe.

By MEREDITH TOWNSEND.

New and Cheaper Edition with an additional chapter. Crown 8vo. Price 5s. net.

A. CONSTABLE & Co., Ltd., WESTMINSTER.

JAPAN. JAPAN. JAPAN.

FAIRY TALES FROM FAR JAPAN. Translated by Miss BALLARD, of St. Hilda's Mission, Tokio. With a Prefatory Note by Mrs. ISABELLA L. BISHOP, F.R.G.S. Illustrated by 47 Engravings from Japanese originals. Fcap. 4to, 2s. 6d., cloth gilt.

STORIES ABOUT JAPAN. By ANNIE R. BUTLER. With 12 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 1s., cloth gilt.

RAMBLES IN JAPAN: the Land of the Rising Sun. By the Rev. Canon TRISTRAM, D.D., LL.D. With 45 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, gilt top, 10s. 6d., cloth gilt.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, 4, BOUVERIE STREET, E.C.

THE EXPANSION OF RUSSIA, 1815-1900.

By F. H. SKRINE, F.S.S., H.M.'s Indian Civil Service (retired). Crown 8vo. With 3 Maps. 6s. (Cambridge Historical Series.)

Pall Mall Gazette.—"The best account yet printed in England of the growth of Russia during the last century. . . . This book will not only be useful to the general reader, but it forms a handy reference-book which any student of the Eastern Question will be glad to have within easy reach."

LONDON:

C. J. CLAY & SONS, Cambridge University Press Warehouse, Ave Maria Lane.

JUST PUBLISHED.

NEW MAP OF KOREA. By ANGUS HAMILTON, F.R.G.S. Scale, 25 miles to an inch. Hills graphically shown by means of colour shading, and existing, partly constructed, and proposed railways clearly distinguished. Size, 20 in. by 29 in. Prices:—Coloured sheet, 5s.; mounted to fold in case, 8s.; on board, flat, 7s. 6d.

JUST PUBLISHED.

MAP OF PART OF TIBET, including SIKKIM, the CHUMBI VALLEY and BHUTAN, showing the Routes between DARJILING and LHASA. Size, 34 in. by 27 in. Scale, 8 miles to an inch. Prices:—Coloured sheet, 5s.; mounted in case, 8s.; on board, flat, 9s. List of the best Books and Maps bearing upon the Far Eastern Crisis and other Eastern Questions post free on application.

London: EDWARD STANFORD, 12, 13, & 14, Long Acre, W.C.
Geographer to His Majesty the King.

INDIA IMPRESSIONS.

By C. F. KEARY.

"If anyone wishes to read a distinguished piece of writing, which pleases the artistic sense, places the India of the Indians before him in an unhackneyed style, contains some practical words and many details, yet also the mystery and glamour of the East, let him take up this modest booklet."
—Bookman.

Letters from Jehn Chinaman

SIXTH THOUSAND.

"A very remarkable and exceptionally able book."
—Pall Mall Gazette.

1s. net. R. BRIMLEY JOHNSON, Adam St., Strand. 1s. net.

THREE WORKS BY Mrs. BISHOP (ISABELLA L. BIRD).

UNBEATEN TRACKS IN JAPAN.

Illustrations, Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

KOREA AND HER NEIGHBOURS.

With Maps and numerous Illustrations from the Author's Photographs. 2 Vols., Crown 8vo, 24s.

THE YANG-TSE VALLEY AND BEYOND.

An Account of Journeys in Central and Western China. With Map and Illustrations, 8vo, 21s. net.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

THE GIST OF JAPAN:

The Islands and their People. By R. B. PERCY, A.M., Ph.D. With 8 full-page Illustrations, 6s.
Athenæum.—"By far the most authoritative statement on the subject that we have met with."

A CYCLE OF CATHAY:

Or, China, South and North. With Personal Reminiscences. By W. A. P. MARTIN, D.D., LL.D., Imperial Tung-wen College, Peking. With Map and numerous Illustrations, 7s. 6d.
Times.—"It is, indeed, perhaps THE MOST VALUABLE CONTRIBUTION that has been made to our knowledge of China in recent years."

OLIPHANT, ANDERSON & FERRIER, 21, PATERNOSTER SQUARE, E.C.

QUEER THINGS ABOUT JAPAN.

By DOUGLAS SLADEN.

Forty pages coloured and uncoloured illustrations by the famous Japanese artist HOKUSAI.

Declared by the whole press to be the most amusing picture of Japan ever penned.

21s. net; in special Japanese binding, 25s. net.

OUT IN CHINA. By Mrs. ARCHIBALD LITTLE. 1s.

ANTHONY TREHERNE & Co., Ltd., 3, Agar St., London, W.C.

The Far East—Books to Read Now—

Continued from previous page.

RUSSIA,
JAPAN,
AND KOREA.

KOREA.

By ANGUS HAMILTON.

Profusely Illustrated from Photographs by the Author. 1 Vol. 15s. net.

* Mr. Hamilton, who was the special correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette in the Far East, examines in this important and timely work the political and economic conditions of the kingdom. There are chapters on the possibilities of the commercial development of the country, on the manners and customs and laws of the people, and, as a whole, the book may be considered to contain the latest and most authentic information upon the Russo-Japanese dispute.

London: WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

ENGLAND
AND TIBET.

IN THE FORBIDDEN LAND.

By A. HENRY SAVAGE LANDOR.

With a Map and 250 Illustrations. Cheaper Edition, 7s. 6d. net.

"A valuable storehouse of information on Southern Tibet and its people."—Daily Chronicle.

London: WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

THE BOOK OF THE MOMENT.

JAPANESE PHYSICAL TRAINING.

The System of Exercise, Diet, and General Mode of Living that has made the Mikado's People the Healthiest, Strongest, and Happiest Men and Women in the World.

By H. IRVING HANCOCK.

Fully Illustrated, crown 8vo, cloth extra, 5s. net.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS,
24, Bedford Street, Strand, London; and New York.

RUSSIAN SELF-TAUGHT

(Marlborough's Self-Taught Series).

By C. A. THIMM, F.R.G.S.

EDITED BY J. MARSHALL, M.A., OANTAB.

Contains Travel Talk, Conversations of Daily Life in the Home, Street, Railway, Steamboat. For Cyclists, Photographers, Fishing and Shooting, etc., Naval, Military, Commercial and Trading Terms. So arranged that they may be learned AT A GLANCE. A simplified Grammar is included, and the ENGLISH Phonetic PRONUNCIATION is given throughout.

Crown 8vo, Blue Wrapper, 2s. Red Cloth, 2s. 6d.

"A noticeable feature is the simple manner in which the difficult and intricate grammar is explained. Useful to officers of both Services."—United Service Gazette

London: E. MARLBOROUGH & Co., 51, Old Bailey, E.C.

The Clergy List

FOR 1904 PRICE 12s. 6d. NOW READY.
Thoroughly Revised

AND
Corrected to the Latest Date.

Contains the Gross and Net Value of every Benefice: it also gives a complete Record of Past and Present Appointments, the College, University, and, where necessary, the Private Address of every Clergyman in England, Ireland, and Scotland in One List. Under the List of Benefices will be found full information as to the Value of every Living, Clergy engaged therein, Patron, Population, nearest Post Town and Railway Station.

Over 600 pages have been added during the last few years, and the book now contains upwards of 1,800 pages.

Established over 60 Years.

London: KELLY'S DIRECTORIES, Ltd., 182-184 High Holborn.

IMAGINARY CONVERSATIONS OF THREE WHITE-LETTER DAYS
IN THE ANGLO-SAXON CLOISTERS.

Half-a-Crown. By J. WOOD. Half-a-Crown.

London: THE LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street, E.C.

AN IMPORTANT BOOK TO READ.

In 2 vols. royal 8vo, 420 Illustrations, 8 Coloured.

Price TWO GUINEAS net.

CENTRAL ASIA AND TIBET

Towards the Holy City of Lassa.

By SVEN HEDIN,

Author of "Through Asia," &c.

HURST & BLACKETT, Limited, 13, Great Marlborough Street, W.

Nearly Ready.

A NEW AND COMPLETELY REVISED EDITION OF

The Imperial Russian Navy :

ITS PAST, PRESENT, AND FUTURE.

By FRED. T. JANE,

Author of "All the World's Fighting Ships" (Naval Annual).

With over 150 Illustrations from Sketches and Drawings by the Author and from Photographs. Royal 8vo, cloth extra, 25s. net.

W. THACKER & Co., 2, Creed Lane, E.C.

MY JAPANESE WIFE.

(A Japanese Idyll.)

By CLIVE HOLLAND.

Twelve Editions of this book have already been printed, and the thirteenth is nearly out of print. Or. 8vo, with Coloured Frontispiece, price 3s. 6d.

LORD CURZON IN INDIA.

By H. O. LIPSETT. With Portraits.

A Sketch of his Career, with Chapters on the new Frontier Provinces, Famine Administration, &c.

"We have never," a Hindu Prince has said of him, "had a Viceroy so anxious to learn the real wishes of the children of the soil, so scrupulous in giving a patient hearing to their grievances, so full of schemes for the development of the resources of the Empire."—Morning Post.

London: R. A. EVERETT & Co., Ltd., 42, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

THE NEW MAGAZINE

THAT'S COMING!

No. 1.

Feb. 12th.

No. 1.

Feb. 12th.

6d.

Monthly.

6d.

Monthly.

"THE RAPID REVIEW" WILL TELL YOU EVERY-THING ABOUT THE
Politics, Thought, Music, Art, Literature, Science, Magazines, and Industries of the World.

A Complete Up-to-Date History of Current Events.

ILLUSTRATED WITH PICTURES, PORTRAITS, AND CARTOONS.

Digitized by Google

"THE TIMES" LITERARY SUPPLEMENT.

A Special Literary Supplement is published with The Times on Friday. This Supplement is an impartial and authoritative organ of literary criticism and a comprehensive and trustworthy medium of literary intelligence.

It can be had with The Times of Friday alone.

Subscriptions, inclusive of postage, for The Times of Friday:—

	3 Months.	6 Months.	12 Months.
Inland ...	3s. 3d.	6s. 6d.	13s. 0d.
Foreign...	4s. 4d.	8s. 8d.	17s. 4d.

CONTENTS OF FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1904.

LITERATURE.

Elizabeth Barrett Browning.
Nero.
The Convict Settlement of Sakhalin.
Voltaire.
Babylon.
American Literature.
The first Lord Seaton—The Prevention of Consumption—Toryism.

FICTION.

Stella Fregelios.
The Island Pharisees.
Kitty Costello.
The Masterfolk.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Dynasts: A Rejoinder (Mr. THOMAS HARDY).
Montaigne's Travels (Prof. SAINTS-BURY).

ART.

Old Masters at Burlington House (concluding Article).

DRAMA.

The Philanthropists.

"THE TIMES" LITERARY SUPPLEMENT is also sold with the Mail, or "THE TIMES" WEEKLY EDITION, upon payment of an additional penny.

Address THE PUBLISHER, The Times, Printing House Square, London, E.C.

H. WELTER,

French and Foreign Bookseller, Publisher, and Dealer in Secondhand Books,

4 RUE BERNARD-PALISSY, 4, PARIS.

Department for the Export of French Publications, founded 1882.

I have much pleasure in drawing your attention to some of my Publications which ought to be found in all University, Public, and Reference Libraries in England and America, viz.:—

Mansi's Collectio Conciliorum. (50 vols. in folio.) 39 vols. are now out, which cost, bound, 3,000 fr., net 2,400 fr.

Asselman's Codex Liturgicus. 13 vols. in quarto, bound. Price 626 fr., net 550 fr.

Histoire Littéraire de la France: being the Great History of French Literature begun in the Eighteenth Century by the Benedictine Monks, continued by the French Academy. 32 vols. in quarto. Price 1,225 fr., net 750 fr.

Recueil des Historiens des Gaules et de la France: being what the Pertz's Monumenta Germaniae Historica are for Germany. 23 vols. in folio. Price 1,550 fr., net 750 fr.

Gallia Christiana: similarly begun by the Benedictine Monks in the Eighteenth Century, and completed by the Members of the French Academy. 16 vols. in folio. Price 1,112 fr. 50 c., net 750 fr.

Revue des Questions Historiques, from the Origin in 1866 to 1888, added to my Catalogue from the Publications of M. Victor Palmé. 46 vols. 8vo. Price 460 fr., net 200 fr.

Graesse's Trésor des Livres Rares et Précieux: Reprint of this valuable and rare work. 8 vols. in quarto. Price 352 fr. 50 c., net 175 fr.

and the forthcoming Reprints in facsimile of Nagler's Künstlerlexikon: Universal Dictionary of Artists. 22 vols. 8vo. Price 250 fr. and of Panzer's Annales Typographici. 11 vols. in quarto. Price 250 fr.

For all of which I shall be glad to receive your orders, within two months, at these greatly reduced prices.

Just Published.

BIBLIOGRAPHIE FRANÇAISE.

Edited by H. WELTER, Bookseller.
VOLUME 1. NUMBER 1.

Monthly Review of all the new publications in French language, published during the past month in France, Belgium, Switzerland, Canada, &c., giving full titles, sizes, names of publishers and prices, as well as also a list of articles and papers issued in all the leading French magazines and reviews.

Subscription Price for the complete volume of twelve monthly numbers, sent post-free, 2s. 10d.

This new French Bibliography will be published regularly the 10th of each month and distributed by post in 11,000 COPIES.

6,960 copies addressed to all Libraries, Laboratories, Institutions, Museums, &c., of the whole world.

4,040 copies addressed to private customers, amateurs and collectors, and to a number of important booksellers all round the world.

Beginning with No. 2 (issued February 10), we intend also to publish regularly every month a Supplement of 16 pages with Publishers' Advertisements. We beg to in it herewith English publishers to advertise in this Supplement.

THERE IS NO OTHER KIND OF MAGAZINE OR TRADE PAPER giving them the guarantee of such a large and extensive distribution to exclusively libraries or people interested in books as the above Supplement, at the same time allowing them to make known their publications to all the learned professions of the whole world.

The prices for Advertisements will be: One full-page, 8vo size, 2s.

Publishers who intend to join and to advertise are requested to communicate with us, and to send their manuscripts not later than the 1st of each month.

Yours truly, H. WELTER, Publisher.

PARIS: 4 Rue Bernard-Palissy, 4.

ELLIOT STOCK'S

New and Recent Publications.

SECOND EDITION, REVISED. In crown 8vo, tastefully printed in old-faced type. 6s. net.

MANX NAMES; or the Surnames AND PLACE NAMES OF THE ISLE OF MAN. By A. W. MOORE, C.V.O., M.A., Speaker of the House of Keys. With a Preface by Professor R.Y.S.

"Mr. Moore has done, and done well, a kind of work which is, so far as we know, unique in its class."—Notes and Queries.

"The pages teem with matter that is suggestive and interesting to the student of archaeology and anthropology."—Antiquary.

In demy 8vo, handsomely bound and illustrated, price 6s. net.

BYGONE LONDON LIFE: PICTURES FROM A VANISHED PAST. By G. L. APPERSON, I.S.O., Author of "An Idler's Calendar." With many Illustrations.

"The book is fascinating from the first page to the last. The antiquarian, no less than the general reader, will find it all that he could desire."—Sunday Sun.

"A series of sketches and portraits which will afford genuine instruction to the student of London."—Daily Graphic.

SECOND AND REVISED EDITION.

Tastefully printed in crown 8vo, on antique paper, and bound in cloth, price 4s. 6d.

HOW TO DECIPHER AND STUDY OLD DOCUMENTS. Being an Illustrated Guide to the understanding of Ancient Deeds. By E. E. THOYTS. With an Introduction by C. TRICE MARTIN, Esq., of the Public Record Office. Illustrated with Facsimiles of Old Deeds and Specimens of Handwritings of Different Periods.

"For the young student it is probably the most serviceable work in existence. The book, for its purpose, is entitled to high praise."—Notes and Queries.

CHEAP AND REVISED EDITION.

In large crown 8vo, handsomely bound in cloth, and fully illustrated, price 7s. 6d. net.

SWEET HAMPSTEAD AND ITS ASSOCIATIONS. By Mrs. CAROLINE WHITE. With numerous Illustrations of Eminent Persons, Historic Houses, and Picturesque Localities.

"Hampstead is extraordinarily rich in literary associations, which Mrs. White chronicles with a charm of style born of true enthusiasm."—Outlook.

In demy 8vo, handsomely printed and bound, price 7s. 6d. net.

PROVERB LORE. A Manual dealing with the History, Literature, Associations, and Significance of Proverbs in all Countries and Climes. By F. EDWARD HOLME, F.L.S., F.S.A., Author of "Mythland," "Wayside Sketches," "Natural History Lore and Legends."

"A remarkably interesting study."—Sunday Sun.

"Mr. Holme's book is the work of an enthusiast and of a well-informed enthusiast, and none can dip into his pages without annexing something—amusing or instructive."—Glasgow Herald.

CHEAP EDITION. In demy 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, 5s.

A POPULAR HISTORY OF THE ANCIENT BRITONS; or, THE WELSH PEOPLE. From the Earliest Times to the end of the Nineteenth Century. By Rev. J. EVANS, B.A.

"Convenient for special study, or for reference by readers particularly interested in the Principality, carefully studied and instructive."—Scotsman.

NOW READY, CHEAP EDITION.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, price 2s.

ALFRED THE GREAT. A CHROVICLE PLAY IN SIX SCENES. By W. H. PINDER.

"The action of the play is brisk and pleasantly stimulating."—Western Times (Exeter).

"Its literary qualities make it more than worthy of perusal, and its dramatic possibilities may be found deserving of attention by those who are desirous of presenting something novel."—Kentish Post (Exeter).

NEW VOLUME OF VERSE.

In crown 8vo, cloth, bevelled boards, gilt lettered, price 2s. 6d.

AFRICAN ITEMS: A VOLUME OF VERSE. By PERCIVAL GIBBON.

"The book is full of vigour."—British Weekly.

"Will, no doubt, rank high in the poetry of the year."—Western Mail.

ELLIOT STOCK,

62, PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

CASSELL & Co.'s ANNOUNCEMENTS.

NEW NOVELS READY DURING FEBRUARY.

Now Ready. Price 6s.

Red Morn.

By MAX PEMBERTON.

"We do not think Max Pemberton has ever produced a brighter, breezier story than 'Red Morn,' which is full of healthy, legitimate excitement."—Daily Mail.

Angels and Devils and Man.

By WINIFRED GRAHAM.

6s.

(Feb. 8.)

Tomorrow's Tangle.

By GERALDINE BONNER.

6s.

(Feb. 15.)

The Despoilers.

By EDMUND MITCHELL.

6s.

(Feb. 22.)

MANCHURIA AND THE FAR EAST.

Popular Edition. Now Ready, price 3s. 6d.

The Real Siberia.

Together with an Account of a Dash Through Manchuria. By JOHN FOSTER FRASER. With Numerous Illustrations. Eleventh Impression.

NOW READY. Complete in Two Vols., 21s.

Cassell's Illustrated History of the Boer War.

With upwards of 500 Illustrations from Photographs and Original Drawings.

"The fighting side of the campaign is very successfully handled for the requirements of a stirring and picturesque narrative. For a compendious and popular book on the subject this guinea work in two volumes, with its 500 illustrations, is not likely to be eclipsed."—Pall Mall Gazette.

NOW READY. Price 5s.

The "Death or Glory Boys."

The Story of the 17th Lancers. By D. H. FARRY. New Edition. Greatly Enlarged. With 8 Illustrations.

"The book is one that no English patriot can afford to miss."—World.

NOW READY. Price 3s. 6d.

The Black Watch.

The Record of an Historic Regiment. By ARCHIBALD FORBES, LL.D. New Edition. With 8 Illustrations.

"It is a living, vivid page from the History of our time."—Daily News.

CASSELL and COMPANY, Limited, London.
And all Booksellers.

MESSRS.

CONSTABLE'S NEW LIST.

LORD WOLSELEY'S BOOK.

THE STORY OF A SOLDIER'S LIFE.

SECOND EDITION. 2 vols., 32s. net.

THE CHURCH OF ST. MARY THE VIRGIN, OXFORD,

In its Relation to some Famous Events of English History.

By the Rev. HENRY L. THOMPSON, M.A.

Crown 8vo. With Frontispiece, 8s. 6d. net.

STUDIES IN SHAKESPEARE.

By J. OUBERTON COLLINS,

Author of "Ephemera Critica," &c.

Extra crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

SHORTER ELIZABETHAN POEMS.

Edited by A. H. BULLEN.

New Volume in the Revised Edition of AN ENGLISH
GARNER. 4s. net.

CANADA IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY.

By A. G. BRADLEY,

Author of "Wolfe" and "The Fight with France for North America."

Demy 8vo, Illustrated, 18s. net.

"A study of Canada done by an impartial hand was greatly needed and it has been done at last and well done. It is because Mr. Bradley knows completely that he writes completely, that his judgments are weighty. . . . Solid, informing and genuine, every page exhibits a wide knowledge of Canada. . . . Here is a reliable compendium, an illuminating study, written by a distinguished historical student in a distinguished manner and worthy of wide circulation."—Sir Gilbert Parker in the London Academy.

NEW 6s. FICTION.

JEWEL. A Chapter in her Life.

By CLARA LOUISE BURNHAM,

Author of "A Right Princess," &c.

MISS ELEANOR HAYDEN'S NEW BOOK.

TURNPIKE TRAVELLERS.

The Morning Post says: "A delightful and amusing book, full of close and intelligent observation, and never wanting in humour or pathos. It is very seldom you come across such delightful reading as is contained in 'Turnpike Travellers.'"

The Times says: "Another delightful volume, descriptive and narrative, from the same pen which gave us 'Travels Round our Village' and 'From a Thatched Cottage,' showing the same intimate sympathy and knowledge of the ways, the thoughts, and the speech of the English peasant."

MY POOR RELATIONS.

Stories of Dutch Peasant Life.

By MAARTEN MAARTENS.

Punch says: "The title reflects the humanity which shines from every page of the book."

The Daily News says: "These stories should be bought, read, and read again."

BOOKS FOR THE LIBRARY.

THE LOG OF A COWBOY. Rancho Life in the Far West. By ANDY ADAMS. Illustrated by E. Boyd-Smith. Second Edition, crown 8vo, 6s.

OLD CAPE COLONY. A Chronicle of her Men and Houses. By Mrs. A. P. TROTTER. With 100 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.

BY THAMES AND OTSWORD. By the Rev. W. H. HUTTON, D.D. With about 100 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

CANADA IN THE 20th CENTURY. By A. G. BRADLEY, Author of "Wolfe" and "The Fight with France for North America." Demy 8vo, Illustrated, 18s. net.

A. CONSTABLE & Co., Limited, Westminster.

SMITH, ELDER & Co.'s PUBLICATIONS.

A POPULAR BOOK AT A POPULAR PRICE.

Messrs. SMITH, ELDER & Co. have pleasure in announcing the publication of a

SIX-SHILLING EDITION

OF

Mr. SIDNEY LEE'S LIFE OF QUEEN VICTORIA.

When the Original Half-Guinea Edition was published some twelve months since, the "QUARTERLY REVIEW" expressed the opinion generally entertained of the Volume as follows:—

"Mr. Sidney Lee has performed, with marked success, a work which required, in no common measure, a combination of assiduous labour, skilful arrangement, and unflinching tact. . . . Our interest is sustained from the first page to the last; and, what is much more important, the book has that weight and authority which make it a fair basis for forming an estimate of the influence, political and constitutional, of Queen Victoria's personality upon her country and her age, and of the general results of the reign."

QUEEN VICTORIA: a Biography.

By SIDNEY LEE, Editor of the "Dictionary of National Biography." NEW EDITION. With Portraits, Map, and Facsimile Letter. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A RECORD OF TRAVEL IN THE APENNINES.

JUST PUBLISHED, with 36 Illustrations from Photographs and a Coloured Map. 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

HILL TOWNS OF ITALY.

By EGERTON R. WILLIAMS.

SCOTSMAN.—"A very pleasant and readable narrative."

COLLECTIONS AND RECOLLECTIONS.

By GEORGE J. W. E. RUSSELL.

TENTH IMPRESSION (SEVENTH EDITION). With a New Preface. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"It is needless to recommend to our readers a book so full of entertaining anecdote and lively reminiscence."

LEGAL T LEAVES.

By EDWARD F. TURNER,

Author of "T Leaves," "Tantler's Sister," "More T Leaves," &c. Crown 8vo, 5s.

WORLD.—"Will be found an equally agreeable companion by lawyers and laymen."

BRITISH WEEKLY.—"Exceedingly clever and amusing, and written from intimate personal knowledge."

THE CORNHILL MAGAZINE

For FEBRUARY. Price One Shilling.

CONTENTS:

THE TRUANTS.—Chaps. 4-8. By A. E. W. MASON.

SOME EMPTY CHAIRS.—By HENRY W. LUCY.

MACEDONIA—AND AFTER? By Mrs. FREDERIC HARRISON.

A GRANDMOTHER'S BUDGET. By Mrs. FREDERIC HARRISON.

HISTORICAL MYSTERIES.—II. The Campden Mystery. By ANDREW LANG.

AMONG JAPANESE HILLS. By ERNEST FOXWELL.

THE WELSH IN LONDON. By J. E. VINCENT.

HAN AND KAWAN. By LAURENCE HOUSMAN.

THE MOTION OF THE SOLAR SYSTEM THROUGH SPACE. By FRANK WATSON DYSON, F.R.S.

THE IMPROVEMENT OF WESTMINSTER. By THOMAS FAIRMAN ORDISH, F.R.S.

THEODOR MOMMSEN. By Prof. TOIT.

PROVINCIAL LETTERS. XIV. From Beaconsfield. By URBANUS SYLVAN.

THE VISITS OF AN EDITOR. By LEONARD HUXLEY.

LONDON:

SMITH, ELDER & Co., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

The Academy and Literature

No. 1657. Established 1869. London: 6 February 1904

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17.6 a year.]

Literary Notes

THE CONTEMPORARY" gives an interesting article on "The Modern German Novel," by Count S. O. de Soissons, in which it is written "the strength of the modern German novel lies in the wise habit of the authors of writing about the people with whom they are in close contact in actual life." Does not that remark apply exactly to the stronger of our own writers of fiction to-day? For examples, to Mr. Conrad, Mr. Morrison, Mr. "Orme Agnus," Mr. Eden Phillpotts, and some few more? Novelists must always depend partly upon experiences and partly upon their imaginations for their characters, but are showing a fine tendency now to depend almost entirely upon their experiences for the scenery and setting of their stories. Realism in fiction has unfortunately come to bear an unsavoury meaning, otherwise I would say that we have a school of realists in fiction who have done good work already and bid fair to dominate our writers of novels in the years to come.

THOSE who study life, both writers and spectators, have deserted the theatre with which fiction is so serious a rival. Countless stories come from the press every year which have no bearing upon the problems and events of life; but there are many others for which we may be thankful, not all high works of art, but all serious essays toward a true picture of life as it has come beneath the observation of the writers. As is said in the article already quoted, "novels written in this way possess inward truth and not only its superficial appearance; they are true works of art."

"THE GREEN SHEAF" is a refreshing publication, as its name implies. Thirteen numbers are issued yearly, it is printed, and well printed, on antique paper, the literary contents are quaint and sometimes beautiful, but the chiefest charm lies in the hand-coloured prints, which are highly decorative, simple in treatment and of a pleasant old-world flavour. The number before me contains a surprise in the form of a reproduction of a pastel by Mr. W. B. Yeats—a pleasing surprise. Mr. Elkin Mathews publishes this acceptable sheaf of good things.

MESSRS. P. S. KING AND SON are issuing a catalogue of Parliamentary Papers, 1801-1900, with a few of earlier date, rightly believing that it will be of service to librarians and students. Parliamentary papers have always appealed to me, and surely to many others, as very often fascinating reading. It is not that their literary style is frequently of a high order of merit, but they present to us facts and not fancies, records and not rumours. And to the student of history, manners, economics, sociology, parliamentary publications are a gold mine of information of a character to be depended upon.

It may appear that this is an oft-told tale; it is; but a tale that has not had sufficient hearers as yet. These publications are too often looked upon as dry-as-dust, sometimes they are so, but not often; usually they are very much alive.

GLANCE, for instance, through the pages of this catalogue. I light upon the entry "Japan," and there find that in parliamentary papers of one kind and another, the political, social and economic history of the new Japan is written down for me. The same may be said of the numberless entries directly or indirectly applying to London of the last century; anyone setting about the writing of a history of that wonderful century of London's life will find abundant material here ready to his hand. There are two columns of entries under the heading "Copyright," dating from 1843 to 1900. What of parliamentary papers—possibly including a bill—concerning copyright will this year of grace provide for us?

M. EUGÈNE BRIEUX

[Photo. Gilbert & Co., Paris.]

MR. LAURENCE HOUSMAN hopes to have ready for publication this spring, by Mr. John Murray, a novel which deals with country life on a lonely part of the English coast at a date some thirty years back. The book is named after the heroine, "Sabrina Warham."

MR. THOMAS WRIGHT, whose life of Edward FitzGerald was reviewed in last week's ACADEMY, is engaged on a Life of Walter Pater, to form two volumes, and will be very glad to receive assistance from any who were privileged to know Mr. Pater.

AN effort is being made to complete the rebuilding of the church of Lower Brixham, Devon, which was commenced thirty years ago in memory of Henry Francis Lyte, its first vicar. £2,000 is still required to complete the work, and surely there should be no difficulty in collecting this sum from those who have found consolation in "Abide with Me," which was written by Lyte on the last evening he spent at Brixham. Donations should be sent to the Reverend Stewart Sim, The Vicarage, Lower Brixham, Devonshire, or per the Editor of THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, 9, East Harding Street, London, E.C.

WHILE it is impossible to agree with all the following passage quoted from an interesting article in "The Independent Review" on George Gissing, most of it can be accepted as true. "Gissing is usually called a realist and a pessimist. If idealism means the deliberate misrepresentation of life as being what the writer knows it not to be, Gissing is certainly no idealist: nor is he an optimist if those alone can claim that title who, through natural or acquired obliquity of vision, see the good always triumphing over evil. But if, having a firm conviction of what is noble and what is base, and holding fast a high conception of what human life might be, a writer with fine analysis, clear intuition, and undaunted fidelity paints the picture of life as he finds it, showing the true issues in the complex conflict of forces, he may at least claim the gratitude of those whom he has helped to a better understanding of themselves and their surroundings. This is what Gissing did; and London, above all, will remember him as her second great interpreter after Dickens. His works and Charles Booth's 'Enquiry' are our generation's contribution towards a fuller knowledge of the mysterious city: indeed, it is in the alembic of such brains as Gissing's that the 'subtler alchemy' is to be found which shall make the dead facts live."

THE destruction by fire on the 26th of last month of the Turin Library is an international loss; scholars will mourn the destruction of many valuable Latin MSS., including a palimpsest of Pliny's Natural History, and a splendid collection of Oriental MSS. As with the recent theatre fire in America, the disaster in Turin will probably raise doubts in many minds as to the safety of other public and private libraries. Books are not easy to burn, and if the buildings in which they are stored are reasonably fire-proof there need not be much risk. But are the buildings of, for examples, the British Museum, the Bodleian, and the Vatican reasonably fire-proof? Are due precautions taken against fire and proper provisions made for its rapid extinction if it should occur?

INDEED the Government would be doing good service if it were to appoint a properly qualified commission to enquire into the safety, as regards fire, of all our public collections and to report upon the most reasonable course to pursue to ensure such safety. Probably, however, no such necessary precautions will be taken until a disaster has taught us that all is not as it should be. Had we a Ministry of Fine Arts the safety of our national museums, libraries and art galleries would come within its scope, as well as many other matters of public import and value. But, then, as a nation we do not care to spend money upon art or letters.

MR. CHURTON COLLINS' letter in our last issue, concerning the Clough and Tennyson parallel, throws no new light upon the difficult question of plagiarism, though it does lighten the particular difficulty in question. In truth, it is not so much matter for wonder that apparent plagiarism should occur as that it does not occur more often. Considering the vast amount of literary matter that is more or less assimilated between the days when reading comes upon a child as a new delight and the arrival at years of literary discretion, or indiscretion, and bearing in mind the vast number of quotations that are current in ordinary conversation, is it not unreasonable to expect that a writer should be able to avoid occasional repetition of phrases or ideas from the works of other authors? All that we have a right to blame is sustained, repeated borrowing of thoughts or sentences, or the unacknowledged pilfering of the results of other men's research. It speaks well for the honour of literary men that such blame is seldom called for.

IN response to the appeal made by the committee of the Max Müller Memorial Fund subscriptions have been received to the amount of £2,500. Professor Hubert von Herkomer, R.A., Honorary Fellow of All Souls' College, has, in addition to a contribution to the memorial fund, presented a portrait, painted by himself, of Professor Max Müller which has been hung in the hall of All Souls' College. Under these circumstances it was considered that there was no further need for a personal memorial and the funds raised will be applied, under a decree of Convocation, to the promotion of learning and research in all matters relating to the history and archaeology, the languages, literatures and religions of ancient India.

THE establishment of a Sociological Society in London, now announced, with the prospect of a Quarterly Journal, is to be welcomed on many grounds. It is part of an international movement tardy in reaching this country. In an initial pamphlet descriptive of the project to form an English society, it is pointed out that "in the last decade of the nineteenth century there was a very considerable development of interests and studies specifically sociological. It was a time of growth characterised by the customary symptoms both of expansion of studies and of co-ordination of them—the establishment of chairs, lectureships and institutions; the multiplication of literature (much of it, to be sure, calling itself sociological with little justification), and the founding of sociological journals. . . . In Great Britain, almost alone of leading nations, sociology is to-day unrepresented by any special institution or periodical of scientific studies, and our Universities stand in conspicuous isolation, whether on the implicit assumption that sociological studies are adequately pursued under some other title, or that means and men are needed we need not for the moment enquire."

THE aims of the Sociological Society are scientific, educational and practical. The society seeks to promote investigation and to advance education in the social sciences in their various aspects and applications. It aims at affording a common ground on which workers from all fields and schools concerned with social phenomena may meet—geographer and naturalist, anthropologist and archaeologist, historian and economist, psychologist and moralist; as also physician and alienist, criminologist and jurist, hygienist and educationist, philanthropist and social reformer, politician and cleric.

AMONGST the executive committee of the new society are the names of E. W. Brabrook, C.B.; Dr. J. H. Bridges; Dr. C. M. Douglas, M.P.; Professor Geddes; Dr. A. C. Haddon, F.R.S.; Mr. L. T. Hobhouse; Dr. Scott Keltie; Mr. Benjamin Kidd; Mr. C. S. Loch; Mr. Graham Wallas and Mr. H. G. Wells. The gift of £1,000 by Mr. Martin White, to establish experimental courses in sociology in London, enables the University of London to take the lead in developing sociology as an academic study in this country. Extra-murally, however, two or three movements have been inaugurated. The first of these was in Edinburgh, which city, Dr. Charles Douglas remarked at the Sociological Conference in June last, "Professor Geddes has made a home of sociology." The other movement springs from the Social Education Committee of the Charity Organisation Society.

THE scheme of lectures under Mr. White's benefaction in London University began on Friday, February 5, with a course by Professor Geddes at the London School of Economics. Professor Geddes is also giving a course of ten lectures on General Sociology at the Caxton Hall, Westminster, in connection with the School of Sociology and Social Economics, the title assumed by the new organisation brought into existence this winter by the Social Education Committee of the Charity Organisation Society. On application to the Secretary of the Sociological Society, 5 Old Queen Street, Westminster, S.W., a pamphlet may be obtained, giving a detailed account of the origin, purpose, programme and constitution of the society, and a full report of the speeches at the conference.

STRONG support to views recently expressed in this journal is given in Mr. William Watson's article on "The State Discouragement of Literature" in "The Fortnightly," from which I quote some passages. The writer says: "To the vast majority of the people the most real and abiding glories of our country are virtually non-existent. To the vast majority of the people the very names of all but two or three, at most, of the supreme masters of our language—the two or three of world-wide acceptance and honour—are unknown. The phenomenon of so huge an illiteracy, at once too palpable to escape us and too familiar to surprise, is a remarkable one." And, "The country is hugely illiterate; the country is not incurably illiterate; the country needs a cure for its huge illiteracy." "Literature is, after all, the most usual gateway by which the whole house of knowledge is approached. Ignorance of it is apt to connote ignorance of much else, which every citizen might profitably know. Indifference to it is apt to connote indifference to most things that are momentous." "If foreign nations are anywhere outpacing us, they are outpacing us by dint of qualities which, in homely phrase, have less to do with the length of a man's legs than with the length of his head. To amplify the mental prospect of the multitude is to vivify their whole existence, with results favourable to effective citizenship and of good omen for the commonwealth. But ignorance of all the larger thoughts of the world will in the end weaken the stroke of the hammer and dull the edge of the blade."

MR. WATSON believes that the neglect of the State in the conferring of honours upon literary men has to some extent, at any rate, been the cause of the apathy with which the general public regards literature, but here I cannot agree with him. The general public does not admire fine art or fine music because honours have been showered upon artists and musicians, nor is the popularity of the theatre dependent upon the knighthoods conferred upon eminent actors. The root of the evil is far deeper than this, and the cure rests, I believe, with those responsible for the education of the people.

THERE are other interesting articles in this strikingly good number of "The Fortnightly": a sane appreciation of George Gissing by Mr. Arthur Waugh, a paper on Eugène Sue by Mr. Francis Gribble, and a poem which is mistakenly said to be unpublished before, by Edgar Allan Poe, with a note by Dr. Alfred Russell Wallace. Here are four of the sixteen lines:—

In a solemn night of summer, when my heart of gloom,
Blossomed up to greet the comer, like a rose in bloom,
All foreboding that distressed me, I forgot as joy caressed me,
Lying joy that caught and pressed me, in the arms of doom.

The lines ring something like Poe, but the evidence that they are his is wanting; in fact it is certain they are not from him. The poem was printed in a morning paper some years ago. Perhaps some of my correspondents can throw light further on the matter!

THE first number of "The Extensionist," the record of the Central Association of University Extension Students, is published this week, and contains much matter of interest to all concerned in the welfare of University Extension work. Included in the contents are the papers read at the inaugural meeting of the Association by Dr. R. D. Roberts, Dr. Emil Reich, Dr. J. Holland Rose and Major Martin Hume. "The Extensionist" is published at the office of the Association, 7 Pall Mall, London, S.W.

THE "Monthly Review" (Murray) contains an interesting article upon Mr. W. E. H. Lecky, by the Hon. Emily Lawless, from which a quotation will surely be forgiven: "His schoolboy life is said to have been a not particularly happy one. For games or sport he had at no time any affinity, and it is easy to understand that the rough ways of ordinary schoolboys would have been a small purgatory to a nature so inveterately gentle and sensitive as his must always have been. At college, on the other hand—where it may amuse his readers to know that his address was '13 Botany Bay'—he quickly contracted a number of friendships, nearly all of which remained an integral part of his life ever afterwards. Upon this account, and still more because it was there that his own great powers first revealed themselves, to himself no less than to others, this period of his life was evidently a thoroughly enjoyable one. He became a member of the Historical Society, whose coveted gold medal for oratory he obtained in the first year of his joining it. The effect produced upon that society by the sudden emergence of their tall, shy, and hitherto inveterately taciturn member, has been well described recently by one of his own contemporaries: 'He spoke, much as he spoke all through his life, with an extraordinary wealth of language, and a marvellous affluence of illustration. . . . And he spoke—one could see—with the strong conviction that he was saying what he believed to be right, and what he held to be true.' Such a success, Lord Ashbourne goes on to say, he had never known in the whole course of his long connection with the society."

"DICKENS AND HIS ILLUSTRATORS," an excellent brochure by Mr. F. G. Kitton (Dickens Fellowship Publications, No. 2, Second Edition, 2d.), calls to mind the often debated and very debatable point—whether readers do or do not appreciate illustrations in their favourite works of fiction. The truth seems to be that sometimes they are acceptable, sometimes not so. Who would wish away the original illustrations to "Pickwick" or "Vanity Fair"? They have established for ever the outward forms of the characters in those works. On the other hand, there must be not a few who prefer, say, Fielding and Miss Austen unillustrated; all of us have formed our own conceptions of the various characters, we all have our mental pictures of Sophia and Emma, and do not desire to have them tampered with. Nor do most of us appreciate the new views of old friends given us by the successors of Cruikshank and "Phiz."

An interesting collection might be made of passages from works of fiction, dealing with various aspects of the streets and life of London. The field is wide from which to glean—Fielding, Richardson, Scott, Beaconsfield, Thackeray, Dickens, Gissing, Morrison, Borrow—to name but some of the many. Well done, and well illustrated, such a book would be a delight to those of us who live in the fascination of London town.

"DICKENS AND THE DOVER ROAD" is the subject of a well-illustrated article by Mr. Walter Dexter in the February number of "Cassell's Magazine." How many places in our country owe the greater part of their interest to their connection with characters that never lived in the flesh.

Such local publications as "The Wimbledon and Merton Annual" can justly claim to possess more than merely local interest when they contain such excellent contributions as "Eagle House" by Mr. T. G. Jackson, R.A., "Nelson's Home at Merton" by Professor J. K. Laughton, and "King's College School" by Professor J. W. Hales. There are other interesting contributions and many appropriate illustrations. The annual is published by Messrs. Edwin Trim & Co., Wimbledon.

THAT very useful annual, "Hazell," is now more useful than ever, in that it possesses an index, which certainly renders it easier to find the exact detail of information sought for. One sometimes marvels how our grandsires kept in touch with the events of their days without "Hazell" or "Whitaker."

THE Anglo-Russian Literary Society announces some interesting lectures, notably the following: March 1, "Manchuria," by A. Hall-Hall; April 5, "Twenty-five Years in Russia," by W. Barnes Steveni; May 3, "A Servian Hero of the Olden Time," by Malcolm Burr; June 7, "The Pamirs," by Captain H. E. Raymond; and July 5, "A Russian Howard," by Mrs. S. Howe.

Bibliographical

Now that definite announcement is made of the imminent production at the Imperial of Mr. John Davidson's version of "Ruy Blas," we may expect that there will be demands on the part of many unlettered playgoers for those English translations of Hugo's drama which are already in existence. These are not so numerous as might have been supposed. In fact, I know of two only that are easily obtainable by the English reader. One of these was contributed by Mrs. Newton Crosland to the volume of "Dramatic Works of Victor Hugo" published by Messrs. Bell in 1887. This forms part of Bohn's Standard Library, and is, I presume, in print. The other version, also in verse, by W. D. S. Alexander, was published in 1890. "Ruy Blas," it may be as well to point out, does not figure in the "Select Poems and Tragedies by Victor Hugo" included in 1890 in the Minerva Library (Messrs. Ward and Lock). I presume, however, a version of it appears in the edition of Hugo's dramas, "fully translated" by I. G. Burnham, the publication of which began at Philadelphia in 1895. An adaptation of "Ruy Blas," in verse, by E. O'Rourke, is in Lacy's series of acting dramas, in which there is also a prose adaptation by Charles Webb. It will be remembered that Marchetti's opera of "Ruy Blas" was produced in England eighteen years ago, with an English libretto from the pen of Mr. W. Grist. There has been more than one travesty of "Ruy Blas." Hugo's own countryman, Hanotelle, burlesqued it in "Le Sixième Acte de Ruy Blas." In England we have had the "Ruy Blas Righted" of Robert Reece and the "Ruy Blas, or the Blasé Roué" of Fred Leslie, the actor.

I had occasion the other day to consult the two volumes which contain the Poems and Essays of William Caldwell Roscoe. These were issued in 1860, and excited much interest at the time among all students of the belles-lettres. So recently as 1891, Miss E. M. Roscoe re-issued her father's Poems, with a few hitherto unpublished additions; a very welcome volume it was. I wonder if a public could now be found for a re-issue of the Essays? I should like especially to see a reprint of the papers on Tennyson, Matthew Arnold, Browning, Samuel Rogers, Tom Moore, Gray, Crabbe, Defoe, Thackeray, the Brontës and Bulwer Lytton. There are comparatively few critical estimates extant of Rogers, Moore and Bulwer. As a young man I found Roscoe very stimulating, and I should think he would have the same effect upon the young readers of to-day. It will be observed that the Essays are now outside the radius of copyright.

Persons with plenty of leisure might do worse than devote a few hours to the verse published by Clough's colleague in the production of "Ambarvalia" (1849). Mr. Miles, in his appendix to an appendix in the tenth volume of "The Poets and the Poetry of the Century," gives that colleague's name as Burbidge; it was, of course, Burbidge. He makes mention of Burbidge's volume of "Poems Longer and Shorter" (1838). There was also a verse-volume by Burbidge called "Hours and Days" (1851)—a title which recalls that of Frederick Tennyson's "Days and Hours" (1854). Mr. Miles accords only a few lines to Burbidge, from whom nothing is quoted, though I think he ought to be represented, however slightly, in every anthology of nineteenth-century verse.

The advertisement of a volume on Matthew Arnold and his influence on his time suggests that that influence has been greater than is generally allowed. We have already had two books devoted to the subject: "Matthew Arnold: the Message and Meaning of a Life," by T. W. M. Lund (1888), and "Matthew Arnold and the Spirit of the Age" by Greenhough White (1898). There is also a section on Arnold in R. A. Watson's "Gospels of Yesterday" (1888). The short essays on the topic are, of course, numerous.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews

A Brilliant Historian

A HISTORY OF MODERN ENGLAND. By Herbert Paul. In five vols. Vols. I. and II. (Macmillan. 8s. 6d. net each vol.)

MR. PAUL regards our era of modernity as having begun about 1846. At that time the life of England was beginning to change in many ways. Although far from being established, "Free Trade" had been arranged for. Stage coaches were being displaced by railway trains. Inventors were about to become active and successful in a measure quite unprecedented. Reviving the best ideals of the Monarchy, Queen Victoria was restoring the State to self-respect. Also, Literature and the Church were waking. Was England really entering upon new courses? One feels that she was; yet it is not easy to define the notion. It is not the State that causes revolutionary enterprise in mechanical contrivances. Mechanical genius causes modifications, or revolutions, first in the fabric of society and then in the State by which society is sanctioned. Similarly, it is not to the State that a people ever owe the coming of an exemplary Sovereign. It is the rise of such a Sovereign that conditions the character of the State. Between Literature and Polity the relations are more obscure; but, even if we leave out of account the considerations discussed by Mr. Watson in the new number of the "Fortnightly Review," it is not easy to believe that Literature is influenced by Polity. Like Trade it has periods of decline; but these are independent of changes in the Constitution and the actions of Parliament.

Are we, then, to conclude that the neatness of Mr. Paul's beginning is more apparent than real? Is his choice arbitrary? It would be gratifying, in a way, to think so. A nation does not object to vicissitudes, which, indeed, are essential in a romantic or otherwise creditable history; but it likes the idea of continuity, the idea that there are centuries of unbroken tradition to its credit. Why not? The New Age, a phrase of which restless but ambitious mediocrities in all times are fond, expresses an aspiration which is either insincere or repulsive. To indifferent honest Philistines it is just as antipathetic as hymnology about the Green Hill Far Away and other chill or inhuman ideals. A quite new England would really mean the end of the old and the rise of another State with the same name. Patriots do not yearn to believe that this has happened. Mr. Paul, we imagine, is at one with them. He chose 1846 simply because, having to begin his history somewhere, that stage seemed better than any other. Wary persons may have observed that in hinting a doubt as to whether there was any breach of continuity in 1846 we have made no mention of what was achieved by the Anti-Corn-Law statesmen. There is no sophistry in the omission. The abolition of protective measures, or the institution of them, is exactly work of the sort to which Parliament is confined. It is not within the scope of this brief reflection. It is work of a kind that affects the life of the nation much less than in times of political strife we are apt to suppose. Let Mr. Paul himself bear witness. Concluding his masterly account of the Crimean War, he says: "Unprepared for a distant and offensive campaign as England was in 1854, the resources of the country proved more than equal to the trial. The real cause of the phenomenon is inherent in the British race." The partial repeal of Protection, over which the whole country had been previously excited for years, had nothing to do with the matter. It seems to be Race, rather than Legislation, that makes a State strong or weak.

Mr. Paul's remark just quoted is a good example of a remarkable power that glowingly distinguishes the first two volumes of his History. Often in a single sentence he sets forth some great truth to define which less gifted writers would need pages. "A State which does not make Education its business will," he says, "forfeit its business to States which do." Again, Lord Palmerston thought that the Pope should not be allowed to re-enter Rome until he had promised to govern in a Constitutional way. "But," Mr. Paul remarks, "a Constitutional Pope is almost as unthinkable as a Constitutional God." After a summary of Louis Napoleon's doings before he reached the throne of France, we read, "It is the way with saviours of society to begin by taking other men's lives, to proceed by taking other men's goods, and to reserve the deprivation of other men's liberties for the last." Mr. Paul, it will be perceived, is a wit; and his wit is of a kind that has become rare. He does not manufacture epigrams in the manner of those who overdeck their pages with witticisms as a woman may overdeck herself with diamonds. His wit is unforced, spontaneous, springing out of the garden of intellect as in due season flowers spring from the tilled earth. In short, Mr. Paul is a very remarkable man. His style, the simple and straightforward style which looks so easy and is so difficult to acquire, is admirably adapted to his subject and is almost wholly free from slips. Then, his scholarship is nothing less than amazing. The annals of England from 1846 to 1865 are before us in these volumes as vividly, and almost with as much minuteness of detail, as if what we have been reading were merely a first-class descriptive and exegetical account of yesterday's proceedings in Parliament.

W. EARL HODGSON.

"Precursors"

HILL TOWNS OF ITALY. By Egerton R. Williams. (Smith, Elder. 10s. 6d. net.)

IN his recent biography of W. W. Story, Mr. Henry James discoursed in suggestive fashion of the "Precursors," by which name he designated those Americans who were first to settle in Italy, drawn by intellectual or temperamental affinities, and who made the way easy for a later generation of confessed and self-condemned exiles. Those early enthusiasts, English as well as American, were possessed of a somewhat indiscriminate enjoyment foreign to our day—"Robert Browning and his illustrious wife burnt incense to Domenichino," observes Mr. James—and the freshness of their impressions made amends for lack of specialised and critical knowledge. "Hill Towns of Italy" may best be classified as a book which might have been written in the days of the Precursors, when foreign travel was in itself an adventure, and when the travellers yielded themselves with unabashed ardour to their experience. Perhaps Americans must always feel more keenly than others the impact of the ancient world which, to them, comes whole and sudden. Certainly Mr. Williams writes of his Italian wanderings with an exaltation and an awe which is somewhat out of date. His raptures are candid, not guiltless of exclamation marks; he cannot escape from the wonder of Italy's long-continued pageant of human life; most significant of all, he is not above quoting Byron at length.

It must not be supposed that "Hill Towns of Italy" consists merely of rhapsodies. The author has given no little study to his subject and has gone decidedly off the beaten track in his rambles across Etruria; his book would be a charming companion and guide for a summer spent in Tuscan and Umbrian towns. We read there not only of Perugia, Assisi and Siena, with their familiar treasures, but of such out-of-the-way eyries as Montefalco, which holds a few rare altar-pieces hidden away on its height.

On one occasion, indeed, Mr. Williams appears to have discovered an Etruscan city of his own, an almost needless achievement, since his delight in each newly-visited town is as intense as though it were newly discovered. In the course of the narrative we gain a fair amount of historical information concerning the past of the various cities, from the days of the Pelasgians to those of Victor Emmanuel, liberator of Italy. It must be confessed that some of Mr. Williams' historical generalisations are dangerously positive, considering that his studies do not appear to have been profound. His artistic appraisements are more to be trusted, though his taste evidently inclines towards the wistful tenderness of Perugino and his school, and his comments on Signorelli's "Last Judgment"—that amazing tragedy of naked souls—are painfully inadequate. In fact the entire chapter on Orvieto is unsatisfactory; the least adequate in the book. Perugia fares better at Mr. Williams' hands, and so does Siena, though the brief sketch of St. Catherine is unsympathetic to a degree, in marked contrast to the impassioned tribute to St. Francis, which takes up much of the space devoted to Assisi. After all, it would be impossible to indulge in minute historical or technical studies in the space which the author has allowed himself, and if he does not go deeply into such subjects, he is sensitively responsive to beauty alike of art and nature. His descriptions of those immemorial citadels holding guard above a country of vine and olive, riotous with the scarlet poppy, are full of the sense of colour, of the sense, too, of the shadows of the past. In the end the book leaves its reader little inclined to quarrel with its limitations, even with its absence of style, since that very lack contributes to its effect of spontaneity and sincerity. The illustrations add greatly to the charm of the volume.

DORA GREENWELL MCCHESENEY.

The Prologue-Play

THE SIN OF PRINCE ELADANE. A story of Early Britain told in Narrative, Dialogue, and Song. With an Introduction. By Oswald Crawford, C.M.G. (Chapman and Hall. 2s. 6d.)

So far as we know, this volume is unique in this respect—that it contains two differently-constructed versions of the same story. Both versions are in blank verse and in dramatic form; but, in the case of that which comes first, there are three acts, the first two of which are each introduced by a long prologue from the lips of a single speaker; while, in the case of the second version, there are four acts and no prologues, the particulars supplied by the aforesaid speaker being put into the mouths of certain of the dramatis personæ. In other words, the second version conforms to the ordinary rules of dramatic composition, while in the first the author makes such use of his prologuist as Shakespeare makes of his Chorus in "Henry V." Both versions, it should be explained, have been written for perusal, not for representation in a theatre. "The judgment of the reader," says Mr. Crawford in his introduction, "is invited as to which is the preferable form of a play intended for the reader only, and as to whether this prologue-form of drama is not a legitimate literary mode, having certain advantages over other ways of telling the same story." We may say at once that, for our part, we see nothing illegitimate in the use of the prologue as preliminary narrative, whether the play be for the study or for the stage. There are, of course, sticklers for the "classic" form of drama, in which everything must be told as well as done by the actors therein, without any assistance from outside. Our own sympathies and judgment, however, go with Mr. Crawford, who, it should be noted, is as far as possible from being a revolutionist in theatrical matters. On the contrary, he is on the side of the conventions. He argues, quite truly, that absolute realism is impossible on the boards, and that, moreover, when the real cab is presented side by side with the unreal lamp-post and curb-stone, the illusion is destroyed. The theatre being the home of artifice, everything in it should be artificial. That we take to be Mr. Crawford's main contention, though we dare say he would like the stage to get, like Caleb Plummer's toys, "as near to nature as it can for sixpence." Ibsen has shown us that it is possible so to contrive plays of modern and familiar life that they shall have the least possible measure of theatricality. With broad, romantic themes, such as that dealt with in "The Sin of Prince Eladane," the conditions are different and convention must be accepted. The reader, we have no hesitation in saying, is helped by Mr. Crawford's narrative prologues, which prepare him suitably for the dramatic action that follows. Very much the same principle has been adopted by Mr. Hardy in the construction of "The Dynasts," though with him the prologue usually takes the shape of a kind of choral dialogue.

LE DÉDALE. Pièce en cinq actes, en prose. Par Paul Hervieu. (Lemerre. 3 fr. 50 c.)

FRENCH novelists and dramatists are greatly attracted by the subject of divorce. Sometimes it is treated from a comic point of view, sometimes the novel or drama is a serious dissertation on the moral or legal aspect of the matter. It would not at first sight seem a subject that offered much variety of treatment. But so far as we are able to make out, the changes in the French divorce laws are so frequent that a middle-aged married woman in this play who tries to dissuade her daughter from seeking a divorce, describes the law as "une loi passagère qui n'existait pas encore lorsque je suis entrée en ménage avec lui [i.e., votre père], et qui n'existera peut-être déjà plus quand ton fils prendra femme." But despite the opportunity seemingly offered by such variations, most writers base their plots on the chances of reconciliation between the parties either just before or just after the proceedings in the Divorce Court. Hervieu treats the question from its most serious aspect—there is not a spark of wit or a touch of humour in the whole of the five acts—and endeavours to prove the futility of divorce where there is a child, because, he believes, a woman never entirely ceases to love the man who is the father of her child. It is not necessary to discuss here that particular view, but every thoughtful person feels that where there are children, divorce is nearly always undesirable. Yet with all its didactic intention, Hervieu's drama is little more than an ordinary "drame de passion." The persons who yield to their passions happen to have been divorced, and that is all. And the passion as portrayed by Hervieu lacks sincerity and inevitableness, it is of an ignoble kind, and not at all the "dæmonic power" of Turguéneff, "the fire which reck not if it burns comfortably on the hearth or destroys the whole house." With one exception, the nerves of all the persons in the play are the whole time strained to the uttermost, and from people in such an abnormal condition it is absurd to expect either sincerity or reasonableness.

Max de Pogis, the husband, is the guilty person, and Marianne, his wife, in her righteous anger insists on a divorce, which she obtains. Her mother, on religious and moral grounds, dislikes such proceedings, and frankly disapproves Marianne's second marriage with Guillaume de Breuil, auguring from it all sorts of evil. Max had before that married the lady who had been the cause of the rupture, but she died a year or two after; he had long repented the whole business, and now, a lonely widower, insisted on having his child with him half the year instead of the few weeks that had previously been arranged. To this Marianne feels bound to agree. The little boy goes to his father's country house, where he falls dangerously ill with diphtheria. The mother is sent for. The boy recovers, but not before over his sick bed love has once again sprung up in the hearts of the divorced husband and wife, and overcome by memories of the past, the woman yields, and so becomes the mistress of her quondam husband. It is indeed a labyrinth. Not of those who can bring themselves to carry on an intrigue, Marianne confesses all to Guillaume, at the same time stating her determination to live in retirement with her child, and never to see again either of the men who loves her. But Guillaume is fiercely jealous, and his one idea is to kill Max. In successfully accomplishing the deed, he compasses his own death. The last act shows the most invention, and is the most dramatic. Marianne's unconsciousness of what is going on almost before her own eyes, her solicitude being entirely for her little boy, who, she fears, has stayed out too late in the meadows, lends pathos and poetry to what might easily have been melodrama.

Whatever Hervieu writes is literature. Ideas, deep thought, artistic expression and style are never wanting. Yet "Le Dédale" with all its qualities leaves us cold; neither in its tragedy and pathos nor in its literary power does it equal "L'Énigme."

THE GREAT NORTH-WEST AND THE GREAT LAKE REGION OF NORTH AMERICA. By Paul Fountain. (Longmans. 10s. 6d. net.)

WRITTEN primarily no doubt for the naturalist and sportsman, the book has the enthusiasm, unusual observation, and personal method which makes it at once a human document: with nothing of commonplace, indeed much of it almost a romance, not weighed down with scientific data, but with all the evidences of accuracy which carry weight.

The author, who has spent years in the vastnesses of the world, finds himself doubting much of what is called science, and his manner is sometimes intentionally aggressive. And if of wildernesses and great forests the author's keen observation and robust thought are often in conflict with accepted ideas, with museum authorities, and with naturalists of the arm chair, it is more than likely that when dealing with the human family his microscope will require some tactful adjustment.

The strong personal point of view of the author is the more remarkable when it is realised that the book records the observations of a young man of twenty, but the author hastens to say that the impressions made, and made honestly, thirty-seven years ago when he was a mere boy are firmly adhered to now. He speaks boldly on many matters, more or less controversial, but on no subject with more vehemence than of the lonely Indian and of the Hudson Bay Company. He holds that the company, like the twelve Hebrew spies of old, raised up deliberately an evil report of a goodly land; that their policy was selfish, if not absolutely dishonest; that they strove to keep a thirtieth part of the earth's surface a private hunting ground and for their own profit; and that they did not pay the trappers a fair price, &c. And as to the Indian, brutal and savage when on the war path he may be, and it cannot be denied; but there was provocation. The Indian is affable, hospitable, and the solitary white may wander from one end of the land to the other and be far safer than in some of "your rascally cities." The Indian is not a brute, not a savage, only he does not want civilisation. The author asks what is the feeling of those men who for countless ages have roamed about the desert, at seeing their hunting grounds seized by land-grabbers; at being turned out neck and crop, commanded to live as the white man lives, to worship the Great Spirit as the white man does or does not, and in the end simply to be wiped out? The author makes no apology for what some may regard as mere squeamishness. "I look upon the wanton destruction of trees as a crime, as I do on the useless and unnecessary destruction of animal life. To me it is an abomination for man to consider the natural productions of the earth as an encumbrance thereon . . . tens of thousands of square miles of timber have been destroyed by fire . . . to clear the land . . . millionaires can be spared better than beans and deers."

The second half of the book is rather of people in the States. "The Yankee is an unqualified idiot over his womenfolk." He dislikes the Yankee boastfulness, their snobbery, their i-dollar-try: he speaks harshly of the improprieties of "husking bees" (a variety of "spelling bee"); and a chapter is given to "shakers and religious mummers." America, he says, was always the dust-heap to which all that was abominable in politics and religion has found its way.

This is amusing enough, but racial criticism is not always free from prejudice. As stated above, the microscope is seen to better advantage in the wilds of the Great North-West, with the free sky above and bears and wolves and foxes for subjects.

THE RELIGIOUS LIFE OF LONDON. Edited by Richard Mudie-Smith. (Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.)

THIS handsome volume, amply furnished with maps and statistical tables, is the final development of the results of the late "Daily News" religious census. It constitutes a monument of journalistic enterprise, and a document of enduring value worthy to be set side by side with Mr. Charles Booth's heroic work. The figures have given *furieuse*ment à penser to divers well-known writers; and their essays on the facts they suggest are conceived for the most part in an admirable spirit of fairness and restraint, and sometimes with singular picturesqueness. One would wish that Mr. George Gissing might have lived to read the essay on the religion of South London contributed by Mr. Masterman, author of "From the Abyss."

In South London, the census shows, one man in six and one woman in five attend a place of worship at least once on a Sunday. Of these the greater part are not furnished by the poor. "In all central South London I have only seen the poor in bulk collected at two places of religious worship—Mr. Meakin's great hall in Bermondsey and St. George's Roman Catholic Cathedral." And this is for no want of energy on the part of the workers:—

If the works done in South London to-day, one is inclined to assert, had been done in Sodom and Gomorrah, they would have repented in sackcloth and ashes. To all this the great unknown multitude remains entirely unresponsive. So far as a conscious spiritual life is concerned the results seem almost negligible. The key to the heart of South London has not yet been found; its interminable streets and desert of crowded dwellings wait for some outpouring of the spirit as yet withholden; and against its amiable acquiescence and passive resistance to the exhortations, threatenings and promises of the churches all these energies beat themselves in vain.

Among the middle classes, "stretching in a kind of skeleton framework through the cities of labour," is found a survival of the Puritan element. It fills the great Baptist tabernacles. It is the residents in the suburbs that furnish the largest proportion of church attendance in any district in London. And it is remarkable that so far as members of the Established Church are concerned, a considerable progress of ritualism is marked. "Here, if anywhere, is to be found the ritualistic grocer whom Sir William Harcourt once challenged his ecclesiastical opponents to produce." Of larger interest is the general reflection that, in striking contrast with what is going on among other nations of Western Europe, the claims of religion are still acknowledged by the rich and governing classes, while they are altogether inoperative upon the lives of the poor.

Among other subjects admirably treated are The Problem of East London (Percy Alden), The Settlement Ideal (P. W. Wilson), and The Problem of West London (Arthur Sherwell). The Religious News Editor of the "Daily News" treats of Facts and Forces not Enumerated, and "Lorna," of the "British Weekly," compares, with discouraging results, the present census with that which in 1886 was carried out by the latter paper.

The quietness and confidence of the writers is the more impressive by reason of the breadth of their outlook and their obvious determination to face the stubborn facts.

Fiction

MY FRIEND PROSPERO. By Henry Harland, (Lane. 6s.) The mechanism is nothing, the manner everything in Mr. Harland's latest novel. An English aristocrat and an Austrian princess meet as informally as might Robinson and Schmidt, and develop the beautiful sentiment which the hero distinguishes from cupboard love by calling it "love-love." The setting is an Italian castle and the time to-day, yet is their pretty story a pastoral delightfully like that of Curan and Argente in old Warner's chronicle. We trifle with "degrees of unbirth" or plebeianism till we arrive at the expression "furiously unborn," but we are well advised that happiness is inexorably their lot. The most original character in the novel is an Italian child, who would impress one even more than she does by her fascinating ingenuousness and superstition, if Baron Corvo had not already presented Toto, the one lad worthy to mate her. When the reader is pondering instead of perusing, he finds himself distinctly annoyed by the hero with his blue-eyed laziness, his perorations to the pictures of "lost ladies of old years" and his habit of talking over a child's head to an imaginary adult in the gallery while pretending to converse with her alone. But while he reads he is delightfully inveigled into the author's dream, and when he wakes from it, is a little surprised to find that he has a book in his hand and a critique insurgent on his lips.

THE CAPTAIN'S DAUGHTER. By Gwendolen Overton. (Macmillan. 6s.) A pleasant, if not particularly forceful, picture of army life in the Wild West. The heroine of the story, Marian, is the young daughter of the Captain, a fearless rider and well acquainted with all the ins-and-outs of garrison life. She by chance surprises a young recruit in the act of plundering the drawer of her father's writing desk in which he keeps troop funds. She lets the thief escape for the moment, intending to put the whole matter before her father. But on reflection she inclines to giving the thief a chance to retrieve what may be his first theft. So by substituting her own savings she gives the recruit time to return the money. Unfortunately, the youth is not worth her sentimental action, and many complications ensue, which at one time seem likely to end in serious disaster. The sketch of old Haggarty, the troop crank, who had grown old in the Captain's service, and who rescues Marian from a compromising situation, even though it means disgrace if he is discovered absent from his post, is particularly well done. He is a true Irishman even though he lives in the West. The book is written in an easy flowing style with admirable restraint, and may be safely recommended to the young reader.

THE CIRCLE IN THE SQUARE. By Baldwin Sears. (Barnes. $1.50.) "The Circle in the Square" is a striking book, if only for its singularly vivid and unvarnished picture of life in the Southern States of America. The struggle of Shan Morgan against the circumstance of his birth, against the languor and inertia of the atmosphere around, is the story of the South. In Madison Square, the select quarter of the town, live most of the characters in this story. "It is suffocatingly hot in those houses on summer nights; noisy with brawls from the river road beneath the hill where the Negro settlements are, from the midnight bells of the monastery on the ridge above the city, and oppressive with the mists and foul odours which rise from the river at nightfall." "Love-making, fighting, politics—indiscriminately cause and effect—fill the round of life in the Circle"; and also fill the pages of this book. Shan Morgan's life is the story of a man who breaks through his environment and pursues the good which he dimly perceives in his soul. His struggles and his temptations, his triumphs and his downfalls, are vividly and truthfully told. And through all, his love for the woman who has been his sweetheart from a little child keeps his heart pure and his temper sweet. Shan returns after three years absence to the Square, a fully fledged M.D., just in time to fight a terrible outbreak of fever, for death is no respecter of the little Circle in the Square. And it is to Shan Morgan, once rejected and deprived of his rights, that the little town looks for help, help in obtaining the sanitary improvements which will stop the ever-recurring outbreaks of fever, help in making politics "a matter of statesmanship instead of a matter of purchase," help in ending "the shameful and paralysing farce of free suffrage." The story of Shan Morgan is not a new story, the various social and political problems touched upon have been written about before, but the picture of Southern life is so remarkable that it will probably linger in the memory when the characters of the story are forgotten.

THE IRON HAND. By James MacLaren Cobban. (Long. 6s.) The opening chapters of this story give one a somewhat misleading idea as to the ultimate intention of the author. The opening is fantastic, quaint, with much promise of delicacy, and certainly indicates none of the horrors which develop in extravagance. Maybe the reader will regret that the author belittles his ability and writes down with deliberation to a level where fineness of touch is lost in an intoxication of incident. The story is of one Townsend, a man of mystery, a member of that fraternity who advertise in the Agony Column, and who has done service before in Mr. Cobban's work. As a detective he is not very promising, but he succeeds at least in disguising his intelligence. It is for him to prove the innocence of a pale, dark man who is accused unjustly, but on good circumstantial evidence, of breaking into a local bank. Separation from wife and penal servitude follow in course. The sorrows of this heroic person do not move one to tears, and his diary written within prison walls is without pathos. Not once, but twice he escapes his warders, mad with fury to avenge himself on those responsible for the deed for which he so innocently suffers. His task is made easy. He has but to double up his knee joints and strap back his legs to become a torso, unrecognisable to pursuers and persecutors alike. Thus artificially maimed, dead to the world, he becomes a person of importance on the Stock Exchange, and makes the acquaintance of his sometime wife, now wedded to a pawnbroker. This pawnbroker has a horrid past and is mixed up undeniably with the aforesaid bank robbery. But virtue will ever triumphant be, even though balked for sixteen long years, and in a pandemonium of improbability and amid alarms and excursions, hero, detectives, bigamist, pawnbroker, bank breakers, police and others are brought together in dangerous proximity to a patent hydraulic lift, which possesses the rare quality of distinguishing between good and evil. The parties are distributed to their several rightful belongings, much to the relief of the torso who is at liberty to unstrap his stiffened knee joints.

THE BOSS. By Alfred Henry Lewis. (Barnes. $1.50.) There is one interest and one section of life only presented in this book, namely, the inner history and workings of that New York organisation known as Tammany Hall. To the student of politics it should prove interesting, to the average reader it will hardly appeal. The book is well written in a strong, forceful fashion, and the life of the man who, from being a child-vagabond roaming around the Bowery, becomes by various stages the chief of Tammany Hall, is carefully and fully depicted. With him as a man we have nothing to do, with him as a political factor only are we interested. The boy sits at the feet of Big Kennedy, whose place as chief he afterwards wins, and draws in as the breath of life the moves of the political game. "City Government is but a game; so's all government. Shure, it's as if you an' me were playin' a game av ca-ards, this politics; your party is your hand, an' Tammany is my hand. In a game of cards, which are ye loyal to, is it your hand or the game? Man, it's your hand av coorse." The boy marks and learns, and in the end plays his hand so well that he wins to be head of Tammany Hall and a millionaire to boot, but in the struggle he loses happiness. "The Boss" is the story of the struggle: it is full of incident and force from cover to cover.

Short Notices

Verses

SAN FRANCISCO, AND OTHER POEMS. By F. W. Groves Campbell. (Gay and Bird. 3s.) This slender volume consists of a few poems in blank verse, narrative in form; and an equally few very brief lyrics. The lyrics fail of lyric effect because they are too compact of thought, with inadequate ardour and spontaneity of emotion. But the longer poems in blank verse have a certain unquestionable measure of poetic power. It is not mere poetised eloquence or rhetoric. It is poetry itself, of an elevated and subtle kind. But it is not of a popular kind. The author tends towards mysticism, and is full of a recondite fancy, passing at times into veritable imagination. He exhibits a great research of rich and classic diction and has often felicitous imagery. He has, too, often the imaginative emotion of youth; a Keats-like fervour, divorced from actuality and based on visionary passion. The gift of vision is his chief and nowadays not too common gift. His defect resides in an over-aesthetic strain of imagery and allusion.

He is fowl of referring to specific pictures, specific composers, which suggests the critic and the aesthete rather than the poet. There is an element of "preciousness," in fact. But the slight volume is distinctly above the bulk even of good minor verse.

RIO GRANDE'S LAST RACE, AND OTHER VERSES. By A. B. Paterson. (Macmillan. 6s.) THE LOST PARADISE, AND OTHER POEMS. By John Tattersall. (Edinburgh: George A. Morton. 2s. 6d. net.) SAVONAROLA, A CITY'S TRAGEDY. By Newman Howard. (Dent. 4s. 6d. net.) THE WANDERING JEW, A POEM. By Chas. Inniss Bowen. (Walter Scott. 1s. 6d.) LA VÉNUS DES AVEUGLES. Par Renée Vivien. (Paris: Lemerre. 3 frs.) Mr. Paterson, like Mr. Lawson, is one of the best known of modern Australian poets. Like well nigh all of them his chosen medium is the ballad in its various forms—in other words, he is a narrative poet. On the whole, he has done better things than this volume. In the most of the poems, the narrative is frank, direct, and of a certain spirit, but the diction is apt to be the conventional diction of the journalist—fatally unpoetical. One cannot but compare it with the diction of Mr. Kipling, which (even when he uses the decadent slang of the British soldier) is racy, vivid, and vital, with that soul of rightness in it which makes for poetry. Here the phrases are customary, blocked out, with no intimate relation to the thing uttered, no quick and alert intention. Yet there are ballads which attain a more spirited execution, and this is especially liable to be the case where Mr. Paterson treats of the horse. "Father Riley's Horse," for instance, has a ring which recalls the verse that made Mr. Paterson's name. But as a whole the book is too facile.—Mr. Tattersall's "Lost Paradise" is a cultivated and tasteful little collection of poems. It has thoughtfulness; it has poetic feeling; it has classic and restrained expression. Only it has not that fulness of ardour, that sense as of closed furnace-doors which we call plenary inspiration. A certain mild inspiration, none the less, may be accredited to it.—Of Mr. Howard's "Savonarola" it may be said that it is clever; it shows a research of historic character, a grasp of historic period; the dialogue is characteristic and human. All which is much. But there is little dramatic and cumulative power; there is nothing which can be called poetic gift, and on the whole it shows talent rather than genius.—"The Wandering Jew" may briefly be dismissed as mediocre.—Not so the "Vénus des Aveugles" of the French poet (or, we believe, poetess) who assumes the name of Renée Vivien. The verse is polished to the last degree, and has a certain perverse imagination. But it is decadent and corrupt to a funereal pitch; morbidity reigns triumphant. No healthy English taste can suffer this impearling and adornment of all that is unnatural, nay, downright vicious. It is the poetry of death and decay, and we can but regret very genuine gifts misbestowed. Of the handful of books we have reviewed, it is by far the strongest, the most authentically poetic. It is also, alas, the most repellent, the most tainted. "Lilies that fester smell far worse than weeds" might be the motto of the author, who shows a tendency to English quotations and titles.

POEMS OF POWER. By Ella Wheeler Wilcox. (Gay and Bird. 3s. 6d. net.) The name of Mrs. Wheeler Wilcox is already known. In this book she shows a regrettable fluency—we had almost written feminine fluency, but it is not confined to women. Regrettable, because there is often substance in these poems; which is not so common a thing that it should go forth to the world carelessly arrayed. In the best of this verse there is thought, but the author is lax as to form, content with common feminine impetuosity and trivialities of utterance—or too often so content. Yet the inherent truth of thought (as is wont happily to chance when thought is truly felt) intermittently presses the verse into shape which arrests attention. "Fate and I" (for instance) has occasional couplets which suggest Blake, and suggest him not unworthily:—

"My immortal will was born
Part of that stupendous cause
Which conceived the Solar Laws," for example; or again, "Who most loves has most of Force"; or still more, "He who harbours Hate one hour Saps the soul of Peace and Power." That last couplet might well have come from Blake's "Songs of Experience." The pity is that these things are casual; that she pours out strong, weak, and indifferent together, as though she did not recognise the difference between them. But, we repeat, there is pith in these poems; and that is not a common thing.

TURKISH LIFE IN TOWN AND COUNTRY. By Lucy M. J. Garnett. (Newnes. 3s. 6d. net.) Although the authoress has nothing very new to tell about Turkey and the Turks, she has collected a large amount of interesting information, the result obviously of long residence in the country and careful study of its very mixed population.

Miss Garnett's views as to the good conduct of modern harem life are sound and informing, and it is only when she touches upon politics that one ventures to differ with her conclusions. The descriptions of domestic interiors, the everyday life of the middle-class Turkish family, the general standard of culture, and the extraordinarily repressive and retrogressive policy of the Sultan, are all most lucidly set forth. There is a comprehensive Index Expurgatorius compiled by the Ottoman Government which prohibits the introduction into the country of such books as Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered," Chateaubriand's "Martyrs," Victor Hugo's "Les Orientales," La Fontaine's Fables, and all the works of Shakespeare, Voltaire, Dante, Rabelais, and Zola. This is somewhat drastic, but the wily Turk circumvents this by importing his Zola ready-bound, with a neat label on the back: "Traité de la langue Française." It is not stated under what disguise Shakespeare figures. In its 222 pages this little book contains a vast amount of excellently digested information, and its value is enhanced by twenty-two good reproductions of photographs, a glossary of Turkish words, and an index.

DER KAMPF DER WELTANSCHAUUNGEN IM 19 JAHRHUNDERT. Von D. Wihl. Schmidt. (Berlin: Trowitzsch. 3m. 60.) The views are here stated of the eight modern philosophers whom Dr. Schmidt considers to have had most influence during the past century. For instance, Comte represents positivism, Büchner materialism, Darwin and Haeckel the theory of evolution, Strauss the belief in monotheism. The main interest of the book lies, we think, in the sketches of the philosophies and lives of lesser men like Feuerbach, Büchner, Hart and Lange. The notion that a fierce and continual fight about these eight varying philosophies of life is going on around us is disconcerting to the thoughtful man, who would prefer some sort of reconciliation to perennial strife. Yet since there are adherents to each philosophy, it is useful to have these sketches in the space of one little book. Dr. Schmidt is sometimes more of the partisan than is consistent with the calm demeanour to be expected from a philosophic guide; his method of exposition, too, is lacking in literary art, but he states his points clearly, and keeps our interest alive. He pays to Darwin the very highest tribute, for he concludes the essay on him with this passage:—

"The enormous increase of general interest in science in almost the whole of the civilised world is due to Darwin. If the past century is called the most scientific it is entirely through him."

ALMANACH DES GOURMANDS. Fondé par Grimod de la Reynière en 1803. Continué sous la direction de F. G. Dumas. (Paris and London: Librairie Nilsson. 5 frs.) Exactly one hundred and one years ago the immortal Grimod de la Reynière, cook, gourmet, poet, and philosopher, published the first "Almanach des Gourmands." About twenty years later it was continued by A. C. Périgord, who did not invent the pâtés. In 1865 the unfortunate but well-meaning Charles de Monselet revised the almanach with the valuable collaboration of Alexandre Dumas père, Aurélien Scholl, Albert Glatigny, Victor Cochinet, and other leading lights of literature and the stew-pans. Now, M. Dumas, no mean authority himself, comes on the scene, and proposes to issue the almanach annually—until the coming of the Cocqsigrués. If he is able to keep up the standard of this, his first issue, his success should be assured, and the debt to him of all clean-palated gourmets will be incalculable. The almanach is a doughty tome of over 200 big square pages; the cover a charming coloured design by Jan Van Beers; articles on Wines, Truffles, Dessert, Fruit forcing, Laughing at Table, Restaurants of bygone times and to-day, pictures in last year's Salon referring to cookery, and papers on culinary painters such as Jan Steen, are interspersed with delightful reproductions of old engravings, original drawings by Ribot, Rossi, Maurice Leloir, and others. Menus—royal, republican and eccentric are given; and the card of the dinner offered to King Edward by M. Loubet at the French Embassy in London, designed by M. A. Gorguet, with its chains of amorini and flowers, is exquisitely beautiful, and a worthy work of art in itself. The almanach is not a "greedy" book, but a valuable collection of interesting literature—artistic, poetic and philosophical. A work to be studied, treasured and loved.

JOHN DRYDEN. Edited with an Introduction and Notes by George Saintsbury. (Mermaid Series. Unwin. 2 vols. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net each volume.) An admirable addition to this already admirable series. The selected plays are "Almanzor and Almahide," "Marriage a la Mode," "Aurung-Zebe," "All for Love," "The Spanish Friar," "Albion and Albanus" and "Don Sebastian." Professor Saintsbury's Introduction is a noteworthy contribution to Dryden literature, discussing suggestively many interesting points in the history of the drama. The plays of the Restoration period are largely read, but too little attention has as yet been given to the connection between the Elizabethan drama and the writers of Charles II. It is a gap in dramatic history and criticism which it may be hoped Professor Saintsbury will fill for us.

RUSSIAN SELF-UGHT. By C. A. Thimm and J. Marshall, M.A. (Marlborough. Cloth, 2s. 6d., paper 2s.) A very useful little manual, especially at the present time, as it deals with phonetic pronunciation, naval, military, commercial, and trading terms, and is altogether a handy and compendious volume. The vocabularies are strikingly practical.

Reprints and New Editions

ESSAYS. Carlyle. With an introduction by Frederick Harrison. THE AUTOCRAT OF THE BREAKFAST TABLE. Holmes. With an introduction by Gilbert K. Chesterton. (The Red Letter Library. Blackie. 2s. 6d. each) The four essays of Carlyle which have been selected for this reprint are "Goethe," "Burns," "Boswell's Life of Johnson," and "Sir Walter Scott," together with the author's notes. Mr. Harrison in the preface tells us that one of his reasons for this selection is that they contain "hardly a sentence which could provoke controversy or indignation, hardly a word that is not full of admiration, love, generous defence, in lieu of the fierce sarcasm of his later time." "No reader will find his principles offended, be he Tory or Democrat, evangelist or free thinker." So that these selected essays may safely be relied upon not to produce any irritation in the mind of any reader! Of the binding and letterpress we need only say that these two volumes are in every way the equal of their predecessors in this series.

THE NEW LIFE. Dante. With a prefatory note by William Michael Rossetti. (Ellis and Elvey.) Mr. W. M. Rossetti in his note mentions the small share which he himself took in the translation of the "Vita Nuova," namely, "Collating the Vita Nuova with the Original, and amending inaccuracies." He opines that this may possibly have been the first important work that his brother translated from the Italian, though, needless to say, not the last.

ESSAYS BY ABRAHAM COWLEY. Edited, with introduction and notes, by Harry Christopher Minchin. (The Little Library. Methuen. 1s. 6d. net.) Of these essays, Mr. Minchin says: "Their writer plays upon our language as a skilled player upon an organ, extracting from it what harmonies he pleases, now in a minor key touching on human disappointments: now in swelling strains calling us to battle for liberty and virtue; now sinking into resignation; now rising to the instrument's full compass in echoing scorn of knavery and servility." This is not saying too much.

a HARRY LORREQUER. By Charles Lever. b THE CAXTONS. By Lord Lytton. c THE PATHFINDER. By Fenimore Cooper. (Blackie. a and b, 2s. 6d. each; c, 2s.) We are glad to note that the editor in his introduction to "Harry Lorrequer" would not have us take Charles Lever as the unrivalled portrayer of Irish life, but recognises what false conceptions of Irish character a perusal of his novels may give. That there is always a reader for "Harry Lorrequer" we do not doubt, but it is not for the essential truth of the pictures, but for its fun and brightness. It is pleasant to have so excellent a reprint of "The Caxtons," in our opinion by far the best of Lord Lytton's many novels. The illustrations are good and the print clear and grateful to the eye. "The Pathfinder" will no doubt be chiefly read by young eyes, which makes it all the more deplorable that so small and so tiring a type should have been chosen.

New Books Received

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL

Stoll (Oswald), The Grand Survival: A Theory of Immortality by Natural Law	(Simpkin, Marshall)	3/0
Atchley, L.R.C.P. (Cutlbert), The Parish Clerk, and his Right to read the Liturgical Epistle	(Longmans)	1/6
Mudie-Smith (R.), edited by, The Religious Life of London	(Hodder and Stoughton)	6/0
Ross, M.A. (J. M. E.), The Self-Portraiture of Jesus	" "	3/6

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES

Pyle (Howard), The Story of King Arthur and his Knights	(Newnes)	net 10/6
Gregory (Lady), arranged and put into English by, Gods and Fighting Men: The Story of the Tuatha de Danaan and of the Fianna of Ireland	(Murray)	net 6/0
Bullen (A. H.), introduction by, An English Garner: Shorter Elizabethan Poems, and Some Longer Elizabethan Poems	(Constable)	each, net 4/0
Kitchin, D.D. (G. W.), Ruskin in Oxford, and Other Studies	(Murray)	net 12/0
Campbell (F. W. Groves), San Francisco, and Other Poems	(Gey and Bird)	3/0

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY

Smith (George Gardner), edited by, Spencer Kellogg Brown: His Life in Kansas and his Death as a Spy, 1842-1863	(Heinemann)	6/0
Thompson, M.A. (Rev. Henry L.), The Church of St. Mary the Virgin, Oxford, in its Relation to some Famous Events of English History	(Constable)	net 3/6
Corbett (Julian S.), England in the Mediterranean, 1603-1713, 2 vols.	(Longmans, Green)	net 24/0

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY—continued.

Griffith (Rev. Joan), Edward II. in Glamorgan	(Western Mail)	5/0
Memoirs of the Life of Colonel Hutchinson, written by his Widow Lucy	(Kegan Paul)	net 3/6
Lee (Sidney), Queen Victoria: A Biography	(Smith, Elder)	6/0
Williams (A. M.), Our Early Female Novelists, and Other Essays	(MacLehose)	net 2/6

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY

Ca'ri (Edward), The Evolution of Theology in the Greek Philosophers. Vols. I. and II.	(MacLehose)	net 14/0
--	-------------	----------

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY

Fraser (John Foster), The Real Siberia	(Casell)	3/6
Watson (W. Petrie), Japan: Aspects and Destinies	(Grant Richards)	net 12/6
Gardner (Edmund G.), The Story of Siena and San Gimignano	(Dent)	net 4/6
Rittner (George H.), Impressions of Japan	(Murray)	net 10/6

EDUCATIONAL

Frazer (Mrs. J. G.), Notes by F. B. Kirkman, B.A., Contes Des Chevaliers—French Medieval Legends	(Black)	1/6
Rob Roy ("Sir Walter Scott" Continuous Reader).....	" "	1/6
Clark, Ph.D. (Charles Upson), The Text Tradition of Ammianus Marcellinus, with Five Manuscript Facsimiles	(C. U. Clark, New Haven, Conn.)
Adamson (J. W.), Our Defective System of Training Teachers	(Ginn)	0/3
Spanish Self-Taught (Thimm's System)	(Marlborough)	1/0

MISCELLANEOUS

Saltus (Edgar), The Poms of Satan	(Greening)	net 3/6
Scheme for recording Ancient Defensive Earthworks and Fortified Enclosures	(Society of Antiquaries)
Facts versus Fiction: The Cobden Club's Reply to Mr. Chamberlain	(Casell)	net 1/0
London University Guide and Calendar, 1904	(University Tutorial Press)
Guide to the Horniman Museum and Library	(London County Council)	1/1
Parliamentary Papers, 1801 to 1900	(King)	net 7/6
Transactions of the Essex Archaeological Society, Vol. IX., Part II.	(Essex Archaeological Society)	8/0
Congregational Historical Society Transactions, No. 5	(Congregational Historical Society)	net 1/0
Browne (Robert), "A New Year's Gift," an Hitherto Lost Treatise (Congregational Historical Society) net 1/6
Wood (J.), Imaginary Conversations of Three White Letter Days in the Anglo-Saxon Cloisters	(Leadenhall Press)	2/6
A Study of English Turcophobia. Translated from the Turkish. (P.-L. S. Series, No. 1.)	(Pan-Islamic Society)	0/6
Clarke (John), Short Studies in Education in Scotland	(Longmans)	net 3/6
The Stamp Collectors Annual	(Nisnen)	1/0
The Ancestor. A Quarterly Review of County and Family History, Heraldry and Antiquities. No. 8.	(Constable)	net 5/0
Geoffrey, Junior (edited with an Introduction and notes by), The Marvellous History of King Arthur in Avalon and of the Lifting of Lyonesse: A Chronicle of the Round Table, communicated by Geoffrey of Monmouth	(Murray)	net 2/6

FICTION

"Thyra Varrick," by Mrs. E. Amelia Barr (Unwin), 6/0; "The Kingdoms of This World," by Stephen Harding (Hurst and Blackett), 6/0; "On Satan's Mount," by Dwight Tilton (Ward, Lock), 6/0; "The Ordeal of Sara," by Alan St. Aubyn (White), 6/0; "His Eminence," by Lady Helen Forbes (Nash), 6/0; "The Gods are Just," by Beatrice Helen Barnby (Duckworth), 6/0; "The Web," by Frederick Trevor Hill (Heinemann), 6/0; "The Island Pharisees," by John Galsworthy (John Sinjohn) (Heinemann), 6/0; "Foam and Mist," by Norman Broughman Warde (Morton), 6/0; "Twelve Trifles," by Theophila North (Morton), net 3/6; "The Brazen Calf," by James L. Ford (Dodd, Mead); "The Money God," by J. P. Blake (Heinemann), 6/0; "Red Morn," by Max Pemberton (Casell), 6/0; "Estranged; or, The Lost Heiress of the Champneys (Henderson), 0/3; "The Great Baruma Mystery," by W. P. Brown (Henderson), 0/8; "Little MacStenger" (Simpkin, Marshall), 1/0; "The Trail of the Dead," by B. Fletcher Robinson and J. Malcolm Fraser (Ward, Lock), 3/6; "Stella Fregelius," by H. Rider Haggard (Longmans), 6/0; "Sandford of the 'Smart' Set; or, Sin and Scandal," by Belinda Blunders (Simpkin, Marshall), net 1/0.
---	--	--

NEW EDITIONS

"John Dryden," edited by George Saintsbury, 2 vols. (Unwin), net 2/6; "The Annals of Tacitus," Books I.-VI., translated by George Gilbert Ramsey (Murray), net 18/0; "Hymns of Faith and Life," collected and edited by the Rev. John Hunter, D.D. (Dent), net 2/0; "Lectures on Preaching," by the Rt. Rev. Phillips Brooks, D.D. (Allenson), net 3/0; "The Babelot, A Masque of Dead Florentines," Parts I. and II. (Mosher), 5 cents each; "Tilbury Nogo," by G. J. Wynter-Merville (Ward, Lock), 0/6; "Hakluyt's Voyages," Vols. III. and IV. (MacLehose), each, net 1/6; Schiller's "Wilhelm Tell," translated by Albert G. Latham (Dent), net 1/6.
--	--	--

PERIODICALS

"Chambers's Journal," "World's Work," "Critical Review," "Windsor Magazine," "Cornhill," "Lady's Magazine," "Pearson's Magazine," "Aisicse," "Contemporary Review," "The Papyrus," "The Commonwealth," "National Review," "Blackwood's Magazine," "School World," "English Illustrated," "Burlington Magazine," "The Photo-Miniature," "British Food Journal," "Monthly Review," "Harper's Monthly Magazine," "Indian Antiquary," "Current Literature," "Educational Times," "Library," "Independent Review," "Book Monthly," "The Antiquary," "Architectural Review," "Genealogical Magazine," "Bible Society Monthly Reporter," "Bible Society Gleanings," "Scribner's Magazine," "Lippincott's."
---	--	--

Foreign

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES

Fulda (Ludwig), Schiller und die Neue Generation. Ein Vortrag	(Stuttgart: J. G. Cotta)	75 pf.
Anders (H. R. D.), Shakespeare's Books: A Dissertation on Shakespeare's Reading and the Immediate Sources and his Works. (Schriften der Deutschen Shakespeare-Gesellschaft. Band I.)	(Berlin: Reimer)	7 marks

MISCELLANEOUS

Schans (Martin), Geschichte der Römischen Litteratur	(Williams and Norgate)	net 8/6
Rickert (Heinrich), Der Gegenstand der Erkenntnis	" "	net 4/0

PERIODICALS

Mercur de France, "Deutsche Rundschau."
--	--	--

Letters from a Silent Study

[The following series of notes, more or less critical, on life have been given to me. The writer wished to tell the truth—a desire which may be regarded as a legitimate claim to any reader's consideration and indulgence.]

IX.—On Proper Pride.

WHEN I was a boy, my two aunts, now grandmothers, were young, very handsome girls. One had the kind of beauty which is superstitiously known as the beauty of the devil; the other had the kind of beauty which is attributed to the Madonna. The two sisters were rarely in agreement, and the devilish charmer was always accusing the gentle one of forgetting her "Proper Pride."

"Where," she would exclaim, "is your proper pride?"

This question, which was never answered, has haunted me through life: for years I wondered what Proper Pride—as opposed to the familiar deadly sin—could be. Yesterday I asked my friend, the pretty lady, what it was. "A deadly bore," said she. Her mind is untrained and she is incapable of tracing her own best guesses to their legitimate source in the common heart of mankind. On this occasion, as on many others, she was right without knowing it. Proper Pride is, no doubt, the deadliest bore in our moral equipment. "As usual," I said to my pretty friend, "you have given me an idea," and, as I left her, I heard her murmur: "Now he has got all he wanted, he goes. If I had any Proper Pride, I'd never see him again!"

This murmur pursued me: I composed long letters to her as I walked home. When I reached home I thought I ought to return and explain my moodiness, which arose, I intended to assure her, from humility, not from ingratitude, never from egoism. But I feared to give a wrong impression: I did not write the letter: I did not go back. Three hours later, after nating my dinner, shunning my favourite books, and assuming an icy air towards my devoted housekeeper, I realised that I myself was suffering from an acute attack of Proper Pride. In more ignorant days, I might have called it dignity.

As I paced the floor and tried to persuade my better judgment (another strange moral tyrant) that I was a fool, I thought of many examples, instances, and illustrations of Proper Pride in history and my immediate experience—all of which had made for much unnecessary pain, a good deal of lying, not a few crimes, and mischief everywhere. I could not remember, or discover, one case where Proper Pride had led to anything except evil and sorrow. My own little ache was a trifle—although it has since manifested itself in the form of a rash on my arm, which baffles the local doctor, but then he does not understand the close connection between the soul and the nerves.

We all know that Proper Pride is the broad root from which all love stories in fiction, drama, and poetry fatally grow—either for sadness or delight. It is Proper Pride which estranges the fondest of couples: it is Proper Pride which drives well-treated husbands to the worst excesses of jealousy: it is Proper Pride which urges a girl to refuse the one man whom she wishes to accept: it is Proper Pride which restrains the noble, if impoverished, suitor from saying the least word which could be construed into a profession of even temperate regard for the "idol of his existence": it is Proper Pride, in fact, which makes so many people insincere, and so many others angry. And, as it affects individuals, it influences nations. There have been few great wars in the cause of justice: thousands of lives have been sacrificed, millions have been squandered: cities have been made desolate for no worse offence than a fancied slight to some Government's Proper Pride, and for no better reason than a display of the same abstract. But what is it? It is, as we have seen, the cause of battles, of suicides, of unhappy love, and nettle-rash, yet I am prepared to swear that it is a manufactured—as opposed to a natural—calamity. We are not born with this bore attached to our sufficiently oppressed spirits: it is added to us first by our parents, relatives, nurses, and other guardians, then by the education we receive, then by the books we read, then by the counsel of our friends—themselves groaning under the burden of the incubus. Reduced to its simplest form, Proper Pride and its exercise may be called the restraint of every kind impulse which makes for the simplification of human affairs—whether on the trivial or the grand scale.

To return to my handsome young aunts. I remember well that the more dashing of the two was a woman who abandoned herself, without a misgiving, to the pleasure of thinking aloud. As a thought entered her head she expressed it; the fact that she contradicted herself at least eighteen times a day never disturbed her equanimity; she refused incessant offers of marriage and she had three husbands (one of whom she left because she did not see why she should live with him); at sixty she had a girl's complexion, but at twenty-seven she had lost her figure (here was a point where Proper Pride might have been advantageous); she had any number of children; they all adored her, disobeyed her, and disappointed her. I have seen her laugh by the hour and cry by the hour; she is called impossible because she is purely natural; boys who gave her sweets when she was a little girl, now, as elderly gentlemen with dignified wives brimful of self-respect, will walk (with gout) miles to see her—if only to refresh their memories of her imperfection. I will own that her life, criticised by those who are disenchanted of candour, has not been in any material sense successful. Her income depends, in the main, on the life assurance policy taken out by the least reputable of her three husbands; years ago she spent her paternal inheritance in various benevolent schemes for amusing the poor. The county, however, forgets its snobbery when it calls upon her, and, under her child-like smile, the Lord Lieutenant dissolves into a human being. She has no proper pride—she can love geese, charwomen, marchionesses, and the greengrocer with an equal and constant love. One of her friends is the district coroner who is but thirty-three, although he has sat on two thousand seven hundred and four inquests. To numbers, he would seem depressing. Another friend is a Duke without a palate. "Still," as she says, "for a Duke, he is very clean and tidy." He tells her about his incorrigible sons and their odious women acquaintances. He always protests when he leaves her that he would enjoy his calls far more if he did not invariably meet his wife coming in as he goes out. My aunt cannot see why he should object to this pleasure, and when a busy lady once asked her: "My dear, how can you be so charming to both?" she replied: "You see, they are both so charming to me."

As I have said already, she has no dignity. But I wish I could describe her eyes.

JOHN OLIVER HOBBS.

[Copyright 1904 by Mrs. CRAIGIE in the United States of America.]

The Kelmscott Press

The Beginnings of a Great Undertaking

"THE Story of the Glittering Plain," finished the 4th day of April, 1891, was the earliest production of the Kelmscott Press, and the attention of the reader who can interest himself in the matter is directed to the following passages

*Kelmscott Press
January 31st
1891*

HF old man answered not a word, and he seemed to be asleep, and Hallblithe deemed that his cheeks were ruddier and his skin less wasted and wrinkled than aforetime. Then spake one of these women: Fear not, young man; he is well and will soon be better. Her voice was as sweet as a spring bird in the morning; she was white-skinned and dark-haired, and full sweetly fashioned; and she laughed on Hallblithe, but not mockingly; and her fellows also laughed as though it were strange for him to be there. Then they did on there shoon again, and with the carle laid their hands to the bed whereon the old man lay, and lifted him up, and bore him forth on to the grass, turning their faces towards the flowery wood aforesaid; and they went a little way and then laid him down again and rested; and so on little by little, till they had brought him to the edge of the wood, and still he seemed to be asleep.

HFT the damsel who had spoken before, she with the dark hair, said to Hallblithe: "Although we have gazed on thee as if in wonder, this it not because we did not look to meet

July 8, 1890.—Morris to Mrs. Burne-Jones. "We have got 6 letters of the new type done, and have had a scrap printed." Of the "golden type" designed for that Press, he wrote on another occasion: "What I wanted was a letter pure in form, severe without excrescences, solid without the thickening and thinning of the line, which is the essential fault of the ordinary modern type, and not compressed laterally, as all late type has grown to be owing to commercial exigencies."

As the accompanying illustration is of a trial page of that book, the reader can judge for himself how nearly this standard was reached. A specially interesting copy is in the St. Bride Institute, London, where the Bibliographical Libraries of William Blades and Talbot Baines Reed, both deceased, form a sort of book-lovers' Paradise, and one easy of access to all. A letter from Morris to Reed, preserved between the covers of his friend's copy, shows how little the writer could rest until he had everything right in so far as personal effort could make it.

By the middle of August, that year, eleven punches had been cut for the new fount.

August 27.—Morris sends Mr. F. S. Ellis: "A specimen (over-inked) of as far as we have gone at present."

September 14.—Still "only eleven cut," but in the middle of the following month he wrote: "I have all the lower case letters, and have been designing ornamental letters—rather good, I think."

By the end of that year "all but two" of the punches, upper and lower case, were completed, and he was able to write as follows: "Expect to have my type in a month."

With the beginning of 1891 the Kelmscott Press actually started working. "Its first premises, a cottage on the Upper Mall of Hammersmith, were taken possession of on the 12th of January. The first sample of paper was received on the 27th, and the first full-trial page was set up and printed on the 31st."

How fortunate, then, was the writer, meeting Morris that very day, to be asked into that cottage and shewn what his printer was doing. The page which is here reproduced, with Morris' writing upon it, was dated at my request. Thought too little of at that time, it has become a thing to be treasured

"The Story of the Glittering Plain," by WILLIAM MORRIS
(A Facsimile of the first full-page trial, January 31, 1891.)

in Mr. Mackail's "Life" of the Poet, Vol. II., pp. 240, &c. :—

"Throughout the year—1890—the project of his new Printing Press, and the work to be done in connection with it, had swallowed up all other interests."

exceedingly, since the sight of it serves to remind me of days that were brighter than these, because we had Morris amidst of us all. [There was mention just now of two letters still missing—evidently E and N—of the upper case.]

Owing to the kindness of Mr. R. A. Peddie, librarian of the above-named Institute, I have been able to examine at leisure the examples he has of printing more recent than this with the stamp of the "New Art" upon it, and with these and others before me have satisfied myself that, excepting the Doves Press, Yale Press, Ashendene Press, and possibly one or two others, they serve no good purpose whatever, for the variants of the best letter, Roman or Gothic, are not inexhaustible, and no modern designer has the daring of the patentee of a fount, seemingly modelled on Caxton's, wherein all letters like g and y had to curl up their tails in order to bring them into line with the rest. The edition of Rasselas, dated, which advertised that invention, shows what happily is not at all rare, the perfection of commonsense printing, and rather than be critic of the most modern absurdities, I would like to be handling such books.

The practice which Morris deplored of compressing the letter laterally is, happily, without imitators among the recruits in this business, but there are many, unfortunately, having none of that architectural sense which, applied to the making of books, should determine the relation of all the parts to the whole (decoration to text, &c.), and designers lacking this sense, since they trespass upon our preserves, and too often on sacred ground, are most deservedly hated by all lovers of art in books. The cry is for novelty, novelty, while the fact is that it is almost impossible to have anything of that in a book without departing from a tradition which has in it the essentials of all good printing whatever. We have the extremes of high and low prices in these debased imitations of the best printed books in the world, and my concluding word would have been to the General Public if there had seemed to be room for it.

ERNEST RADFORD.

Egomet

AT the back of my mind there has always lingered a faint hope that in the next world it may be granted to me to renew my friendship with the books that have been my friends in this world and that further I shall be permitted to read the many works for the reading of which in this life I shall have no time. It is this hope, perhaps, which sometimes has almost persuaded me to believe that my ego had lived as distinguished from my mortal parts, that I have had a pre-existence, just as I hope for a future life. Well known is that strange feeling of familiarity which comes over many of us when visiting a place or meeting a person for, as far as we know, the first time. I have entered a room that I know I have never been in before with a sense that everything in and about it is familiar. A striking example of this was my first visit to the library at the Oxford Union. I went into it from the little room, well lined with books, which gives entrance to the gallery and to the steep stairs that lead down to the floor of the main room. There was no sense of novelty; all was old acquaintance. Of course I may have seen a picture of the place, but even that fact would not have accounted for the feeling of complete knowledge of details that came over me. I have met with no such striking incident in regard to persons.

But with regard to books I have had experiences, not unique, but I believe somewhat rare. In more cases than one I have taken down from the shelves books of which I knew merely the names, have commenced to read them and have discovered to my great surprise that their contents are familiar to me, familiar not merely in a general way but verbally so. I have sought for a key to this mystery and have in vain tried to persuade myself either that I have read extracts from the books in question or that the familiarity is merely imaginary. But neither of these explanations has contented me. Nor on the other hand have I found myself able to believe that in some former existence I have read the books in question. A specific example is Bacon's Essays. This has never been an unfamiliar book to me; on my first reading of it long years ago its splendid prose came upon me with the face and voice of an old friend, a friend that I had met somewhere, but where and when I knew not.

Is it possible that in babyhood I had taken up the book, that its lines had made a photographic print upon my mind, so that the words, though conveying no meaning then, later when I had understanding of them came familiar to my vision? This seems to me a fantastic explanation of the mystery, so indeed but more persuasive does the only other that suggests itself—that I had read the book before in another existence. More persuasive is this latter explanation, because it is fascinating to me to fancy—even if I cannot quite believe—that my reading in this is but a continuation of my reading in a former life. Still more delightful to fancy that I may have met in former existences the writers of the books that now delight me.

I may have walked with Shakespeare the streets of Elizabethan London, have sat by his side among the groundlings at the Globe Theatre, have talked with him at the Mermaid Tavern. I may have strolled with Bacon in Gray's Inn beneath the trees and have discussed with him the laying out of gardens. Addison may have been my familiar friend, Goldsmith may have jested with me in the Temple; I may have met and admired—possibly loved silently—Miss Austen. Ah, what dreams, what foolish, vain dreams, yet how pleasing! Are they dreams? Who shall tell me? Are they memories? Who shall say?

E. G. O.

Science

Atoms and Evolution

RADIUM has supplied us with the first experimental proof that one so-called "element" can change into another; that evolution applies even to the "foundation stones" of the material universe; and that Herschel's description of the atom as bearing upon it the stamp of the "manufactured article" can no longer be accepted. Atoms, as we know them, are not manufactured but evolved. The researches of Thomson of Cambridge, Rutherford of Montreal, and Ramsay and Soddy of University College, London, have now gone so far that one may try to indicate some of the features of atomic evolution as it has been demonstrated by the last-named observers.

Radium, as we all know, gives off a great many different kinds of radiation, but we need fix our attention on only one set of these, much the most interesting and important, which have been called by physicists the Alpha rays. They represent by far the greater part of the energy given out by radium, and they constitute the very act of atomic evolution in this instance. Sir William Ramsay has not discovered the "philosopher's stone," but he has demonstrated without its assistance that for which the alchemists sought it. He has not yet converted lead into gold, but he has observed the transformation of radium into helium, and Professor Curie told the Royal Society, when it presented him with a gold medal the other day, that he would do his best to convert it into radium. The transmutation of the elements is a proven fact, and we owe the proof to the Alpha rays of radium.

Now what are they? Their most important characteristic is that they are material rays. They consist of ponderable matter, not merely of undulations in the ether, like sunlight or Röntgen rays or heat waves. And they shoot out from radium at an astounding speed, probably about one-tenth the speed of light—say at the speed of twenty thousand miles a second. They are by no means the fastest moving matter shot out from radium, for the Beta rays, which also consist of material particles, move with a speed approaching that of light. Until these discoveries it was thought that the fastest flying matter known was that of some of the “runaway” stars, such as Arcturus, which you may see low down in the East late at night at this time of year. Arcturus is moving at the rate of about 100 miles a second, yet he is but a laggard compared to the Alpha particles from radium, which move two hundred times as fast.

So much for their speed: but that is not the really important thing. They have no penetrative power and are easily imprisoned in a glass tube, in which a gas of unknown nature appears, doubtless formed from them. But Ramsay and Soddy found that when this unknown gas is watched for about four weeks, its spectrum changes into that of helium. In other words, the evolution of the radium has given rise to the helium by means of the Alpha rays. Now the weight of a radium atom, as compared with the weight of the lightest known atom—that of hydrogen, which we call 1—is 225, according to Madame Curie. The weight of a helium atom is about 2.2, that is to say, about twice the weight of a hydrogen atom, and just about one hundredth part the weight of a radium atom. It is probable that the radium atom breaks up into about a hundred particles, each of which is, so to speak, an immature atom of helium, and these particles constitute the Alpha rays. When they have had four weeks in which to settle down and mate with one another—for the atoms of a gas generally go about in pairs—then the spectroscope reveals their identity with helium. This, then, is atomic evolution taking place sensibly before our eyes. Anyone may witness part of the process by purchasing a spintharoscope, the little scientific toy invented by Sir William Crookes. When you hold the little instrument close to your eye in the dark you see an incessant shower of sparks that shoot out from a central point. These sparks of light are due to the impact of the Alpha particles against a sensitive screen which is placed at the end of the tube. The Beta and Gamma rays are not arrested and pass on in all directions—many of them into your eye and right through your head—but the Alpha particles are too big and are stopped by the screen, despite their tremendous velocity. As they strike the screen they crack the crystals of zinc sulphide with which it has been covered and thus produce the flashes of light which you see. The instrument costs a guinea, but though the speck of radium in it is too small to be visible it will continue to emit these particles at this astounding speed, day and night, in season and out of season, for at least thirty thousand years. It follows that the most abundant source of energy in the Universe—a source all but inexhaustible—is to be found within the atom—where until recently no energy was suspected. Some day we may expect to tap it—and then we need not deplore our exhausted coal-mines.

C. W. SALEBY.

Dramatic Notes

“LOVE IN A COTTAGE,” by Captain Basil Hood, and “Les Bienfaiteurs,” by M. Brieux, are examples of the old style and the new; the former sweetness without alloy, the latter bitter-sweet, more bitter, perhaps, in intention than in accomplishment. M. Brieux has an object-lesson to teach, that almsgiving is not charity, and that charity without love counts as nothing; but unfortunately he has fallen into the old fault of caricaturing the attitude and the arguments of those whom he would refute. Landrecy is enabled to found a factory, where he will be at liberty to experiment with all the panaceas recommended for ameliorating the lot of the workman, his wife is provided with ample funds to carry on all the works of charity for which her good heart pines, by Salvat, the millionaire, who has been through all the trials of poverty himself, and has not much, if any, faith in the efforts made by the well-intentioned to relieve distress. Of course the experiments fail, grotesquely on the part of Madame Landrecy, pitifully on the part of her husband, who is brought face to face with his workmen, who misunderstand all his efforts for their welfare.

It is with regard to the ladies' committee and their farcical proceedings that fault must be found with M. Brieux, who has here grossly overstated his own case and mis-stated that of those with whom he differs. Many follies have been perpetrated under the guise of charity, but all charity is not foolishness, all the charitable are not fools. M. Brieux puts up a ninny and knocks him (or her) down with skill and neatness, but he is beating the wind if he thinks by this to teach us any lesson whatever; farce is not satire. More than this, M. Brieux apparently intended his play as a serious picture of life, which it is not. There is room for a scathing satire upon some of the methods adopted by those in charge of charitable associations; there is room for a stern tragedy dealing with the deep gulf that too often parts the rich and the poor, the masters and the men; neither of these has he given us, but a bootless amalgam of farce, caricature, comedy and tragedy, not one of which rings true. The play interests only spasmodically and is on occasion amusing, but the comedy and farce are elementary and the tragedy but skin deep. M. Brieux has not dared to be true; he has not had the courage to shake himself free from the conventions of the drama; therefore, on the whole, he has failed.

THE acting would probably have been more convincing had the characters been true to life. Salvat is a human being, not lovable but alive, and Mr. C. V. France played the part admirably. This actor has the useful gift of thinking when he is not speaking, which too many of our performers forget to do; on the other hand, he occasionally uses a gesture which means nothing. Mr. E. W. Garden was really natural as Landrecy, Miss Lily Malvon was excellent in an unpleasant part which might easily have been over-acted; and there an end. The scene is laid in France and the characters are all French, and yet, but for a symptom or two in the way of make-up, the whole was as British as it well could be; surely the scene should have been changed to England or the performers have done something to indicate that they were enacting French folk?

It is never a pleasure to find fault, still less so when criticising the work of the Stage Society, the aims of which are excellent and the achievements always interesting. But—are there no better plays to be shown us from the repertoire of Europe than Gorki's "Doss House" and "The Philanthropists" of Brieux? If not, the drama abroad is in as sickly a condition as it is in our own country. For its

Just as the plot contains no strikingly original situations, so are the characters by no means new friends; they are old friends in new clothes, and Captain Hood has provided

SHAKESPEARE'S LONDON : THE WHITE TOWER, TOWER OF LONDON

[Photo. Booker and Sullivan, Chancery Lane.]

next programme the Society has fixed upon Browning's "A Soul's Tragedy," by no means that poet's finest play, but one which it will be interesting to see tested by the true test of every dramatic work, by being acted, preceded by "Op o' My Thumb," by Messrs. Frederick Fenn and Richard Pryce. We shall see what we shall see, and be grateful as ever to the Stage Society for its chiefest virtue, that it is in earnest.

CAPTAIN BASIL HOOD's new comedy, "Love in a Cottage," is a pleasant example of that class of pieces to which such plays as "Caste" and "Sweet Lavender" belong; it does not deal with, though it occasionally touches upon, deep emotional problems; the story of true love which for a time does not run smooth is its theme, the incidents are usually mirth-provoking, though there are occasional hints of tears, the characters are for the most part such as we would welcome in daily intercourse, and the dialogue, without being really witty, is bright, natural and amusing. Captain Hood has chosen for the motive of his comedy the danger to happiness that lies in marriages of convenience, a motive which would serve also for a tragedy. Indeed, a wrong note of prospective tragedy is unnecessarily struck in the first act. We are whisked away from fashionable London to the Irish house of an impecunious peer, where the comedy works itself out naturally to a pleasant end; the lovers—there are two couples—are made happy, in so far as the prospect of immediate matrimony will secure their happiness, and the curtain descends to the good old tune of "Haste to the Wedding." All is sweet as sweet can be, natural, simple, entertaining.

them with very excellent garments. The acting all round is good, especially that of Mr. Vane-Tempest as a fatuous man of money, and of Miss Irene Rooke as an unhappy wife: but all are good. For our actors of comedy are as superior to our actors of tragedy as are our writers of comedy to our writers of serious drama. There is considerable ground for hope, as I have urged before, that comedy may recover its old-time glories, while, unfortunately, the condition of the serious drama shows little but symptoms of further decline.

"THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW" asks "What can be done to help the British stage?" in an article which reprints Mr. John Hare's recent letter to The Times, and portions of speeches by Mr. Beerbohm Tree and Mr. Pinero. The suggestion, of course, is conveyed that to rescue the stage (not dramatic literature) from its present parlous position can only be done by the founding of a repertoire theatre and a school of acting. Both Mr. Tree and Mr. Benson have founded admirable schools for actors, the latter having already accomplished much good work. As for the subsidised repertoire theatre, as is usual in these discussions, no practical suggestion is made except by Mr. Frederick Harrison, who has tried "to induce an eminent philanthropist to become the Herodes Atticus of a revived Athenian drama." But the drama will never be revived by philanthropy; in some such practical scheme as that recently put forward in this column lies the only hope of combating the evil influences which are doing so much harm to the English theatre. A repertoire theatre will provide both a school of acting and a means for providing for the preservation as acting plays of the many masterpieces which adorn our dramatic literature.

A NEW one-act piece in verse, by Ludwig Fulda, was played the other night at the Royal Theatre, Berlin. It is entitled "Lästige Schönheit" (Tiresome Beauty). The heroine, a beautiful woman, tired of hearing praise of her physical charms, desires to be won for her intelligence and amiability, and takes the opportunity at a masked ball of discovering whether the man she really loves cares for aught but her beauty. Her mental excellences and her pleasing disposition so work on him that although she assures him she is the plainest if not the ugliest of women, he declares beauty to be nothing, and she consents to give him her hand. He does not, however, conceal his delight when he discovers her identity. It is, of course, the lightest trifle and needs the lightest handling by the actors. It serves as a suitable introduction to Fulda's admirable translation of Molière's "École des Maris," performed the same evening. Why is Molière never played in England? There are plenty of good translations. Perhaps our "repertory" theatre will change all that.

A SOCIETY for the promotion of modern dramatic art has been founded in Strassburg. Its members already number a thousand, with Professor Theobald Ziegler, of Strassburg University, as president. Its aim is chiefly to produce works forbidden by the Censor. The plays chosen for the first performance were Schnitzler's "Grüner Kakadu" and Oscar Wilde's "Salome."

A NEW drama in four acts, by José Echegaray, "La desequilibrada," has been produced at the Teatro Español, Madrid. The leading idea is that good men and women who, at critical moments of their lives, allow themselves to yield to their passions and temperaments, fall a prey to persons of mean character, who under a pleasing and brilliant exterior, conceal cold-blooded cunning and craft. The third act is remarkably fine, and the whole had a favourable reception.

Musical Notes

NOT many novelties figure in the programmes of Professor Kruse's second musical festival to take place at the Queen's Hall in April. It will, however, be interesting to hear the many standard works set down for performance under Herr Weingartner's direction. Such things as Weingartner's own "Orchesterlieder," Hugo Wolf's Italian Capriccio, and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Tasso," will moreover be new to most, while the appearance of Dr. Henry Coward's Sheffield chorus in "The Dream of Gerontius," the choral symphony, and the Mass in D will be another interesting feature of the festival. A famous operatic singer will also be heard in Frl. Thérèse Malten. A rather striking omission on the other hand is that of any work by the most notable of all living composers. One scans the list in vain for the name of Richard Strauss.

THE world is clearly going to hear a good deal of Miss Paula Szalit, the brilliant young Austrian pianist who produced at her two recent recitals such a profound impression on all—or say nearly all, for there was at least one notable exception—who heard her. At present Miss Szalit gives signs of proving more a second Madame Schumann than another Sophie Menter or Carreño; and without implying the least disparagement of anyone this is certainly not matter for regret. In a word it is even more by her wonderful musicianship than by the perfection of her technique as such that the young player has impressed her hearers. Whether she will prove of any particular account as a composer is, of course, a much more open question.

BUT at least the little pieces of her own creation, which she played at her second recital, possessed certain merits none too common, showing a sense of form as well as of beauty too seldom encountered in compositions of this order. One called an Impromptu, in which suggestions of Mendelssohn and Chopin seemed equally blended, pleased especially, and had to be repeated, but the others were almost equally clever and interesting. Miss Szalit, by the way, is another instance of a prodigy who has redeemed the promise of her youth. When quite a child, it seems, she attracted the attention of connoisseurs in Germany by her precocious attainments, and is even alluded to, in this connection, in Oscar Bie's well-known work, published some years ago, on the pianoforte. Her recent studies have been directed, it seems, by Leschetizky, who should certainly be proud of such a pupil.

THE raising of their gallery prices from 1s. to 2s. 6d. by the Philharmonic Society seems hardly a happy move. It may be that at most other orchestral concerts the higher charge is made, but in this matter our oldest musical organization might well have held by that conservative policy which it displays so often in other matters. The change can hardly benefit the society's income to any appreciable extent, whereas it will mean a very considerable difference indeed to the many young and struggling music lovers who find even 2s. 6d. a strain on their resources. Musicians, perhaps, do not always realize how much they owe to the shilling and half-crown public by whom as often as not the reputations are made which stimulate the subsequent patronage of the higher priced seats.

MR. JOHN LANE announces a new illustrated series of monographs, biographical, bibliographical and critical, entitled "Living Masters of Music." The first volume, "Henry J. Wood," will be issued early in February, and it will be followed by volumes on Richard Strauss, by Alfred Kalisch; Edward Elgar, by R. J. Buckley; Paderewski, by E. A. Baughan; Alfred Bruneau, by Arthur Hervey; and Joachim, by J. A. Fuller Maitland.

MRS. NEWMARCH, the editor of the series, is to be congratulated, moreover, on her choice of "subjects," and on the capable hands to which they have been entrusted. As one of the first of living authorities on Russian music she herself should deal in a peculiarly sympathetic spirit with the work of Mr. Wood. One of the sanest and most acute of living critics will handle the fascinating problem presented by the works of Richard Strauss in the person of Mr. Kalisch. Mr. Arthur Hervey will be fulfilling a congenial task, which he is pre-eminently qualified to discharge successfully in discussing the work of Bruneau. Mr. Baughan's "Paderewski" may be trusted to make good reading; while Mr. Buckley and Mr. Fuller Maitland in their turn will be discoursing on subjects with which they are in completest sympathy. It is to be hoped, however, that one danger will be guarded against. Such works should not be all butter.

THE reappearance in London of Eugen D'Albert has been an event of interest. Since he shook the dust of England off his feet, under circumstances which it is now unnecessary to recall, and became an adopted son of Germany, D'Albert's visits to what is, at least, the land of his birth have been singularly intermittent. Yet he has certainly not lacked appreciation whenever he has deigned to visit us, even if his somewhat unromantic personality is of a sort to militate, perhaps, against his ever becoming a fashionable pianist. Yet he has every other qualification requisite to the attainment of this end, not omitting a readiness to play to the gallery in a manner which, truth to tell, consorts not very happily with his reputation as a musician. When the "little giant," as they call him, lets himself go, there are few, indeed, who can make more noise. But he is a great pianist all the same.

MUSICIANS have been divided into various camps at different times—from those of the Gluckists and Piccinists to the Straussites and anti-Straussites of to-day. Apparently the mechanical piano is to prove yet another bone of discord. At least the most different opinions are held concerning it. On the one hand you have those who will make no sort of terms with such a child of Belial, and scout the suggestion that it possesses any kind of value. On the other there are those who, sceptical perhaps at first, have modified their opinions altogether with closer knowledge of the subject, and in particular are impressed by the educational possibilities of these instruments. As usual, no doubt, the truth lies somewhere betwixt the extremes. While no one in his senses can maintain that even the best of these contrivances begets results to be compared with the performances of, say, a de Pachmann or a Paderewski, yet their superiority to those of the average domestic performer is obvious enough.

I do not hesitate, indeed, to say that an immense amount of nonsense is talked concerning the demerits of these wonderful instruments by those who suppose themselves to demonstrate thereby the acuteness of their perceptions, and I should dearly like to see some kind of a test match organised at which certain of these hypercritical gentry should be called upon to distinguish between a pianola and an ordinary pianist when both were operating behind a screen. Many, no doubt, would spot which was which pretty readily, but many others, I am sure, would do nothing of the kind, and even the most cocksure might, I fancy, find themselves more puzzled now and again than they would imagine possible. It is, of course, the uniformity of tone colour of the mechanical piano which is at present its besetting weakness. But who shall say that even this difficulty may not be overcome in time? Where so much has been achieved already nothing seems impossible.

Art

I AM glad to see that Mr. Fairman Ordish raises a note of warning in "Cornhill" about the improvements of Westminster; and all the more glad am I in that he is as hot an admirer of the London County Council and its aims as I am. The triumph of the Council over the intrigues of the syndicate that nearly overthrew them in the House of Lords gave joy to all lovers of London. But there is just one matter in which I would raise my voice with Mr. Ordish in a prayer to the Council to save a little piece of historic old London. Of the main scheme and its fine effect when completed there can be no two opinions. And that is all the more reason for the Council to honour the little wedge of old London that is of historic value. The little court in North Street, so characteristically Dutch in architecture, so English in memories, has no equal in London. This court should be saved at all costs. And besides these houses, there are Little College Street, Great College Street, and College Mews, which are so sacred in memory that it will be to the eternal shame of every Londoner to-day should they be swept away. Fortunately Cowley Street and Barton Street near by are safe. They are like a cathedral close. These quiet streets are full of memories which every human soul with a scrap of imagination loves to recall. Keats lived here;

Gibbon lived and visited here; and the blotting out of the filthy squalid area between St. John's Church and Horseferry Road should not only not call for the destruction of these old streets, but should enhance their charm. Once destroyed, no art of man, no remorse, can replace or recall them. They should remain to London's honour.

MR. HENRY ROSE, in his lecture at the Polytechnic in Regent Street upon the Story of Sculpture "From Phidias to Flaxman," gave a fair survey of the subject in such fashion that it might be understood by the man in the street—and that is no easy task. His survey was happier in the Greek stage than in the modern; but he took the judicial attitude rather than the personal, and the dead masters have of course more to yield in the way of tributes from the great dead, though such tributes are often out of proportion owing to the weight of the names of such as rendered the homage. Nobody, for instance, would think of taking Ruskin's estimate of Rembrandt or of Whistler as being of much higher significance than that of a Vaudeville farce to-day. And it is perhaps for this reason that whilst Mr. Rose over-rated the value of the Albert Memorial, he omitted to mention the name of one of the greatest of modern sculptors, Rodin. That the Greeks themselves did not fully appreciate their own treasures is grimly evidenced by the fact that whilst their writers mention with enthusiasm some works which are not so highly estimated to-day, there is no mention amongst them all of the greatest Greek statue, the Venus of Melos! And Mr. Rose, though he said it diffidently enough, was quite right when he stated that the early Victorian rage for the Apollo Belvedere was overdone. But I was sorry to think that Mr. Rose thrust a shaft of satire at the youth from Hampstead who considered that Englishmen were the successors of the Greek youth in manly beauty. Personally I am of a mind with Mrs. Raggles when she uttered her immortal dictum, "I have seen Apollo Belvedere, and I have seen Raggles; and I say give me Raggles."

THE Society of British Sculptors has formed itself at last; and let us hope that it will avoid the pitiful jealousies and black blood of the two societies that Providence, in merciful wisdom, raised out of the murk of the last mid-century to destroy each other and prevent the handing down of the ghastly traditions of that day. I would like here, at the beginning of a new society, to make a suggestion: It is an obvious fact, if a sad one, that sculpture in itself does not attract an audience such as pictures will attract, just as pictures will not attract so large an audience as the drama. Now, a society of sculptors presumably forms itself in order to reach a wider public, for he who despises the public and the taste of the public will very easily avoid contact with that public by shutting himself up in his studio. If a society of sculptors wish to draw a large public, they should exhibit not only statuary figures, but examples of the application of statuary to the arts and crafts. Let me give a few examples: the cremation of the dead is becoming daily more national, yet I have never seen a fine design for the ashes of the dead—and this though it is in relation to the loved dead that people have one of the most pious and reverent feelings. It is, in fact, a strange thing that the making of that one form of sculpture that everyone has to fall back upon during some part of their experience, the gravestone, has passed wholly to the ghastly and gruesome yards where the monument-maker plies his miserable chisel, hammering it into marble and stone to the disfigurement of modern places of burial. Then again there is the carved mantel—almost a lost source of beauty. There are, in fact, a dozen and one applications of the sculptor's art which are pushed aside for the mere statue which only the very rich can buy, and which very few even of them want. It must have struck even the sculptors themselves that a visit to the sculpture-room of a picture gallery always leaves a certain impression of the uselessness of statues to an ordinary man of means. The carved doorway with figures is rarely seen in model; in fact, the ordinary man associates the sculptor with the maker of funeral arrangements, and relegates his sphere to the damp corners of churches. The meeting of sculptors the other day seems to have been enthusiastic and promising; and the rivalry of the several societies of artists to which they belong seems to have been thrust aside in the endeavour to found a really national institution. The last few years have seen a remarkable re-birth of sculpture throughout the land, and I hope that the society may have all the success it deserves; indeed, it is born at an auspicious time, and carries the good wishes of every lover of art with it.

THE Royal Academy is to be congratulated on its common sense in electing, to give itself honour, so very fine an artist as Mr. Brangwyn. He ought to have been elected at least ten years ago, but that is another story. The Academicians may be surprised to hear it, but he is a far finer artist than Bonnat, who is loaded with honours by his own Government; but he is elected, and the Academy will soon discover his value. Frank Brangwyn is one of the finest painters in Europe to-day; few but our forty immortals could have drowsed through that fact. He has an individual and a personal force that has created quite a school already, and has had a marked effect on art abroad. He is one of the few men of genius who manage to keep a decorative effect in harmony with the full pictorial and artistic impression. His "Venice" will never again be "skied" on the walls of the Academy, and his election greatly strengthens that body. Mr. Charles Furse, the second painter elected to the roll of this great national Academy, is a painter of considerable talent, and is another strong prop taken from the New English Art Club, where most of his career was won. He is best known for his portraiture; and his technique and artistic qualities make him a useful addition to the ranks of the Academy. Mr. Pegram's sculpture has steadily won him recognition as a good artist, and he has once or twice almost made a sensation. He is one of the new school of sculptors who have brought back almost a lost art to England.

As regards the foreign elections of honour to the Royal Academy, it is rather fantastic to see Frémiet put before Rodin; but, given the academic bias of mind, Frémiet is an addition to the honorary immortals. His equestrian "Joan of Arc" we all know as she rides out of her square in the Place des Pyramides into the Rue de Rivoli, and half the jewellers' shops of Paris sell little gold models of this work. It was this same Joan who caused so much adverse criticism amongst the people of Paris, until Frémiet, irritated by their carping, and foolishly listening to it, modelled another Joan, and, during the upheaval and confusion of the street when the underground railway was being made, placed the new Joan in the old Joan's seat, only to find the new Joan execrated, and the old Joan become a work of art and a national idol! Bonnat, the painter, with a marked style of his own, has done some very fine work. It must be rather a grim satisfaction to these two distinguished men that one had to wait until he was seventy, and the other until he was eighty, before this high honour fell upon him. Few who saw it will forget Frémiet's large "Gorilla carrying off a Woman."

THERE seems to be a good deal of flutter in the studios about the new rule of the Royal Academy which allows three pictures only from outsiders and six from insiders at the coming show; but (I do not know whether it is my fancy) I thought that three was the number decided upon long months ago. However that may be, I am bound to say I do not think the complaint against the Academy is quite fair—and no one will accuse me of a cringing faith in that somnolent body. I think that when a man has won his spurs in art he is entitled to more consideration than the youngsters who are knocking at the gate, and who have not yet established themselves. But surely this limiting of numbers of pictures sent in is simply a saving of the trouble and time of the Council of the Academicians who select for the year; and as they do absolutely nothing else for their position during the year, their labours for a few days do not move me to tears on their behalf. I would far rather see thirty pictures of Brangwyn's hung than, say, only two Brangwyns and braces of this, that and the other mediocrity. And another improvement loudly called for is the hanging of all a man's work together as at the Champ de Mars Salon in Paris. In this way a man gets his share of line and sky much more fairly; and he can control the surroundings of his pictures. But why bawl into the ears of the Royal Academy?

A RUSKIN EXHIBITION is to be held at the Manchester City Art Gallery, opening on March 23 next and closing on May 14, of pictures and other works of art illustrating the life and work of Ruskin, including the early Italian painters, Turner, the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, and also Ruskiniana such as letters and manuscripts. The Committee have offers of loans sufficient to show that the exhibition, which is being organised for them by Mr. W. G. Collingwood, will be extremely interesting.

University Extension

An Experiment in Bibliography

THE British Museum is often regarded by the younger sort as a sepulchre of specimens dated at least 5000 B.C., and avoided accordingly; to many it is known as the shrine of the Portland Vase (and nothing else), and the fact that there existed a "lecture-room" in the building at Bloomsbury came as a piece of fresh intelligence to a large number of those who were present at the "Bibliographical Visit" last Saturday, to which I referred recently. The room in question is known more properly as the Assyrian Saloon and provides the only apartment ever given up to legitimate lectures. That it is not more often used for that purpose is a matter for no small surprise; Mr. Chad Boscawen lectures occasionally on the subjects with which the walls are covered, and I am not overstepping the mark in saying that otherwise the room is little used. One of the Museum attendants even expressed ignorance of the existence of any such lecture room!

These remarks come under the heading of University Extension because of the fact that the Central Association of U.E. Students (would they had some shorter designation!) is determined to rectify this state of affairs by bringing into requisition this lecture room as a new supplementary force in Extension work.

The above visit was not a visit in the general sense of the term. There was no procession of wondering individuals blindly following their leader through the galleries. Such proceedings are of little or no value. But the utility of a lecture room capable of seating two or three hundred people within the Museum itself—in the precincts of the subject matter of the lecture—will be easily understood by any who recognise what our museums are really worth. University Extension work must be strictly unlimited, and not partake of the nature of certain organised visits to private collections which are matters for "the happy few."

I must devote the remainder of the present article to a brief consideration of the occasion mentioned above, when Dr. Emil Reich attended to receive questions from any of those present ("questions on subjects of any science whatever"), then to point out the books whence the desired information might be sought. Dr. Reich's aim was to give some idea of the methods to pursue and the facilities that are available in unearthing and assimilating the accumulated knowledge of the past. To know which books to go to for what, is the best knowledge a student can desire, and that is the science of bibliography.

The interest taken in this experiment was evinced by the two hundred and more who were present, and by the variety of questions submitted to the "Examiner." At the end of an hour and a quarter Dr. Reich had not finished going through the batch of queries, and as each question was the occasion for individual explanation and comment respecting the books used in tracing it out, it will be seen that the afternoon was in reality devoted to a biographical lecture or demonstration.

To use his own words, Dr. Reich desired to demonstrate "that the masses of learning which have been accumulated in books, printed books, during the last five centuries, are not a pathless waste in which the explorer upon the track of knowledge is compelled to wander haphazard upon the off-hand chance of some day running across the information he requires; scholars have long ago reduced the chances of going astray to a minimum, and they can now hunt down their information with both rapidity and almost mathematical precision."

He then proceeded to hunt down his prey. The first question referred to the old theory of "The Discovery of America by the Chinese." He first went direct to the Bibliography of Cordier, the French sinologue, dealing exclusively with China. But supposing Cordier not to be known, the seeker has then to refer to the keystone of all bibliographical investigation, the Manuel de Bibliographie Générale, the work of M. Henri Stein. This work is practically a subject-catalogue of bibliographies, and under Chine will be found the reference to Cordier's work.

And so with the subsequent questions. Some occasioned the mention and use of the Subject-Index of the Printed Books in the British Museum, three volumes invaluable for contemporary literature, containing the names of all the books acquired since 1880, classified under their subjects. Then, again, there is Sonnenschein's "Readers' Guide" and "Best Books."

Another question meant reference to Kletke's bibliography of Prussian History, which contains, in addition to all that concerns such history in printed books, even the key to the unprinted material in the Berlin libraries—"when you have exhausted Kletke you may be satisfied that nothing has escaped you."

Dr. Reich then explained the nature of the German Jahrbücher; each particular science having its "Year Book," which contains, in systematic arrangement, a record of all that has appeared during the year concerning the particular science.

And so the questions continued to exhaust the list of compilations that exist for the facility of reference—the handmaidens of bibliography. The success of this experiment will lead, let us hope, to the regular course of lectures on Bibliography which Dr. Reich anticipates giving next year.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK announces that the next volume of the "Book-Lovers Library," to be published in the popular issue of the series, will be Mr. W. Carew Hazlitt's "Studies in Jocular Literature."

Correspondence

Tolstoi and the Babies

SIR,—In your issue of 30th January a writer, C. W. Saleeby, in the course of a most interesting article called "Tolstoi and the Babies," says, "you will tell me that . . . it is human nature that the All-Good Father has made 'desperately wicked'—as the theologians assure us."

Can the writer of the article quote any one theologian, of any one school of Christian thought, as having anywhere taught such colossal nonsense?—Yours, &c.,

STUDENT IN HOLY ORDERS.

Sonnets from the Portuguese

SIR,—In his preface to Mrs. Browning's "Sonnets from the Portuguese" Mr. Edmund Gosse remarks that "there is a marked absence in the 'Sonnets from the Portuguese' of all slovenly false rhymes, of all careless, half-meaningless locutions, of all practical jokes played upon the parts of speech." The sonnets are most of them very fine, no doubt. But still there are a good many bad rhymes, it seems to me, as e.g., in Sonnet XIII., where enough—rough—off—proof—are supposed to rhyme. As regards meaningless locutions, would some reader of THE ACADEMY be kind enough to explain to me the following lines from Sonnet XV. ? :—

"On me thou lookest with no doubting care,
As on a bee shut in a crystal line.
Since sorrow hath shut me safe in love's divine,
And to spread wing and fly in the outer air
Were most impossible failure, if I strove
To fail so."

—Yours, &c.,

E. DICK.

Shelley : Victor and Cazire

SIR,—Having failed in the ordinary course of business to establish communication with a gentleman or lady using the initials "G. S." in THE ACADEMY for 19 December, 1903, I venture to ask space for a few lines concerning the reported fourth copy of "Original Poetry by Victor and Cazire."

When I published "The Shelley Library" no copy at all was publicly known to exist. Now three are known and will be duly described under their owners' names in the complement of that work and in future editions of Shelley. Of course, if there is a fourth it also should be described; but I should naturally hesitate to affirm that a fourth copy is expected to be in the hands of a lady or gentleman writing under the initials "G. S." if and when it should please the Lord to take the present incumbent of the said "G. S." reversion.

The genuineness of a copy of such a rare book as this requires establishment on the authority of an expert. As the book has been fac-simile'd, it can be faked; and Shelley's presentation would not put the experienced faker in much difficulty.—Yours, &c.,

46, Marlborough Hill, N.W.

H. BUXTON FORMAN.

"Fitz"

SIR,—Will you allow me to say, in reference to Mr. Meynell's very kind review of my "Life of Edward FitzGerald," that I was quite surprised to find that I had made no acknowledgment in my Preface of the help obtained from Mr. E. V. Lucas' article in THE ACADEMY. The article was of real service to me. There is a reference to it in a footnote in Volume I., page 149.—Yours, &c.,

Olney, Bucks.

THOMAS WRIGHT.

[Other Letters held over.]

BOOKSELLERS' Catalogues Received.—Mr. W. M. Murphy, Liverpool (Miscellaneous); Mr. Henry Bumpus, High Holborn (General); Mr. Bertram Dobell, Charing Cross Road (Manuscripts and Autograph Letters); Messrs. Douglas and Foulis, Edinburgh (Biography, Travel, History, and General); Mr. Wilfrid M. Voynich, Soho Square, W. (MSS. and General); Messrs. Day's Library, Mount Street, W. (History, Biography, Travel, &c.); Messrs. Hatchards, Piccadilly, W. (Books of To-day and To-morrow).

"Academy" Questions & Answers

Questions and Answers for this column must be addressed to THE EDITOR, THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, 9, East Harding Street, London, E.C. The envelope to be marked in the top left-hand corner "A.Q.A." Full name and address must be sent, not necessarily for publication. Each Question or Answer must be written on a separate sheet of paper and on only one side of the paper. The Editor will not undertake the forwarding of any correspondence. Questions must be confined to matters of Literature, History, Archaeology, Folk-lore, Art, Music, and the Drama. The Editor reserves the right of deciding whether or not any Question or Answer is of sufficient interest to be published.

COMPETITION

Until further notice, four prizes, of the value of 5s. each, will be awarded weekly for the two best Questions and the two best Answers contributed to "Academy" Questions and Answers.

The Editor's decision must be considered absolutely final and no correspondence whatever will be entered upon with regard to the awards. The prizes will go to those Questions and Answers which are deemed to be of the greatest general interest, and briefly in all cases will count as a merit.

The names and addresses of prize-winners will not be published, but the winning Questions and Answers will be indicated by an asterisk (*).

The prizes will consist of 5s. worth of books to be chosen by the several prize-winners. The name and address of the booksellers where the book or books can be obtained will be given.

Each prize-winner in the United Kingdom will be advised that a credit note has been sent to a bookseller as early as possible in his (or her) immediate neighbourhood, and that on demand he (or she) may choose a book or books to the value of 5s. Winners outside the United Kingdom will receive a cheque for 5s.

Non-adherence to the rules and regulations of "Questions and Answers" will imply disqualification.

No Questions or Answers received after Monday will be considered eligible for the current week's competition.

No competitor can win a prize more than once in three months.

Questions

LITERATURE

FRANK SEAFIELD, M.A.—Biography of this author wanted. He wrote "Literature and Curiosities of Dreams," referred to in the "Encyclopædia Britannica," as the standard work on the subject of dreams.—W. F.

* DOGBERRY.—Is Shakspeare responsible, in Dogberry (1600), for the introduction into English literature of characters who, like Mrs. Slipslop (1742) and Mrs. Malaprop (1775), misapply or attach wrong meanings to words?—L. F. P.

ORIGIN OF RHYME.—At what period and in what country was rhyme first used, and who was the first known writer to employ it?—A. J. (Leeds).

GIBBSING'S LAST WORK.—How should "The private papers of Henry Rycroft" be classified? As a novel?—W. P.

DEATH OF SIR HENRY GAGE, 1645.—Do the following lines form part of a poem; if so, where can I find it?—

"Drums, beat an onset; let the rebels feel How sharp our grief is by our sharper steel!"—R. J. Fynmore.

EDGAR ALLAN POE.—What is the correct pronunciation of the poet's surname? If as two syllables, would not a dieresis be needed on the last letter?—W. P.

HISTORY

PARLIAMENT FIELD.—There is an obscure locality near Brailles called Traitor's Ford, at a passage of the river Stour, on the borders of Oxfordshire and Warwickshire, which connects an ancient roadway from Brailles to Hooknorton; this roadway appears to bound and separate four parishes. Adjoining is "Parliament Field," where Oliver Cromwell is believed to have encamped with his troops. Can any student of the Civil Wars identify the date of this campaign?—A. Hall.

"OLD NOBS."—In the Creevey Papers George III. is referred to as "Old Nobs." In "Pickwick" Sam Weller applies the same nickname to his father. Is there any other reference to "Old Nobs," or is it a coincidence?—F. A. S.

GENERAL

* TEA IN ENGLAND BEFORE 1657.—Tea began to be used as a national beverage when Garraway opened a tea-house in Exchange Alley in 1657. Wanted: references to tea-drinking in England before that year.—Harmatopegos.

WEIGH—WAY.—Can any of your readers say when the misspelling of "weigh" for "way" in the phrase "to get under way," used of a ship making good progress, first came in? It is an ignorant mistake probably arising from confusion with the phrase "to weigh anchor." Surely there is no such substantive in English as "weigh." Moreover, as Professor Skeat once pointed out to me, the Dutch have a similar expression to signify "getting under way" in the ordinary sense of "way." F. (Cambridge).

MONUMENTAL TEXTS.—When did the practice originate of inscribing texts or scriptural quotations on tombstones? Are there any examples earlier than about 1690?—A. W. (Cambridge).

CLASSIC—ROMANTIC.—Can any of your readers give a short definition of the terms "classic" and "romantic," not applying to nature, literature, art, epochs separately, but a general definition that would point out the essential nature of the terms?—R. G. (Nürnberg).

GERMAN "V" AND "W".—What is the equation or distinction between "v" and "w" in modern high German? Of two abridged dictionaries now before me, one puts "Gull = möve," but also "möwe = sea-gull"; the other varies thus, "mewe, möwe = sea-gull," also "gull = die meve."—Querist.

WHITE HEN'S CHICKEN.—My landlady greeted one of her children who had received a present with this phrase: I next met it in Burton's "Anatomy" in the form of "Pallus Jovis et gallinae filius albae"; this classical authority suggests some connection with the soothsayer's birds. Taken literally it does not seem a happy expression; a white hen here proved so bad a mother to her brood that only one chicken attained a sunted maturity; and this one now walks about with a deprecating air, sometimes furtively laying a diminutive egg, with an apologetic cry very different from the usual cackle of triumph. Can anyone say if the expression be common, and throw light upon its origin?—Luke.

Answers

LITERATURE

* LEE PRIORY BOOKS.—"Bibliotheca Cantiana," published by J. Russell Smith 1837, page 237, mentions in a catalogue of J. W. Southgate's collection of Lee Priory Books, sold by auction in 1833. Lee Warley bequeathed a library of books to Eltham, Kent—they are, I believe, kept in the vestry of the church there. See Arch. Cant., Vol. x., pages 68-9. In volume xxv. Arch. Cant., page 266, there is a descriptive catalogue of documents belonging to the Kent Archaeological Society, preserved at Maidstone, and amongst the papers is a book with memoranda by Henry Oxenden, wherein mention is made from time to time of books lent to friends with great liberality.—R. J. Fynmore.

* OHNE PHOSPHOR KEIN GEDANKE.—I doubt if this expression was used by Goethe. Professor W. James in his "Principles of Psychology" (vol. I., page 101), quotes the saying as "a noted war-cry of the 'materialists' during the excitement on that subject which filled Germany in the '60's."—M. A. C. (Cambridge).

* PROSERPINA.—Shakespeare's authority is Ovid—Met. v. 399. In what translation he read the incident of the fallen flowers with the rest of the beautiful story (having "little Latin"), who shall say? I have not by me Arthur Golding's translations in Alexandrine verse, which had gone through seven editions, at least in Shakespeare's time; but he would not be likely to have disguised the incidents of the story much. Sandys does not; but he of course is too late for Shakespeare.—H. Buxton Forman.

[Replies also received from G. E. D. (Richmond) and H. C.]

* SCALIGER.—In "Ebert, Allgemeines Bibliographisches Lexikon" (1830) I find mentioned: "Scaliger, Jos. Just. Opus de emendatione temporum, &c., Col (onia) Allobr. (aude Err. Genevae), typis Roverianis, 1629 f." The same work also contains a "Verzeichnis aller Echten Aldinischen Drucke" in which an edition of Cicero, "Epistolae," is noted as having been published in 1652 as well as in 1579.—D. S. (Amsterdam).

* CALIGULA.—The reference is Suetonius "Life of Caligula," chapter 50. In Holland's translation (anno. 1606) the passage is thus rendered: "He was troubled: out of all with want of sleepe; for he slept not above three hours in a night: and in those verily hee tooke no quiet repose, but fearefull and skared with strange illusions and fantasticall imaginations; as who among the rest, dreamed upon a time that hee saw the very forme and resemblance of the sea talking with him."—H. W. M.

* HUMPHREY HOUR.—Richard tells his mother that the only "comfortable hour" he has given her was the hour of his birth. "Humphrey Hour" meant a time of emptiness, when a man "dined with Duke Humphrey," i.e., paced the nave of old St. Paul's, by the tomb of Humphrey, Duke of Gloster, while those who could afford it were eating their dinners.—Pedagogue.

AUTHOR FOUND:—

The verse is by Guido Gürres, born 1805, died 1852. Gürres has edited a collection of historical ballads, written by himself and the Count Pocci, under the title "Österreichischer Festkalender." The ballad is called "Belagerung Wien's durch die Türken," and begins with the verse:—

"Ein Falke späht vom Felsenest
Hinaus, hinaus ins Land,
Er späht nach Ost, er späht nach West
Hinauf, hinab, den Strand—
Der Falke ist Graf Starckenberg," &c.

Guido Gürres, one of the "Jüngere Romantiker," wrote also many legends and "Volksmärchen."—W. F. Stolz (Zleb, bei Caslau, Bohemia).

[Reply also from M. A. C. (Cambridge).]

THEATRE

WIND ON THE STAGE.—In answer to "Vanity Vair," the whirling of leaves on the ground and off the trees was well reproduced in "Oyranoe de Bergerac," Act v., Sc. v.; according to the stage directions "À ce moment un peu de brise fait tomber des feuilles."—M. S. (Bookham).

GENERAL

STATUE OF CROMWELL AT WESTMINSTER.—The sculptor was Hamo Thornycroft. It was not unveiled by Lord Rosebery, but was uncovered without any ceremony by the workmen of the Office of Works on November 14, 1899.—D. J.

[Similar replies received from A. R. B. (Malvern) and M. M. Dobrée.]

* NOT FIT TO HOLD A CANDLE TO HIM.—The "New English Dictionary" gives older instances of the use of this phrase than that quoted by Clericus, e.g., 1550. Crowley: "Disse players . . . that have nothing to playe for . . . Holde the candle to them that have wherewith, and will sette lustily to it." 1614. T. Adams: "Let Plato then, hold the candle to Moses." 1640. Sir E. Dering: "Not worthy to hold the candle to Aristotle."—T. H. (Ely).

* TO HOLD A CANDLE TO HIM.—The custom of holding the candle for a reader dates back to the old times when illuminations were scarce and inadequate. One can fancy that in the lady's bower the favourite page, or the privileged maid would be the one to stand near the mistress and "hold the candle." The phrase, perhaps, has acquired additional weight from ecclesiastical usage; for the reading of the Gospel, two servers held the candles; and the appropriateness of the externals to the act of proclaiming the Light of the World, led to the erecting of the necessary device into a liturgical symbol familiar to us to-day.—S. C.

[Replies also from M. A. C. (Cambridge) and Alpha.]

* THE OX WITH THE CRUMPLED HORN.—"The ox" is the still, "the horn" the twisted "worm"—hence "crumpled" horn. The figure is common in many drinking songs, thus—

"I'll buy a milch cow that will never run dry,
And I'll milk her by twisting her horn."

"Treading out the corn" means extracting the spirit from the grain. As far as I know the figure is confined to such songs.—T. W.

* COUNTING-OUT VERSES.—The form which I knew as a boy ran thus:—

"Ena mena, mona, mite,
Piska, lava, bora, bite,
Ulga, bulga, bo:
Eggs, butter, cheese, bread,
stick, stack, stone, dead."

The form which "Pet Marjorie" used, and which so greatly delighted Sir Walter Scott, is thus given by Dr. John Brown:—

"Woney, twoery, tickery, seven;
Alibi, crackaby, ten and eleven;
Pin, pin, musky, dan,
Twiddle um, twiddle um, twenty-wan;
Kerie, orle, ourle,
You, are, out."

I believe that a book on "Counting-out Rimes" was published a few years back. Perhaps some correspondent will give author's name and title of book.—C. A.

NOTE.—"The House that Jack Built." Reply received from A. C. (Olmsteadford). "Kipling." Replies received from R. G. W. (Richmond, Yorks), J. T. (Blackpool) and F. C. G. (Dublin). Correspondents may note that if they do not wish to compete for the weekly prizes they can endorse their Questions or Answers: "not for competition."

PRIZES.—The asterisks denote the two questions and two answers to which prizes have been awarded. The winners can obtain, on application at the following booksellers, Five Shillings' worth of books. Notices have been despatched to the several winners and to the four booksellers whose names follow:—

Slatter and Rose, 16, High Street, Oxford.
Mr. Henry Bumpus, 335, High Holborn, W.C.
Loneragan & Co., Patrick Street, Fernoy, County Cork.
Sherratt and Hughes, 27, St. Ann's Street, Manchester.

The Far East—Books to Read Now

JAPAN AND CHINA.

By Captain F. BRINKLEY,

For many years Special Correspondent of The Times at Tokyo.

PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED.

Only a limited edition available for the United Kingdom, viz. 1—500 Library Edition in 12 vols., at 14s. net per volume, and 35 Edition de Luxe at 42s. net per volume.

Ten Volumes now ready.

"Enormously in advance of all existing literature on the subject."—The Athenæum.
"Promises to be the standard work on the subject for a long time to come."—The Times.

DETAILED PROSPECTUS ON APPLICATION.

London: T. C. & E. C. JACK, 34, Henrietta St., W.C.; and Edinburgh.

THE BOOK OF THE MOMENT.

JAPANESE PHYSICAL TRAINING.

The System of Exercise, Diet, and General Mode of Living that has made the Mikado's People the Healthiest, Strongest, and Happiest Men and Women in the World.

By H. IRVING HANCOCK.

Fully Illustrated, crown 8vo, cloth extra, 5s. net.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS,

24, Bedford Street, Strand, London; and New York.

INDIA IMPRESSIONS.

By C. F. KEARY.

"If anyone wishes to read a distinguished piece of writing, which pleases the artistic sense, places the India of the Indians before him in an unhackneyed style, contains some practical words and many details, yet also the mystery and glamour of the East, let him take up this modest booklet."

—Bookman.

Letters from John Chinaman

SIXTH THOUSAND.

"A very remarkable and exceptionally able book."

—Fall Mail Gazette.

1s. net. R. BRIMLEY JOHNSON, Adam St., Strand. 1s. net.

Just Published.

NEW MAP OF KOREA. By ANGUS HAMILTON, F.R.G.S. Scale, 35 miles to an inch. Hills graphically shown by means of colour shading, and existing, partly constructed, and proposed railways clearly distinguished. Size, 30 in. by 29 in. Prices:—Coloured sheet, 5s.; mounted to fold in case, 7s. 6d.; on board, flat, 7s. 6d.

Just Published.

STANFORD'S MAP OF EASTERN CHINA, JAPAN, AND KOREA, with an Inset Map on a larger scale of Korea, Shantung Peninsula, Kiao-Chau, Wei-hai-wei, and Port Arthur. Scale, 110 miles to an inch. Size, 32 in. by 30 in. Coloured sheet, 3s.; mounted to fold in case, 5s. List of the best Books and Maps bearing upon the Far Eastern Crisis and other Eastern Questions post free on application.

London: EDWARD STANFORD, 12, 13, & 14, Long Acre, W.C.
Geographer to His Majesty the King.

ASIA and EUROPE.

Studies presenting the conclusions formed by the Author in a long life devoted to the subject of the relations between Asia and Europe.

By MEREDITH TOWNSEND.

New and Cheaper Edition with an additional chapter. Crown 8vo. Price 5s. net.

A. CONSTABLE & Co., Ltd., WESTMINSTER.

SPECIAL WAR EDITIONS.

THE STORY OF JAPAN.

By DAVID MURRAY, Ph.D., LL.D. Late Advisor to the Japanese Minister of Education.

With 34 Illustrations and a Map. Story of the Nations. 5s.

THE STORY OF RUSSIA.

By W. R. MORFILL, M.A. Reader in Russian and other Slavonic Languages.

With 60 Illustrations including Maps. Story of the Nations. 5s.

London: T. FISHER UNWIN, London, E.C.

JUST PUBLISHED.

Things Chinese:

OR, NOTES CONNECTED WITH CHINA.

BY

J. DYER BALL, M.B.A.S., M.N.C.B.R.A.S., H.M. Civil Service, Hong Kong;
Author of "Cantonese Made Easy," "How to Speak Cantonese."

Fourth Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Demy 8vo, 12s. net.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

RUSSIAN SELF-TAUGHT

(Marlborough's Self-Taught Series).

By C. A. THIMM, F.R.G.S.

EDITED BY J. MARSHALL, M.A., OXFORD.

Contains Travel Talk, Conversations of Daily Life in the Home, Street, Railway, Steamboat. For Cyclists, Photographers, Fishing and Shooting, etc., Naval, Military, Commercial and Trading Terms. So arranged that they may be learned AT A GLANCE. A simplified Grammar is included, and the ENGLISH PHONETIC PRONUNCIATION is given throughout.

Crown 8vo, Blue Wrapper, 2s. Red Cloth, 2s. 6d.

"A noticeable feature is the simple manner in which the difficult and intricate grammar is explained. Useful to officers of both Services."—United Service Gazette.

London: E. MARLBOROUGH & Co., 51, Old Bailey, E.C.

KOREA.

By ANGUS HAMILTON.

Profusely Illustrated from Photographs by the Author. 1 Vol. 15s. net.

"Mr. Hamilton, who was the special correspondent of the Pail Mail Gazette in the Far East, examines in this important and timely work the political and economic conditions of the kingdom. There are chapters on the possibilities of the commercial development of the country, on the manners and customs and laws of the people, and, as a whole, the book may be considered to contain the latest and most authentic information upon the Russo-Japanese dispute."

RUSSIA, JAPAN, AND KOREA.

London: WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

ENGLAND AND TIBET.

IN THE FORBIDDEN LAND.

By A. HENRY SAVAGE LANDOR.

With a Map and 250 Illustrations. Cheaper Edition, 7s. 6d. net.

"A valuable storehouse of information on Southern Tibet and its people."—Daily Chronicle.

London: WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

Two Important Books by FRED. T. JANE,

Author of "All the World's Fighting Ships" (Naval Annual).

A NEW AND COMPLETELY REVISED EDITION OF

THE IMPERIAL RUSSIAN NAVY.

With over 150 Illustrations from Sketches and Drawings by the Author and from Photographs. Royal 8vo, cloth extra, 25s. net.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF

THE TORPEDO IN PEACE AND WAR.

With about 30 Full-page and smaller Illustrations by the Author. Oblong folio, cloth gilt, 5s. net.

W. THACKER & Co., 2, Creed Lane, E.C.

MY JAPANESE WIFE

(A Japanese Idyll.)

By CLIVE HOLLAND.

Twelve Editions of this book have already been printed, and the thirteenth is nearly out of print. Crown 8vo, with Coloured Frontispiece, price 3s. 6d.

London: R. A. EVERETT & Co., Ltd., 42, Essex St., Strand, W.C.

Continued on page 180.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS.

GEO. R. SIMS'S NEW BOOK.

YOUNG MRS. CAUDLE.

By GEORGE R. SIMS, Author of "Mary Jane's Memoirs." Fcap. 8vo, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d.

"Mr. Caudle is a journalist and author, and it is just when he has writing to finish that Mabel, who, like her famous prototype, has plenty to say, specially wishes to talk to him. His amusing sketches."—Times.

CHRISTIE MURRAY'S NEW NOVEL.

V.C.: a Chronicle of Castle Barfield and of the Crimea.

By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY, Author of "Joseph's Coat," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"The two 'chronicles'—of a fraudulent father who works a salt mine near Droitwich, and of his son who gains the V.C. in the Crimea—unite to form a vigorous, well-written story."—Times.

THE FOOLISH VIRGINS

By ALFRED SUTRO, Author of "Women in Love." Fcap. 8vo, picture cover, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d.

"The tragedy could not be more pathetically or more truly told."—Vanity Fair.

MANY WAYS OF LOVE.

By FRED. WHISHAW. With 8 Illustrations by WARWICK GOBLE and B. SCHUMACHER. A NEW EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"This charming story."—Liverpool Post.

PATSEY the OMADAUN.

By M. McD. BODKIN, K.C., Author of "Dora Myri, the Lady Detective." Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. [Feb. 18.]

THE ORANGE GIRL.

By WALTER BESANT. With 8 Illustrations by F. PEGRAM. A NEW EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. [Feb. 18.]

A NINETEENTH - CENTURY MIRACLE.

By LOUIS ZANGWILL. A NEW EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. [Feb. 18.]

BRITISH VIOLIN-MAKERS, Classical and Modern.

By the Rev. W. MEREDITH MORRIS. With Illustrations, Portraits, and Facsimiles. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF PRINCE CHARLES STUART, the Young Pretender.

From the State Papers. By A. C. EWALD, F.S.A. THIRD EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE "R.T.S." LIST.

AN OPPORTUNE BOOK.
160 PAGES. STIFF PAPER COVERS.
ONE SHILLING.

AMONG THE TIBETANS

By ISABELLA BIRD BISHOP, F.R.G.S.,

Author of "Unbeaten Tracks in Japan," &c.

With Illustrations by EDWARD WHYMPER.

Mrs. Bishop made an adventurous journey into this almost unknown region. With her power of vivid description she enables the reader to realise much of the daily life of the people, and many of the strange scenes there to be witnessed. Mr. Whympers' Illustrations are from sketches by Mrs. Bishop.

A NEW SHILLING

PILGRIM'S PROGRESS

By JOHN BUNYAN.

With Eight Coloured Pictures by HAROLD COPPING.

John Bunyan made many alterations in the various Editions published during his lifetime. The Text of this Edition has been carefully collated with the one finally revised by the author, and published in the year in which he died.

320 PAGES, CLOTH GILT, ONE SHILLING.

One of the best and cheapest Editions ever offered to the Public.

SECOND EDITION.

Are the CRITICS RIGHT?

An Important New Work on the Higher Criticism of the Old Testament.

By W. MÖLLER.

Translated from the German by C. H. IRWIN, M.A.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

The Guardian says: "His position is a strong one. It is not new, of course, but we know of no book in English which sets it out so well."

The Preachers' Magazine says: "It is a wise, sane, and discriminating plea for suspension of judgment on many points, and for readjustment of view on many others."

The Christian says: "To those who are tempted to entertain the conclusions of the critics it may be cordially recommended."

The Christian World says: "It is undoubtedly an able contribution to the further elucidation of the Pentateuch problem."

The Expository Times says: "The book is temperate. It is also a scholars' book."

PRESENT DAY TRACTS.

GREAT REDUCTION IN PRICE.

In order to meet the present strong attack against the Christian Faith, the Committee of the Religious Tract Society have decided to encourage the wider circulation of their valuable series of Present Day Tracts by reducing the price

From 4d. each to

2d. EACH.

All the 84 Numbers of the Series may now be obtained at 2d. each.

The 84 Tracts are also bound in
14 VOLUMES, CLOTH.
A Complete Set of these Volumes may now be had for 16s. NET.

Lists of these Tracts may be obtained from the
RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY,
4, BOUVENIE STREET, E.C.

Mossrs. LONGMANS & Co.'s LIST.

EIGHTY YEARS' REMINISCENCES.

By Col. J. ANSTRUTHER-THOMSON.

With 29 Portraits and other Illustrations.
2 vols. 8vo, 21s. net.

[On Wednesday next.]

ENGLAND IN THE MEDITERRANEAN:

A Study of the Rise and Influence of British Power within the Straits, 1603-1713.

By JULIAN S. CORBETT,

Author of "Drake and the Tudor Navy," &c.
2 vols. 8vo, 21s. net.

NEW NOVEL BY MR. RIDER HAGGARD.

STELLA FREGELIUS:

A Tale of Three Destinies.

By H. RIDER HAGGARD.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Stella Fregelius" attains a loftiness of conception never before reached by Mr. Rider Haggard. . . . If, as Matthew Arnold held, 'the high seriousness which comes from absolute sincerity' is the supreme test of poetic excellence, then is there poetry most excellent in this fine novel by Mr. Haggard."—To-Day.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

With 42 Portraits and other Illustrations.
8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

CAROLINE THE ILLUSTRIOUS

Queen Consort of George II., and sometime Queen Regent.

A Study of her Life and Time.

By W. H. WILKINS, M.A., F.S.A.,

Author of "A Queen of Tears," &c.

THE GREAT NORTH-WEST AND

THE GREAT LAKE REGION OF NORTH

AMERICA. By PAUL FOUNTAIN, Author of

"The Great Deserts and Forests of North America." 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"Has all the freshness and independence that mark its two companions . . . this delightful and original book."—Westminster Gazette.

A SOCIAL HISTORY OF ANCIENT

IRELAND: Treating of the Government, Military

System and Law; Religion, Learning, and Art;

Trades, Industries, and Commerce; Manners,

Customs, and Domestic Life of the Ancient Irish

People. By P. W. JOYCE, M.R.I.A., LL.D., Trinity

College, Dublin. With 361 Illustrations. 2 vols.,

8vo, 21s. net.

"We sincerely recommend this long labour of love to readers, both English and Irish, of all classes and creeds."—Athenaeum.

TEXT-BOOKS OF PHYSICAL CHEMISTRY.

Edited by Sir WILLIAM RAMSAY, K.C.B., F.R.S.

THE PHASE RULE AND ITS

APPLICATIONS. By ALEX. FINDLAY, M.A.,

Ph.D., D.Sc., Lecturer and Demonstrator in Chemistry, University of Birmingham. With 118

Figures in the Text, together with an INTRO-

DUCTION TO THE STUDY OF PHYSICAL

CHEMISTRY by Sir WILLIAM RAMSAY, K.C.B.,

F.R.S., Editor of the Series. Crown 8vo, 6s.

* Sir WILLIAM RAMSAY'S "INTRODUCTION TO PHYSICAL CHEMISTRY" is also issued separately, 1s. net.

* Other Volumes of the Series are in preparation. Prospectus sent on application.

LONGMANS, GREEN & Co.,

39, PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.; NEW YORK AND BOMBAY.

London:

CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

The Academy and Literature

No. 1658. Established 1869. London: 13 February 1904.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17/6 a year.]

Literary Notes

MR. "BENJAMIN SWIFT" is at present engaged on a philosophical work which will not be an attempt at constructive theory, but rather an analysis of human emotions and the fatality of temperaments. The author of "Nancy Noon," "Nude Souls," and "Sordon" may be expected to deal brilliantly with such a subject, but the work will not be complete yet awhile.

MR. LUCIEN WOLF, the writer of the brilliant article on Anti-Semitism in the new volumes of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," is editing an edition of the works of Lord Beaconsfield, the centenary of whose birth occurs this year. There will be an introductory volume in the form of a life. If the edition really contains all the writings of Disraeli it will be a boon to students of biography as well as to lovers of fiction. Lord Beaconsfield has hardly yet achieved his rightful place as a man of letters: the glamour of his political work outshone for his contemporaries the brilliancy of his contributions to literature.

MR. W. SOMERSET MAUGHAM is finishing a novel, "The Merrygoround," which will be published this spring and an episode in which is the foundation of his play, "A Man of Honour."

A CORRESPONDENT has called me to task for writing to the effect that the public in this country really fond of good literature is but small and is not increasing as it should in correspondence with the increase of population and the still larger increase of those who can read. I must hold to my opinion, however, while quite willing to admit that it is a matter of opinion, for there are no figures which help us to come to any definite conclusion and any opinion formed must be the result of personal observation rather than founded upon statistics.

INDEED in this matter statistics are apt to be misleading. The reports issued by various public libraries are in stereotyped form and a comparison between, say, the works of fiction and of serious literature issued by any free lending library is not in itself truly informative. Roughly speaking, a constant reader of novels would consume many volumes in the time that it would take a student to assimilate, for example, Mr. Paul's "History" or the "Creevey Letters." What really counts is the amount of time spent by each man and woman on the perusal of what is generally admitted to be good literature, and I contend that very few people devote much, or, indeed, any of their time to the study of letters. Outside the business of life, be it work or pleasure, men were ever too ready to avoid all brain exercise and are becoming more and more so every day. This is bad both for literature, which is in danger of losing touch with life and of becoming a mere "study" pursuit, and for the public, who are acquiring a slackness of thought and losing the benefit of that mental tonic which good literature alone can supply.

MR. WILLIAM SOMERSET MAUGHAM

[Photo. Agnes Jennings, London.]

IN connection with this subject there is significance in the recent lecture upon "The Growing Distaste of the Many for the Higher Kinds of Poetry," delivered at the Royal Institution by Mr. Alfred Austin. The lecturer asked what was the cause of this growing distaste, and answered that in his opinion it was partly the result of the rise of prose romance; fiction, he admitted, and all will agree, is a goodly means of abstracting oneself from the grind and toil of life, but abused by over-use is unwholesome and destructive to all taste and desire for finer things. But there are deeper reasons than that; the mass of literature to-day is terrifying and the indiscreet are ready to jump to the conclusion that they must have their reading done for them and be content with extracts, resumés and criticisms; that is another cause of the evil, and there are still others. And the cure? Though I run the risk of being censured for repetition, I will again urge that the cure lies in the hands of those who are responsible for the education of the country, not only of the education of young folk but of elders too. English literature, like all other subjects of teaching, can be made dry or can be made appetising, and it is the duty of those in authority to look to it that it is made the latter in all our schools, public and private.

As for the older folk, I should like to see more attention given in University Extension courses to English literature, and to learn that classes were being formed in connection with them. A steady course of reading with a definite aim braces the whole mental being, increases the grasp of a man's understanding and gives him the ability to distinguish in everyday life between essentials and non-essentials. I should like also to see every effort made to strengthen that excellent association The Home Reading Union. And I should welcome a sixpenny "Fortnightly" or "Nineteenth Century" and a shilling "Quarterly." The one hopeful sign of the literary times is that good literature is cheap.

THERE is good reading in Mrs. George Bancroft's "Letters from England in 1846-49," published in Scribner's. This lady was the wife of the historian whom she married in 1838, and accompanied him to England in 1846 when he was appointed American Minister at the court of St. James, seeing "London life under an unusual variety of interesting aspects." In these letters we rub shoulders among other well-known folk with Lord Holland, Samuel Rogers, Macaulay, Dean Milman, Lady Morgan, Macready, not to speak of mere politicians and statesmen. It is pleasant to note that there are more letters to come. Are there not in our country stores of similar correspondence which might and should see the light? There is also in the same magazine an interesting article on "Charles Keene as an Etcher," by Mr. M. H. Spielmann.

IN "Saint George" for January there is much edifying reading, notably Dean Kitchin's admirable lecture on "The Romantic Period of Letters," and the Reverend J. Hunter Smith's "The Evolution of the Idea of Love: Being the Revelation of the Unknown Eros."

THE passing fashions of the literary hour, at any rate as regards fiction, are subject matter for some pretty verse in "The New York Bookman"; but what will literary historians in 2,904 make of this:—

Who'll now "The Christian's" woes relate?
 Poor "Knighthood's Flower," you'll all agree
 Is "Run to Seed," and much that fate
 O'ertook the whole "White Company."
 "Red Rock" is lost; inaudibly
 "The Choir Invisible" makes cheer,
 And "Trilby" sobs th' insistent plea;
 "Where are the books of yester-year?"

Where indeed?

Mrs. GERTRUDE ATHERTON, in the same monthly, in a paper on "Some Truths About American Readers," gives us the following pleasing verdict on the Italy of to-day: "She reeks with rotteness, degradation, disease; she is a thing of the far past, gangrene, crying out for decent burial." In another passage she says: "I have grown to question if we Americans are really humorists or merely a race with a strong, youthful sense of the ridiculous—a vastly different thing from true humour." Is it polite for a writer sprung from a young country to call an old country by such unpleasant names? Americans have at any rate a sufficiency of true humour to appreciate how ridiculous is bombast and childish abuse. Really a writer of the calibre of Mrs. Atherton should know better.

Who actually wrote Yvette Guilbert's "La Vedette"? The question is not easy to answer. Yvette Guilbert published it as her own and as hers a German firm translated it into German. The book is a story of "Café-Concert" life. There is no fine and delicate humour in it, no fine and delicate sentiment. Nevertheless, it contains both humour and sentiment of a kind; of the kind, in fact, to be expected in men and women who have no place for delicacies of any sort but who suffer the human tragedies like the rest. The book, like the life, is vulgar even in its pathos and piteous even in its comedy. But it is neither foolish nor quite insignificant. The observation is always sincere, careful, persistent, and the truth of the whole description is patent on every page.

YVETTE GUILBERT is a very clever woman as well as a well-known singer in music halls. It created no great surprise, therefore, that she should write a study of the life of these places. The book was a success, when suddenly came the accusation, from the German publisher, of false authorship, and a Monsieur Byl obligingly stepped forward to protest himself the real writer. A mass of correspondence is put into the court—the letters written by Madame Guilbert upon the subject. From a perusal of them one comes first of all to the conclusion that the writer possesses a very individual and charming literary style, and, secondly, that "La Vedette" was undoubtedly the result of collaboration.

THE affair seems to have commenced as follows. One day Madame Guilbert received a letter asking her to collaborate upon a work of "Café-Concert" life. To this she wrote back that she knew absolutely nothing about Café Concerts. At a fixed hour she drove to the building, dressed herself in a room by herself, went on the stage, sang, and drove off again. After an interview, however, she consented to the literary effort. Only Monsieur Byl, whose intentions were from the beginning frankly and exclusively pecuniary, stipulated that the publication as far as he was concerned should bring only money—the glory he left to the lady. A book published under his own name would pass unnoticed; in hers pecuniary benefit was certain, and pecuniary benefit was his one and only object.

BUT now comes the interesting intensification of the mystery—the climax to an extraordinary literary episode. Monsieur Byl sent his copy to Madame Guilbert in a handwriting clearly not his own. And one day in the parcel of manuscript she found a note addressed to him. "Here is the fifth instalment of 'copy.' Marsolleau." So Monsieur Byl did not write his own contributions and "La Vedette" was indebted to a third contributor! The mystery is still unlifted. Certainly Monsieur Byl, who was paid generously out of the profits, cuts a sorry figure in the business. His threats when demanding still further remuneration are contemptible. Legally the case ended in a victory for Madame Guilbert. From the point of view of law she remains the authoress of "La Vedette." Assistance was rendered, but she undoubtedly not only wrote a large part of the work herself, but repeatedly urged her collaborator, or collaborators, to sign with her for publication. Also, as the judge observed, Monsieur Byl's letters alone prove him incapable of rendering anything but the very slightest literary assistance to anybody, while his acknowledgment of the money paid, is given for revision, and "small services rendered" in connection with the book.

ONLY there is a literary moral to the story. In writing a book it is best to write it oneself, or when assistance is given to acknowledge it, for the silence of those still capable of speaking is never in this world to be relied upon.

THE death of the Master of the Temple comes with a sense of personal loss, even to those who did not possess the advantage of his friendship. He was a man of wide sympathy and great culture, and will live long in the affections of those who love Charles Lamb, whose works, including the letters, he edited and whose life he wrote for the "English Men of Letters" series. He was born in the year 1837, and was a life-long sufferer from ill health, which prevented him from playing the great part in life for which his gifts adapted him. He was Reader at the Temple Church from 1866 to 1892, was appointed Canon of Bristol in 1887 and Master of the Temple in 1894. He was a wit and a scholar, and will live always not only in the memories of those who were privileged to know him, but of those, also, who respect integrity, modesty and learning.

COULD the author of "The Gentle Art of Making Enemies" learn in the Shades of the present running to and fro in the earth in search of examples of his pictorial art, he would probably conceal in a fine affectation of scornful amusement his pride in the ultimate triumph of his genius. But the posthumous recognition of genius is no new thing; in Mr. Whistler's case admiration had preceded death, and only the final touch of nature was needed to set enthusiasts everywhere in diligent search of even the most trivial and uninspired productions of the master. In his native America and in his adopted Britain Whistler is being made the sole or the central attraction in picture exhibitions large and small. Perhaps the Royal Scottish Academy can do so with better grace than some other similar institutions, for Whistler was early recognised in Scotland, and some of his most notable works have their home there.

HOWEVER that may be, the R.S.A. has succeeded in bringing together at its show in Edinburgh no fewer than fifty-three examples of Whistler's work in every medium, except lithography, to which he set his hand. Chief of these are the Glasgow Corporation's "Thomas Carlyle," two "Miss Alexander's," the artist's portrait of himself in grey-blue studio dress, and "Sir Henry Irving in the character of Philip of Spain." In other kinds are the "Golden Screen," belonging to Lord Battersea, "Old Battersea Bridge," and "Trafalgar Square"; but the etchings were shown on the press view day in the small octagon room where the light was not good enough to show them at their best. Whistler's successor in the Presidency of the "International" is represented by a small but finely conceived sculpture entitled "Frère et Sœur."

COINCIDENTLY with the presidency of Sir James Guthrie, there has been a diminution in the number of accepted exhibits at the Royal Scottish Academy, and this year at least there has been a contingent improvement in the quality of the work that makes the exhibition perhaps the best that has ever been held by the Academy. The President is represented by two portraits, one of Lady Alice Shaw Stewart, simple, womanly and refined; the other of Dr. William Jack, Professor of Mathematics at Glasgow University, skilfully realised. Other notable portraits are of "Madame la Baronne de H.," by Mr. John Lavery; of that very militant Scottish ecclesiastic the Rev. Principal Hutton, by Sir George Reid, the ex-President of the R.S.A.; and of the veteran Glasgow artist, Mr. Joseph Henderson, by his son, Mr. John Henderson. For the rest, a list of the exhibitors would be little more than a catalogue of the leading Scottish artists—nearly all of whom are worthily represented—supplemented by a few others with work of high quality in the loan section.

Bibliographical

I SEEM to find in current literature, periodical and otherwise, a tendency to adapt well-known verse for the purposes of quotation. Thus, towards the end of Mr. William Canton's new "History of the British and Foreign Bible Society" one comes across the following, brought in at the end of a paragraph:—

The whole round earth was every way
Bound about the feet of God.

This, of course, is an adaptation of—

For so the whole round earth is every way
Bound by gold chains about the feet of God.

In like manner, in the current issue of the "Cornhill" (page 200), Clough's lines—

Where lies the land to which the ship would go?
Far, far ahead, is all her seamen know—

appear in this altered form:—

Where was the land to which the ship would go?
Far, far ahead is all the sailors know.

Mr. Canton's mal-quotation is the worse of the two, but both instances are to be deprecated, for they tend to the debasing of the poetic currency. I see, by the way, that Mr. Eden Phillpotts, in his "American Prisoner," makes one of his characters ascribe the familiar utterance, "Let us swear an eternal friendship," to "the man in the play." But it was not a man, you remember; it was a woman. Men don't do these things, even in burlesques.

Mr. William Archer, I note, dedicates his new book, "Real Conversations," "to G. R. H., oldest of friends." A good many years it is, indeed, since Mr. Archer and Mr. G. R. Halkett—then, I believe, resident in Edinburgh—were concerned together in the production of "The Fashionable Tragedian," a bitter and indiscriminating attack on the acting of Henry Irving. This was in 1877, after the actor had "taken the town" successively as Digby Grant, Mathias, Charles I., Richelieu, Hamlet, and Richard III. The little pamphlet, which was issued in Edinburgh, was made specially pungent by Mr. Halkett's not at all good-natured caricatures. In the letterpress Mr. Archer was aided by another of his friends—the late Mr. R. W. Lowe, who made the amende to Henry Irving when, in 1888, he dedicated his "English Theatrical Literature" to the actor "whose genius and achievements have so powerfully promoted that revival of interest in matters dramatic to which it owes its existence." In 1877 Mr. Halkett was twenty-two and Mr. Archer twenty-one; they are now forty-nine and forty-eight respectively, and probably have long regretted this misdeed of their youth.

Mr. E. V. Lucas, in his "Highways and Byways of Sussex," naturally devotes a chapter to Brighton, in connection with which he quotes in full the stanzas on that watering-place which appeared in James and Horace Smith's "Horace in London" (1813)—"Now fruitful autumn lifts his sunburnt head," and so forth. But the true laureate of Brighton was Mortimer Collins, with his—

If you approve of flirtations, good dinners,
Seascapes divine which the merry winds whiten,
Nice little saints and still nicer young sinners,
Winter at Brighton!

Next to Collins, though longo intervallo, I should put Mr. Ashby-Sterry, whose stanzas have equal gusto but not

THE FIRST HOME OF THE KELMSCOTT PRESS

(No. 16, Upper Mall, Hammersmith.)

[Photo. Booker and Sullivan, Chancery Lane.]

quite the same gaiety and ease. Here is the best of them:—

If spirits you would lighten,
Consult good Doctor Brighton,
And swallow his prescriptions and abide by his decree;
If nerves be weak or shaken,
Just try a week with Bacon,
His physic soon is taken—
At our London-by-the-Sea.

One cannot remember everything; and it is not surprising, therefore, that one of the reviewers of "A Magdalen's Husband" should have described its author, Mr. Vincent Brown, as "a newcomer in the field of fiction." Nevertheless, it is eight years since Mr. Brown published his first story, "My Brother," the power and freshness of which were recognised by at least some of the critics. Then came, in 1898, "Ordeal by Compassion" and "The Romance of a Ritualist," followed in 1899 by "Two in Captivity." No one of these fulfilled the promise of "My Brother"; but in "A Magdalen's Husband" that promise, I venture to think, is more than accomplished.

The outlines of the bibliography of the late Canon Ainger do not occupy much space. They are concerned mainly with his work re Lamb, which appears to have begun in 1878 with the monograph contributed to the "English Men of Letters" series (reprinted in 1888). Then came editions of the "Tales from Shakespeare" (1879, 1883, 1886), the "Essays of Elia" (1883), the "Poems, Plays, and Miscellaneous Essays" (1884), "Mrs. Leicester's School, &c." (1885), the "Letters of Charles Lamb" (1888), and the "Life and Works" (1899). Then there is what Dr. Ainger did for Thomas Hood—the preface to Hood's "Humorous Poems" (1893) and the edition of the complete Poems (1897). There is also the preface to Galt's "Annals of the Parish" and "Ayrshire Legatees" (1895). Add to the above the "Sermons Preached in the Temple Church" (1870), the editing of "Tennyson for the Young" (1891), and the recent monograph on Crabbe (1903), and you have, I think, practically the sum total of the Canon's literary "output."

The promise of the Rev. G. R. Gleig's personal recollections of the "great Duke" of Wellington sends the mind back to his "Life" of the Duke (1862), based partly upon the work by Brialmont and partly upon hitherto unpublished matter. For the rest, one is amazed, when one comes to think of it, at the reverend gentleman's literary fecundity—his "Subaltern," his "Hussar," his "Light Dragoon," his "Soldier's Help," his "Soldier's Manual of Devotion," his "Chelsea Hospital and its Traditions," his "Lives" of Lord Clive and Warren Hastings and Sir Walter Scott, his "Waltham, or a Country Village," his "Country Curate," and his "Sermons." Then there were the two volumes of "Essays from the 'Edinburgh' and the 'Quarterly'" (published in 1858), and a host of compilations for the publishers.

THE BOOKWORM.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS, ETC.

THE title of Madame Albanesi's successful novel "Susannah and One Elder" (now in its third edition) has been changed to "Susannah and One Other," this alteration having been made in deference to the opinion of many reviewers and of her publishers, who appear to regard the original title as misleading and calculated to prejudice a large class of readers.—Mrs. B. M. Tanqueray has written a novel under the title of "The Royal Quaker" which will be issued by Messrs. Methuen on the 11th.—Mr. Arthur C. Benson has written a life of Tennyson which will be issued in Messrs. Methuen's Little Biographies Series in a few days. The book contains several illustrations.—The next two volumes to be added to the Little Quarto Shakespeare, issued by the same firm, are "The Merchant of Venice" and "The Taming of the Shrew."—Mr. John Lane announces two new volumes in the New Pocket Library, "Typee" and "Omoo," by Herman Melville. The editing has been placed in singularly appropriate hands, those of Mr. W. Clark Russell, who contributes an introduction to each volume. There are also notes to both books by Marie Clothilde Balfour. Other volumes will follow.—"The Adventures of Elizabeth in Rügen," which will be published immediately by Messrs. Macmillan and Co., show Elizabeth transported from her German garden and on the enterprise of driving round the island of Rügen.—Professor A. C. Armstrong's treatise on "Transitional Eras in Thought," published by the Macmillan Co., is an enquiry into the development of Western thought and culture, with a special purpose of inferring from the study of previous transitional epochs the future which may be expected for our own era in speculation.

Reviews

A Glorious Art

BRITISH VIOLIN-MAKERS, CLASSICAL AND MODERN. By the Rev. W. Meredith Morris, B.A. (Chatto and Windus. 10s. 6d. net.)

The compilation of this biographical dictionary must have cost the Rev. W. Meredith Morris a vast amount of loving labour, and we doubt not that the volume will form an indispensable item in the violinist's and violin-maker's library. In the space of 200 pages will be found biographical notices of between four and five hundred makers, these varying from a couple of lines to four whole pages. Many facsimiles of their labels are given—a most useful idea—besides photographs of their instruments and persons—an addition of more doubtful value. We make no pretensions to the possession of the special knowledge required to check Mr. Morris' great store of facts and dates; we can but criticise the introduction of fifty pages which prefaces the dictionary proper and comment upon the style of the work.

It seems to us that the first ten pages, which discuss the reason why the early English violin-makers adopted an inferior model, are a mere waste of words. Given a long-established instrument—the viol, and a foreign intruder—the violin—given the conservative character of the British workman—what else could be expected but that he would prefer the Stainer pattern to the Cremona? In seeking unnecessary reasons for the lack of enterprise Mr. Morris does not fail to make the old, old mistake of slandering the Puritans. "The furious bigotry of Anabaptists, Levellers, and Fifth-monarchy men," he says, "had placed music under a ban, and the gentle voice of melody had been drowned in the hoarse battle-cry of the 'saints'." It would seem that a charge once made by an early historian, however superficial and careless he be—we allude, of course, to Dr. Burney—can never be expunged, refute it as often as one may. We would recommend Mr. Morris to read Davey's "History of English Music" before he publishes his second edition. It cannot be too often reiterated that the Puritans were not such farcical humbugs as one finds them on the stage in a comic opera, but honest men who protested, only too successfully, against the vicious frivolity of the Stuarts, and effected a very necessary cleansing of our Church by abolishing its music, amongst other abuses. But music as such was not merely tolerated, but encouraged and practised by Puritans from Oliver Cromwell down to John Bunyan, as every educated man should know. It only serves to heighten the mystery surrounding the origin of violin tone, that after depreciating the adoption of and persistence in what is regarded as an inferior model, our author finds himself forced to own that these Parker, Banks, and Forster fiddles all possess a tone not in the least like that of Stainer, but rather like that of Amati. If this be true, what is there to worry about? But tone is a very difficult subject: there are too many factors concerned to render it wise to speak with such decision upon it as Mr. Morris sometimes allows himself to do. Indeed his enthusiasm for his subject leads him frequently to use descriptions of a florid and hyperbolic character which cannot but be repellent to the practical man for whom the book is presumably written. "Majesty intoxicated with the wine of the Graces," for instance, may be classical (though we fail to take the allusion), but is hardly definite; and to say (page 92) that "The notes drop off the strings like tears trickling down the beard of a weeping god" is surely to apply to the instrument a description more suitable to a performer. Some of our provincial critics in search of new terms of praise for Kubelik or Miss Marie Hall might here discover some gems of language quite in their style; as, for instance, "The harmonics were as crisp as the jingle of frozen rush blown by the breath of winter." Being told that "Duke's varnish is elastic, soft, and transparent," we do not find it assist our conception of it when the author adds, "but it lacks unction." There is an air of aristocratic refinement about it which is quite unmistakeable, but we long for one sweet blush of the emotions." On page 18 is a very pretty collection of mixed metaphors, beginning "Those who are in quest of the Excalibur (sic) of Antonio" which we have not space to quote.

In his section, "The Revival of Violin Making," Mr. Morris is very insistent that "The glorious art was never more alive than it is to-day." But he must not seek to prove too much. While he puts the yearly production of high-class violins in England at 150 (which seems to us over the mark) this does not make a very large supply for a population of forty millions, to which, as he elsewhere states, factory-made violins are imported "by the ton." The fact seems to be that musical instruments are one of the fittest subjects for protective duty, both import and export.

In taking leave of Mr. Morris' useful book we would direct the attention of violinists to page 74, where they may learn that in the course of three months of 1890 there were nearly 300 "undoubted Strads" offered for sale in British and foreign sale-catalogues. But populus vult decipi. The syllogism "Stradivari was the greatest of fiddle makers. My fiddle is a Strad. Therefore, my fiddle is the best possible," is irresistible logic for the common mind. Perhaps the present volume may do something to expose the fallacy. F. CORDER.

A Revelation

THE HOUSE OF QUIET: AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY. Edited by J. T. (Murray. 8s. net.)

THIS book is vouched in "J. E.'s" preface to be the autobiography of a friend and cousin, a man of retired country life, now dead. At first, from the manner of the preface, we had a horrible suspicion that here was yet another fictitious self-revelation, after the manner made temporarily fashionable by "An Englishwoman's Love-Letters." And while that book had genuine power, its imitative progeny were a destructive plague-cloud. The preface has all the symptoms with which those books made us fatally familiar. But a glance at the body of the volume and that suspicion vanished. It is a genuine autobiography, the revelation of a true personality. "The House of Quiet" is a happy title: it indicates the man, no less than his life. This is essentially a quiet, a restrained, a minor-toned, yet a distinguished personality. His tastes are distinguished: delicate, refined, unclamorous. His feelings have the same delicate distinction; remote from weakness and sentimentality as from gush or the parade of intensity. His life has it; a life of small and minor things, which the ordinary man would peevishly or lachrymosely bewail as a failure, but which this man had the virtue to make a subtle and invisible success. Invisible to the world, during the term of that life; but now, and in this book, it becomes visible to all who have the sympathetic vision. Lastly, his style shares in this delicate distinction. It is not a great style, as his is not a great personality: but it is a style very far removed from commonplace, always adequate, clear, simple, and direct; while when occasion serves it becomes felicitous, close, and arresting in phrase. Its worst defect, if not its sole defect, is an occasional slipshodness of grammar.

It is purely a story of mental and spiritual development. A very simple story in externals: a young man of good birth and position, who goes through a university education, enters on official duties, and then, with the interest of life opening on him, finds himself crippled by ill-health. In order to prolong his life, he is condemned to a future of retirement and the avoidance of exertion. At first, most naturally, the effect was one of despondence and deep depression: he had, according to customary ideas, no career, no use or occupation in the world. Then, as a result of this enforced seclusion and his psychic suffering (an ugly word, but "mental" hardly meets the case) he found in himself a new sense for the subtler and interior things of nature and art: alike in music and literature (for example) he began to see below the surface which had hitherto contented him. But the acute nervous tension which was at the root of this sudden sensitiveness, by an inevitable reaction gave place to profound melancholy. Happily for him he fell back on philosophy and religion. Eschewing dangerous introspection, he sought an external distraction in philanthropy; and his philanthropy took a form as wise as it was uncommon. In place of formulating his own plans, and annoying with them the independent English poor, he set himself to find how his poorer neighbours wanted to be helped, and to forward their wishes. It is not surprising that he presently found himself the trusted helper and counsellor of some forty peasantry, and discovered in this activity a source of content, so far as content could be looked for in an imperfect world.

Such are the main external lines of a life, the interest of which lies in its interior vicissitudes. But beside the record of these, there are appended a number of extracts from the writer's diary, or from autobiographic notes found among his remains. These are among the most interesting portion of the book. In a large number of them he has given character-sketches of his country neighbours. These sketches are done with an urbane and tolerant insight, a forbearing sympathy, above all, a quiet and refined humour, which make them charming reading. Others, again, are really psychological and personal essays on various themes, such as Dreams, or Obsession, which have the attraction of a thoughtful and delicate mind meditating on its own experience. The combined effect of the whole book is to admit the reader to intimacy with an individuality, an individuality distinct from its neighbours both in its limits and its strength. And that is not over-common nowadays. Nor is the record obtruded on by any consciousness of a listening public.

FRANCIS THOMPSON.

A Novelist as a Man of Business

LA JEUNESSE DE BALZAC. BALZAC IMPRIMEUR. 1825-1828. Par Gabriel Hanotaux et Georges Vicaire. Avec trois Estampes et deux Portraits gravés sur bois par A. Lepère. (Ferroud.)

We have here a book which may be classed as first and foremost a documentary work, and when, at a cursory glance, we find quite half of it to be appendices, chiefly accounts, we are inclined to fling it aside as no concern of ours. But in this case second thoughts are best, for when Balzac is in question, documents take a special meaning, and the life of a publisher, printer, and typesetter between 1825 and 1828, though the narration of actual facts, becomes a veritable romance. We get Balzac's autobiography by fragments, as it were, throughout his works, but although a large number of books on Balzac have appeared, there is no complete life. Thus the contribution before us lets in much light on a portion of his early career of which little is known, a period not without great influence on his later life.

The years of Balzac's youth stretch from 1823 to 1833. They are the first years of struggle and comprise the first contact with life. He was doubtful what career to follow. His father wished him to avoid that of letters, for it was then that he wrote his first works: his tragedy of Cromwell, articles for the newspapers, numberless short-stories and novels. It was then too that he made the acquaintance of "un ange," who was his support during "cette horrible guerre." "Mme. de B. [erny] quoique mariée, a été comme un Dieu pour moi. Elle a été," he writes to Mme. Harska in 1837, "une mère, une amie, une famille, un ami, un conseil; elle a fait l'écrivain, elle a consolé le jeune homme, elle a créé le goût, elle a pleuré comme une soeur, elle a ri, elle est venue tous les jours, comme un bienfaisant sommeil, endormir les douleurs." Suddenly he gave up the literary career. He dreamed of rapidly making a fortune, he thought himself suited for business, and so he bought a printing establishment in the Rue Marais Saint-Germain. The history of the enterprise has been told by him in "Les Illusions Perdues," in the failure of César in "César Birotteau," which is that of Balzac and his partners, and it turns up in numerous passages of the "Comédie Humaine." But Balzac was only so to speak an "improvised" man of business and he came to serious grief. The steps of the downfall may be studied in detail in this work; all the accounts, all the correspondence are there. A cousin intervened and with his help and that of Balzac's parents the situation was in a measure saved, but Balzac was saddled with obligations that weighed on him all his life. As a publisher and printer he was the first to project compact editions of the classics, and issued Molière and La Fontaine. The list of his publications contains chiefly French classics, but we note also translations of speeches by Canning, Peel and Brougham, and of the works of Shakespeare and Schiller.

For some the main interest of the volume will reside in the detailed account of his relations with Mme. de Berny, who appears in "Le Lys dans la Vallée," "Le Curé de Village," "La duchesse de Langeais," and other of his works. Her history is here fully traced out, we believe for the first time. Her father, Philippe-Joseph Hinner, was a German harpist at the Court of Marie-Antoinette. The queen married him to one of her femmes de chambre, and thus to their daughter, Mme. de Berny, Balzac doubtless owed his knowledge of the Court, his royalism, his pretensions to nobility, his relations with a society in which he had no real footing. She was twenty-two years his senior, but Balzac loved her passionately and sincerely, and to her, too, we probably owe what some call Balzac's immortal gift to humanity—the prolonging of a woman's life in her relations with men. He cured love of the prejudice of youth, and that lesson he learned while he was struggling with the printing establishment in the Rue Marais. The portrait by Devéria, of which a wood-cut appears in the book, represents Balzac as a handsome youth of twenty-two. He gave it to Mme de Berny (she died in 1836) with the inscription Et nunc et semper. He also dedicated to her his novel, "Louis Lambert," which is really the memoirs of his youth.

The book is sumptuously printed and decorated. The type was specially made by the founders now occupying Balzac's old establishment, and the wood-cut decoration that frames the pages was discovered there. There is also a wood-cut of a portrait of Mme. de Berny.

Christianity in Embryo

THE EVOLUTION OF THEOLOGY IN THE GREEK PHILOSOPHERS. GIFFORD LECTURES 1900-1, 1901-2. By Edward Caird. Two volumes. (Glasgow: MacLehose. 14s. net.)

It will rightly be taken for granted that this series of lectures on the Gifford foundation from the pen of the Master of Balliol constitute a work of some distinction. It is in effect, for such as can brace themselves to follow without flagging so strenuous a guide, an inquiry of which the intrinsic importance for a right understanding of the questions which lie at the root of much of the history of two thousand years is matched by the charm of a singularly lucid treatment and a clear compelling style.

It is, of course, out of the question that we should attempt to indicate the long line of Dr. Caird's patient tracking of so many clues through the convolutions of so wide a maze; it is only when, in his last lecture, he finds himself at last at the heart of the labyrinth that it may be possible to indicate something of his results.

There is a cheap and easy sneer, that has not always been disdained by such as might have been expected to refrain their lips from such things, in the light reference to the iota over which for so many decades the Christian Church was divided. But "I do not believe," writes Dr. Caird, "that controversies about words ever occupy a great space in human history, although it is true that the controversies of the past often seem to us mere controversies about words." The Arian controversy which was concerned with the nature of Christ, whether it was the same or like to the nature of the Father, is, from his point of view, seen in its full importance only when it is previously understood how far Greek thought had gone in the direction of solving the insistent problems of life. Religion, by the time when Christianity entered into the world, had lost its essentially social character. In their philosophical schools the Greeks, in the synagogue the Jews, had found the beginnings of a system of individual adjustment to God. And this relation of men to a common centre, constituting indirectly a relation to one another, was the germ of the church-idea. In the Christian Church Christ was set in the midst; but by the overshadowing brightness of His perfect union with God the potential union of all men with the divine came to be obscured. In the same direction tended the Neo-Platonic philosophy. For, as soon as the Messianic idea left Jewish soil, it had to find an equivalent; and no idea seemed so appropriate as that of the Logos. And thereupon became quickly manifest a tendency in this application to reduce the whole life of Christ to a mere illusive appearance of one who was not a human being at all. The protest of St. John against this marked the beginning of the controversies which vexed the Church during the time that the creeds were in making. And though the result was the assertion of the unity of the divinity and humanity in Christ, this union was confined to Christ alone, and—which from a practical point of view was more serious—it was regarded as static rather than dynamic. If Christianity refused to give up its central idea of the unity of the human with the divine, and its faith that men in some sense are capable of being participants in the divine nature, yet, under the influence of Neo-Platonic modes of thought, the gulf between Christ and other men tended to widen. Thus Greek philosophy may indeed on the one hand be considered a germ of Christianity, if we consider that in Neo-Platonism it was struggling with the ideas of the antagonism between the human and the divine, and at the same time of the necessity of that relation. It was, on the other hand, a great adverse force in so far as it set the two terms in such absolute opposition that a true synthesis or reconciliation of them became impossible.

It would seem that Dr. Caird's view is one which is not easily to be reconciled with any recognition of Christianity as a supernatural revelation. As a purely scientific study of it as a natural evolution from preëxisting ideas, it is of curious interest and importance.

THE PAISLEY SHAWL AND THE MEN WHO PRODUCED IT. By Matthew Blair. (Paisley: Alexander Gardner. 7s. 6d. net.)

He would be a curmudgeonly fellow who did not feel grateful to the chairman of the Incorporated Weaving, Dyeing, and Printing College of Glasgow for this "record of an interesting epoch in the history of the town" of which he is a native, and of an industry in which he takes a legitimate pride. Mr. Blair has an affectionate admiration for the memory of the old-time producers of shawls. He was brought up in the trade, entered business life at the time when the industry began to decline, witnessed its extinction, and had to go elsewhere to earn a living. But he acknowledges that the failure of the shawl industry has been the economic salvation of Paisley, for out of its decay have sprung the multifarious businesses that make the town one of the most prosperous in Scotland. The beautiful and once famous fabrics had their genesis in the desire to emulate on the loom the beauties of the mixed woven and needle-work products of Turkey and Cashmere from examples sent home by officers engaged in withstanding the French expedition to Egypt. The success was complete, and for fully half a century the Paisley shawl was "the only wear" from Queen Victoria to the cottar's wife in her Sunday best. The exquisite finish of these goods is a pleasant memory to many; to those less fortunate the reproductions in this volume of lovely specimens of the shawls will help to convey a fair idea of the "braws" in which our grandmothers disported themselves at church and market. Mr. Blair explains the technical processes of design and facture, and insists that the intricacy and precision of these had an exhilarating effect upon the morals and intellects of the weavers, who became expert politicians, men of letters, artists—indeed, every man was a politician and every third man (it was said) a poet. Wilson the ornithologist, Tannahill the poet, Alexander Smith the essayist, and Sir Noel Paton the artist, were some of the men who began life in the Paisley shawl industry. So that altogether Mr. Blair had at his disposal abundant material for a definitive book on a fascinating subject. Unfortunately he has not made the most of it. He has given us an outline sketch—for which we are thankful; but he need not be astonished if we insistently ask for more.

SOME LONGER ELIZABETHAN POEMS. SHORTER ELIZABETHAN POEMS. (AN ENGLISH GARNER.) With Introductions by A. H. Bullen. (Constable. 4s. each net.)

THESE two volumes form part of the reissue of Arber's English Garner. The object of the reissue, under (we are told) the general editorship of Mr. Thomas Seccombe, is seemingly to introduce some kind of system and classification into Professor Arber's great series of reprints. The scientific mania for classification and system has infected even the pleasant and quiet fields of Elizabethan literature and the Professor is to be trimmed accordingly. The desire is comprehensible. Professor Arber has been among the pioneers in the reprinting of sixteenth and seventeenth century literature. When he began his work, the idea of collecting, editing, and reprinting all authors of value in those early days, as modern poets are reprinted and edited, was scantily entertained. He was free, therefore, to dive at pleasure into that sea of neglected literature, secure that whatever he brought up would be new to the general reader. His "Garner" was not in any set order, but represented the rich browsing of an exploring student. The delight of it, to the truly initiate, was the Jack Horner delight of putting in your thumb and pulling out a plum, unguessing what it might be. But now the day of the literary "resurrection-man" is upon us; and author after author whose writings first found reprint in the "Garner" has gone forth to the world in a separate and "collected edition": wherefore, to hold its own, it perhaps required some introduction of system.

To us, however, we must say the attempt at classification seems rather to emphasize the absence of system. The wildwood maze refuses to be made into a trim park. But the "Garner" is so good a thing in any form, that we will not insist upon this. Let us rather note that the editor has added to the first volume a number of poems by Barnfield; and this filling of what the publisher's note calls lacunæ is seemingly part of the plan of campaign. We regret to add that the editing, on the mechanical side, leaves something to be desired. The text is worried by meticulous commas: "Quickly him they will entice" becomes "Quickly him, they will entice," for instance; while in the same poem, a few lines earlier, is a full stop where the sense is clearly continuous. The punctuation needs revision: on page 82 of the "Longer Poems" we have "She, Understanding is," where the comma after "she" is intrusive; and these things are frequent. Worse yet, in Drayton's "Agincourt" you find "That, with cries they make"—omitting "the" before "cries." To make amends, a superfluous "the" is inserted in a later stanza, "Arms were from the shoulders sent"; where that "the" ruins the metre. This is worse than mispunctuation. We imagined that such matters would be looked to in these volumes of a welcome reissue, which has the advantage, we should add, of an excellent introduction to either volume by Mr. A. H. Bullen.

THE EXPOSITOR'S GREEK TESTAMENT. Vol. III. Edited by the Rev. W. Robertson Nicoll, LL.D. (Hodder and Stoughton. 28s.)

THIS third volume of the "Expositor's Greek Testament" includes 2 Corinthians (Dr. Bernard), Galatians (Rev. F. Rendall), Ephesians (Dr. Salmond), Philippians (Dr. Kennedy), and Colossians (Professor Peake).

That between 1 Cor. and 2 Cor. a letter written to the Corinthians had been lost has come to be so generally received a theory that it is refreshing to find the latest commentator reverting, as does Dr. Bernard in his very skilful introduction, to the view that the two that have come down to us are the only epistles that were written. The hypothetical epistle, with the catena of unrecorded events which, on the assumption that it ever existed, it is necessary to suppose, is generally supposed to be implied in St. Paul's allusion in the passage "For out of much affliction and anguish of heart I wrote unto you with many tears; not that ye should be made sorry, but that ye might know the love which I have more abundantly unto you" (2 Cor. ii. 4). Of such anguish, it is said, there is no trace in the first letter. Moreover, in another place, the Apostle says that for a moment he regretted having written it; and here, say the critics, it is inconceivable that he should be alluding to so costly a monument of Christian truth as the First Epistle. Dr. Bernard answers: (1) by pointing to the structure of the First Epistle, the core of which is found in chapters v. and vi., which are very severe and might well have been written with anguish; and (2) that the regret was for the pain that in these early chapters he had been constrained to occasion. Besides, every variety of the current theory postulates an elaborate complication of events of which no record remains. Now, though it is often necessary to introduce hypotheses in order to co-ordinate the more or less fragmentary records of the New Testament, this is not to be done beyond the measure of necessity. "The theory which depends on the fewest hypotheses has the best claim to acceptance, provided that it covers the facts." "It has not been proved . . . that the 'Painful Letter' of 2 Cor. ii. 4, vii. 8, cannot have been the First Canonical Epistle to the Corinthians. And it is upon this supposed impossibility that the whole edifice of the theory rests . . ." As to the further question, Dr. Bernard is a stalwart defender of the unity of 2 Corinthians. In England the theory that chapters x. to xiii. are distinct from chapters i. to ix. has been supported by Dr. Kennedy in his "The Second and Third Epistles to the Corinthians," who supposes chapters x. to xiii. to constitute a part of the Painful Letter. It is impossible to indicate Dr. Bernard's criticism of this theory, depending as it does on a very minute examination of the internal evidence by which it has been sought to support it. But here also he points out that the theory postulates several improbable hypotheses—and, finally, that there is absolutely nothing in manuscripts or versions to bear it out.

We have left ourselves no space in which to indicate the lines taken by other contributors to this volume, and must content ourselves with saying generally that their work is worthy of the reputation of the "Expositor."

Fiction

OVER STONY WAYS. By Emily M. Bryant. Illustrated. (Jarrold. 6s.) Perhaps this story is the pioneer of a new species of novel. The prevailing local colour is that of Somersby, and Tennyson's "Brook," quoted in the title, runs through the novel in an undertone of pathos. Pretty scenes reproduced effectively from the photographs of Mr. Carlton, and some strictly Tennysonian notes on them by the Rev. T. F. Lockyer have, perhaps, rather the air of agreeable addenda to the main performance than of integral parts of it. Returning then to the novel, it is only fair to say that, though professedly "a romance of Tennyson Land," it is not parasitically dependent upon the poet, but a novel of vigorous portraiture and moving situations. True, it is not in the academic sense of the word a good novel, excellent as is its moral tone. A woman of talent is not at her best when she entrusts narrative to the pen of the pet cripple of her fancy—and he a man! Self-consciousness, something oleaginous striving to be manly, gets into our author's style when "Willie the Wag" represents her. Let that pass; the narrative is not wholly in his hand, and in the third person he is attractive. The story follows the career of five Somersby children. One escapes from an evangelical aunt to become a great singer. Another, less beautifully in love with applause than she, enters the ministry for self-display, and is brutally thrown over by a lady who ought to have been a cousin of Lady Clara Vere de Vere. On the whole our author shows most success in depicting the incongruity between the passionate childish ambition to shine at large and the starchy loving rule of village evangelicism, with its intercessory prayers for people less remote than the Royal Family, and its belief in the charity of punishment. She is particularly effective in communicating the pain inflicted by the sacrilege of a ribald intrusion on a place hallowed by association. Therefore, one is more anxious to learn that Miss Berson (her "Lady Clara") does not invade Somersby Holt—the fairy wood where Tennyson first met Emily Sellwood—than to be assured that a budding Patti prefers Jim in a farm to unshared thunder in the Albert Hall. Here we leave our author, recipient perhaps of a "deep ambrosial smile" she cannot see.

THE BRAZEN CALF. By James L. Ford. (Dodd, Mead & Co.) We are informed by the publisher's note that "The Brazen Calf" is a "satire" on the American worshippers of rank and fashion. There is, however, but little satire to be found in the book itself, the pages of which ring with violent invective against the snobishness and insincerity of the "Four Hundred," their imitators and their chroniclers. Mr. Ford's scorn of the false standards and tinsel splendours of the would-be aristocrats of New York is expressed with unsparing vehemence, and he shows, in his rare intervals of gentleness, a real respect for the finer elements of human nature. His study is, nevertheless, curiously unconvincing and leaves the reader with a suspicion that the author's acquaintance with American plutocrats and English fortune-hunters is based largely on a perusal of those very society papers which he so justly despises. Doubtless there is much of ostentation and unreality in the society of New York, and, for the matter of that, in the society of every great city. But before Mr. Ford can play social satirist, he must learn that vituperation is not wit and that for such work something more of characterisation is required than can be conveyed by the use of such names as "Titepurse" and "Highflier." The episode of Mrs. Foxcroft proves that the author can draw a human being: let him realise that worshippers even of the Brazen Calf are not necessarily—wooden.

HIS LITTLE WORLD. By Samuel Merwin. (Barnes. $1.50.) The story of Hunch Badeau is very simple, as simple and free from complexities as the man himself. There are no modern problems of thought or conduct, only the old story of a man who sacrifices his love for the good of his friend. Hunch Badeau, the commander of a lumber schooner, is a big, clumsy child of Nature, large-hearted and full of latent nobility. The man for whom he makes his sacrifice proves unworthy, and Hunch suffers the agony of seeing the woman he loves neglected and ill-used by her selfish, worthless husband. The hero is a fine creation; he lives and moves with force. We are present with him when he drives the schooner through a lake storm, only to have his boat dashed to pieces by the fury of the waves; we stand by his side while he quells a lumber yard mutiny, and we rejoice in his ultimate happiness.

THE TRAIL OF THE DEAD. By B. Fletcher Robinson. (Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.) This book inevitably recalls Sherlock Holmes and Dr. Nikola, and those who enjoyed those stories will undoubtedly like "The Trail of the Dead." Two medical men constitute themselves detectives in order to run to earth Professor Marnac, who is afflicted with a curious form of homicidal mania. The Professor is a scientist of great attainments, and when the story opens has recently published a book which has met with many adverse criticisms from fellow scientists. It is to these that his mania is directed, and we follow in search of him from place to place, where generally the detectives arrive too late to save the victim. The escapes of the wily Professor are marvellous, while his methods of killing his victims are exceedingly ingenious. In fact, he is so ingenious that it seems a pity he could not kill a few more people before he came to an end. The story goes with a swing from start to finish.

THE WAYS OF THE MILLIONAIRE. By Oswald Crawford. (Chapman and Hall. 6s.) "The Ways of the Millionaire" is ambitious. The author boldly plays with a revolution, the outwitting of a famous soldier by a war correspondent, the floating of a company in London called the Gondalcote Diamond Treasure Company, Limited, which is to bring immense fortunes to its shareholders, the love affairs of a millionaire with a lady who is suspected of murdering her husband, and his philanthropic schemes for mankind at large. For the millionaire of Mr. Crawford is bored by his splendid mansion in Park Lane, and fails to find anything but ennui in his intercourse with "the smart set." "He had been a stranger to this new social world, and without trial of it, he could never have guessed what a poor mockery of human intercourse it afforded." This is very disquieting, and upsets one's preconceived ideas of millionaires. Does Mr. Crawford think the millionaire needs whitewashing? The plot which starts well falls to pieces in the middle when the author seemingly changed his mind. The story is bright and spirited in parts, in others wildly improbable. Had it been better constructed and more carefully thought out, it would not have been necessary to deplore the unsatisfactory nature of the whole. We are introduced to some extraordinary characters, particularly that of Lionel Foljambe, the adventurer, who for his services to the king of Gondalcote receives as reward some priceless diamonds, and the promise of a large share of the treasure in the crypt. Lady Adair is a clever sketch of an utterly vain yet good-natured worldling. The author evidently means to award her high praise when he says, "She was so dressed that she might have stepped at that moment from the trying-on room of the most fashionable dressmaker in Dover Street." Mr. Crawford can do far better things than "The Ways of the Millionaire."

Short Notices

THE STORY OF KING ARTHUR AND HIS KNIGHTS. Written and illustrated by Howard Pyle. (Newnes. 10s. 6d. net.) In the foreword Mr. Pyle confesses that the writing and the illustration have been labours of love. Perhaps this is a little in evidence in the work itself. In holding elaborately to the quaint simplicity of an early English style, the simplicity has become a little too overdone to be quite natural. Nevertheless this collection of romances with their vivid pictures of errant knights and damosels makes very enjoyable reading, and from the first page to the last there is no word of offence. Any child might learn from these tales his first lesson of chivalry, and of the mystic charm of that wonderful, fanciful life led by the heroes of the Round Table. The history of Arthur and his Knights has formed the theme of song and story from Mallory's famous history to Tennyson's as famous "Idylls," yet Mr. Pyle, one imagines, has no desire to challenge comparisons with any of his predecessors, and such comparison is totally unnecessary. He has dealt with his subject in a fashion which has, one can see, given pleasure to himself, and will with equal certainty give pleasure to many readers. It seems odd to read a volume of stories on the Knights of the Round Table in which neither Lancelot of the Lake nor Galahad the knight of Purity figure, except by casual mention, nor is the story of the "Holy Grail" included, but in many a side word and hint the author holds out the promise of a future work which shall be the completion of the present volume. The drawing in the illustrations strikes one as uneven. It follows out the quaint suggestion of the letterpress, but it errs somewhat on the side of fancifulness. For instance, the portrait of the beautiful Vivien would certainly not appeal to the modern idea of beauty, and yet it might have done so without losing any of the old-world look of the illustrations.

IMPRESSIONS OF SPAIN. By Albert F. Calvert, F.R.G.S. (George Philip and Son. 10s. 6d.) The impressions which Mr. Calvert has brought back from his journeys in Spain are of cathedrals, cafés, and mines; picture galleries and mines; bull fights, handsome women, sunburnt plains, and above all these—mines. Of Spanish tin, of Spanish coal, of Spanish copper, and silver-bearing lead—whoso, having read the work, still demands to know more, must have a strangely exacting taste. From what point of view to interpret the book is the problem that puzzles us. Seeing that it has no cohesion, save in the generous mining section, which is the author's unusual peroration to an odd kind of discourse, the most natural plan would seem to be to start at the last chapter and work back straightway to the first; and yet we are not so confident as Mr. Calvert that mining details are of that absorbing stuff which the reader of a volume of reisebilder desires. We were tempted to find fault with M. Maurice Barrès because he did not call his notes on Spain "Impressions": conversely we are disposed to rebuke Mr. Calvert because he does. The volume is, in fact, precisely what its title would not lead us to expect. It is a somewhat disjointed collection of papers written by a professional man with a very real interest in his subject, and an unshakable resolve to describe the people and the Government—yes, decidedly the Government—in the generous and delicate spirit of that latest child of complex civilisation, the advertising agent. Is the book therefore hopeless? By no means. For there is a magic about Spain. Take it, describe it, as you will. Versify Seville, and prose about the Alhambra, be mortally original or deadly dull—yet, mysteriously, your fluent or halting lines will give off some aroma of the exquisite charm—oh, for a word to define it!—the sunny yet sombre, barbaric and hidalguesque, the dormant-fervid charm for which mankind has found no name till now but—España! This miraculous touch of Spain you will find last, wherever it has once been impressed. In Mexico, in Central and South America, something of the grave courtesy, the chivalrous self-respect, which the Spanish conquistadores knew how to communicate still clings about the meanest vaquero or peon. And the peculiar thrill which Spanish art produces has clearly come to Mr. Calvert—quite uninformed, in an artistic sense, as his criticisms show him to be. Therefore, we recommend a book which we will not criticise in detail. It would be idle, for example, to point to flaws in the Spanish of a writer who has not yet mastered English. (Mr. Calvert states that among the things he saw were "cries of 'largo!'"") But it would be doing an injustice to his sketches not to admit that the author is a very sane, if not a learned or a sensitive, guide; and his photographs are many and interesting. One more point before we leave the book. The scene in the fábrica de tabacos at Seville is, of course, described; as Mr. Mortimer Menpes and, more lately, Mr. Bart Kennedy have described it. And like other visitors, the author was impressed by the number of little children playing about the petticoats of the cigarette-makers or sleeping in shady corners. Unhappily a friend of his, with true British impertinence, felt constrained to make a suggestion about the morality of the handsome young women and the parentage of the children to the manager of the place. "There would seem to be more babies here than married women," he said. "It is possible," was the grave and fine reply of the manager, "Some of the married women are blessed with more than one." There spoke a gentleman . . . The book is not well produced.

LETTERS WRITTEN BY A GRANDFATHER. By George Birkbeck Hill. Selected by Lucy Crump. (S. C. Brown, Langham & Co. 3s. 6d.) These are just letters to children—unstudied, unadorned, domestic letters. They are not brilliant examples in their kind, they have no original and fascinating personality behind them. They are not, for instance, in any way on a level with the charming whim and fancy of one or two published letters to children by Lewis Carroll, that writer who united the personality of a distinguished child to the finished literary art and intellect of a man. But they have the right playful kindness; short of genius, they are what the right sort of letter to the right sort of child ought to be. If you have anything of the child in you, therefore, you will like them; if you have not, you won't—and there is no more to be said. Since the right sort of man should always have enough of the child in him to sympathise with children and what appeals to children, it is to be trusted you will like them. The chief defect (if we may be a little hypercritical) is that they sometimes too obviously unbend to the child; the writer too evidently says (with a smile aside, as it were), "I am going to get on my hands and knees." There should be a franker, a more unconscious and instinctive camaraderie in the ideal letter to a child. But the defect, if it exist, is only sometimes. There is plenty of candid, excellent nonsense, such as is beloved of any childlike child, and is pleasant for "grown-ups" to read. And there is good sportive verse, quite in the right vein, with no thought of "literary merit" intruding a priggish head. These are, as a whole, letters right grandfatherly; and what better can we say?

A QUEEN OF TEARS. By W. H. Wilkins. (Longmans. 2 Vols. 36s.) Doubtless Mr. Wilkins' gossip will find its welcome among those readers who enjoy taking their history from the personal standpoint, and with a strong element of sentiment. In his earlier study, "The Love of an Uncrowned Queen," the author dealt with a story so full of passion and romance that it could not fail of a certain dramatic effect. This chronicle of Caroline Matilda, sister of George III. of England and wife of Christian VII. of Denmark and Norway, reads almost like a parody of the tumultuous history of Sophie Dorothea and Königsmarck. Here, too, we have a desolate princess, neglected by an unfaithful husband, seeking consolation in a forbidden love. But in Caroline Matilda we feel, in spite of Mr. Wilkins' prodigal encomiums—none of the charm of her hapless ancestress, and Struensee, her lover, appears as a craven and self-seeking adventurer. Christian VII., the half-imbecile husband, and George III., the stolid and indifferent brother, bring no light into the narrative of blind passion and sordid intrigue. The only person who emerges with a shred of character is the chivalrous Sir Robert Murray Keith, English ambassador and the Queen's devoted champion. A different treatment of the story might have produced a less painful impression, for Struensee was a man of intellect, and when he had made himself fairly master of the situation, the reforms which he attempted and the theories he advanced are of real interest. Unfortunately, the author does not seem able to detach himself from the individual story long enough to give any convincing study of the larger political issues, nor does he attempt much analysis of Struensee's very complex personality. It is with relief that, after a detailed account of so uninspiring a romance, we reach the catastrophe, though Struensee's confession, "conversion" and death present a lamentable picture of degradation. Mr. Wilkins has clearly devoted much care and labour to an unrewarding theme, but his manner lacks distinction as much as does his matter historic dignity.

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF MIGUEL DE CERVANTES SAAVEDRA. Edited by Jas. Fitzmaurice Kelly. Translated by H. Oelsner and A. B. Welford. Vol. ii., "Galatea." (Glasgow: Gowans and Gray. 1s. net.) Nothing is easier than to condemn the literary vices of a past period, unless it be to acquire those of our own. The "Galatea" of Cervantes was written under a convention of which the world in the main is weary, yet there always have been and doubtless are still readers for whom the book is exquisite. Séanancour's contemptuous criticism of the pastoral style hardly meets the case: there are other forms of literature in which expressions and figures are repeated "quelques millions de fois," without altogether losing their vitality. The taste for "Galatea" is not dissimilar to that for certain types of old engravings: its convention is not a drawback, but its charm. It is admittedly a sort of Euphuism; and in either case the affectation is no mere individual birth: it is in humanity's blood. The time will doubtless return when gallants will wear rich dresses, and will drawl, and worship the fair sex in strange raptures, and then "Galatea" will be drawn from its recesses and be read with delight by people who will wonder what we made of "Sherlock Holmes" and "The Iron Pirate." Mr. Fitzmaurice Kelly edits after the approved fashion, and can patronise his author and tear to pieces the work of earlier adventurers in the same field as himself, with some measure of the energy lately displayed by Mr. Macdonald in his edition of Lamb. In this type of writing vehemence is so valued that accuracy becomes of secondary importance: what matters, for instance, the small difference between a Bowring-Smijth and a Bowyer-Smijth? As Mr. Macdonald attacked Canon Ainger, so Mr. Kelly excoriates that dead-and-gone person of no importance, Gordon Willoughby Gyll. The translation is a respectable and careful piece of work, and the publishers deserve to be congratulated on having produced a somewhat rare classic so well and cheaply.

TALPA; OR, THE CHRONICLES OF A CLAY FARM. By C. W. Hoskyns. With Introductory Note by John S. Arkwright, M.P. Illustrated by George Cruikshank. (Brimley Johnson. 3s. 6d. net.) This volume is one of considerable interest. It consists of a series of essays upon agricultural matters contributed to the "Agricultural Gazette," which first appeared in volume form in 1852. The author—originally a lawyer—was for some years in Parliament, and in addition to being a keen and practical agriculturist, was evidently a widely read man, with a strong vein of humour and imagination, and possessed of considerable literary gifts. The editor of this new edition very rightly describes "Talpa" as being "one of the few recognised classics of agricultural literature," and indeed, it is hard to recall any work of its class—books giving practical agricultural information—at all equalling it in literary merit. There is no necessity for the reader to be specially interested in farming to be able to thoroughly enjoy the book. George Cruikshank's illustrations display his usual dexterity, but they can scarcely be said to illustrate the book, being mainly merely humorous interpretations of its text. The cut upon page 74 is of special interest from its having hitherto appeared only in the first edition of the book. Possibly it was thought to bear rather too much the appearance of a stray from "The Comic Almanack"! "Talpa" possesses considerable merit as an agricultural handbook to this day, and the agriculturalist reading it will doubtless find interest in determining for himself how generally its author's theories have been universally accepted, and his predictions realised or falsified.

THE BOOK OF TOWN AND WINDOW GARDENING. By Mrs. F. A. Bardswell. (John Lane. 2s. 6d. net.) "It is best to water pot plants by standing them in a pail or tub. . . . The leaves . . . should not be left too wet, which rots them." This is indeed amazing information to meet with in a "Handbook of Practical Gardening." Town gardening affords excellent subject matter for an interesting book, but Mrs. Bardswell has most lamentably failed to write one. She deals largely with trivialities, and does not even devote a chapter to public gardens—surely the most important phase of town gardening. Suburban gardeners who think to find a guide in Mrs. Bardswell will be sadly disappointed, for she touches but lightly upon the laying out of a garden or—it is as well—upon cultural details. The book abounds in errors, misprints of plant names are numerous, and the mistakes regarding the personnel at Kew on page 50, and the description of Holland House as being ". . . but a stoue's throw from the Great Western Station and the World's Fair of William Whitely" may be cited as examples of Mrs. Bardswell lack of accuracy. We turn to the illustrations with relief; all of these are favourable specimens of photographic art, and many of them will be of real interest to garden lovers.

FLORA AND SYLVA. A Monthly Garden Review. Vol. I., 1903. Edited by W. Robinson. (Robinson. 21s. net.) This volume, handsome alike without and within, would be coveted by any garden lover. In his foreword, Mr. Robinson—the author of that celebrated work, "The English Flower Garden"—declares himself all for wood engravings, hand-made paper and large type, in preference to the usual modern order of things, and describes other garden periodicals as being "too much devoted to flowers and plants as distinct from trees and shrubs." On this latter point we are altogether with Mr. Robinson, and lovers of that noblest form of plants—the tree—will find plenty to delight them in the series, "Greater Trees of the Northern Forest," and in other matter throughout the volume. While feeling an inward tenderness for the engraving, we must state that not all of the engravings in "Flora and Sylva" can be termed quite successful, and we think it doubtful, if for garden illustrations, where extreme accuracy and clearness of detail are often indispensable, the modern process methods of reproduction are not actually superior. The coloured plates throughout the volume are excellent, and other notable features of Mr. Robinson's praiseworthy enterprise are the number of contributions by eminent foreign horticulturists, and of short monographs upon genera.

GROSSSTÄDTLYRIK. Keranagegeben von Heinz Möller. Buchschmuck von Ludwig Sütterlin. (Leipzig: Voigtlander.) Many contemporary English poets have written verses on London town. Locker, Henley, Davidson, Laurence Binyon have from different points of view recorded in verse their impressions of the great city. Berlin has been a "great city" for a shorter time than London, yet she has already inspired her poets to produce no inconsiderable amount of verse on subjects connected with city life. Möller gives here a charmingly printed and decorated little anthology of some fifty pages. Among the poets represented are Avenarius, Richard Dehmel, Otto Ernst, Fulda, Julius Hart, Hugo von Hofmannshahl, Jacobowski, Detlev von Liliencron, Johannes Schlaf and Bruno Wille. The subjects include the suburb, the express train, a garden concert, the railway station, streets, the working-man, and so forth. They are all to some extent marked by a melancholy born of the feeling of the absorption of the individual in the great mass of the inhabitants and of the absorption of each individual in his own affairs. Such lines as—

"Es treibt vorüber mir im Meer der Stadt
Bald der, bald jener, einer nach dem andern.
Ein Blick ins Auge, und vorüber schon.
Der Orgeldreher dreht sein Lied.

• • • • •

Es schwimmt ein Leichenzug im Meer der Stadt,
Querweg die Menschen, einer nach dem andern.
Ein Blick auf meinen Sarg, vorüber schon.
Der Orgeldreher dreht sein Lied—" strike the note of what life in a great city in these modern days is for most of us. But over against this, spring and summer find their way into the town and into the hearts of the inhabitants:—

"Der Frühling weiss zu finden
Mich tief in Stadt und Stein,
Giesst mir in's Herz den Linden
Fröhlichen Hoffungschein."

The poem by Ferdinand von Saar, entitled "A Workman's Greeting," is a little gem in its way. Grudgingly does the artisan touch his hat to the poet, thinking, "He is one who does not know what work means," and the poet pardons him because the artisan has never felt—

"Des Geistes tiefes Müh'n,
Du ahnst nicht, wie die Schläfen
Mir heiss vom Denken glüh'n."

Und wie ich mich verblute
Mit jedem Herzensschlag."

POLITICS AND RELIGION IN ANCIENT ISRAEL. By the Rev. J. C. Todd. (Macmillan. 6s.) It would be difficult to acquire from a document compounded of fragments of "Paradise Lost," one of Cromwell's dispatches, part of a sermon by Jeremy Taylor, and extracts from Pope's "Essay on Man," an intelligent idea of English history from the sixteenth to the nineteenth century. Mr. Todd complains that nothing has yet been done to bring home to the ordinary reader the highly complex character of the Jewish books which together constitute the English Bible. He demands an edition in which the assured results of criticism should by means of chapter and paragraph headings be indicated. There really seems no reason, except the obvious difficulty of determining precisely how much is at a given moment certainly ascertained, why something of the sort should not be done. As to his present "Introduction to the Study of the Old Testament," we think that Mr. Todd has written a book that should do much to clear the outlines and quicken the colours of the picture that Bible-lovers have in their minds. His learning sits very lightly on him. The casual reader may easily fail to realise how much reading and what anxious thought have gone to the making of his book. His style is agreeable and relieved with touches of humour; and where he meets the great issues of Christianity, for all his liberalism his spirit is reverent of the fundamental dogmas. But, as he says in his preface, the praeparatio evangelica lies outside his scope; his main purpose is to indicate the lines upon which, with the aid of commentaries, the reader should study the Bible for himself.

THE TRUTH ABOUT JESUS OF NAZARETH. By Philip Sidney. (Stewart. 2s. 6d.) Mr. Sidney has built his essay on a study of the four Gospels and Dean Farrar's "Life of Christ." His conclusions are extremely unfavourable to the character of the Founder of Christianity and to the veracity of his biographers. We commend the book to the notice of young men preparing for the Bishop's Examination. It comprises all the difficulties likely to be propounded to them by the half-educated, and therefore should be of especial service to such as propose to work in large manufacturing centres.

Reprints and New Editions

MEMOIRS OF THE LIFE OF COLONEL HUTCHINSON. Written by his widow, Lucy. (Kegan Paul. Buckram, 3s. 6d.; leather, 4s. 6d. net). Lovers of biography will welcome this admirable reprint of a book already so widely known and appreciated. Not only lovers of biography, for it is seldom that the history of any period, and especially so remarkable a one as is covered by this book, is shown us by so cultivated and discerning a writer, herself present at many of the scenes and an active spirit therein. Also the preface reminds us we should "acknowledge the advantage of her adding to the vigour of a masculine understanding, the nice feeling and discrimination, the delicate touch of the pencil of a female." We have nothing but praise for the binding and general "get up" of the volume.

SCHILLER'S WILHELM TELL. Translated by Albert G. Latham. (The Temple Classics. Dent. 1s. 6d.) Another volume of this delightful series, equal in every respect to its predecessors. The print is clear and bold, while the volume is light and fits the pocket.

New Books Received

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL

Mathew (A. H.), edited by, The Conversion of Sir Tobie Mathew to the Holy Catholic Faith..... (Burns and Oates) net 3/6

POETRY, CRITICISM, DRAMA, AND BELLES LETTRES

J. T. (Edited by), The House of Quiet..... (Murray) net 8/0
Archer (William), recorded by, Real Conversations..... (Heinemann) net 6/0
Collins (John Churton), Studies in Shakespeare..... (Constable) 7/6
Swan (Helena), Dictionary of Contemporary Quotations (English)..... (Sonnenschein) 7/6
Masterlinck (Maurice), translated by Alfred Sutro, Monna Vanna. (Allen) net 3/6

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY

Benson (Arthur Christopher), Alfred Tennyson..... (Methuen) 3/6

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY

Stevens (William Chase), An Introduction to Botany..... (Heath) 4/6

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY

Jack, F. G. S. (R. Logan), The Back Blocks of China..... (Arnold) net 10/6
Lucas (E. V.), Highways and Byways in Sussex..... (Macmillan) 6/0

EDUCATIONAL

Walker, M.A. (Albert Perry), edited by, Macaulay's Life of Johnson.. (Heath) 1/0
Public Schools Year-Book 1904..... (Sonnenschein) 2/6
Onions, M.A. (O. T.), An Advanced English Syntax..... () 2/6
Marden (C. Carroll), Poema de Fernan Gonsalez: Texto Critico, con Introduccion, Notas y Glosario..... (Johns Hopkins Press) cloth net 2.50
Verity, M.A. (A. W.), edited by, The Tragedy of Hamlet..... (Cambridge) 3/0
Woodward (W. H.), arranged by, A Book of English Poetry for the Young, and A Second Book of English Poetry for the Young..... (Cambridge) each 2/0

MISCELLANEOUS

James, M.B. (Captain S. P.), First Report of the Anti-Malarial Operations at Mian Mir, 1901-03..... (Government Printing Office, Calcutta) 1/2
Bloussat, Ph. D. (St. George Leakin), The English Statutes in Maryland (Johns Hopkins Press)
Morris, B.A. (Rev. W. Meredith), British Violin-Makers, Classical and Modern (Ohatto and Windus) net 10/6
Martin's Up-to-date Tables..... (Unwin) 2/6
Burton-Brown (E.), Recent Excavations in the Roman Forum 1898-1904: a Handbook..... (Murray) net 3/6
Hogge, M.A. (J. M.), Betting and Gambling..... (Simpkin, Marshall) 0/6
Herring (Paul), The Wrong Mr. Chamberlain: A Fiscal Farce... (Arrowsmith) 1/0
Douse, B.A. (T. Le Marchant), Examination of an Old Manuscript preserved in the Library of the Duke of Northumberland..... (Taylor and Francis) net 2/6
Durland (Kellogg), Among the Pipe Miners..... (Sonnenschein) 2/6
The Clergy List, 1904..... (Kelly's Director, Ltd.)
Dawson (O.), Practical Billiards..... (Surliton: O. Dawson) 12/6
Moody (Helen Waterson), A Child's Letters to her Husband. (Heinemann) net 2/0
Lewis (Arthur D.), Essays in Fury..... (Sonnenschein) 3/6

ART

Great Masters, Part VIII..... (Heinemann) net 5/0
Grego (Joseph), introduction by, Orukshank's Water Colours.... (Black) net 20/0
Bygone Eton, Part I..... (Spottiswoode) net 1/6

FICTION

"Green Mansions," A Romance of the Tropical Forest, by W. H. Hudson (Duckworth), 6/0; "The Taskmaster," by Alphonse Courlander (Duckworth), 6/0; "The Cardinal's Pawn," by K. L. Montgomery (Unwin), 6/0; "Young Mrs. Caudle," by George R. Sims (Ohatto and Windus), 1/0; "V.O." A Chronicle of Castle Barfield and of the Crimea, by David Christie Murray (Ohatto and Windus), 3/6; "A Comedy of Conscience," by S. Weir Mitchell (Douglas), 1/0; "Jewel: A Chapter in Her Life," by Clara Louise Burnham (Constable), 6/0; "A Sunbeam from Italy," by Jessie Rycroft (Digby, Long), 6/0; "Angel, Devils, and Man," by Winifred Graham (Casell), 6/0; "An Inarticulate Genius," by W. R. H. Trowbridge (Hurst and Blackett), 6/0; "A Modern Man-hunt and Other Tales of the Greenback Club," by P. H. Lockwood (Elliot Stock), 3/6.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS

"Thomas Middleton," with introduction by A. O. Swinburne and edited by Havelock Ellis, 2 vols. (Unwin), each, net 2/6; "The Collected Works of William Hazlitt," edited by A. R. Waller and Arnold Glover, Vol. X. (Dent), net 7/6; "The Gorilla Hunters," by R. M. Ballantyne (Ward, Lock), 0/6; "Looking Backward," by Edward Bellamy (Ward, Lock), 0/6; "The Pilgrim's Progress," by John Bunyan, illustrated (Religious Tract Society), 1/0; "Among the Tibetans," by Isabella L. Bishop (Religious Tract Society), 1/0; "A Guide to Journalism," A Practical Handbook, by Alfred Kingston (Pitman), 1/6; "The Taming of the Shrew" and "The Merchant of Venice" (Little Quarto Shakespeare) (Methuen), each net 1/0; "Mr. Sponge's Sporting Tour," by R. S. Surtess (Methuen), net 3/6.

PERIODICALS

"Sunday Magazine," "Good Words," "Westminster Review," "Geographical Journal," "Priory Magazine," "Saint George," "Bookman," "United Service Magazine," "New Liberal Review," "Indian Magazine," "Journal of the Royal Colonial Institute," "Books and Book-Plates," "The London," "The Library World."

Foreign

POETRY, CRITICISM, DRAMA, AND BELLES LETTRES

Hers (Dr. E.), Englische Schauspieler und Englisches Schauspiel zur Zeit Shakespeares in Deutschland..... (Hamburg: Voss) 6m.
De Zuylen de Nyevelt (La Baronne Hélène), Effeullements..... (Lemerre) 4 fr.
Schmidt-Bonn, Mutter Landstrasse. Das Ende einer Jugend Schauspiel in drei Aufzügen..... (Berlin: Fleischel) 1 mark

NEW EDITIONS

Petermanns (Dr. A.), Mitteilungen, Herausgegeben von Professor Dr. A. Supan 50 Band 1904..... (Gotha: Justus Perthes)

BOOKSELLERS' CATALOGUES.—Messrs. A. Maurice & Co., Bedford Street (Choice Books and General); MM. J.-B. Baillière et Fils, Paris (Livres de Sciences); Messrs. E. George and Sons, 151, Whitechapel Road, E. (Art, Science, and General).

Letters from a Silent Study

[The following series of notes, more or less critical, on life have been given to me. The writer wished to tell the truth—a desire which may be regarded as a legitimate claim to any reader's consideration and indulgence.]

X.—On the Nursery Label

MEN, who will watch with painful and inexhaustible solicitude every fluctuation of the money market, and women, who will become inspired in their eagerness to follow every shade of change in a lover's temper, are nevertheless dense, unobservant, and always wrong when they have to deal with the character of any near blood relation. No one denies that an individual is least known by the members of his own family: brothers and sisters on the subject of each other's peculiarities are often very amusing, but they are never right. Few parents can manage their own children; fewer still have the gift of gaining their confidence, and the grinding tragedy of family life lies in the fact that familiarity with a person's mannerisms is accepted indolently as intimacy with that person's heart.

In the first place, the label for life is given by the nurse and the nursemaids—Master Charles is a little pig: Master George is a pretty dear: Miss Ethel is a lamb of a child: Miss Kate is as spiteful and as sly as they make them: Master Wilfred is a selfish, horrid boy: Miss Amy is the biggest liar that ever walked: Master Basil has a nasty, sulky temper: Master Tom is a Turk: Master Percy is as good as gold: Miss Ada is a proud, forward minx no one could take to. And so on. These untrained, misunderstood Masters and Misses, prejudged and influenced by servants (themselves mostly undisciplined), grow up: and the nursery label, after a certain period, becomes regarded, if it be unflattering, as a family secret, and if it be flattering, as a family credential. Ethel, for instance, is a pet and a lamb for ever—this is announced from the house-tops: Wilfred, for ever—this is murmured in confidence—has a selfish, horrid disposition. This is silly enough, but there is worse to be told. Let us grant, for the sake of argument, that the nursery label, in its crude way, is approximately correct: Basil, at seven, did sulk, and Percy, at eight, was as good as gold. But the discipline of life, of education, of illness perhaps, of sorrow perhaps, of pleasure and success perhaps, of ease and indulgence perhaps, of hard labours and embittering trials perhaps, will make short work of the finest, most careful label ever thought out—whether by the astute governess or the blundering servant. Ethel, the lamb, under the strain of constant praise, grows gradually into Ethel the tyrant: the proud Ada, after harsh reverses, becomes a sympathetic silent woman: bold Tom, on the strength of his possibilities in the way of courage, declines into a loafer: the selfish Wilfred, after a few tussles with the egoism of the world, astonishes strangers by his nobility:

the despised fool of a family not infrequently makes it famous: the bright hope is too often its most humiliating burden: I do not know of a case where the nursery label found its justification in a career. The label, however, would matter little enough if it did not lead to so much unnecessary pain and confusion in a world where there is already too much grief that is unavoidable. Human beings change hourly and daily, and it is piteous to find people who, while they admit that the laws of transition and development are the first laws of life, will not take the trouble to remember them in connection with those whom they are taught to regard as their nearest and dearest.

We can all see depressing changes and striking improvements in the relatives of other people: each of us has spent hours of wonder discussing the unkindness and obtuseness of our best friend's parents: there was never yet a marriage made for love, except on the sound basis that the bridegroom's people—though charming—did not understand him, and the bride's people—though nice in every way—never really understood her. The old worn jokes, of which we are all weary, about mothers-in-law and "in-laws" altogether could not have lasted so long if they had not touched on partial or temporary truth. I say partial or temporary, because I must hope, at least, that it is not eternal. There are signs in the land that the great science of human souls—which was always the first consideration in the Catholic religion and in all other mastering religions—is being restored to its right position at the head of all the sciences. It is a monstrous thing to comprehend the stomach of a dead fish and misjudge, through ignorance, your brother's soul. I take the liveliest interest in the anatomy of the dead fish, but it cannot be compared, for a second, with the everlasting importance of a passing mood in a neglected beggar—so highly should we rate the mind of man. I do not say that there is not enough self-analysis and self-introspection. The least sympathetic persons will think willingly and incessantly of themselves: they find clues to their own unknowableness in every novel they consider readable, and in every play they can enjoy. Self-study is to psychology what the practice of scales is to the musician—a means of gaining clearness. But, just as one may play scales to perfection, yet stumble ignominiously through a fugue by Bach, so the individual may know, beyond praise, himself and his needs and yet go utterly wrong in his estimate of a fellow creature. Laziness is a genial failing; it has, moreover, an artless healthy value in this feverish age; I would call it inexcusable only at those moments in a conversation when the nursery label is brought forward, and left uncontradicted for want of a trifling exertion of some one's heart in the direction of justice.

JOHN OLIVER HOBBS.

[Copyright 1904 by MRS. CRAIGIE in the United States of America.]

Egomets

To me the daily paper, morning or evening, is no source of interest. I care not for news, only for history, and news does not become history until it has been tempered by time. The din of party politics, of international strife, of commercial enterprises, of social chatter is no music to my ears but merely noise, and of such din the newspapers are only too full. I remember that once I was sojourning in a remote village in Thuringia, far away from any echo of the doings of the day; while there I never saw a newspaper. On my return to the busy burghs which call themselves the world I slipped back into my accustomed place and routine, and soon realised that though for a month or more I had heard no news I was not, therefore, one penny the worse or the less wise.

The daily newspaper has become an evil habit with too many folk; a form of mental dram drinking. So eager has the taste for news become that it is no infrequent occurrence to hear a reader exclaim as he—or she—tosses aside the sheet, "The paper is stupid to-day; there's no news." No news for me is good news; why should I want news, of what profit is it to me? There may be wars, there are more often rumours of wars; there may be moving accidents by flood and fire, brutal crimes, commercial panics—what of them? What have they to do with me? As news little, as literature less. If murders fascinate me have I not de Quincey and Shakespeare? If war, have I not Carlyle and Kinglake? Pooh, no, for me the daily paper as news conveyer has no interest.

As far as letters are concerned I live by books alone and live very well too. I have sometimes tried to estimate how much of my life-joy books stand for. I have asked myself what would become of me if books were forbidden and my answer has ever been that without books I should wither away and die. All this to the man for whom books are mere entertainment for a vacant hour must appear mere midsummer madness, but to us who love them it is but matter-of-fact. I was told once by a loud-voiced friend that I should be ashamed of myself for spending so much of my time in reading. "Why," answered I, "what better could I do?" He laughed, and made the inane reply that time was money. Maybe it is, but I spend my time and my money in purchasing for myself the pleasure that satisfies me most, books, books to love and read.

Yet this very friend have I seen reading the daily papers, morning and evening, stuffing his mind with windiness and information, mostly wrong, about matters that are no concern of his, he who bawls into my ear that time is money. How vastly learned the world would soon become if men and women read books in place of newspapers! Had I my way I would abolish all newspapers save one, which should be the property of the State, should contain no articles, no advertisements, nothing in short but a summary of the truthful news of the day. But then rumour lies with a loud voice, so my journal would be as brief as any news letter sent by town mouse to country mouse. All of which is one of my foolish old daydreams, which I dream as I wander about the streets, to the infinite peril of my life for my eyes are ever turned inward, or by the fire-side as I halt between one chapter and the next. If it were not for our daydreams how dreary, how grey life would be. All great men were dreamers and none of their achievements ever equalled the glory of their dreams. Why, then, should I not be content to read and dream and do nought? I am content; let others do as they list, so that they disturb not my dreams by bawlings.

E. G. O.

A Monument to Thomas à Kempis

In the immediate neighbourhood of Zwolle, a provincial town of Holland, lies a low hill called St. Agnietenberg. There formerly stood the monastery of the Augustinians where Thomas à Kempis lived and worked, and in the chapel of which he was buried in 1471. For two centuries his body rested there. In 1672 Bishop Maximilian of Cologne put the mortal remains of Thomas à Kempis in a beautiful pale green shrine, and brought them in "a carriage with six horses" to the Chapel of St. John in Zwolle. This chapel had to be rebuilt, and in the Cathedral of St. Michael which arose in its place the relics of Thomas à Kempis were on 10 November,

MONUMENT TO ST. THOMAS À KEMPIS AT ZWOLLE

1897, with great ceremony, deposited in the magnificent tomb of which the above is a faithful reproduction.

From all parts of Europe people contributed to the funds of this monument, which has been projected and built by the sculptor F. W. Mengelberg, in the Flemish style of the eighteenth century. On a foundation of black marble rests the sarcophagus in which, behind a fence of wrought iron, the relics are placed in their old shrines. The marble bears, in Latin, the following inscriptions: "In honour, not in remembrance, of Thomas à Kempis, whose name shall last longer than any monument," and a little higher are found the opening words of the first chapter of the first book of "The Imitation of Christ": "He that followeth Me, shall not walk in darkness." From this foundation of black marble rise the different groups of figures in cream-coloured sandstone. The principal group is formed by Thomas devoutly kneeling before Christ and noting down His words for posterity. Among the minor groups we notice, in the first place, Mary mother of Christ, then Mary Magdalen and various Apostles. And above these groups rise higher and higher the Gothic spires, and there Christ the Victor is seated, surrounded by the four Saints who founded their Religious Orders in his imitation. This is the monument worthy to glorify such a man as Thomas à Kempis.

Science

Its Latest Ally

WE hear much nowadays of the rapidity and facility with which Japan has adopted Western civilisation: and she is rightly admired therefor. It is indeed, a good hap that has provided her with chloroform and carbolic acid—with modern surgery, that is to say—ere the beginning of what promises to be a long campaign. It is not possible for us to conceive what chloroform means to the soldier. Here is a merciful anæsthetic, easily administered, needing no apparatus whatever (unlike ether), certain in its effects, and so powerful and concentrated that the question of portage hardly arises. What agonies it is now abolishing in the Far East who can say: and for this agent Japan owes a debt to a man of a far distant race, who risked his life in anæsthetising himself with it, fifty-seven years ago, in an Edinburgh dining-room. No less great than its debt to Sir James Simpson is its debt to Lord Lister, "who saves more lives every year than Napoleon took in all his wars."

But it has not all been mere adoption and imitation on the part of Japan. In the science of relieving human suffering, I have quoted two discoveries, made by a Scot and a Yorkshireman, which will save thousands of Japanese—and Russian—lives, and will relieve immeasurable agonies in the present campaign. But, confining ourselves to the records of that same branch of science, we may easily discover that we, too, are in Japan's debt for at least three notable discoveries, two of which have already saved many European lives. I do not say that they take rank with anæsthesia and Listerism, but they are noteworthy additions, nevertheless, to the war-stores of the healing art.

The oldest of these is the discovery by Kitasato, a Japanese bacteriologist, of the bacillus that causes lock-jaw or tetanus. Now, if there is any branch of science that requires patience, manual and ocular dexterity—if one may use the phrase—and a genius for details, it is bacteriology. Anyone who knows how Pasteur, its founder, discovered the life-saving treatment of hydrophobia, or who has read the history of Koch's successful search—rewarded after many years—for the tubercle bacillus, will agree with me in this assertion. And these are typical Japanese qualities, as their art abundantly proves. The most dexterous dissector I ever knew was a Japanese. Therefore it is not surprising that we owe to them the discovery of the bacillus tetani, leading to the production of an anti-toxic serum which is now regularly used and is by far the most efficient remedy we possess for this terrible disease.

But this is not their only achievement in bacteriology, for a Japanese observer named Shiga has recently discovered the bacillus which causes a great many cases of dysentery: and though that discovery has not yet led to any improvement in prevention or treatment, and will therefore not lower, during this struggle, the death rate from that dire foe of the soldier in wartime, no one doubts that this is the first step towards our control of another deadly disease.

The third discovery is really more interesting, because it raises newer problems. There is in the body of each of us a pair of organs known as the adrenal glands: yet unknown to the public, though life could not continue without them. It is a curious fact, by the way, that the public has heard of the stomach—which is the least important of the digestive organs, and which many people are now living without in perfect comfort—yet has never heard of the pancreas, which is the digestive organ par excellence, and which is essential to life quite apart from its digestive function. Occasionally we consume, as a dainty, an animal's pancreas, which we call a "sweatbread," but we never suspect that without our own sweatbread we could not live for more than three weeks. Similarly the adrenal glands, without which we would die in an even shorter time, are not known to public fame. It was a Japanese chemist, Takamine, who isolated from these glands the invaluable substance which they produce for the benefit of the rest of the body. It is known as adrenalin, and nearly every sample of it, if prepared by a good firm, bears upon it the name of that distinguished Japanese. I have not space here to discuss the normal rôle of adrenalin. I would only say that if there were none in your blood just now, you would not have the muscular strength to sit in an easy chair, far less stand or walk. But the most remarkable influence of adrenalin is on the blood-vessels. A solution containing one part of it in a million will contract the microscopic blood-vessels in the foot of a frog so that you can no longer see them. Hence it is the most powerful of all chemical agents for stopping hæmorrhage. It will arrest bleeding from the nose when everything else has failed: not that that much matters, for the nose is accessible to mechanical means; but adrenalin has already saved many lives that were oozing away in a thin red stream no surgeon could reach. I wonder how many Russian soldiers' lives will be preserved by it during the present war, to enable them to fight against Takamine's fellow countrymen? Not that they will know their saviour's name or race.

C. W. SALEBY.

Dramatic Notes

SOME little time since I promised to consider more in detail the only plan that appears to me practical for establishing a repertoire theatre in London. The suggestion is that the London County Council should set aside a plot of land belonging to them, in a central position, and build thereon a moderate sized, unpretentious and comfortable play-house; that this theatre should be leased for a rental representing 5% on the capital outlay and on the loss of rent from the land; that the lessee should be granted a lease upon certain well defined and well considered terms. The chief advantage of this plan is that it would cost the County Council nothing; it can borrow money at less than 5%, and if the repertoire scheme fails the theatre could be let in the ordinary way or sold. Now for the details.

THE terms of the lease should include a veto upon all musical pieces whatsoever; a specified number of performances every year of a specified number of Shakespeare's plays; the performance every year of a specified number of plays not less than 100 years old; the production every year of a specified number of new plays; I would suggest two new dramas and two new comedies, and sixty representations of five of Shakespeare's and sixty of five other old plays. Also the lessee should be bound to give a certain proportion of these representations by aid of his stock company, or, to put it another way, that his stock company should appear for a specified number of nights each year. When not playing in London the stock company could doubtless tour through the provinces with profitable results. The actors and actresses of the company should be engaged for at least three years, should be given shares of the profits in proportion to their salaries, and should be bound over to accept any parts in any plays chosen for them by the lessee.

THERE are various admirable touring companies travelling through the country playing pieces new and old, which could doubtless arrange, even in the case of quite modern plays, to occupy the boards of the repertoire theatre for periods of a week or a fortnight. There is the admirable company recently organised by Mr. Tree, and looking down the "On Tour" list in "The Stage" I note the following: "The Admirable Crichton" Company, The Benson Company, Mr. Willard's Company (surely he would help), The Compton Comedy Company, Sir Henry Irving, and Miss Ellen Terry. Those among them could provide varied and valuable entertainment, and could share the profit with the lessee. And there are others. Then there is the Stage Society, who would doubtless be glad to have a permanent home.

SCENERY and dresses are the next difficulty; these would be required only for the performances of the stock company. Now, a little good scenery goes a long way; a few well-selected interiors and exteriors, all capable of varied arrangement, would suffice at any rate for the beginning, and all could be bought second-hand. The stage should be of a medium size for obvious reasons. Stage properties could be gradually accumulated, also dresses, armour, decorations, &c.—all second-hand. Warehouse room would have to be carefully considered and provided.

THE question of what manner of man the lessee should be is another difficult matter. He should not be an actor or a dramatist. Whatever else he may be, he must be a hard-headed, practised man of business and a man of sound education. Whether practical experience of theatrical management is essential is open to question. The type of man I have in mind is that personified by Mr. John Hollinghead before he devoted himself to burlesque. Granted—and it is a big grant, I allow—your theatre, your players, your equipment, your manager, what of your plays? The old ones may be allowed to settle themselves, and the public will soon show which they prefer; but for your new ones? Here, indeed, is a practical difficulty. Would the short runs and the consequent small profits on individual plays appeal to Mr. Pinero, Mr. Henry Arthur Jones or Mr. Barrie? Or, in fact, to any of our successful playwrights? They can answer for themselves; at any rate it is to be hoped they would be willing to allow occasional revivals of old successes. Should we then have to depend for new works upon the great unacted? This brings me to my main point, which is that any repertoire theatre whatsoever will give little, if any, direct assistance toward the achievement of a higher class of new plays. All that it can be expected to do for us is to sustain interest in the masterpieces we already own, thereby educating and stimulating public taste, and to train up a school of all-round practised actors. If only it accomplishes that work, it will be worthy of our best support.

WHAT amount of support can such a theatre be expected to receive? Quite sufficient, I believe, to make it a profitable concern to lessee and actors. There is already a very considerable public in London and the provinces who are ready to support adequate performances of fine plays, and the very performances of such plays will quickly increase that public. Then, as I have already suggested, I see no reason why subscription seasons should not be arranged—one in the spring, one in the summer, and one in the autumn and winter. Among the subscribers I have already suggested the metropolitan newspapers, most of whom could afford to pay for their critics' seats. In fact the lessee should actually, not nominally, suspend the free list once and for all. Is it too much to hope that His Majesty would head the list of subscribers and that some of our social leaders would help?

THERE is the scheme, still in outline, with many difficulties unsolved, some even unmentioned. It is a careful attempt to avoid the practical difficulties which vitiate all other schemes, some of which call for the efforts of philanthropy, which would kill and not revitalise the art of the theatre, some of which cry aloud for the moon. We do not want the theatre of a clique or that of a set of cranks; Mr. Pinero was right when he said that what we want is a theatre where the masterpieces of English Dramatic Literature would find an abiding home.

"FRÈRE JACQUES," a comedy in four acts, by Henry Bernstein and Pierre Veber, just produced at the Paris Vaudeville, is a pleasant play with witty dialogue not devoid of a kind of elegance, and with characters that are distinctly amusing. The study of sentiment that furnishes a pretext for the comedy, if somewhat thin, is not without charm. Needless to say, Tarride's acting is beyond praise, and he is well supported by the rest of the company.

DER MEISTER. Komödie in drei akten. Von Hermann Bahr. (Berlin: Fischer.)

CAIUS DUHE, a successful physician with a strong individuality, believes himself to be a sort of Uebermensch standing far above the motives and actions of ordinary men. He bends all with whom he comes in contact to his will, or thinks he does, for he knows, he is certain, much better than they do themselves of what they are really capable. A promising violinist he turns into a secretary and typewriter, and accomplishes other equally desirable or undesirable transformations. Marriage he regards as a matter of pure reason; love is never a necessary factor in the union, and lapses from the marriage vow by either husband or wife should always be condoned. Yet when his own wife goes astray his philosophical calm is somewhat ruffled. But he is not convincing either with his "Strength-theory" or his "Reason-theory." There is only one human being in the play in whom we can feel an interest, and he is the Japanese, Dr. Kokoro, who has been sent by his government to Europe to study medicine and Western civilisation. So excellently is he portrayed that we are glad, despite its many faults, that the play has been written. We should like to quote a number of his observations on men and matters, but must content ourselves with one or two. When Duhr boasts that he is no slave to his passions, that he deals with everything, even with an erring wife, by the light of pure reason, that he never fails in justice towards all, the Japanese answers to the effect that to love and to protect those whom we love, even against themselves, is far better than being merely just. It is God's place to be just. It is foolishness for us to boast ourselves cleverer than fate, which works through our passions, and to think we can cut its threads with the shears of reason. The dialogue throughout is good and telling, far better than the action. But dialogue alone, however clever and easy, will not make a good play, and it is somewhat surprising that the great theatre of Berlin should have produced "The Master." Admirable as Bahr is as a critic of plays, we fear he will never rank high as a maker of them.

Musical Notes

WHAT a fellow is this Richard Strauss! He is as bad as Wagner for the way in which he makes his critics change their minds. When "Also sprach Zarathustra" was performed at the Strauss Festival last June, for instance, it was written of as follows by the critic of an esteemed contemporary:—

In it Herr Strauss seems to us to have leaped forward to things which, until his time, had been unsuspected in music. . . . Certain orchestral combinations sometimes goaded the ignorant to laughter. These did not realise the meaning of "Also sprach Zarathustra," which philosophically speaking captures the meaning of modernity as the winging sparrowhawk takes its prey, with certainty and with unerring definiteness. "Also sprach Zarathustra" is a marvellous expression of the thoughts of our own time. It leans backwards and forwards: it reaches here and there; it does not stay at what have been called the heresies of Beethoven; it has individual significance.

That was thoroughgoing, that was eloquent, that warmed the heart of the Strauss lover.

JUDGE therefore of the latter's astonishment when he found the same distinguished authority writing of the self-same work within a few brief months in the following terms:—

It is extraordinary to consider how simple, how natural, and how utterly childlike is the music of Richard Strauss. . . . His simplicity, his absolute denial of complexity of form, his search after sheer beauty without any sort of demand upon anyone's intelligence, his romantic ideas, not always fulfilled in his music, but at the same time well meant, well intended, are exceedingly interesting. . . . Strauss is amazingly naïf; he is simply the expression of childlike thought in music. . . . It is absurd to think of Strauss as a complete musician. . . . He does not do otherwise than sing the song of sheer childishness, of sheer irresponsibility, of absolute forgetfulness of the things which make this mournful life of ours tend towards the realisation of that which is to be. . . . That he is a great man needs no reiteration; but that a great deal of his work is absolutely as cheap as anything that music can give to mankind is a matter beyond contradiction.

Now are not these conflicting judgments very interesting? And do they not throw a striking light on the difficulty of the Strauss problem? The critic in question is one who, as is well known, takes himself with all becoming gravity. Yet one finds one and the same work producing within the space of a few months these extraordinarily diverse impressions. What had seemed in June to "capture the meaning of modernity as the winging sparrowhawk takes its prey with certainty and unerring definiteness," and to constitute "a marvellous expression of the thoughts of our own time," appears in January music "without any sort of demand upon one's intelligence . . . a song of sheer childishness, of sheer irresponsibility, of absolute forgetfulness of the things which make this mournful life of ours," &c., &c. The contrast is absolute. Yet one cannot doubt that the writer sincerely recorded the impressions which he received in each instance. Such an example is a lesson to those who would sum up Strauss, or any other master (Brahms, say), as Master Hugues of Saxe-Gotha played his fugues, "off-hand and runningly."

ANOTHER critical utterance touching, or rather, in Parliamentary phrase, "arising out of" "Zarathustra," was that of "E. A. B." in the "Daily News," to the effect that "in 'Zarathustra' we have Strauss in the stage of experimentalist, just as Wagner was an experimentalist in the first two acts of 'Siegfried.'" Now as one who holds "Siegfried" to be absolutely the most perfect, from beginning to end, of all the four sections of the "Ring," the passage which I have italicised seems to me a very hard saying. In what respect any portion of "Siegfried" whatsoever, whether in the first, the second, or the third act, can be regarded as "experimental" I am completely at a loss to imagine. Such a term might conceivably be applied to "Das Rheingold," to "Die Walküre," or to "Götterdämmerung"—but to "Siegfried"! Perish the thought!

It is true that the music of the third act was written later than that of the first and second, but when one thinks of the glorious music which the latter contain—the magnificent Wander-Mime scene, the Forging music, the Waldweben music and the rest—it is hard indeed to adopt the accepted view, that the music of the third act is superior to what has gone before. Indeed I do not hesitate to say that in many respects the third act is the weakest of the three. The music certainly is glorious enough, but who in his heart of hearts does not find the long-drawn duet too long? Who can regard it as completely satisfactory from a dramatic standpoint? It is one of those few instances, in my judgment—another is the closing scene of "Götterdämmerung"—in which Wagner failed more or less by attempting too much. Pelian is piled on Ossa, climax succeeds climax, but the net result is—something less than absolute success. Certainly there is not a page in either of the preceding acts so obviously open to criticism. Wherefore it is amazing to hear the latter dubbed "experimental."

To hear de Pachmann play the "Waldstein" sonata so soon after D'Albert was a somewhat interesting experience. The comparison was bound to go against the Pole of course, for de Pachmann is distinctly not a Beethoven player. But D'Albert might have learned something from his performance, none the less. A slight infusion of de Pachmann's smoothness and elegance, in fact, is precisely what the so-called "little giant" most requires. It is, indeed, rather singular when you come to think of it, that for all his antics and grimaces and other eccentricities of manner de Pachmann's actual playing is never disfigured by the least excess or departure from good taste. If he behaves at times rather like a mountebank, he never plays other than as an artist. D'Albert on the other hand cultivates no peculiarities of manner, but in his playing often exceeds the limits of propriety.

IN his capacity as farceur de Pachmann was in excellent form last Saturday, and his little gesture of delight when, having done his duty by Mozart and Beethoven, he took his place at the instrument to tackle a more congenial portion of his programme in the shape of Schumann's G minor sonata was an eloquent expression doubtless of a very real sentiment. But has this curious fact ever been noticed concerning those famous nods and becks and wreathed smiles with which de Pachmann annotates his performances—namely, that his gestures and grimaces bear as often as not the least possible relation to the character of the music in hand? Thus a passage of the utmost solemnity he will deliver with a smile of infantile delight. Does this not go to explain a good deal? The pianist whose countenance is suffused by happy smiles while he plays an adagio molto, say, of Beethoven, is scarcely likely to bring out all its meaning. The contrast between the thing played and the manner of its performance is sometimes quite laughable in de Pachmann's case.

THE Broadwood Concerts are excellently interesting as a rule, but their programmes might frequently be more felicitously drawn up. There is really great art in the right choice and arrangement of an evening's music, and a flagrant instance of how not to do it was provided by one of these recent concerts at which Professor Hugo Becker was put down for solo after solo while the supreme attraction of the concert in the shape of the Bohemian quartet were reserved for a single innings at the very end of the programme. Without any reflection on Herr Becker, whose playing needs no commendation at this time of day, one would gladly have foregone a few, if not all, of his solos in order to have had a little more of the Bohemian players. For Herr Becker we have often with us, while the Bohemians come but seldom. For once in a way a programme of three quartets might even have been held justified.

THE case of the critic who recently did penance in a letter to his editor for having omitted from one of his notices the name of a principal performer, by no means stands alone. The thing has been done before not infrequently—by design and otherwise. Not long ago, for instance, a certain American musical weekly published a long account of a vocal concert, in which while the work of the accompanist was with much particularity commended, the name of the singer was not mentioned once from beginning to end. The explanation was understood to be that the accompanist had business relations with the advertising department of the journal, while the vocalist had not. In another instance a well-known critic penned nearly half a column in a London daily regarding a certain fair débutante, who was alluded to with such a wealth of periphrasis, that in this case again the actual name of the performer was never disclosed. "Sheer carelessness, madam," was however the explanation in this case.

Art Notes

IN "Harper's Magazine" this month is a charming example of the fine art of Sarah Stilwell, the American lady on whose brilliant talents I discoursed in these pages when touching on the remarkable talents of Miss Shippen Green and Miss Jessie Willcox Smith. It is a strange thing that, with two exceptions, we have been unable in this country, the home of great illustrators, the land of Charles Keene and Aubrey Beardsley, of Phil May and Sime and Du Maurier, and the Beggarstaff Brothers and Pinwell and Boyd Houghton, and Raven Hill, and the rest, it is a strange fact that we seem unable to produce editors who can gather the best illustrators into a band and produce a great magazine. The sole exceptions to this pathetic generalisation have been the "Pall Mall Magazine"—which, as some one sadly observed, is backed by American enterprise—and "The Idler" for the splendid year or two when it bore as its cover the beautiful purple design by Sime. I am leaving "The Butterfly," "The Savoy," and "The Yellow Book" out of the question because they were not magazines quite in the ordinary sense. Well, "The Idler," a superb effort during that year or two that gave us the fine work of the men of "The Butterfly" group, Sime's "Beauty Spot" and the like, Raven Hill's studies of a serious kind, Edgar Wilson's decorative pieces, fine work by Cowper and Clayton Calthrop and Greiffenhagen, and others—this Idler died for mere lack of support by the public. It is to the eternal shame of the public, but the fact remains. So to-day we have the "Pall Mall Magazine" for sole rival to the three great illustrated American magazines, "Harper's," "The Century," and "Scribner's." To a certain extent the "Pall Mall" holds its own; it certainly stands far above all other English illustrated magazines—which I fear is no high praise, for English magazines have sunk to the uttermost depths, what with their multitudinous petty illustrations and swarms of photographs, each more hideously placed upon the page than the last. The "Pall Mall" to-day stands in splendid isolation. Its interviews with celebrities by William Archer, with their beautifully placed portraits, are the very type of perfection in this realm, and far surpass anything of a like nature in the pages of its American rivals—they are almost of universal interest. The editor has not always a nice discrimination in rejecting certain mediocre artists, indeed it is often difficult for an editor to cut his friends, but in this also "Harper's" and others equally offend. There is a sense sometimes in the "Pall Mall" of things inferior being set too close to things excellent. But on the whole the standard is very high. Greiffenhagen and Edgar Wilson and Hartrick have their place; for the "Pall Mall" Raven Hill has done some of his very best black and white work, and E. J. Sullivan has constantly given distinction to its numbers. Its literary matter has not always the breadth of aim and the largeness of view of its American rivals; but on the other hand, it is on the whole less ponderous. And I feel perfectly sure that its success depends largely on its handsome treatment of artist and author alike.

I HAVE never been quite able to understand this superiority of the American magazine over ours, especially when it is remembered that our illustrated weeklies are, or were, on the whole, superior to the American. But I think it is due to some arrangement by which the art editor is free of the literary editor. Literary editors are often strangely deaf to art. It is one of those strange facts of nature; but so it is. In America the magazine writer and the magazine artist have always been well paid. And it is almost a commonplace to say that the discovery of Velasquez and Japan by Europe and America in the mid-nineteenth century, together with the creation of the American magazine, have founded American art and the high artistic achievement of our cousins across the water. Velasquez gave us Whistler and Sargent. The American magazine, steeped in the artistic spirit of the great Englishmen of the eighteenth century, gave us Howard Pyle and Edwin Abbey. Whilst our English magazines, run upon more economical lines and often by literary editors alone, scorned the work of men of the superb genius of Aubrey Beardsley, who had to invent his own magazine before he could get a hearing; were indifferent to the whimsical genius of Sime; and were content with second-rate men when England was particularly rich in men of the most brilliant parts.

By the way, there is on view now at the Leicester Galleries an exhibition of Edwin Abbey's drawings for Shakespeare's comedies which enriched the pages of "Harper's" and gave an impetus to artistic endeavour in the pages of magazines both in America and here that it is almost impossible to exaggerate. At the same galleries is a collection of the work by other fine illustrators, Frederick Sandys, Rossetti, Leighton, and others.

ONE of our contemporaries speaks flippantly, not to say with some complacency, about the mistake of several papers in announcing that the Royal Academy had elected the French sculptor Fremet to the rank and majesty of honorary immortal. But the Royal Academy alone is to blame, for the official announcement sent to me certainly contained the name so spelt. I risked the fact, however, that Frémiet was intended, for I came to the conclusion that even the Royal Academicians must have heard of Frémiet, whilst I was equally certain that if I did not know a Fremet by artistic repute, I was quite certain no Academician did. Wherefore I changed the name to that of the sculptor of "Joan of Arc," and slept peacefully. There is a spice of Sherlock Holmes in my nature. I wonder if he were elected by the immortals as Fremet!!!

My criticism of Count Gallatin's book upon Aubrey Beardsley draws a somewhat interesting comment from him. He tells me that, having come into possession of two of Beardsley's drawings of late, he removed the frames and found on the back of each design a most interesting study in red chalk. He asks me to beg all persons who are happy enough to possess such studies on the back of any drawing by Beardsley which may happen to be in their possession to communicate with him to the care of his bankers in Paris, Messrs. Morgan, Harjes and Co. Might I add that the publication of a collection of such studies would be invaluable; and might I also add that I have seen some few designs of Beardsley's which, though quite impossible for publication as they stand, could easily be made possible by the omission, very often, of the smallest details; and as it was to such work that his fantastic mind gave some of its most exquisite artistry, it seems a thousand pities that they should pass into oblivion. Judging by the enthusiasm of Count Gallatin I should say that all such matters could not be entrusted into better or more tactful hands. At any rate, Beardsley's smallest pencil sketches are worth preserving—his was, indeed, an exquisite genius.

At the Council Chamber of the Westminster City Hall, in Charing Cross Road, may be seen daily until the 24th of the month a series of old views of St. James's Park and neighbourhood, which should be of considerable interest to all who are watching the changes at the east end of the Mall and its extension into Charing Cross. The public are indebted to Mr. Charles Edward Jerningham for the exhibition of his collection.

With its February number the "Architectural Review" begins a new series. There are so many architects throughout the three kingdoms, to say nothing of the colonies, that there should be good support for a really good technical professional magazine like this quite independently of outside interest. But, as a matter of fact, outside support for an architectural review must be very small—the emptiness of the architectural room at the Royal Academy summer exhibitions proves the utter indifference of the general public to the mighty art of the building of houses. To express an opinion then on the new series of the "Architectural Review" from the point of view of the public would be futile—the public being wholly indifferent. It is to the profession as a whole that the "Review" must be made to appeal; and it seems to me that this first number of this new series is promising from Mr. Reginald Blomfield's paper on "Philibert de l'Orme," down to the current architectural gossip.

"THE CONNOISSEUR" for February has one or two charming reproductions from the work of Boucher, the Frenchman who with Fragonard and Watteau understood better than any artist how to paint masterpieces that are pleasant to live with. I notice one critic who speaks patronisingly of Boucher as an artist—it is the veriest cant. Boucher saw the possibilities of art that is pleasant to live with; and because he did not paint dreary masterpieces from subjects that old masters painted for churches, he is accused of being frivolous. Good heavens! what is a drawing-room for, if not for frivolity and pleasant talk and genial comradeship and dancing and gossip? Boucher is a great artist; and his prices proclaim the fact. If the critic waits for them to go down, he had better purchase a grey wig. Who could paint a woman with half his charm and who a child with half his insight, amongst all the ghosts of the old dead past? . . . There is also a fascinating reproduction in colour of Riesener's glorious masterpiece, the "Bureau du Roi" in the Wallace Collection, from a water-colour by E. Foley and W. Eassil.

THE "Burlington Magazine" contains a charming gravure of Jane, Duchess of Gordon, by Romney, amongst other things.

MR. JAMYN BROOKS is showing at Graves's Galleries his portraits of the King and Queen, painted for the United Service Club, and he adds to the attractions a small profile of Mr. Gladstone.

MESSRS. BELL continue their clever little miniature series of painters with the life of Michelangelo, by Mr. Strutt; a life most interestingly compressed within the narrow range of the series, and as well illustrated as any book of the series.

MR. EDWARD STRANGE contributes "The Colour Prints of Japan" to the Langham series of art monographs, published by Mr. Siegle, of Langham Place; an excellent little piece of work, and extremely useful and businesslike with its signatures and other helps to the collector. From so high an authority as the author it may be said that the work is good and sound; but it is also, what does not always go with the work of a high authority, eminently intelligent and helpful.

BUT it is to the German monographs on artists, published by Grevel & Co., of King Street, from the German that we have to look for the best value in popular art monographs. Take the one on Donatello, just published, and translated by P. G. Konody—what an excellent piece of work! In its way almost as good as the "Holbein" of the same house—or, perhaps I should say, almost as interesting, as good it certainly is. I am not here concerned with the life of Donatello, which is well done, so much as with the illustrations of the statuary—for it is the illustrations which, in works on art, are of prime value. They are excellent, well chosen as to the point of view, well photographed, and well reproduced. Altogether the series published by Grevel in this country leaves little to be desired.

The New Magazine.

No. 1.

No. 1.

NOW ON SALE.

NOW
ON SALE.

Suppose yourself at a bookstall,
You would like to buy everything,
You don't want to miss anything,
You have not much money.

What ought you to do?

Buy the Rapid Review!

But why?

Because it tells you all you want to know.

All the Magazines,

All the Periodicals,

All the Newspapers,

All the newest books.

All the speeches,

All the lectures,

All the plays,

All the newest in science and art.

Suppose yourself in a foreign town:

You want to see everything,

You don't want to miss anything,

You have not much time.

What do you do?

You buy a guide book,

It tells you just what you ought to see,

And what not to waste time over.

The Rapid Review is a guide book,

Not to a town, but to the world,

Not to the sights of the world,

But to the doings of the world.

To the progress and thought of the world;

In literature and art,

In music and science,

In politics—in everything.

THE RAPID REVIEW

WILL SAVE YOU TIME, THOUGHT & MONEY

Sixpence Monthly.

Get a copy while you can.

You'll want it every month.

The Far East—Books to Read Now—Continued from page 159.

"JAPAN" is neither a purgatory, as some would have it, nor a paradise, as others maintain, but a land full of individuals in an interesting stage of social evolution.—This is the subject treated in

Mr. SIDNEY L. GULICK'S NEW BOOK
EVOLUTION OF THE JAPANESE
SOCIAL and PSYCHIC. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Guardian.—"Singularly opportune. . . . a very valuable book."
Scotsman.—"Extremely interesting. He portrays the Jap as only one can do who has lived long beside him."
Spectator.—"He analyses with much acuteness the characteristics of the Japanese people."

FLEMING H. REVELL COMPANY,
 21, Paternoster Square, E.C.; and Edinburgh.

THE BOOK OF THE HOUR. THE PATH OF EMPIRE.

By GEORGE LYNCH.
 Up-to-date on Questions Russian, Japanese, Korean, Manchurian.
 90 Illustrations and a Map. Large demy 8vo, 10s. net.
 "No one has given so admirable a picture of Russian activity."—Athenaeum.
 "Absolutely necessary for the understanding of the Far Eastern question."—Daily Mail.
 "Just at this moment the very highest interest belongs to the new book by Mr. George Lynch."—Vanity Fair.

FEUDAL AND MODERN JAPAN. By ARTHUR MAY KNAPP. Two vols., with 24 Photogravure Illustrations of Japanese life, landscape, and architecture. Small fcap. 8vo, 4-bound, white cloth, blue sides, gilt top. 8s. net.

DUCKWORTH & Co., 3, Henrietta Street, W.C.

QUEER THINGS ABOUT JAPAN.

By DOUGLAS SLADEN.

Forty pages coloured and uncoloured illustrations by the famous Japanese artist HOKUSAI.

Declared by the whole press to be the most amusing picture of Japan ever penned.

21s. net; in special Japanese binding, 25s. net.

OUT IN CHINA. By Mrs. ARCHIBALD LITTLE. 1s.

ANTHONY TREHERNE & Co., Ltd., 3, Agar St., London, W.C.

JAPAN. FAIRY TALES FROM FAR JAPAN. Translated by Miss BALLARD, of St. Hilda's Mission, Tokio. With a Prefatory Note by Mrs. ISABELLA L. BISHOP, F.R.G.S. Illustrated by 47 Engravings from Japanese originals. Fcap. 4to, 2s. 6d., cloth gilt.

JAPAN. STORIES ABOUT JAPAN. By ANNIE R. BUTLER. With 12 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 1s., cloth gilt.

JAPAN. RAMBLES IN JAPAN: the Land of the Rising Sun. By the Rev. Canon TRISTRAM, D.D., LL.D. With 45 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, gilt top, 10s. 6d., cloth gilt.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, 4, BOUVERIE STREET, E.C.

AN IMPORTANT NEW WORK.

THE NATURAL HISTORY OF ANIMALS

The Animal Life of the World in its various Aspects and Relations.

By J. R. AINSWORTH DAVIS, M.A.,
 Of Trinity College, Cambridge, and of University College, Aberystwyth.
 Profusely Illustrated with Full-page Colour and Black-and-White Plates, and Engravings in the Text, by Eminent Animal Artists.
 In 8 half-volumes, cloth extra, price 7s. net each.

PROSPECTUS FREE.

THE GRESHAM PUBLISHING COMPANY,
 34, Southampton Street, Strand, London, W.C.

DRAMATIC STORIES IN VERSE.

By OSWALD CRAWFURD, Author of "The Ways of The Millionaire."

TWO MASQUES. Crown 4to, price 5s. net.

THE SIN OF PRINCE ELADANE. Crown 8vo, price 2s. 6d.

From the Daily Chronicle.—"Mr. Oswald Crawford has shown the way to a new field for verse that should prove rich in fruit of a modest but very attractive kind."

PUBLISHED BY CHAPMAN & HALL, Ltd., 11, Henrietta Street, London.

An Important work of timely interest.

The Russian Advance

By the Hon. ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE,
 United States Senator from Indiana.
 With Maps. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d.

"Those who would understand the aims and methods of Russia to-day must turn to these pages."—Daily Mail.

HARPER & BROTHERS, 45, Albemarle Street, London, W.

AN IMPORTANT BOOK TO READ.

In 2 vols., royal 8vo, 420 Illustrations, 8 Coloured.

Price TWO GUINEAS net.

CENTRAL ASIA AND TIBET

Towards the Holy City of Lassa.

By SVEN HEDIN,

Author of "Through Asia," &c.

HURST & BLACKETT, Limited, 13, Great Marlborough Street, W.

THE EXPANSION OF RUSSIA,

1815-1900. By F. H. SKRINE, F.S.S., H.M.'s
 Indian Civil Service (retired). Crown 8vo. With 3 Maps. 6s. (Cambridge Historical Series).

Pall Mall Gazette.—"The best account yet printed in England of the growth of Russia during the last century. . . . This book will not only be useful to the general reader, but it forms a handy reference-book which any student of the Eastern Question will be glad to have within easy reach."

LONDON:

C. J. CLAY & SONS, Cambridge University Press Warehouse, Ave Maria Lane.

"THE TIMES" LITERARY SUPPLEMENT.

A Special Literary Supplement is published with The Times on Friday. This Supplement is an impartial and authoritative organ of literary criticism and a comprehensive and trustworthy medium of literary intelligence. It can be had with The Times of Friday alone.

Subscriptions, inclusive of postage, for The Times of Friday:—

	3 Months.	6 Months.	12 Months.
Inland ...	3s. 8d.	6s. 6d.	13s. 0d.
Foreign ...	4s. 4d.	8s. 8d.	17s. 4d.

CONTENTS OF FRIDAY, FEB. 12, 1904.

Literature.

Fielding.
 The Bible Society.
 The Public School System.
 M. Yves Guyot on Labour Disputes.
 The Oxyrhynchus Papyrus.
 The Duke of Shrewsbury.
 Gabriele D'Annunzio's Poems.
 The Back Blocks of China—The Nile Quest—The Ingoldsby Country.

Fiction.

A Magdalen's Husband.
 The Cardinal's Pawn.
 The Money God.
 The Young Gerande.

Correspondence.

Canon Ainger's Sermons.

Art.

Turner's Water Colours.

Drama.

"The Dynasts" and the Puppets.

"THE TIMES" LITERARY SUPPLEMENT is also sold with the Mail, or

"THE TIMES" WEEKLY EDITION, upon payment of an additional penny.

Address THE PUBLISHER, The Times,
 Printing House Square, London, E.C.

Correspondence

Bacon and Shakespeare

SIR,—I was so thankful to THE ACADEMY, when I read its review of Dr. Engel's "Shakespeare-Rätsel," and I hope THE ACADEMY will allow me to answer Mr. Stronach, to tell him that I am very sorry to see national prejudices in his criticism, for he speaks so scornfully of German critics. We have a good old German proverb that everyone is surely not right who is uncivil.

I know quite well Bacon's philosophy, and I would prove, also, he has borrowed his science, if I had time enough. But I will principally censure, if Bacon is a poet or not. Mr. Stronach says, "The German needs an English education" to find it. Quite right; even Schiller's philosophical works are not regarded as poetical works, and only Nietzsche has written his works poetically from our standpoint, but he also is not generally known as a poetical writer. I like English poetry, but Bacon is too dry, without fancy, for me to name him a poet. Dr. Engel surely could better answer than I can, and I am sure, though I am not acquainted with him, he would prove his theses to every one, and so he would sincerely acknowledge it, if any one could convince him scientifically, without irony, if he is not right. That is all truer than my English is correct. In Germany a philosopher must be quite original, for we have a great number of philosophical systems. I am sorry, I can say so, a student of philosophy never will find a philosophy, but philosophies—and never a philosopher was regarded as a poet, only Nietzsche, and the later fact may be a comment for Mr. Stronach. Only Nietzsche is a philosopher-poet, because he has produced a quite new and beautiful style. I must have more time to dispute the originality of Bacon's philosophical system, but I am ever ready to show my reasons why I can never find Bacon poetical.—Yours, &c.,

Schloss Zleb, bei Čáslav,
Bohemia.

WILH. FRIED. STOLZ, Phil.D.

Sonnets from the Portuguese

SIR,—Your correspondent, E. Dick, asks for an explanation of some lines in Sonnet XV. In my edition the first line pointed out reads: "As on a bee sheet in a crystalline," an allusion apparently to the preservation of dainty insects and fragile growths in amber. Mrs. Browning's poems, like those of her illustrious husband, have suffered much from the vagaries of printers. I submit that the line taken with the preceding ones presents no great difficulty. "Love's divine" is an instance of poetic licence not differing in form from "the highest," "the dearest," "the base," though less familiar. Here it suggests imprisonment in some unique condition, an ethereal amalgam; and sustains the analogy of the prisoned bee:—

"Were most impossible failure, if I strove
To fail so"

is a deliberately Elizabethan construction, and may be paralleled often in Shakespeare. The passage with its context implies that her watchers need not regard her anxiously in her loved prison-house, for that should she unworthily seek to escape the dear thralldom her heart, her self, is so completely captivated that freedom is impossible. Undoubtedly there is an under-reference to the isolated invalid life which Elizabeth Bassett was leading when Browning first became acquainted with her. But though a consciousness of this intensifies the pleading protest it is not necessary to the comprehension of it. It may be added, that Mrs. Browning herself wrote concerning her poems, "I have used a certain licence, and after much thoughtful study of the Elizabethan writers, have ventured it with the public." One could wish that prefaces and introductions endeavoured to place the poet's point of view and intention before the reader, instead of only appreciating the value of the work.—Yours, &c.,

S. CUNNINGTON.

SIR,—I would suggest the following solution of the poetical problem from Mrs. Browning, set by E. Dick in your last issue:—

"On this men look till grown too tired to stare,
But cannot comprehend one cryptic line.
Since secrets shut in safes can none divine,—
Since unbeheld fly motes in midnight air,
Guessers would probably fail here, though they strove
An age long."

—Yours, &c.,
The Hermitage, Sutton.

FRANCIS H. BUTLER.

J. M. B. and R. L. S.

SIR,—I had just concluded a second reading of "The Letters of R. L. S." when I struck your remarks about plagiarism in last week's ACADEMY.

Mr. J. M. Barrie gave us the immortal Tommy who always "found a w'y," and in a recent play this gifted author has himself "found a w'y," and dished up for us a very ancient yarn of Stevenson's. I quote from a letter to Mr. Edmund Gosse, dated July 29, 1879: "the Scene" . . . "Royal Hotel, Bathgate. I went there with a humorous friend to lunch. The maid soon showed herself a lass of character. She was looking out of a window. On being asked what she was after: 'I'm lookin' for my lad,' said she. 'Is that him?'"

"Weel, I've been looking for him a' my life, but I've never seen him yet," was the response. Your readers will remember the like incident in "Quality Street."

It is interesting to remember that in 1892 Stevenson wrote in a letter to Henry James, "But Barrie is a beauty, 'The Little Minister' and 'The Window in Thrums,' eh? Stuff in that young man; but he must see and not be too funny. Genius in him, but there's a journalist ever at his elbow—there's the risk. What a page is the glove business in the window! Knocks a man flat: that's guts, if you please."—Yours, &c., Leytonstone.

EDWIN T. WALKER.

Classic—Romantic

SIR,—I have been specially studying for some years this question of the distinction between the terms Classic and Romantic, taken, as R. G. says, generally, not separately for any of the different arts. As I view it the distinction is one between two different ways of appreciating or of approaching things to be considered from their æsthetic side. I would call Classical the tendency to include in the object which is to be taken from the point of view of its beauty, a less number, and Romantic the tendency to include in it a greater number of the associations which it (considered in its narrowest physical sense) suggests to the mind.

For instance, a corn field in summer, Racine's "Iphigénie" or Reynolds' "Mrs. Siddons as the Tragic Muse," imply (in order to be understood and æsthetically enjoyed) fewer of the associated notions which they may directly or indirectly suggest than do a mountain landscape, "King Lear" or "Beata Beatrix." The first three would be more highly admired from the standpoint of Classicism, the latter from that of Romanticism. The associations (philosophical, historical, and otherwise) suggested in both of the latter cases go to form part of the æsthetic effect of the object in each case. In the three former cases, only the more obvious associations are so included.—Yours, &c.,

H. C. F.

"Tolstoi and the Babies"

SIR,—I am delighted that a "Student in Holy Orders" should regard the doctrine that the All-Good Father made human nature "desperately wicked" as "colossal nonsense." I suppose Jeremiah, the author of the phrase, does not rank as one of the theologians I am challenged to quote: nor need I cite Augustine, or support him against Pelagius. I do not know how the dogma of "original sin," certainly held, though not originated, by the former, is reconciled with the belief in an All-Good Father. Augustine believed in both, and therefore—implicitly if not explicitly—"taught such colossal nonsense." As I cannot believe in two mutually exclusive dogmas, and as I prefer to believe in the latter rather than in the former, I never lose a chance of having at the Augustinian theory, which seems to me no less than blasphemous. My challenger doubtless agrees.—Yours, &c.,

C. W. SALEERY.

Fiction and Electricity

SIR,—I have heard it stated that a fictional-scientific book gave a theory that the continued abstraction by Man of Electricity from the atmosphere, will eventually act detrimentally on the climate and life of this planet. What author suggested this?—Yours, &c.,

GUY WILFRID HAYLER.

[Several Letters held over. Correspondents are asked to write as briefly as possible.—ED.]

"Academy" Questions & Answers

Questions and Answers for this column must be addressed to THE EDITOR, THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, 9, East Harding Street, London, E.C. The envelope to be marked in the top left-hand corner "A.Q.A." Full name and address must be sent, not necessarily for publication. Each Question or Answer must be written on a separate sheet of paper and on only one side of the paper. The Editor will not undertake the forwarding of any correspondence. Questions must be confined to matters of Literature, History, Archaeology, Folk-lore, Art, Music, and the Drama. The Editor reserves the right of deciding whether or not any Question or Answer is of sufficient interest to be published.

COMPETITION

Until further notice, four prizes, of the value of 5s. each, will be awarded weekly for the two best Questions and the two best Answers contributed to "Academy" Questions and Answers.

The Editor's decision must be considered absolutely final and no correspondence whatever will be entered upon with regard to the awards. The prizes will go to those Questions and Answers which are deemed to be of the greatest general interest, and briefly in all cases will count as a merit.

The names and addresses of prize-winners will not be published, but the winning Questions and Answers will be indicated by an asterisk (*).

The prizes will consist of 5s. worth of books to be chosen by the several prize-winners. The name and address of the booksellers where the book or books can be obtained will be given.

Each prize-winner in the United Kingdom will be advised that a credit note has been sent to a bookseller as early as possible in his (or her) immediate neighbourhood, and that on demand he (or she) may choose a book or books to the value of 5s. Winners outside the United Kingdom will receive a cheque for 5s.

Non-adherence to the rules and regulations of "Questions and Answers" will imply disqualification.

No Questions or Answers received after Monday will be considered eligible for the current week's competition.

No competitor can win a prize more than once in three months.

Questions

LITERATURE

AUTHORS WANTED.—Can any reader direct me to the source of the following verse:—

"Farewell! may no thought pierce thy breast, of thy treason;
Farewell! and be happy in Hubert's embrace;
Be the belle of the ball and the bride of the season,
With diamonds bedizened and languid in lace."

—J. C.

Who is the author of the following lines:—

"Cosmella's charms inspire my lays,
Who, fair in nature's scorn,
Blooms in the winter of her days
Like Glassenbury thorn."

Also, where is Glassenbury, and what is the Glassenbury thorn?—M. O. H.

BROWNING'S "CHRISTMAS EVE."—

"Gone music too! The air was stirred
By happy wings: Terpander's bird
(That, when the cold came, fled away)
Would tarry not the wintry day."

Can any of your readers explain "Terpander's bird" or give the classical reference?—A. R. R.

"POOR ROBIN."—The compiler (William Winstanley) of the early years of "Poor Robin's Almanack" describes himself on the title-page of each issue as "Knight of the Burnt-Island." What does this signify? I am aware that there is a town of Burntisland in Scotland, but do not conjecture any connection.—W. G. H.

"RUNAWAYS: AN-HEIRES."—There are two words in Shakespeare which have puzzled all commentators—"runaways" and "an-heires." The passages in which they occur are:—"Romeo and Juliet": "That runaways' eyes may wish," and "Merry Wives": "Will you go, an-heires?" What is a reasonable explanation?—Consuelo.

ANIMALS AND GOD.—Cardinal Newman says somewhere that animals have more direct means of communication with God than men. Where does the passage occur?—E. M. C. (Salò).

"LAMBKINS."—What is the meaning of "lambkins" in the following? "Let us condole the knight: for, lambkins, we will live."—Henry V., Act II, Sc. I., last line. This is imitated by Browning, "The Ring and the Book," Dominus Hyacinthus de Arangelis, last line (1814): "Sing 'Tra-la-lia, for, lambkins, we must live!' unless there is here a reference to 'lamb's fry,' mentioned in line 1,100.—A. T.

MASSACHUSETTS.—Is there any good history of Massachusetts, or of Boston, Cambridge, and Concord, dealing with its literary associations during the past century?—H. P. H.

DEDICATIONS.—What is the first authentic case of a book being dedicated to any one person; and what justification is there for this practice nowadays?—N. R.

GENERAL

CHURCH WINDOWS.—In figures on the windows of many mediæval churches the departure of the soul from the body is shown by the shape of an infant issuing from the mouth of the figure. How is this conceit explained?—M. T. (Ilkley).

SILURIST.—What is a Silurist? I have the poems of "Henry Vaughan: Silurist," but I cannot find any clue as to what a silurist is or was.—A. J. W.

"DEVINE" OR "DEVIGNE"?—Can anyone give information of any family of this name in England in the seventeenth century? If there are any records of Quaker or Roman Catholic families during this period, the name should appear either in the county of Wiltshire—where there was a Quaker family of Devine—or in Ireland.—Claymore.

GENERAL WADE.—Is the General Wade who commanded the English Army in the Rebellion of '45 against the Young Pretender, the same as he of whom the delightful Irish ball was perpetrated:—

"If you'd seen these roads before they were made You'd bless the memory of General Wade?"—H. P. H.

Answers

LITERATURE

"FRANK SEAFIELD, M.A."—This was the pseudonym of a certain Alexander Henley Grant. Under his own name he edited Koble's "Christian Year" and compiled two anthologies of sacred verse.—W. G. H.

"LORDS OF HELL."—I do not believe that Tennyson was thinking of the di inferni when he spoke of "Lords of Hell." I always regarded it as taken from Miltonic phraseology, and referring to Milton's hierarchy of Hell, the "Thrones, Dominations, Princedoms, Virtues, Powers." Milton speaks of "Princes of Hell" in "Paradise Lost," Book II. To confirm this view in the same stanza Tennyson refers to "Divine Philosophy," evidently taken from "Comus," 476, "How charming is divine philosophy."—F. (Cambridge).

ORIGIN OF RHYME.—Omitting occasional rhymes, intentional or otherwise, in Virgil, Ovid, &c., the first poem rhymed throughout was probably a Latin song composed in honour of Clothaire II., King of the Franks (d. 628), on his return from a campaign. Muratori, however, in his "Dissertationes on Italian Antiquities" cites a Latin poem in rhyming distichs, dating from the sixth century.—W. G. H.

"HUMPHREY HOUR."—I think "Humphrey Hour" is the name of a serving man; and I also think that Richard plays with the word "graced" used by his mother. He seems to imply that Humphrey Hour "graced" the Duchess in two ways; first, by styling her "Your Grace"; secondly, by calling her forth from the undesirable company of her troublesome son, so proving himself a "comfortable Hour." In the next line, "If I be so disgracious in your eye," Richard still plays with the word.—W. H. P.

CLASSIC—ROMANTIC.—By the term "Classic" is involved the idea of thought and expression, limited by intellectual selection, conforming to the standard of some convention. In the term "Romantic" is involved "an extraordinary development of imaginative sensibility," limited only by the bounds of the imagination. The difference between the two is that between routine and wonder, intellect and imagination.—E. M. W. B.

CLASSIC AND ROMANTIC.—The Classical spirit is marked by restraint, balance, reflection. It is impersonal; conscious of human limitations; its joy is a chastened serenity. The Romantic is the spirit of adventurous, often rebellious, individualism. Emotional and tender; its vision adverted from the actual to an idealised world of wonder and delight.—G. B.

"DOGBERRY."—John Aubrey, in his brief life of Shakespeare, says: "The humour of the constable, in 'Midsummer Night's Dream' (a mistake, one supposes, for 'Much Ado'), he happened to take at Grendon in Bucks which is the road from London to Stratford, and there was living that constable about 1642, when I first came to Oxon." Dogberry appears then to be Shakespeare's own, and he is akin to Dull, the constable in "Love's Labour's Lost." What plot there is in this early play seems of the poet's own manufacture; and if Dogberry be, to some extent, Dull retouched, he also claims affinity with Gobbo, Mrs. Quickly, Elbow, and the second gravedigger in "Hamlet."—A. R. B.

GISSING'S LAST BOOK.—"The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft" might, perhaps, be styled a Romantic Autobiography.—A. R. B.

GENERAL

"WEIGH" "WAY."—It is possible to see no ignorant mistake in the nautical "get under weigh." Our word "weigh" is derived from A. S. weagan, meaning "to carry," and to weigh the anchor expresses the getting and carrying of it on board. Sailors do not use the term "to get under weigh" to express a favourable fluctuation of speed, but to describe the resumption of normal speed after anchoring. Hence "weigh" seems to be quite the right word. The old word "goings" gives one of the many meanings of "way," and only if such a meaning is intended could it be right to say, "get under way"?—S. C.

"PANETTONE" AND "PANETTO," not "PANATTONNE."—Panettone means big bread—in the sense of fine or glorified bread. The sweetened dough is made very light and spongy, with a few plums. It is the distinctive cake of Milan, and may be seen in dozens at the buffet of the station.—E. M. C. (Salò).

"NOT FIT TO HOLD THE CANDLE TO HIM."—There is good literary authority for this phrase. It occurs in the "Merchant of Venice," where Jessica says to Lorenzo, "What, must I hold a candle to my shame?" (II, vi., 41). In this passage, however, it seems to be used in its literal sense, but the use of this phrase in its figurative sense is fairly common among the Elizabethans.—A. J. A.

"NOT FIT TO HOLD A CANDLE."—The phrase is not colloquial; Byron writes:—

"Some say, compared to Buononcini,
That Mynheer Handel's but a ninny;
Others aver that he to Handel
Is scarcely fit to hold a candle."

The allusion is to linkboys who held torches to light passengers.—M. T. (Ilkley).

"POPE'S NAME."—The name of Pope Sergius II. before election (844) was Peter. Out of reverence to St. Peter that Pope took the name by which he is known. Subsequent Popes have followed Sergius the Second's example, without the cause that moved him.—Harnatopgeos.

TEA.—The earliest mention of tea by an Englishman is in a letter from Mr. Wickham, an agent of the East India Company, written from Firando in Japan, on the 27th June, 1616, to Mr. Eaton, another officer of the company, resident at Macao, and asking for "a pot of the best sort of chaw," and in Mr. Eaton's subsequent account of expenditure occurs this item—"three silver porringers to drink chaw in."—M. McLean Dobbs.

TEA BEFORE 1687.—According to old Isaac Disraeli tea was introduced into England by Lord Arlington and Lord Ossory, who brought over a small quantity from Holland in 1686. But this is antedated by the following advertisement in Mercurius Politicus September 30th, 1688: "That excellent and by all Physicians approved China Drink called by the Chinese Tea, by other Nations Tay alias Tee, is sold at the Sultaness Head Cophee-House in Sweetings Rents, by the Royal Exchange, London."—F. S.

CALIGULA.—Reply received from E. Wakefield.

"FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY."—Reply received from J. H. McM.

DRAMATIC

WIND ON THE STAGE.—("Vanity Fair.") I believe that Mr. Forbes Robertson recently tried fans in the wings with disastrous results to scenery and the actors' health.—Garrick.

*MONSIEUR BEAUCAIRE.—The correspondent who answered Historian's question is wrong. The grandson of the Regent Philippe d'Orléans (1674-1725), who was born in 1725 bore all these titles. He was called Louis Philippe, Duc d'Orléans, de Valois, Chartres, Nemours et Montpensier, Comte de Vermandois, &c., &c. My authority is the Comte Duos. In a work by him, entitled "La mère du Duc d'Enghien," we have the marriage contract of Bathilde d'Orléans with the Duc de Bourbon. She was the daughter of Louis Philippe, who was born in 1725. This contract is now at the Archives.—Cunctator.

PRIZES.—The asterisks denote the two questions and two answers to which prizes have been awarded. The winners can obtain, on application at the following booksellers, Five Shillings' worth of books. Notices have been despatched to the several winners and to the four booksellers whose names follow:—

Mr. Charles Gardner, 31, Dundas Street, Edinburgh.
Messrs. T. R. and E. Vickers, The Grove, Ilkley, Yorks.
Mr. Charles Jones, Old Bookstall, Colonnade, Malvern.
Messrs. Harrison and Sons, 59, Pall Mall, S.W.

The Far East—Books to Read Now

A NEW EDITION.

JOURNEY TO LHASA AND CENTRAL TIBET.

By SARAT CHANDRA DAS, C.I.E., of the Bengal Educational Service, Member of the Asiatic Society, Bengal, &c.
With Map and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
[Ready next week.]

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

MARLBOROUGH'S "SELF-TAUGHT" SERIES of EUROPEAN and ORIENTAL LANGUAGES.

Contains Travel-Talk for Railway, Steamboat, Customs, Hotel, Naval and Military Terms, &c., Vocabularies and Grammar, &c., with ENGLISH PHONETIC PRONUNCIATION.

RUSSIAN	Self-Taught. Wrapper, 2/- each; cloth, 2/6 each.	HINDUSTAN	Self-Taught. Wrapper, 2/- each; cloth, 2/6 each.
NORWEGIAN		EGYPTIAN
SWEDISH		ARABIC
DANISH		TURKISH

E. MARLBOROUGH & Co., Publishers, LONDON, E.C.

ASK YOUR LIBRARIAN OR BOOKSELLER FOR MY JAPANESE WIFE (A Japanese Idyll.)

By CLIVE HOLLAND.

Twelve Editions of this book have already been printed, and a few copies only left of the Thirteenth Edition. Crown 8vo, with Coloured Frontispiece, price 3s. 6d.

London: R. A. EVERETT & Co., Ltd., 42, Essex St., Strand, W.C.

AN IMPORTANT BOOK TO READ.

In 2 vols. royal 8vo, 420 Illustrations, 8 Coloured.

Price TWO GUINEAS net.

CENTRAL ASIA AND TIBET

Towards the Holy City of Lassa.

By SVEN HEDIN,

Author of "Through Asia," &c.

HURST & BLACKETT, Limited, 13, Great Marlborough Street, W.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN,

ALBEMARLE STREET, PICCADILLY, W.

TUESDAY NEXT (FEBRUARY 23RD), at Five o'clock,
E. FOXWELL, Esq., M.A., First of Three Lectures on "JAPANESE LIFE AND CHARACTER." Half-a-Guinea the Course.

THURSDAY (FEBRUARY 25TH), at Five o'clock, Professor
H. L. CALLENDAR, M.A., LL.D., F.R.S., First of Three Lectures on "ELECTRICAL METHODS OF MEASURING TEMPERATURE."
Half-a-Guinea the Course.

Subscription to all the Courses in the Season, Two Guineas.

DRAMATIC STORIES IN VERSE.

By OSWALD CRAWFORD, Author of "The Ways of The Millionaire."

TWO MASQUES. Crown 4to, price 5s. net.

THE SIN OF PRINCE ELADANE. Crown 8vo, price 2s. 6d.

From the Daily Chronicle.—"Mr. Oswald Crawford has shown the way to a new field for verse that should prove rich in fruit of a modest but very attractive kind."

PUBLISHED BY CHAPMAN & HALL, Ltd., 11, Henrietta Street, London.

Mr. Helnemann begs to announce the publication of two important works touching the Far East Question.

For JAPAN, CHINA, KOREA, and SIBERIA, Read The World's History.—Vol. II.

The 2nd Volume of this work (of which Volumes I., III., IV. and VII. have already appeared) is now ready, and deals with the territories and peoples at present forming the Stage and Dramatis Personæ of one of the Greatest Dramas of the World's History.

The Myths, Gods and Heroes, Religions, Dynasties, Social and Political development, aims and ideals of the various pure and blended races, as well as the geographical configuration (aided by the most recent maps) and climatic conditions of the countries they occupy, are described with the greatest literary skill and historical accuracy. This Volume will be found a sine quâ non to those desirous of understanding fully the factors which have contributed to the great awakening of an Eastern people to the consciousness of its mission of Civilization.

A SECOND EDITION OF KOREA. By ANGUS HAMILTON. 15s. net.

This Book, fresh from the pen of an Eye-witness of the social and political condition and customs of the Koreans and their destined lords, the Japs, has attracted so much attention during the past two weeks that the whole of the First Edition has been exhausted. To understand the Hermit Kingdom this book is a necessity.

WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, London, W.C.

"THE TIMES" LITERARY SUPPLEMENT.

A Special Literary Supplement is published with The Times on Friday. This Supplement is an impartial and authoritative organ of literary criticism and a comprehensive and trustworthy medium of literary intelligence. It can be had with The Times of Friday alone.

Subscriptions, inclusive of postage, for The Times of Friday:—

	3 Months.	6 Months.	12 Months.
Inland ...	3s. 3d.	6s. 6d.	13s. 0d.
Foreign ...	4s. 4d.	8s. 8d.	17s. 4d.

CONTENTS OF FRIDAY, FEB. 19, 1904.

Literature.

The Book of Genesis.
A Great American Reformer.
Studies in Irish History.
Asia and Europe.
Japan.
Navy Records.
Robert Burns.
Elizabeth in Rugen—More Studies
by J. R. Green—Some Lessons of the Boer War.

Fiction.

The Gods are Just.
The House of Quiet.

Correspondence.

"The Dynasts," a Postscript (Mr. Thomas Hardy).

Drama.

"The Mourning Bride."

Music.

Some Books on Music.

"THE TIMES" LITERARY SUPPLEMENT is also sold with the Mail, or

"THE TIMES" WEEKLY EDITION, upon payment of an additional penny.

Address THE PUBLISHER, The Times,
Printing House Square, London, E.C.

Messrs. METHUEN'S NEW BOOKS

THE GODS OF THE EGYPTIANS. By E. WALLIS BUDGE, Litt.D. With 98 Coloured Plates and Illustrations in the Text. 2 vols., royal 8vo, £3 3s. net.

An elaborate description of the worship of Spirits, Demons, and Gods in Egypt from the earliest periods to the introduction of Christianity. "Dr. Budge's volumes are a credit to English scholarship. We are entitled to expect from him what the French call a 'definitive' work on the subject, and the result fully answers our expectations."—Athenæum.

BYZANTINE TEXTS.

THE CHRONICLE OF MOREA. Edited by JOHN SCHMITT. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

THE ELEMENTS OF METAPHYSICS. By A. E. TAYLOR. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"The work is divided into four books, of which the first deals with general notions, the second with the general structure of reality, the third with cosmology, and the fourth with psychology. The book is marked by great earnestness of purpose and soundness of judgment, and will be found to contain, besides its own positive teaching, a valuable and well-poised estimate of current philosophical doctrines."—Glasgow Herald.

"Mr. Taylor has full mastery over his materials, and he writes a clear and fluent style."—Scotsman.

THE LIFE AND PRINCIPATE OF THE EMPEROR NERO. By B. W. HENDERSON, Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Henderson writes with power, brilliancy, and charm. His account of Aote, and his description of the death of Britannicus, are small masterpieces."—Spectator. "Very readable and thoroughly scholarly."—Manchester Guardian. "One of the ablest books that has come out of Oxford for some time."—Pall Mall Gazette.

WESTMINSTER COMMENTARIES.

THE BOOK OF GENESIS. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by S. R. DRIVER, D.D., Canon of Christchurch, and Regius Professor of Hebrew at Oxford. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d.

ILLUSTRATED POCKET LIBRARY.

THE COMPLETE ANGLER. By IZAAC WALTON and CHARLES COTTON. With 14 Plates and 77 Woodcuts in the Text. 3s. 6d. net. This Volume is reproduced from the beautiful edition of John Major of 1874-5.

THE ANALYSIS OF THE HUNTING FIELD. With 7 Coloured Plates by HENRY ALKEN, and 43 Illustrations on Wood. 3s. 6d. net.

MR. SPONGE'S SPORTING TOUR. By R. S. SURTEES. With 13 Coloured Plates and 90 Woodcuts by JOHN LEECH. 3s. 6d. net. "The most dainty and covetable books that have appeared for many years." "A truly delightful series in a delightful form."—Outlook. "No pleasanter editions to read or handle can be desired."—Standard.

ARDEN SHAKESPEARE.

THE MERRY WIVES OF WINDSOR. By WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE. Edited by H. C. HART. Demy 8vo, 3s. 6d.

LITTLE BIOGRAPHIES.

TENNYSON. By A. C. BENSON. With 12 Illustrations. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.; leather, 4s. net.

ROBERT BURNS. By T. F. HENDERSON. With 12 Illustrations. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.; leather, 4s. net. "A plain unvarnished narrative, informed with sympathy; a model of its kind." "At once concise, adequate, and readable."—St. James's Gazette. "Mr. Henderson has done his work well. He is judicious and candid, and regards his subject with sympathy."—Spectator.

THE LITTLE GUIDES.

SUFFOLK. By W. A. DUTT. Illustrated by J. WYLIE. Small pot 8vo, cloth, 3s.; leather, 3s. 6d. net.

JOHN BULL'S ADVENTURES IN THE FISCAL WONDERLAND. By C. GEAKE and F. CARRUTHERS GOULD. With 46 Illustrations by F. CARRUTHERS GOULD. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. "An exceptionally clever parody."—Outlook.

"Much food for merriment. To those who can enjoy a political skit which pokes fun, sometimes maliciously but never malevolently, at the Member for West Birmingham, these pages will furnish much amusement."—Scotsman. "Protectionists with any sense of humour will enjoy the book as much as Free-traders."—Truth.

"If there is any quite modern parody, which for precision, freshness, and political point, never deviating into bad humour, can compare with the 'Fiscal Wonderland,' we can only regret that it has hitherto escaped our attention."—Morning Leader.

LITTLE BOOKS ON ART.

"An exquisitely artistic Little Library of Art."—Daily News. "They exceed all rivals in comeliness, being delightful to regard and pleasant to handle."—Yorkshire Post.

WATTS. By R. E. D. SKETCHLEY. With many Illustrations. Demy 16mo, 2s. 6d. net.

GREEK ART. By H. B. WALTERS. With many Illustrations. Demy 16mo, 2s. 6d. net.

METHUEN'S MINIATURE LIBRARY.

A Series of Reprints in Miniature of a few interesting Books which have qualities of humanity, devotion, or literary genius.

THE NEW VOLUME IS
THE RUBAIYAT OF OMAR KHAYYAM. By EDWARD FITZGERALD. From the First Edition of 1859. Leather, 1s. net.

KINDLY WRITE TO MESSRS. METHUEN FOR THEIR NEW LIST OF ANNOUNCEMENTS.

METHUEN & Co., 36, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

BOOKS ON BUSINESS.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

MESSRS. METHUEN propose to issue a Series of Volumes dealing with all the most important aspects of commercial and financial activity.

THE STOCK EXCHANGE. By CHAS. DUGUID, City Editor of the Morning Post, Author of "The Story of the Stock Exchange."

RAILWAYS. By E. R. McDERMOTT, Editor of the Railway News, City Editor of the Daily News.

"A great mass of useful information in a small compass."—Star. "A very interesting book, the perusal of which will well repay every business man."—Investor's Review.

PORTS AND DOCKS. By DOUGLAS OWEN, Barrister-at-Law, Secretary to the Alliance Marine and General Assurance Company.

PROTECTION AND INDUSTRY. By various Writers.

Crown 8vo, 1s. 6d. net. A Series of Articles written by experts, from the Free Trade point of view, on the great branches of business which are alleged to be injuriously affected by Free Trade.

"Altogether, the book is timely and most useful."—Investor's Review. "A valuable contribution to the current controversy."—Morning Leader.

THE LITTLE QUARTO SHAKESPEARE.

Pott 16mo, leather, price 1s. net each Volume.

A Miniature Edition of the Plays and Poems of Shakespeare. The Series will consist of 40 Volumes. With Introductions and brief but sufficient Footnotes by Mr. W. J. CRAIG.

"Altogether they are sweet little morsels which will delight the soul of the bibliophile."—Star.

"We are inclined to hail this edition as the best of all pocket Shakespeares."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE FOLLOWING ARE READY:—

TWO GENTLEMEN OF VERONA.	MERCHANT OF VENICE.
A COMEDY OF ERRORS.	TAMING OF THE SHREW.
THE TEMPEST.	MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.
MEASURE FOR MEASURE.	MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING.
LOVE'S LABOUR'S LOST.	AS YOU LIKE IT.
THE MERRY WIVES OF WINDSOR.

FICTION.

THE AMERICAN PRISONER. By EDEN PHILLIPOTTS.

Crown 8vo, 6s. "Here is romance, and the characters live."—Morning Post. "A graceful story; a novel of unusual merit. Full of adventure and scenes to stir the coldest blood."—Daily News.

"A very exciting and interesting story. Mr. Phillipotts's rustics are as good company as any we have in the works of living writers. Enriched by admirable descriptive passages, informed by local lore and penetrated by a deep sense of the magic and mystery of the moor. Intensely readable and often delightful."—Spectator.

GRAN'MA'S JANE. By MARY E. MANN. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"If you once begin it you will not put this novel down for bed or board or work or play till you finish it. It is the very strongest thing Mr. Mann has yet done."—Truth. "Quiet humour, sympathetic humanity, realistic strength."—Daily Mail.

ABANDONED. By W. CLARK RUSSELL. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Mr. Clark Russell may always be depended upon as a writer of healthy and interesting stories. The idea of the book is striking. The bride refuses to live with her husband, and the gallant captain, finding fair means fail, resorts to foul, and manages to kidnap his reluctant love. Alone of all his crew he is washed ashore on an uninhabited island. Here we have Mr. Russell at his best. The end of the story is cleverly conceived, and not in any way theatrical or melodramatic."—Daily News.

THE YELLOW DIAMOND. By ADELINE SERGEANT.

Crown 8vo, 6s. GARNERED. By RICHARD MARSH. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE ROYAL QUAKER. By Mrs. B. TANQUERAY. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A CHANGE OF FACE. By THOMAS COBB. Crown 8vo, 6s.

DAVID MAROH. By J. S. FLETCHER. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A LOST ESTATE. By MARY E. MANN. A New Edition.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

METHUEN'S SIXPENNY NOVELS.

METHUEN'S SIXPENNY NOVELS are the most popular Sixpenny Books in existence, and they are to be seen everywhere. Please ask for them at all Booksellers' and Bookstalls. The last volumes were THE RED HOUSE, by E. NESBIT, and THE CREDIT OF THE COUNTY, by W. E. NORRIS.

One of the most remarkable ventures in publishing is Messrs. Methuen's Sixpenny Edition of all the Novels of Alexandre Dumas. Every book has been freshly translated, and is well printed on good paper, and in an attractive cover. There will be over 70 books when the Series is complete. Each volume is unabridged. Please ask to see one of the volumes. The New Number is THE BLACK TULIP. "The first volumes are on our table, and they evoke sincere admiration for their workmanlike, comely, and attractive appearance. The type is clear, bold-faced, and eminently readable."—Daily Chronicle.

THE THREE MUSKETEERS. With a long Introduction by ANDREW LANG. Double Volume.

THE PRINCE OF THIEVES.

ROBIN HOOD. A Sequel to the above.

THE CORSCAN BROTHERS.

GEORGES.

CROP-EARED JACQUOT.

An Edition of "The Three Musketeers" is also published in cloth, 2s. 6d.

TWENTY YEARS AFTER. Double Number.

CERILE; or, the Wedding Gown.

ACTE.

THE BLACK TULIP.

THE SNOWBALL & SULTANETTA.

THE CASTLE OF EPPSTEIN.

AMAURY.

The Academy and Literature

No. 1659. Established 1869. London: 20 February 1904.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17/6 a year.]

Literary Notes

AT last! At last there seems to be a probability of seeing an adequate Shakespeare memorial in London. No one grudges the fame of Stratford-on-Avon, but after all it was in London that Shakespeare lived and worked; it was from the country surrounding London that he drew much of his inspiration, and we have still in our midst many memorials of Elizabethan London, little appreciated it may be and deserving of far more attention than they are usually given. The question of the memorial is under consideration of the London County Council, and has been the object for some time past of the London Shakespeare Commemoration League, of which Mr. T. Fairman Ordish is president. The site suggested is a portion of the ground now being cleared between the Houses of Parliament and Lambeth Bridge. Mr. George Badge, an old Stratfordian, has made a generous offer of support.

BUT what is the memorial to be? Not a statue, I hope, or, as has been suggested, a Shakespeare school of dramatic art. What is wanted is a thoroughly practical institution in connection with Shakespearean study and Elizabethan London. A library, a museum of relics, pictures, maps, &c., of Elizabethan London, a portrait gallery of Shakespearean actors, critics and commentators, and a lecture and meeting-room (possibly this last could be combined with the picture gallery). But above all what is required is enthusiasm and surely this will not be difficult to arouse. The study of Shakespeare and his times is fascinating if only rightly approached, and the scheme outlined above would be welcomed, I believe, and generally supported by all lovers and students of Shakespeare.

NEXT month Mr. John Murray will publish "Lord Cardwell at the War Office," by General Sir Robert Biddulph, who was military secretary to Lord Cardwell, and must therefore have known better than anyone the importance and character of Lord Cardwell's work. Another interesting work from the same house will be "Henry Brocken, his Travels and Adventures in the Rich, Strange, Scarce-imaginable Kingdom of Romance," by Mr. Walter J. de la Mare, favourably known already as a poet under the pen-name of Walter Rawal.

MRS. KATHERINE TYNAN HINKSON is very busy at present. Messrs. F. V. White will publish a novel by her on the 29th, and a second, "Judy's Lovers," on June 30. In the autumn Messrs. Smith, Elder will issue a novel from the same pen; and Messrs. Collins, of Glasgow, a girls' book for Christmas; also a serial, "Julia," will commence in "The Gentlewoman" toward the end of March. Mrs. Hinkson has also completed three gift-books for children, two of which will be illustrated by Mr. Charles Robinson, the third by Mr. John Hassall.

AN interesting incident appertaining to the earlier years of the late Canon Ainger has been overlooked by most of the writers of the various obituary notices. In the days of his youth he took part in the private theatricals, organised by Dickens at Tavistock House on Twelfth Night—which happened to be the birthday anniversary of the novelist's eldest son. These juvenile entertainments began in 1854, and were renewed until the principal actors ceased to be children. In that year Mr. Ainger assumed the part of Lord Grizzle in Fielding's burlesque, "Tom Thumb," for which Dickens composed entirely new songs; in 1855 the play selected for representation in "The Smallest Theatre in the World" (as Dickens called it) was "Fortunio," and among other humorous announcements, the playbill notified, in large type, "Re-engagement of that irresistible comedian, Mr. Ainger!" to whom the part of the Emperor Matapa was assigned.

MR. "BENJAMIN SWIFT"
[Photo, Elliot & Fry, Baker St., W.]

ANOTHER play in which Mr. Ainger assisted was "The Lighthouse," by Wilkie Collins, when performed at Tavistock House in 1855. He formed one of the "Relief of Light Keepers," and the cast included Dickens himself, who was ably supported by Wilkie Collins, Mark Lemon, Augustus Egg, Miss Hogarth and Miss Dickens, the latter being deputed to sing a new ballad, the words of which were composed by "Mr. Crummles"—i.e., Charles Dickens.

To those with but little shelf-room for their books as well as to those with little spare money for literary purchases the numberless cheap and good reprints with which publishers are now providing us come as a boon. As to space, an example will suffice. Miss Austen's novels can now be purchased for a small price in two thin volumes! As to the other point, authors, publishers and booksellers know to their cost that it is only his spare money that the average man spends upon books, and it is a disgrace to us as a nation that this should be so. The moment that money becomes "tight" the first luxury to be cut down is books, for literature is looked upon in this country as a mere luxury for the leisured and the well-to-do, not as a necessity for every man who would keep his brain clear and in good working order. But I will not labour this point, to which recently considerable attention, but not too much, has been given in these columns.

MR. YERKES, of underground fame, has recently expressed the opinion that "the worst fooled man is the man who fools himself." Does not this apply with striking force to the man who fools himself into believing that he keeps in touch with life and literature by perusing "tit-bits" and reviews?

MR. LUCIEN WOLF will not contribute a biographical volume to the edition he is editing of Lord Beaconsfield's works, but a biographical introduction to each volume.

ACCORDING to the latest annual report of the Minister for Education there are fifteen public and thirty-five private libraries in Japan. Of the books read the largest percentage is 22.1 for works on science and mathematics, next in order being history, biography, travel, &c., 19.8, and literature and language 19.5. In Tokio, until recent years, the university library used to bear the name of the "Place for the Examination of Barbarian Writings."

PROFESSOR RHYS is engaged in revising his "Celtic Britain" (S.P.C.K.) for a new edition to be issued probably some time in May; the work will be brought up to date and a revised map will be added.

MR. PULTENEY BIGELOW is working at Volume IV. of his six-volume "History of Germany" (1806-1900).

MR. W. H. RIDEING, known to lovers of Thackeray, has written a novel "How Tyson Came Home," which will be published by Mr. John Lane. It deals with the story of an Englishman who, after a long absence "out West," returns to the old country.

ARRANGEMENTS are being made in Salem, Mass., for a celebration of the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Nathaniel Hawthorne on July 4. It would be a graceful act on the part of Englishmen of letters if some notice were taken in this country of the occasion. July 4 is truly a great day in America!

PROFESSOR GEORGE E. WOODBERRY, who has resigned his position at Columbia University, will edit for Messrs. McClure a "universal" library of literature, which, I understand, will run somewhat on the lines of Bohn's library. The outcome of this scheme will be watched with interest, but at first sight there scarcely seems to be room left for such an undertaking, the success of which, however, will chiefly depend upon the discretion used in the choice of works, the format and the price.

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S "Lady Rose's Daughter" will shortly be issued in an Italian version.

THE Lothrop Publishing Company of Boston (U.S.A.) are issuing "The Human Touch," by Mrs. Edith M. Nicholl, a daughter of the late Dean Bradley. The authoress resides in New Mexico, and makes due use of "local colour" in her story.

MR. HERBERT SPENCER'S Autobiography, which will be published by Messrs. Williams and Norgate at the end of March or early in April, will form two large volumes and will contain a number of portraits. It ends before the completion of the "System of Synthetic Philosophy," at the time the author left London and retired to Brighton, where, as is well known, he spent the later years of his life. In his preface he calls the work "a natural history" of himself, and this it is; but it is also a book full of side-lights on the intellectual life of the Victorian era. The first volume deals with the philosopher's boyhood and early life, the second with his literary work. There will be some twenty-five illustrations in all. Messrs. Appleton will publish the work in America.

At the Royal Institution on Tuesday next (February 23) Mr. E. Foxwell, late Professor of Economics and Finance at the Imperial University, Tokyo, will deliver the first of three lectures, at five o'clock, on "Japanese Life and Character" and on Thursday (February 25), at the same hour, Professor H. L. Callendar will commence a course of three lectures on "Electrical Methods of Measuring Temperature." The Friday evening discourse on February 26 will be delivered by Mr. Alexander Siemens, his subject being "New Developments in Electric Railways"; on March 4, by Professor W. Stirling, on "Breathing in Living Things"; and on March 11, by Professor F. T. Trouton, on the "Motion of Viscous Substances."

MR. FRANKLIN T. BARRETT, of the Public Libraries, Fulham, writes me as follows: "In your literary notes of 13th inst. you refer to the inadequacy of public library statistics as a guide to the relative amount of reading done by the public in fiction and in non-fiction. There is no doubt that these statistics (being of issues only) are quite misleading, and for many other reasons than the one you instance. But notwithstanding that, the amount of fiction skimmed—there is very little read—is deplorable. The cure, if cure be possible, cannot fail to be slow, but it lies in the directions you indicate. That we think so in this library is evidenced by the enclosed handbill. I may remark that we have the use of a committee room with seats for 70 persons for the meetings of the class, and that though very little advertising was done some 150 applications were received for the 80 tickets allotted. The attendance at the first meeting was 67, and at the second 50 (an exceedingly wet and unpleasant night)." A leaflet is enclosed drawing attention to a class for the study of English literature, conducted by Mr. John Scott, on Friday evenings, at 8, at the Fulham Town Hall, the tickets for which and full particulars can be obtained from Mr. Barrett. It is pleasant to hear of this enterprise, which it is to be hoped will meet with great success.

MESSRS. ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & Co. will publish "The History of the King's Bodyguard of the Yeomen of the Guard." A striking feature of the book will be the illustrations, consisting of some sixty plates in all, many being in colour, photogravure, &c., most of which have never before been published; several being from the unique royal collection which the King has given special permission to be reproduced. The issue of the book will be limited to one edition of 300 copies.

"THE RAPID REVIEW" will doubtless prove very useful to those who have not the time to read the magazines. But personally I should have had a warmer welcome for a more complete review of the newspapers of the month; there is much good matter in the daily paper which dies an early death, and which would well bear reprinting in the pages of "The Rapid Review"; the continental papers receive too little attention in England.

MESSRS. KELLY'S "Clergy List for 1904" is to hand, and is, as ever, an accurate and useful work of reference.

Bibliographical

MR. W. E. MOZLEY says that Mr. Robert Browning gave him, in conversation, "a very interesting account of Mr. E. M. Fitzgerald's chequered career." If Mr. Mozley can recollect any part of that account, one would be glad if he would make it public. There is nothing about Edward Marlborough Fitzgerald in the brand-new edition of Chambers's "Cyclopædia of English Literature"; nor, I may add, is there anything about him in the "Dictionary of National Biography." He figures, to be sure, in Mr. Miles's "Poets and Poetry of the Century," but Mr. Miles has no more to tell us than Mr. Locker-Lampson told us in his "Lyra Elegantiarum" (1867), in the notes to which we read: "Mr. Fitzgerald wrote in the style of Præd, and perhaps exaggerated Præd's defects; but there are noteworthy stanzas by him scattered through the magazines. It is said that Præd assisted Fitzgerald in his compositions." Mr. Locker-Lampson reproduced three of Fitzgerald's pieces—"Because," "Good-night," and "Chivalry at a Discount"; and, curiously enough, these are precisely the pieces that Mr. Miles reproduces. Of course, Mr. Wright is not justified in ascribing to Edward Fitzgerald (with the capital G) verses which, much more probably, were written by Edward Fitzgerald (without the capital G); but, equally, there is no reason why the verse-work of the latter should be unduly depreciated. Why not always speak and write of the former as "Omar" Fitzgerald? That would sufficiently differentiate the two Edwards.

There is, by the way, a third Fitzgerald (without the capital G) among the bards—that "hoarse Fitzgerald" who, according to Byron, was wont to "bawl his croaking couplets in a tavern hall"; whom Cobbett described, happily, as "the Small-Beer Poet," and who lives among the parodies in "Rejected Addresses." With him, fortunately, "Omar" Fitzgerald is not likely ever to be confused. And yet the "Dictionary of National Biography," though it ignores E. M. Fitzgerald, records the performances of "Fitzgerald, William Thomas."

It would not be fair to prejudge the volume of "Notes" from Mr. Palgrave's "Golden Treasury of English Songs and Lyrics" which is said to be on its way to us. One would not have thought that the "Notes" could be of much service without the anthology to which they refer; but we must wait and see. Meanwhile, is it not possible to exaggerate the permanent value of these "Notes," and indeed, of Mr. Palgrave's literary comments generally? The First Series of the "Golden Treasury" came out in 1861, and, personally, I am inclined to ascribe most of what is excellent in that anthology to the knowledge and taste of Lord Tennyson, of whose assistance Mr. Palgrave made acknowledgment. In proof of this I would submit the Second Series, published in 1896, which was marked by glaring errors of literary judgment, both in selection and in criticism. The First Series still remains—by virtue, I believe, of Lord Tennyson's share in its compilation—the best anthology of English lyrical verse down to the days of Wordsworth. But concerning the Second Series the less said the better.

"The sentimentalist," says Sir Leslie Stephen in his new volume (page 160), "does not weep because painful thoughts are forced upon him, but because he finds weeping pleasant in itself. He appreciates the 'luxury of grief.' (The phrase is used in Brown's 'Barbarossa'; I don't know who invented it.)" Now Dr. Brown's tragedy of "Barbarossa" was performed at Drury Lane in December, 1754. Did Tom Moore ever read it? If he did, we may have in Brown's "luxury of grief" the origin of Moore's "luxury of woe"—

Weep on, and, as thy sorrows flow,
I'll taste the luxury of woe.

But phrases like "the luxury of grief" are apt to be caught up and bandied about from mouth to mouth.

That Mr. John Lane is about to reproduce Melville's "Omoo" and "Typee" is the latest testimony to the strong vitality of those works. An edition of "Typee" was issued by Mr. W. H. White so recently as 1898. On the other hand, I fancy the latest reprint of "Omoo" was that by Mr. Murray in 1893, in which year Mr. Murray also re-issued "Typee" (with a memoir of Melville). Messrs. Putnam issued both works in 1892. New editions of two other popular books by Melville—"Moby Dick" and "White Jacket"—came out about two years ago.

I described Mortimer Collins last week as the laureate of Brighton. I have a very strong feeling that that clever rhymester has not had full justice done to him, and I should much like to see the publication of a volume of selections from his verse. There are things in "The British Birds" hardly surpassable in their way, and some of his sentimental lyrics are really pretty. Out of "The British Birds" (1872), "Summer Songs" (1860), "Idyls and Rhymes" (1865), "Letter to Benjamin Disraeli" (1869), "The Inn of Strange Meetings" (1871), and, I may add, the many songs embedded in his novels, it should be possible to build up a worthy monument to an exceptionally able verse-maker.

When I gave last week some bibliographical details concerning Canon Ainger, I ought to have explained that I was confining myself to his published volumes. An esteemed correspondent now suggests that I should mention the Canon's accounts of Charles Lamb in "The Dictionary of National Biography" and in Chambers's "Cyclopædia of English Literature"; also his articles on "Charles Lamb in Hertfordshire" in the "English Illustrated Magazine" for January, 1886, and on "Thomas Poole and his Friends" in "Macmillan's Magazine" for February, 1889. One of the editors of "The Hampstead Annual" also writes to inform me that Canon Ainger contributed an article to every issue of the "Annual" from 1897 to 1903 inclusive, the subjects being successively "George du Maurier in Hampstead," "Joanna Bailie," "Margaret Gillies," "Edward Fitzgerald's Letters," "Mrs. Barbauld," "The Children's Books of One Hundred Years Ago," and "George Crabbe in Hampstead."

THE BOOKWORM.

B

Reviews

Shakespeare

STUDIES IN SHAKESPEARE. By J. Churton Collins. (Constable. 7s 6d.)

THESE studies of various aspects of Shakespeare and his work if not always convincing are interesting and suggestive. The first essay in the volume, "On Shakespeare as a Classical Scholar," is on the whole the best, proving as it does beyond reasonable doubt "that the poet was not merely a fair Latin scholar, but that his knowledge of the classics both of Greece and Rome was remarkably extensive." Mr. Collins supports his argument with a fine array of illustrations, and does not, as so many do, attach undue weight to "parallels." Shakespeare has suffered more than any other author at the hands of commentators and critics, to whom it is chiefly due that the majority of people look upon the dramatist as a phenomenon for whose work there is no reasonable account to be given and of whose life we know less than of that of any other great writer. As a matter of fact we know more about Shakespeare than we do of any of his contemporary dramatists and we are in a position to trace his methods of work very fully. This latter point is made clear in another essay in Mr. Collins' "Studies," that on Shakespeare and Holinshed. In truth the Bacon mania could not exist for a day had not the Shakespeare myth grown up. Shakespeare was a poet, a practical dramatist, an actor, a keen man of business, concerning whose life we know a great deal and whose work we can study from the inside by the aid of the intimate knowledge we possess not only of his methods of work but of the circumstances under which he lived, moved and had his being.

All the essays in this volume are marked by careful scholarship and high thinking. "Shakespeare as a Prose Writer" is an extremely useful study of a field in Shakespearean criticism to which but little attention has been paid. The glory of Shakespeare's poetry has cast a shadow over his prose and Mr. Collins does not exaggerate when he writes: "Had he taken up the novel where Greene and Lyly left it, England would not have had to wait a century and a half for novels like Fielding's, and more than two centuries for novels like Walter Scott's." But there are matters upon which we cannot see eye to eye with Mr. Collins. Take, for example, this comment upon "Hamlet": "It is, in relation to its motive and main interest, a purely psychological study, and to that study the whole action of the drama is subordinated." This, as we see it, is a sample of that bad habit of reading into Shakespeare's work and of putting into his mind thoughts that were never there. Shakespeare, to repeat, was a practical dramatist; he wrote plays in preference to poems and to fiction because by so doing he appealed to the largest possible and most profitable public, and can it be really argued with any sense of conviction that he would have asked the Elizabethan playgoing public to come in crowds to see a psychological study? Surely to the Elizabethan playgoer "Hamlet" was like "Richard III." and "Macbeth" a stirring drama of blood and thunder, ghosts, daggers, duels, murders all appealed to the spectators in boxes or in the pit, who called for energy, movement and, above all, horrors; but for psychology—no! Doubtless the psychology is there as it is in any great drama by any great dramatist, and poetry because Shakespeare was poet as well as playwright; but Mr. Collins is certainly wrong in writing that "the whole action of the drama is subordinated" to the study of psychology!

Moreover, Mr. Collins contradicts himself, to our thinking, saying elsewhere: "It is as a dramatic poet and a dramatic poet only that Shakespeare deals with life; he is a moralist and theosophist indirectly and by virtue of the subtlety, profundity, and comprehensiveness of his dramatic insight."

Again, Mr. Collins devotes over thirty pages to discussing the question, "Was Shakespeare a Lawyer?" Is not this time wasted? Shakespeare owned possibly the most retentive memory and the most receptive mind with which man was ever blessed. Then, too, he had seen much of life. Then, too, as to the law, he must as a boy have grown weary of the law and its delays and difficulties, for he must have heard and learnt more of it than he had any desire to do in connection with his father's monetary and other troubles. Shakespeare can be found to have been anything and everything if we pick our quotations carefully. Again, what grounds has Mr. Collins for thinking it highly probable that "Venus and Adonis" was composed at Stratford as early perhaps as 1585?

It is only because this book of studies is so good as a whole, so sound and so sane, that we have devoted space to drawing attention to what appear to us to be its weak points. If all critics were as accomplished and as cautious, as fearful of over refinements and as anxious to avoid alterations when no alterations are called for, these essays of Mr. Collins' would not stand out so high as they do above most Studies in Shakespeare.

W. T. S.

SHAKESPEARE'S BOOKS. A DISSERTATION ON SHAKESPEARE'S READING AND THE IMMEDIATE SOURCES OF HIS WORKS. By H. R. D. Anders. (Berlin: Reimer. 7m.)
ENGLISCHE SCHAUSPIELER UND ENGLISCHES SCHAUSPIEL ZUR ZEIT SHAKESPEARES IN DEUTSCHLAND. Von Dr. E. Herz. (Hamburg: Voss. 6m.)

"SHAKESPEARE'S BOOKS" forms the first volume of the publications of the German Shakespeare Society, and owes its existence to the suggestion of Professor Brandl. It is a somewhat disappointing performance. There are few signs of original research, so that it comes to be little more than a creditable compilation of what other critics and scholars have discovered. And the style is so tiresome and unattractive that at times we are inclined to become irritated with the book and perhaps miss what in it is really of worth. The author seems cognisant of his sins in that direction, for in the preface he states that a long stay on the Continent—his alma mater is the Cape of Good Hope University—"can hardly be said to improve one's style." Certain disfigurements in the spelling, due doubtless to the printing of an English book at a foreign press, and to careless and ignorant proof reading, do not add to the charm. Another disfigurement to our mind is the contemptuous criticism in which Mr. Anders sometimes indulges when he has occasion to refer to other men's books, and this is as often as not introduced into the notes. Surely it is absurd to give a reference to a book and at the same time to say that it "has esprit but no depth," or that it is "a schoolboy's essay," or that it is "extravagant" or "verbose." We are also told by way of criticism that "The Jew of Malta" is Marlowe's best play, and that an "estimable lady," presumably of the author's acquaintance, told him that "Timon of Athens," acted by the Meiningen Company "made an ineffaceable impression on her mind."

Mr. Anders arranges the books to which Shakespeare had access conveniently under these heads: the classics, modern continental literature, English non-dramatic polite literature, the English drama, popular literature, the Bible and the prayer-book, books of travel and scientific works. He thinks it improbable that Shakespeare was the owner of a large private library. He probably had the run of the libraries of his patron the Earl of Southampton, of Jonson, Camden and others. The booksellers' shops in those days were public libraries of a sort, and of them there were plenty in London. The usual observations are made about Shakespeare's powers of assimilation. But it is not our purpose here to discuss how much knowledge Shakespeare gained from reading, or what were the books which he read. Mr. Anders mentions probably all the books that were accessible to a man of Shakespeare's standing and tastes, and he goes even further, for he gives passages from the plays that seem more or less to reproduce passages from those books, beginning with the Latin grammar. Such conjecture is not invariably safe, for, as we know, a similar thought may occur independently to two poets. The book contains a large amount of information, and will doubtless be useful to those who have neither the time nor the inclination to go themselves to original sources. Shakespearean scholars, however, should take note of the suggestions put forth as to books waiting to be written: among them are a full Shakespeare-Bibliography, a scientific (sic) History of Elizabethan Literature, an up-to-date edition of Simrock's "Quellen," a working index to Arber's transcript of the Stationers' Registers, and general indices to the publications of the Shakespeare Ballad Societies. We are heartily in agreement with Mr. Anders when he asserts that Shakespeare will gain in popularity not by study, not by learned comments and dissertations, but by good acting on the stage. Indeed, paradoxical as it sounds, we never see the performance of a play by Shakespeare with which we have had only a fireside acquaintance without marvelling how well he wrote for the stage.

The second book, an interesting and scholarly volume, forms the eighteenth part of a series of researches into theatrical history, edited by Professor Litzmann of Bonn. It is packed full with valuable information and makes appeal to students rather than to the general public. It deals with all the new material that has become available since the publication of Creizenach's "Plays of the English Comedians" in 1889.

The peregrinations of the ten companies of English actors who practised their art on the Continent between 1579 and 1650 are made clear by means of five maps, and it is instructive to find over what a wide area they wandered. They visited all the important towns between Stockholm, Riga, Dantzic and Königsberg in the north, and Vienna, Graz, Munich and Basle in the south, between Leyden in the west and Warsaw in the east. Dr. Herz dwells on the special characteristics of each troop. It is curious to learn that in the first instance they seemed to have owed their chief popularity to the "Singspiele," plays accompanied by singing and dancing which the English introduced into Germany, and which seem to have been greatly relished there. The subjects were suited to the intellectual level of the common people, who greatly preferred plays in which adultery was the leading motive. But bright, attractive music, certain melodies recurring often enough for the spectators to be able to join in the refrains of the songs, brilliant costumes and scenic decorations, lively dances and acrobatic feats were of even more importance. The action was naturally easy to follow without a knowledge of the English tongue. It may bring consolation to some to learn that musical comedy is not wholly an invention of the degenerate nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Twelve plays of Shakespeare were included in the repertory, and among other dramatists whose plays were represented we note Peele, Marlowe, Kyd, Greene, Chapman, Dekker, Marston, Beaumont and Fletcher, Massinger and Ford. The German version of these plays leaves much to be desired, and it would seem that the disfigurements and barbarities introduced into them were not invariably due to the German translator or adaptor, but were suggested by the director of the English troop of players in order that the pieces might "take" better with his audience. Among Shakespeare's plays were the "Comedy of Errors," the episode of the clowns' play of Pyramus and Thisbe from "Midsummer Night's Dream," "The Taming of the Shrew," "The Merchant of Venice," the first part of "Henry IV.," "Titus Andronicus," "Hamlet," "Lear," "Othello," and "Winter's Tale." But not one of them seems to have been given as Shakespeare wrote it. For details of the changes we must refer our readers to Dr. Herz's little treatise.

Desultory Essays

RUSKIN IN OXFORD, AND OTHER STUDIES. By G. W. Kitchin, D.D., Dean of Durham. (Murray. 12s. net.)

By no very violent metonymy we might apply to Dean Kitchin the epithet which belongs properly to his book. He, we are assured, is of more than ordinarily decanal suavity; but his book, though it deals with a variety of quite harmless and unexciting topics, is of that peculiarly glutinous texture which makes such difficult reading. Criticism is to some extent disarmed by the Dean's prefatory assurance that "neither unity is here, nor a moral," and by his pathetic references to that "self-esteem of an old man" which is responsible for the publication of these sketches; and we do not suppose that anyone will be churlish enough to grudge their author the gratification which will doubtless be his at beholding his desultory essays—the adjective is his own—set out in the majesty of large print. It has occurred to Dean Kitchin that nowadays the world reads "in scraps and in 'five minutes' with the best or the worst authors," and he is apparently anxious to find amongst such scrappy readers an audience larger than any provided by the august societies before whom these papers were originally read. He will surely have his reward.

The subjects dealt with are mainly archaeological—Whitby Abbey, Durham College, the font in Winchester Cathedral, and the like. Less remote in interest are a paper on the "statesmen" of West Cumberland, an address on Bishop Butler, and that which gives its title to the book. Of the "statesmen"—that fast-disappearing class of small freehold farmers who were, until quite recent times, the most interesting inhabitants of Cumberland—the Dean writes with placid enthusiasm and obvious knowledge. He is mildly Ruskinian in his denunciation of those conditions of modern life which have made impossible the continued existence of the statesmen, though his logic is a little difficult to follow when, having declared that they have gone "not from their weaknesses, but from their strength," he proceeds to show that their disappearance is due to half-a-dozen causes, such as drink, increased cost of living, machinery, and premature death. The same belated Ruskinianism is apparent in the initial paper, which gives a by no means uninteresting account of Ruskin as undergraduate and professor. The Dean is certainly alive to the more obviously absurd aspects of Ruskin's teaching, though ready to do justice to the fervour of his moral enthusiasms. He is not, we fancy, wholly convinced of the value of such attempts to combine the modern democratic spirit with the aristocratic traditions of Oxford as are exemplified in the foundation of Ruskin Hall, but he talks with the authentic accent about a "true merry England"—why not "merrie"?—and makes a proper peroratorical allusion to Ruskin's "singularly characteristic nature"—whatever a characteristic nature may be. No doubt the Ruskin Society of Birmingham, which first heard the essay, understood and was glad. Of the remaining papers the most nearly spirited is that which gives an account of the embassy of Enea de' Piccolomini—the future Pope Pius II.—to the court of James I. of Scotland, though it seems scarcely fair to say that the young ambassador rose to the papal throne only through the "light and superficial gift" of writing Latin prose. The methods of the archaeologist, who is as prone to conjectural emendations as any Shakespearean commentator, are excellently well shown in the paper on that very curious stone in the church of North Stoneham, a village a few miles north of Southampton, which Dean Kitchin ingeniously assumes to mark the burial place of the Slavonian sailors who, in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, manned some of the galleys that plied between Venice and Southampton. The conjecture is certainly attractive, and may be well founded. The most scholarly essay of all is that which asks and answers the question, Why did Dante choose Virgil as his guide through Inferno and Purgatorio? Dean Kitchin has no difficulty in proving that Virgil stood to Dante as the symbol of that Roman world-empire which the Florentine held to be prophetic of the dominion of the Holy Roman Empire of his own day. Here the Dean rises somewhat above his pedestrian course, and the article is one which certainly bears reprinting. We do not remember if the Dean, or another, is responsible for the translation here given—"with eyes more bright than Venus' star"—of the beautiful line ("Inferno," II., 55), "Lucevan gli occhi suoi più che la stella."

SIDNEY THOMPSON.

The End of New France

LES DERNIÈRES ANNÉES DE LA LOUISIANE FRANÇAISE. Par le Baron Marc de Villiers du Terrage. (Paris: Librairie Orientale et Américaine, E. Guilmoto. 15 fra.)

THE story of New Orleans and the French Settlements on the Mississippi is not of such romantic and absorbing interest as the tale that Parkman has told so well of Canada. For one thing, the French colony there never had the importance of the older northern countries; for another, its fate was settled chiefly by diplomacy, and only indirectly by war. Left almost unattached by England, it was handed over to Spain to pay for the losses of that power in her brief and disastrous share of the Seven Years' War, in which British troops and ships had captured Havana and Manila, antedating the story of our own days. Spain took possession in her own dilatory way, and was hardly well settled there when Napoleon as First Consul cajoled and bullied the wretched government of Godoy into exchanging the colony, whose value the great man well knew, for the phantom kingdom of Etruria. Then, before he could do anything, came the rupture of the Peace of Amiens; and with his usual business-like promptness, Napoleon saw that he could not hope to hold Louisiana against superior sea power. He sold it to the United States, equally anxious to forestall a possible rival, and New France belonged to the past.

It is this interesting but not dignified story that Baron de Villiers du Terrage tells in a substantial volume. The earlier history of the colony is briefly sketched. It consists chiefly of fights with the Natchez Indians, the Choctaws and Cherokees, each raid against a savage tribe supported by the rival race. The wars with England and the British colonists only touched Louisiana indirectly.

The detailed history begins in 1752 with the appointment of the Chevalier de Kerléree, a Breton, like many of the distinguished sailors of France. His papers during his term of office in Louisiana have been largely used by the author. It is interesting to see his comments on the affray which began the career of George Washington and led to the war in America. If Kerléree had had his way, that career might have been cut short in retaliation for the "murder" of Jumonville.

The valiant sailor-governor, however, remained unmolested himself by British forces, and his enemies were those of his own house; as so frequently happened in French colonies, he was soon at daggers drawn with his civil colleague, M. de Rochemore. The latter seems to have been a hopelessly obstinate official, who seized a vessel laden with flour that had come in under a flag of truce from Jamaica when New Orleans was starving.

Trade in war time was technically illegal; practically it was necessary, and Kerléree released the cargo by force. This miserable business poisoned the later years of Kerléree, who was pursued by the vengeance of his enemies and treated with the ingratitude that Louis XV. and his ministers showed to all who served France well.

I cannot notice in detail the rest of this collection of documents. It is abundantly illustrated with portraits of the principal persons mentioned in the book. Madame de Kerléree, the wife of the bluff sailor, must have been a most charming woman, to judge by her portrait. It is curious that Baron de Villiers calls the first United States Governor of Louisiana "Clairborn," and gives a reduction of a proclamation in English, French and Spanish, in which the Governor styles himself "Clairborne." But it is a trick of many French historians to think they can correct foreign names. Monroe appears with a wholly needless diaeresis over his final vowel.

ARTHUR R. ROPES.

Sussex

HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS IN SUSSEX. By E. V. Lucas. With illustrations by Frederick L. Griggs. (Macmillan. 6s.)

THIS latest addition to the familiar "Highways and Byways" series must only have needed announcement to create demand. With Mr. Griggs' delightful landscape drawings we are all now familiar, whilst the author's versatility has been so fully proven, his humour so universally welcomed, that it was a foregone conclusion that he would make an incomparable guide to a district which holds so much of his affections.

In natural features the Sussex country is sharply distinguished from all other parts of England, for the Sussex Downs are like no other English uplands. Their swelling undulations have something in common with ocean itself, hence perhaps the indescribable restfulness they are able to communicate to the mind of the tired town-dweller. Gilbert White's eulogy after thirty years' acquaintance with them runs: "I still investigate that chain of majestic mountains with fresh admiration year by year, and I think I see new beauties every time I traverse it." Except that we do not nowadays class the downs as mountains the words might be used unaltered by all lovers of Sussex.

Mr. Lucas gives suitable expression to his delight in the actual country, but his investigations include almost everything that is interesting in the way of architecture, family history and local tradition. As becomes so enthusiastic a cricketer, he has much to say about the king of games, in this county so closely associated with it. We read of the achievements of Brown of Brighton, and Nyren's pages receive local illustration. Again, from the compiler of one of our most lovable anthologies one expects verse, and one gets it. There is a poem by Mr. Belloc, entitled "The South Country," that takes up and crystallizes a mood that we must all have been aware of at one time or another, an atmosphere that will thrill every reader with a love not merely for Sussex but for his own countryside, wherever it may be. And "A Song Against Speed" (surely Mr. Lucas' own) has a quiet irony that endears it to the meditative.

Here is a little glimpse of Felpham, where Blake saw the fairy's funeral, given in Blake's own words:—

A sweet place for study because it is more spiritual than London. Heaven opens here on all sides its golden gates; the windows are not obstructed by vapours; voices of celestial inhabitants are more distinctly heard, their forms more distinctly seen; and my cottage is also a shadow of their houses.

At Parham (Lord Zouche's) is one of the book-treasures of the world, the Montaigne containing Shakespeare's autograph, and Mr. Lucas duly chronicles the fact.

Is he not mistaken, however, in speaking of Sackville College as the model for Walker's "Harbour of Refuge"? It has been stated over and over again that Walker got his inspiration at Bray.

The name "Frusannah" is mentioned by Mr. Lucas as new to him. The writer believes he will find frequent entries of it in the registers of Hounslow, Heston and the district.

In speaking of the Lewes martyrs no mention is made as to the manner of their death. It was that suffered by St. Laurence, and in the fifties the actual grid employed was preserved in the cellar of a hotel (since demolished) and used as a stand for beer barrels. The plate from Foxe, framed, hung in the coffee-room. If any trace of the original grid can be found it would be well that it should find a permanent home in the museum at Lewes Castle.

The private ownership of the chancel of Arundel Church may possibly have suggested to Miss Silberrad an incident in one of her recent novels, "The Princess Puck."

The Sussex labourer one notices was accustomed to take a nunch—luncheon was originally nuncheon—at five, but his "mouthful of bread and cheese and pint of ale" at starting in the morning was apparently a nameless meal. In the Isle of Wight it used to rejoice in the delightful name of "dew-bit."

Is not Mr. Lucas mistaken in speaking of the American gentleman who now resides at Battle Abbey? Surely Battle was repurchased at the Cleveland sale by the family of a former owner.

Apropos the new Christ's Hospital at Horsham, where different houses are distinguished by the names of famous alumni, it may interest the latest editor of Lamb to learn that on the opening day, a fond parent desirous of interviewing the head of his boy's house addressed an official: "Er—my boy's in Lamb's. Can I see Mr. Lamb?"

Of the many curious epitaphs transcribed in the volume, mention must be made of one in the Shurley chapel at Isfield. It contains, all unconsciously, the most caustic reflection on the blessedness of the married state; stating of the children of Sir John Shurley that some "were called into Heaven and the others into several marriages of good quality."

Mr. Griggs is slowly modifying his methods, possibly having set up a fresh ideal, possibly owing to an unconscious influence. His drawings are still possessed of uncommon charm and uncommon skill in the presentation of colour-equivalent, but they no longer display the strong mannerism which distinguished the examples published earlier.

F. CHAPMAN.

ALFRED TENNYSON. By Arthur Christopher Benson. (Methuen. 3s. 6d.)

SINCE the appearance of Lord Tennyson's life of his father, the making of brief biographies has become a tolerably easy task. We have already, since then, had Mr. Lang's mainly critical study, and Sir Alfred Lyall's critical biography in the "English Men of Letters" series. Previously there was the life by Mr. Arthur Waugh, and Mrs. Thackeray Ritchie's "Records"; to both of which Mr. Benson acknowledges obligations, while he states that his book was written before the publication of Mr. Lang's and Sir Alfred Lyall's volumes. But of course Lord Tennyson is the main and confessed source from which he has quarried his material. He frankly disclaims, therefore, any originality of material, or indeed any originality at all—though this latter is too modest a disclaimer. His own account of the book is succinct and adequate. "I have tried," he says, "to give a simple narrative of the life of Tennyson, with a sketch of his temperament, character, ideals, and beliefs; I have tried from his own words and writings to indicate what I believe to have been his view of the poetical life and character; I have attempted to touch the chief characteristics of his art from the technical point of view, here again as far as possible using his own recorded words."

That describes the little volume very well; but it would be a mistake to adopt the author's view that it is without originality. Though he has no fresh biographical matter to offer, he has in treatment adopted lines of his own, which give it a certain very agreeable freshness, and distinguish it from other monographs on the poet. The biography is brief, and not too crowded with facts or quotations. But it is handled with literary skill and a sense of proportion. He has selected the right kind of facts, the right kind of quotations, governed by an instinct for character which directs him to what is significant. We should, perhaps, have wished for a few extracts from FitzGerald's descriptions of the circumstances under which he and his friends heard or read the early poems, which are rich in picturesque suggestion; but in the main Mr. Benson has chosen soundly. The result is a biography which, for all its brevity, has the art of being continuously interesting.

It is interesting, as all biography should be, but as Tennysonian biography is not generally remarkable for being, by its characterisation. Throughout, no less than in the section specially devoted to that purpose, Mr. Benson has brought out the poet's character with an attention and success which gives the book a special note, and makes it work of artistic value. He has studied Tennyson's psychology with the interest of an admirer and the understanding of a man who is himself a poet; and he makes it interesting to the reader. In particular, he admires too well and too robustly to fear emphasising the human weaknesses which make Tennyson something more than the just man with a nimbus and a passion for tobacco that weak idealism would have him. The poet does not lose by the process: he gains, he becomes believable, human, attractive, impressive—a harmony with its due and enriching leaven of discords. You learn his moods, his grumpinesses, his vanity, his irritable sensitiveness, and egoisms; and the childlike frankness of nature in which these weaknesses, no less than his strength, had their root. You understand, and you admire. That is no little for which to be thankful to Mr. Benson.

On the critical side the book has again the value of coming from a poet, who writes with insight and intimacy of an art which he has himself practised. Again, too, Mr. Benson has courage and lines of his own. He has the strength and frankness of his views when they do not chance to be popular views; he states his own perceptions, nor does he fear to quote with countenance when they commend themselves to his judgment the views of others which are not popular. Thus he cites with more or less approval an utterance of Coventry Patmore on Tennyson's earlier and best work, mainly just, but perhaps a little too unexceptionable, and certainly not sweetened to the general palate. We do not always agree with the author in detail; but this section as a whole is excellent and valuable. He has given in small space a clear and comprehensive idea, so far as might be, of Tennyson's outlook on his art. The book, to sum up in a word, is the most interesting and well-executed of its kind and size which has appeared on the late Laureate, and should approve itself both to the general reader and, still more, to the student.

THE CHURCH OF ST. MARY THE VIRGIN, OXFORD. By the Reverend H. L. Thompson, M.A. (Constable. 3s. 6d. net.)

THE author disarms any severe criticism in his preface, in which we learn that the book is not intended to be an exhaustive or even complete study of the Church of St. Mary, Oxford, but contains seven sermons most of which the author, as Select Preacher before the University, delivered in that church. This being so we can highly praise the little book, in which we are reminded of St. Mary's relations to many stirring and momentous events in English history. St. Mary's has always held a great, a unique position, being indeed at one time a court for the administration of justice in all matters pertaining to the University, the headquarters of the Chancellor who here settled such matters as the needful amount of bread required for the University; the treasury of the University; the one public library, a theatre for the acting of plays, and many other things. St. Mary has always been closely connected with the University and freely welcomed its claims upon her, although she does not forget that there has existed a church of St. Mary the Virgin from Saxon times, which occupied the site of the present building, long before there was any University to attend her services.

Standing within her cool grey walls one is almost overawed with the visions of famous people which flit through its gloom. Perhaps the most famous name is that of John Wyclif. It was from the pulpit of St. Mary that he often expounded those teachings which were afterwards destined to bring him under the displeasure of the ecclesiastical authorities. Here Cranmer was brought to answer the charges laid against him. "He came forth of the prison to the church of St. Mary's," writes Fox, "fetched forth with bills and gieves for fear lest he should start away." From St. Mary's he followed in the footsteps of Ridley and Latimer to the stake, their death sentences having all been pronounced within the walls of that church. John Keble, Newman, Liddon and many another famous divine in later days preached from its pulpit. "St. Mary's has been the theatre for the exposition of each successive movement of English theology, for the hot discussion of each bitter controversy, for the condemnation and tardy acceptance of each novelty in doctrine or practice." Every Sunday during Term Time the big bell of St. Mary calls academical Oxford to prayers, which summons it obeys with quaint and imposing ceremony, listening to the preacher of to-day as it listened to those of more stirring times. But undergraduates are an irreverent race, living rather in the historic present than in the historic past.

GODS AND FIGHTING MEN: THE STORY OF THE TUATHA DE DANAN AND OF THE FIANNA OF IRELAND. Arranged and put into English by Lady Gregory. With a Preface by W. B. Yeats. (Murray. 6s. net.)

MR. ANDREW LANG had better look to his laurels as a storyteller. Lady Gregory as a medium for Gaelic myth and legend is almost as industrious as the editor of the many coloured fairy books. It is but a little while since she began with "Poets and Dreamers," and barely yesterday since she gave us in "Cuchulain of Muirthemne" a whole cycle of Gaelic tradition, yet already she presents us with this further instalment of Irish legendary literature. Lady Gregory is an enthusiast for Gaelic learning, and we may be sure that it is from a more worthy motive than the mere love of being before the public that she produces these books in such rapid succession. But while we are grateful for the results of her devotion to her design of putting into an intelligible English form the traditional literature of the Irish fireside, we must warn her of the dangers of over-rapid production, as it affects both the quality of her own work and the heartiness of the welcome accorded to it. Certainly she has had much encouragement in such inspiring compliments as that which she records as coming from President Roosevelt, who after reading her last book "sent for all the other translations from the Irish he could get" to take with him on his journeys. But even so, it is better that we should wish for more than that we should get too much.

It is, perhaps, ungrateful to welcome thus churlishly a volume of legendary tales which are new to most of us in substance as well as in form, and which have so much of the freshness which only extreme antiquity can give. But the manner of Lady Gregory's work leaves something to be desired. She tells us that she has "found it more natural to tell the stories in the manner of the thatched houses where she has heard so many legends than in that of the slated houses where she has not heard them." But since most of the stories come not from the cottage fireside but from an Irish text authenticated by manuscripts in great libraries, this is hardly a sufficient justification for the preservation of Irish idioms in an otherwise colloquial English version. Nothing is gained by writing "It was what Sreng said" for "Sreng said," or "It was Nuada was king" for "Nuada was king." A more serious objection is involved in Lady Gregory's choice of a title, and her substitution of a divine for a historical motif for many of the legends. Irish legend is vague enough without attempting to represent its historical personages as the divinities of a hypothetical mythology. Because she has found it impossible to date the legends historically, Lady Gregory has, in support of a purely speculative theory, "left out such names as those of Cormac and Art," and other more or less historical personages. In doing so, we take leave to think she has robbed the stories of much of their interest. Half of the charm of unreal things lies in the doubt whether they may not after all be real. What should we say to the editor of the Arthurian legends who should leave out Arthur?

THE LIFE OF CHARLES GRANT. By Henry Morris. (Murray. 12s. net.)

It is given to few to be born amid circumstances so picturesque as those which attended the birth of Charles Grant. Just before the battle of Culloden, Alexander, the father, accompanied by thirty warriors, snatched a brief respite from military affairs in order to be present at the christening. "A weird scene took place on this occasion. They named the child Charles after the Prince; and, drawing their swords, they crossed and clashed them over his cradle, thereby enlisting him in the service of Charles Edward Stuart; then, in token of fealty to his supposed sovereign, each enthusiastic warrior took the child's hand, and made it clasp the hilt of his sword with its baby fingers." That was a brave entry upon life's stage; but Charles was destined to move, for a time, through scenery much less romantic.

The father was wounded at Culloden; after hiding in caves and woods until the storm blew over, he found his property destroyed; unable to retrieve his fortunes, he joined a Highland regiment which the Government was raising for service in America. Thus Charles, when grown up into a strapping youth, found himself obliged to earn his own living. He did so, to begin with, as a clerk in the office of a shipping agent at Cromarty. Soon, to similar employment, he went to London; and ere long he entered the service of the East India Company, of which, eventually, he became a director. Mr. Morris, his biographer, who wrote "Brief Lives of the Governors-General of India," and should, therefore, speak with authority, declares Grant to have been "the greatest director" of that incomparable enterprise. Some readers may consider the estimate an amiable exaggeration; but, whatever the exact truth may be, it is certain that all who are affected by the revival of interest in the history of British India will find much to instruct them in this volume. Ourselves confess to a feeling of disappointment and vexation over the continual prattle of Claphamite Evangelicism with which Grant coloured his career. It was out of harmony with his father's heroic benediction at the baptism, and was not in itself particularly impressive.

Still, one must make allowance for the spirit of the times in which a man lives. Grant's mind had the dogmatical disposition, and some of the strong men who became his intimate friends were stern and unbending dogmatists of a dreary school. However, one of them had wit. To Grant, just become representative in the House of Commons of Inverness-shire, William Wilberforce wrote: "Your election seems to have been more like that of a Pope than that of a Member of Parliament, and your County Court to resemble a conclave of Cardinals." Can one wonder at that whimsical view? The declaration of the poll, for a county of very large area, had been as followeth:—

Grant, 15. | Lovat, 11. | Culloden, 6.

That was just about a hundred years ago, when, despite an elementary franchise, the British Constitution was not at all an inefficient instrument in time of war.

Fiction

THE ADVENTURES OF ELIZABETH IN RÜGEN. By the Author of "Elizabeth and Her German Garden." (Macmillan. 6s.) The authoress in this present volume has returned to her first style of writing which she temporarily deserted in "The Benefactress." There is the same delicate charm, the same gentle humour, the same peculiar qualities which made "The Solitary Summer" and "Elizabeth and Her German Garden" so widely read and admired. Here we have Elizabeth in the island of Rügen, making a driving tour with as sole companion her maid Gertrud, all her luggage contained in a hold-all, and filled with a determination to enjoy herself. To thoroughly appreciate Elizabeth's amusing and interesting experiences one must first rid the mind of any suspicion that it is selfish to go on a holiday by one's self and leave the husband, the Man of Wrath, to look after the children. For Elizabeth is Elizabeth, her pleasant fancies are something beyond ordinary common place vices or virtues, her whimsicalities are all her own. This suspicion cast aside we can thoroughly enjoy a pretty piece of writing. A trip around Rügen, according to Elizabeth, must be a very pleasant thing, and Rügen may find itself very inconveniently crowded next summer. Her description of its forests and lakes, its quaint houses and hotels, its bathing and boating will surely send others in search of its treasures. But, perhaps, they may not find the same delights as Elizabeth, for Elizabeth, above all, loves solitude and nature, she sees a charm in every tree (except when she is tired), and her humour brightens every occasion. The "Adventures" contain numerous amusing incidents, and the meeting with Charlotte and the Professor, for she is not long left in solitude, affords a charming diversion. The book is quite worthy of its authoress, and this is high praise.

RED MORN. By Max Pemberton. Illustrated. (Cassell. 6s.) Capricious fortune decided that the present critic should read five of Mr. Pemberton's punctual volumes. From four he figured the novelist as a capable stereotypist; from "Red Morn"—the fifth—he conceives Mr. Pemberton to deserve the higher title of romantist. It is a swinging tale of shipwreck and rescue which may be read with pleasure, and was evidently written with enjoyment. The heroine steams away on the "Jersey City" to marry her millions to a noble bankrupt, but the avowed purpose of her voyage merely increases the reader's determination that she shall marry the handsome stranger whom his fellow-passengers have unjustly set down as a black-sheep. One likes the fair American, and remembers her remark about the sea: "You don't come back to it and say . . . 'Who's been building here?' and 'Where's the old place I loved?'" As for the hero, he is all that is chivalrous, and what with the bursting of an ammonia tank, the eruption of Mont Pelée, and the shipwreck before mentioned, his chivalry is well tested. Mr. Margetson, the illustrator, approves of him, for he has given him a likeness to R. L. Stevenson. The one distinctly false note in the story is struck in chapters xix. and xx., which set probability at defiance for the sake of a crude exhibition of female spite. But for all that the story is more romantic than mechanical, and therefore above the average "romance."

THYRA VARRICK. By Amelia E. Barr. (Unwin. 6s.) In this partly Orcadian story Mrs. Barr reminds us, by her success, of her best-known work, the Shetland story called "Jan Vedder's Wife." Her period is that of the Young Pretender's abortive invasion, and when we state that Mrs. Barr's estimate of that "bonny" Prince is lower even than Mr. Neil Munro's in "The Shoes of Fortune," enough is said to warn off excitable members of the White Rose League. The Pretender, however, is of little importance in her narrative, which chiefly concerns the love affairs of the lovely Orcadian named in the title. There are of course two lovers, a perfidious Hector and a faithful Robert, and a powerfully conceived situation when Hector wakes near a sepulchral burrow to find his hair pinned to the earth by the dirk of his magnanimous foe. An amiable and pathetic character is a crippled laird of nine who has an infallible method of proving all great men to be Scots.

The tone of the novel is solemnised by a benignant spiritualism which distracts attention from Mrs. Barr's rather old-fashioned way of accomplishing poetic justice.

PHOEBE IN FETTERS. By Mrs. Baillie Reynolds (G. M. Robins). (Murray. 6s.) Though it never enters the region of supernatural, "Phoebe in Fetters" is by no means as convincing a novel as the same author's "Dream and the Men." It is not well constructed, for it takes more than a third of its 418 pages to lead to the situation which originates its dramatic life. Nevertheless it is an interesting work, appealing rather more to the intellect of a man of the world than the majority of even good novels. The heroine is a brilliant girl, ignorant of the physiology of marriage, who unites herself with a well-intentioned solicitor to escape poverty, but recoils from his caresses and keeps him at arm's length until passion is waked in her by a process of self-depreciation. Setting aside the minor defects of the novel, anyone viewing fiction as a medium for illustrating the truths of human nature must perceive it to fail from this very fact of trying to reason a woman into a state produced by amateness and nothing else. Mrs. Reynolds has done her best, but the result of great labour is after all a novel for the jeune fille rather than the educated adult. One can feel this talented woman, with her strong commonsense, her dislike of old fogeyism and cant, struggling to reveal in 100,000 words what a Marcel Prévost could reveal in half that number, but she is stifled by her English decorum. And the best drawing in her book is not Phoebe, but a subsidiary character, Waterson, who is a perfect realisation of the clever Philistine in theatrical art.

JEWEL. By Clara Louise Burnham. (Constable. 6s.) "Jewel" might easily have been an altogether charming book, instead of only partly so. The beginning of the book which at first threatens to be the commencement of an old hackneyed plot suddenly becomes altogether original and unusual. The small heroine of the book, aged nine, is left in the charge of her grandfather who does not want her, while her parents go on a voyage. The grandfather takes her home to Bel-Air Park reluctantly, and to his astonishment, for he has been separated from his son and his wife, he finds that their child is "a perfectly formed and well-developed specimen of a Christian Scientist." The situation is distinctly good, the crabbed conservative old man on one side and the determined little Christian Scientist on the other. But the story is seriously marred by over accentuation and an undue partiality. It says much for the authoress that the child appears to us entirely loveable and quaint, in spite of the fact that she is made to talk of her religion on all and every occasion, and in the end of the book those who are not converted to Miss Eddy's creed we are given to understand will shortly be so. That a child who has been brought up in this belief should have all the phrases and "catch words" at the tip of her tongue is conceivable, but that she herself should recover from a threatened illness within a few hours by "treatment" which does not include a doctor's aid, her grandfather's favourite horse should also be cured by the same "treatment," and a young man be rescued from drink by her ministrations, we cannot believe. As a study of a child "Jewel" is delightful, but as a means for the exposition of Christian Science it is not successful, at any rate from an artistic point of view. It is a pity that so much talent as the authoress undoubtedly possesses should not have been used to better advantage.

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE. By S. Weir Mitchell, M.D. (Douglas. 1s.) A delightful example of a short story as it may be written. The story is compact without being meagre, suggestive yet not discursive. The idea of the tale is amusing. Serena Vernon, "a spinster by choice," journeyed into the city one morning on the trolley car, carrying a little handbag containing her purse and other oddments. When she reaches home again she discovers that her purse has been extracted from the bag, and a rapid survey of her movements leads her to fix the guilt upon a man whom she had noticed wearing a handsome diamond ring. To her astonishment when she reaches the bottom of the bag she finds, evidently dropped from his finger, the ring. The rest of the story is made up of Miss Vernon's efforts to return the ring to its rightful owner and their amusing results. A charming trifle.

TWELVE TRIFLES, CHEERFUL AND TEARFUL. By Theophila North. (Edinburgh: George A. Morton. 3s. 6d.) In this volume the authoress has collected twelve sketches, some of which have previously seen the light in various magazines. They show a decided gift for character drawing, especially happy being the bucolic characters, such as "Billy Adams" in the first sketch, and Keziah and her mother in "The Flitting of Keziah," and the maid Bettie in "Pirola." These little sketches barely attain the dignity of stories, except in the case of the last in the volume, "Waldia," which tells a pretty tale of a father's self-sacrifice. "In a Literary Way" is a gracefully written trifle. The only thing in the book to which exception can be taken is "Dogs we have Lived with," and dog-lovers will certainly consider that scant justice has been done to the better side of canine nature. Perhaps the authoress is no dog-lover—there is a lack of enthusiasm in her style of writing about them that suggests it, and dogs, like human beings, seldom turn their best side to those who have no real affection for them. The volume has a charmingly written dedication to "F. U. R." which, if we were "F. U. R." we should highly appreciate.

TENNESSEE TODD. By G. W. Ogden. (New York: A. S. Barnes. $1.50.) Since the Mississippi river, with the immortal heroes Tom Sawyer and Huckleberry Finn, were introduced into fiction by Mark Twain, the Great River has flowed with few echoes in romance. "Tennessee Todd" is the dramatic story of the fight between the steamboat and railroad, between the picturesqueness of the old order and the progress of the new. Mr. Ogden does not emulate Frank Norris in taking, as in his "Octopus," the whole country as his canvas and giving to the conflict almost the epic dignity of civil war. The strife is here symbolised in the story of two families: that of Captain Andrews, who with the prescience of business genius foresees the end and sells out his interest in the steamboat line to stake his fortune on the new venture of the railroad; and Captain Blair, who holds to the Mississippi boats with the passion of an adherent to a lost cause. The book is vigorously written with vivid pictures of the old life of the river, the immensity of its traffic, its reckless races and its lurid tragedies. There is sharp characterisation of the two captains, once partners, who as representatives of the opposing lines become rivals and foes; one holding the future in fee, the other going with his last boat to the destruction of the loosened ice gorge on the Great River. Tennessee Todd is a strong, elemental creature, with moods as uncontrolled as the winds or tides. Her temperament fortells tragedy in an unfulfilled passion, not compromise and acceptance of the average woman life, with which end the author weakens his book.

HIS EMINENCE. By Lady Helen Forbes. (Nash. 6s.) The place a capital town of the little north Italian state of Montechiari; a land whose king is a child; a little world peopled with priests and women; the time a hundred years ago: of such is the story which leisurely, and not without narrative skill, takes its way, and terminates abruptly but unintentionally about the middle of the book. And at this juncture, an attempt is made to stretch the canvas so as to take in Napoleon, and War, and Carnage and Red Terror generally. Will the canvas already filled with the dramatic exits and entrances of a possible Pope, and the tantrums of a Duchess Regent, also admit of justice being done to that man of destiny, greater than either of the author's puppets? Well, the answer is that the canvas splits; the story is spilled out, the whole structure of romance is lost and runs riot, the fate of the infant Duke, and Duchess Regent, the fate of His Eminence, the fate of the Ostro Goths is forgotten in the cataclysm of Revolution. Vae Victis indeed! Far better have reserved Napoleon for another volume, and rested content with the machinations of the cardinal and the crafty subtleties of his henchmen.

THE CARDINAL'S PAWN. By K. L. Montgomery. (Unwin. 6s.) Given a Cardinal who is a Medici, a handsome girl posing in doublet and hose as her murdered twin brother, a scheming Venetian beauty, a sorceress and her attendant dwarf, an errant Englishman of noble birth, an artists' model of doubtful reputation but high morality, a crowd of priests, nuns, soldiers, nobles, Jews, gondoliers, &c.; and as a background to the shifting scenes, Florence and Venice of the Middle Ages—Venice, under the rule of the mysterious "Ten"—one must naturally anticipate a stirring and exciting picture. Nor are we disappointed, for the adventures of Piaunna Bonaventuri, the "Pawn" of the title, are so many and so varied that one becomes at times a little bewildered in reading them. One complication treads upon the heels of another, until the imagination is hard beset to follow them. Not that they lack interest, but the interest is a little too stimulating at times and one longs for a little rest. Nevertheless there is a vivid and picturesque power in the writing which carries one along with it, and when the author has succeeded in training an exuberant fancy, and pruning what is unnecessary and exaggerated, the result should be an excellent romantic novel. The style is easy, and the atmosphere of the period chosen is sustained without strain. Some of the descriptions are really beautiful; there is one of a distant view of Florence near the end of the eighteenth chapter which is delightfully written, and another of the Venetian Fête in honour of Bianca Capelli which makes the pageant vividly real.

DIE VOM NIEDERRHEIN. Roman in Zwei Büchern von Rudolf Herzog. (Stuttgart and Berlin: J. G. Cotta. 4m.) If we are to believe this delightfully and unusually cheery writer, in order to retain our youth we must be born in the lower Rhine provinces of Germany and spend our lives in Düsseldorf. Clara Viebig in "Die Wacht am Rhein" gave us an admirable picture of the gay, pleasure-loving, light-hearted inhabitants of Düsseldorf, but there is perhaps more of the unrestrained joyousness of youth in Herzog's book—in any case, in the first half of it. He tells the adventures of Hans von Steinherr, the son of well-to-do parents, from the time he is a sixth-form schoolboy until his marriage. There is nothing particularly fresh in his career. As a boy he falls in love with a girl, his inferior by birth, and vows she shall be his wife. But after experiencing life in a smart Korps at the Universities of Bonn, Heidelberg, and Berlin, and serving his military term, he fears such an alliance will lower him socially, and discouraged somewhat because his mother, a widow, to whom he believed himself all in all, is on the point of marrying a man who had loved her in her youth and from whom she had been separated by her parents' desire of marrying her to a rich husband, he leaves his native city. His wanderings teach him many things. He learns how women can be false, how life usually treats us according to the way in which we treat it, and finally returns home disgusted with everything. The girl whom he loved as a boy has become a celebrated concert singer, but despite his cavalier treatment of her, she has remained true to him, and all ends happily. Here, however, it is not the story that is the thing. Its atmosphere and setting give it its worth, and verily enchant us as we read. Beauty and poetry, and joyous youth, and the happy spring-time impregnate every page. The men and women who play their parts against that background are mostly simple, natural, human beings who love and trust one another, enjoy the good and bravely endure the evil that is vouchsafed them. The crafty merchant, for we see something of the commercial side of Düsseldorf life as well as of the artistic, seems the only figure that is not in the picture, but we suppose a villain was necessary to the piece, although in this case it is a very mild species of villain. The painter and his father are two of the most joyous and happily conceived characters we have come across in modern fiction for a very long while; they serve to show us, too, that goodness of heart is ever the best preserver of youth.

Short Notices

IMPRESSIONS OF JAPAN. By George H. Rittner. (Murray. 10s. 6d. net.) On the whole a disappointing book, though likely to be food for controversy. Mr. Rittner is an out-and-out admirer of things Japanese, though he has little fresh to tell us about them. He does well, however, to emphasise the fact that the Japanese are an artistic nation as well as a nation of artists. The whole up-bringing of the race is based upon a love of admiration for the beauties of nature; as the writer says, "April brings out the cherry blossoms, when the whole nation makes holiday and turns out to admire the colour"; again, "No country in the world is probably so artistic as Japan; the inhabitants from their earliest childhood are taught to love nature, and from that the finest art springs"; and again "A Japanese will sometimes walk miles or climb a mountain to watch a sunset from a particular spot. Imagine an English farmer or a farm labourer, after a day's work, climbing some mountain in Wales to watch a sunset or to obtain a view of some distant landscape." Imagination boggles at the effort! Mr. Rittner delivers himself of a terrific onslaught upon civilisation and missionaries, with some of which we could find it in our hearts to agree, but which cannot be discussed as literature. The illustrations to this volume are very beautiful.

THE JUDICIAL DICTIONARY. By F. Stroud. In 3 vols. Second edition. (Sweet and Maxwell. £4 4s.) As we do not happen to have seen the first edition of this monumental work, it is only fair to the author to give some account of its general scope and character. It differs from other legal lexicons in that it attempts to cover a much wider field, by quoting ipsis verbis the definitions that have been given by judicial authority to words and phrases of all sorts, from Domesday Book down to the statutes of Victoria. The undertaking was a vast one, and much labour has evidently been expended upon it. That the book must have had some measure of success is attested by the fact that it has passed into a second edition within little more than ten years. But with every desire to be just to so learned and painstaking an author, we cannot honestly say that his toil, however interesting to himself, is calculated to be profitable to others. The arrangement seems to us clumsy, with little regard to the relative importance of things. For example, nearly forty phrases are explained alphabetically under the preposition "at," which few would look for in such a connection. The word "corpse" is not to be found, while under "cadaver" we are treated twice over to the absurd mediæval etymology of caro data vermibus. The real value of such a work as this is only to be discovered by constant use. All that we profess to have done is to have turned over the pages. We have found much that is curious, and a good deal that we did not know before. But we cannot candidly say that we feel disposed to add the three solid volumes to our reference shelves. It appears worthy of note that, though the author and publisher are both English, the book has been printed—and printed well—in America.

THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS YEAR-BOOK. (Sonnenschein. 2s. 6d.) This companion volume to the "Schoolmasters' Year Book," recently reviewed in these columns, contains a Prospectus Catalogue of over a hundred English Public Schools (pp. 1-336), and other information serviceable to parents. The Appendices deal with the promises of some of the professions, although the Army and Navy aspirants are put off with syllabuses of entrance examination and the cost of training. Journalism and law go unmentioned; but medicine—to which a whole appendix of 30 pages is devoted—and music, engineering, agriculture, horticulture and the colonies are regarded as excellent bait for Public School Boys. The Public Schools bibliography seems fairly complete; but the writers of the short notices of the year's school-books have done their part very perfunctorily. It is much better to give price of book, publisher, and some idea of contents, than to be guilty of such lapses as—"Vectors are fully discussed," when the slightest glance at the book referred to would show that Vectors are necessarily only very partially treated of. Another gem is "For all practical purposes these five-figure logarithms are as accurate as the usual seven-figure ones." Does the writer know that four-figure logarithms are now used in the Civil Service Examination, in some of the London University Examinations, and in very many schools?

STORIES OF THE ANCIENT GREEKS. By Charles D. Shaw. (Ginn. 2s. 6d.) Ancient Greek stories retold in simple language for boys and girls of to-day, who should spend many pleasant hours with this book.

HANDBUCH, DER KLASSISCHEN ALTERTUMSWISSENSCHAFT. Herausgegeben von Dr. Iwan von Müller. Band 8, Abteilung IV. DIE RÖMISCHE LITTERATUR VON CONSTANTIN BIS ZUM GESETZGEBUNGSWERK JUSTINIANS. Erste Hälfte. DIE LITTERATUR DES VIERTEN JAHRHUNDERTS. Von Martin Schanz. (München: C. H. Beck. London: Williams and Norgate. 8s. 6d. and 10s. net) Dr. Iwan von Müller's great undertaking—for, of course, the work is only a handbook in the magnificent German sense—is now nearing its twentieth year of publication, and the last volume of the set will probably appear in 1905. The interested scholar cannot but concede that the enterprise is a model, and almost a shame for English publishers. Here is a true encyclopædia—a guide at once comprehensive in range and minute in treatment to a special class of subjects, as there is reason for holding every encyclopædia should be; we should be happy indeed to learn that an original work on the same broad lines, or a good translation of this, was to appear in England. We have not space to review the volume at length, and can do little more than give it the warmest of recommendations to the English scholars—a comparatively small band, we are afraid—who properly value Roman literature, and resent the unjust position of inferiority to which prejudice attempts to relegate it. Persons who know neither language have come to repeat glibly the futile dictum that Latin literature is a mere copy and offshoot of Greek; it would be almost as exact, and quite as fruitful a judgment, to pronounce English literature a mere copy and offshoot of French. For the rest the literature of the fourth century, both "pagan" and Christian, is of the highest importance. D. M. Ausonius, Aurelius Victor, the anonymous author of the "Querolus," Tyberianus, Aquila Romanus, Damasus, Aurelius Prudentius Clemens, and Ambrosius form a company whose variety and interest render profitable any time spent in their study. The scholarship is sound and penetrating. We agree with Professor Schanz in thinking that Baehrens was in error in ascribing the haunting Pervigilium Veneris to Tyberianus. Professor Fowler, the American author of an interesting little "History of Roman Literature" published last year, seems, by the way, to be quite unaware of this ascription. We could wish for more excerpts from Roman authors: but this the desire to keep the work within reasonable compass forbids. Printing and paper are alike unexceptionable, and there is an excellent index.

HISTOIRE DES ŒUVRES DE STENDHAL. Par Adolphe Paupe. Avec une introduction par Casimir Stryienski. (Dujarric.) CARMEN SYLVA (SA MAJESTÉ LA REINE ELISABETH DE ROUMANIE). Bibliographie et extraits de ses œuvres. Par Georges Bergesco, auteur de la Bibliographie des œuvres de Voltaire. (Brussels: Lacomblez.) Beyle never was and never will be popular; but, notwithstanding, he must always hold a definite place in the literary history of the nineteenth century. He was one of the pioneers in the novel of psychological analysis, and his greatest work, "La Chartreuse de Parme," is a wonderful study of the secret springs that move human beings. Balzac called that novel the chef d'œuvre of the literature of ideas, the modern "Prince," for he considered it was the novel that Machiavelli would have written had he been banished from Italy in the nineteenth century. Stryienski collected notes for a Stendhal biography, but, lacking time to prepare them for publication, handed over the task to M. Paupe, who gives us here a most excellent "histoire raisonnée" of Beyle's works. The genesis and composition of each book is related in detail; criticisms of it are likewise given, and also notices on Beyle, both during his life-time and after his death, which occurred in 1846. It is a most useful and well-arranged compilation, and will serve for all time, we should imagine, as a book of reference on Beyle. It is unlikely that such a book was needed on the work of Carmen Sylva. She is a very graceful writer, and her tales, legends, poems, novels, dramas, maxims and translations have won a certain popularity in every country of Europe, but that she will become a classic is open to doubt. It is, perhaps, too early to judge her, for "there is no history of contemporary affairs, for judging the men and works of our day, we lack both the recoil and the necessary documents." Besides the very full bibliography, which is excellently done, the book contains a sketch of Carmen Sylva's life and extracts from her works.

Reprints and New Editions

SPENSER'S FAERY QUEENE. Book I., with an Introduction and Notes by Professor W. H. Hudson. ("Temple Series." Dent. 2s.) The introduction to this volume is exceptionally full, and perhaps almost errs on the side of too much explanation for the ordinary reader. But for school use it would be admirable. The notes are copious. The book is bound in a serviceable manner, and is printed in good clear type.

THE BUILDING OF THE SHIP. By H. W. Longfellow. ("Flowers of Parnassus." Lane. 1s. 6d. net, leather; 1s. net, cloth.) If this poem had to be illustrated it might well have been done in a better manner. The illustrations are certainly not worthy of the letterpress.

THE CHURCH IN CECILIA'S HOUSE. By Walter Pater. (Brown, Langham. 3d.) A welcome reprint.

MR. SPONGE'S SPORTING TOUR. By the author of "Handley Cross." ("The Illustrated Pocket Library of Plain and Coloured Books." Methuen. 3s. 6d.) Certainly the sportsman cannot complain of any lack of reprints. The present volume will probably not fulfil the aim of its author "to put the rising generation on their guard against specious, promiscuous acquaintance, and train them to the noble sport of hunting," but it, at any rate, affords an excellent picture of the sporting life of its time, the woodcuts by John Leech being alone worth the price.

a THE DIARY OF JOHN EVELYN, with an Introduction by Austin Dobson; b TENNYSON'S POEMS, with an Introduction by A. T. Quiller Couch; c THE FOUR GEORGES, with an Introduction by L. F. Austin. ("National Library." Cassell. 6d. each net.) In the introduction to the Diary Mr. Dobson compares it with that of Pepys. "If," he says, "the Diary of Evelyn does not, like the Diary of Pepys, disclose the inner character of the writer, it nevertheless possesses a distinctive interest. Its entries have the precise value of veracious statements; it is a magazine of contemporary memories of a definite kind; and its scope, as a chronicle, is far more extensive than that of Pepys." He concludes with the hope that a revised edition founded on the original text at Wotton may one day be given to the world.

BUNYAN'S PILGRIM'S PROGRESS. (R. T. S. 1s.) An excellent and cheap edition. The illustrations by Harold Copping are worthy of especial attention. The frontispiece and "The Valley of the Shadow of Death" are particularly good examples. We note, as an interesting fact, that "The Pilgrim's Progress" has been translated into 104 languages and dialects.

LA LANGUE ANGLAISE SANS MAÎTRE. By C. A. Thimm. (Marlborough. 1s.) A revised edition of a handy and valuable little book. It is intended for the use of French persons who desire to rapidly acquire the English language without the aid of a master. The approximate pronunciation of each English word is given, and should prove very helpful to the beginner.

ALL Subscribers to THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE have a right to use our columns FREE for advertising for books, pictures, music, &c., wanted or for sale.

See Notice on Cover.

New Books Received

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL

- Everitt (Lieut.-Col. Herbert), edited by, Saint Paul's Journey from Jerusalem to Rome.....(S.P.C.K.) 0/6
 Little (Rev. C. E.), What is "Christian Science"?.....(") 0/2
 Sandford (E. G.), Address on Dr. Temple.....(") 0/2
 A Lenten Litany, with Meditations for each Day in Lent.....(") 0/6
 Davies, M.A. (Rev. R. V. Faithfull), Christ in the Lenten Gospels.....(") 1/0
 Special Forms of service.....(") 1/0
 Brooke (The Rev. Charles Hyde), edited by, Great French Preachers, I.—Lent and Holy Week, Sermons by Bourdaloue, de la Boissière, A. Vinet, Bossuet (Richards) net 3/6
 Chamberlain (J. E. Foster), edited by, The Epistle to the Hebrews (Johnson) net 2/0
 Collins, D.D. (W. E.), The Rights of a Particular Church in Matters of Practice (S.P.C.K.) 0/3

POETRY, CRITICISM, DRAMA, AND BELLES LETTRES

- Carman (Bliss), The Kinship of Nature.....(Murray) 6/0
 Davidson (John), A Queen's Romance, a Version of Victor Hugo's "Ruy Blas" (Richards) net 3/6
 Erskine, Ph.D. (John), The Elizabethan Lyric, a Study.....(Macmillan) 3/50
 Painter, A.M., D.D. (F. V. N.), Elementary Guide to Literary Criticism (Ginn) 4/0
 Van Dyke, D.D., LL.D. (Henry), An Introduction to the Poems of Tennyson (Ginn) net 2/0
 Macfie (Ronald Campbell), New Poems.....(Lane) 5/0
 Stephen (Sir Leslie), English Literature and Society in the Eighteenth Century (Ford Lectures, 1903).....(Duckworth) 5/0
 Rydberg (Victor), translated by Josef Freobär, Sluggoalla.....(Scott) 6/0
 Gore-Booth (Eva), Unseen Kings.....(Longmans) net 2/8
 The Fiscal Paper of Brum, by a Free Trade Rhymer.....(Norman) net 0/6

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY

- University Studies, Vol. III, No. 4.....(University of Nebraska)

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY

- Bogg (Edmund), Two Thousand Miles in Wharfedale.....(Leeds: Edmund Bogg) 7/6
 Dutt (William A.), Suffolk (Little Guides Series).....(Methuen) 3/0
 Rawnsley (The Rev. Canon H. D.), Flower Time in the Oberland (MacLehose) net 5/0

EDUCATIONAL

- Thimm (C. A.), La Langue Anglaise Sans Maître.....(Marlborough) 1/0
 Thomson (C. Linklater), A First History of England, Part V.....(Marshall) 1/6
 Matriculation Directory, No. XXXVI.....(Tutorial Press) net 1/0
 Scott (Sir Walter), edited by Flora Masson, The Lady of the Lake (Dent) subject 1/4
 Spenser's Faery Queen, Book I, edited by Professor W. H. Hudson (Dent) subject 2/0

MISCELLANEOUS

- Newspaper Press Directory: Fifty-Ninth Annual Issue, 1904.....(Mitchell) 2/0
 Archaeologia Eliana; or, Miscellaneous Tracts relating to Antiquities, Part 61 (Newcastle-on-Tyne: Society of Antiquaries).....(Sands) 5/0
 Raupert (J. Godfrey), Modern Spiritism: a Critical Examination.....(Sands) 2/6
 A Short Out to Happiness, by the Author of "The Catholic Church from Within." Preface by the Rev. B. W. Maturin.....(Sands) net 2/6
 Shaw (Bernard), The Common Sense of Municipal Trading.....(Constable) 2/6
 Hitch (Clove), A Handbook on Sailing.....(Lane) net 3/0
 Garstang (John), Tombs of the Third Egyptian Dynasty at Raqinah and Bêt Khallâf.....(Constable) net 2/0
 The Tariff Dictionary.....(Simpkin, Marshall) 2/6
 Fordham (E. Mary), The Evolution of Local and Imperial Government from the Teutonic Conquest to the Present Day.....(Knight) 1/0
 Wright (Walter P.), edited by, Pictorial Practical Obryssanthemum Culture (Cassell) 1/0

ART

- Carter (A. O. R.), compiled by, The Year's Art, 1904: A Concise Epitome of all Matters relating to the Arts of Painting, Sculpture, Engraving, and Architecture.....(Hutchinson) 3/6
 Buschmann (J.-E.), edited by, Art, Volume One, 1903.....(Brown, Langham) 10/6

FICTION

- * The Adventures of Elizabeth in Rügen, by the Author of "Elizabeth and Her German Garden" (Macmillan), 6/0; "Facing the Future; or, The Parting of the Ways," by Robert Thynne (Unwin), 6/0; "Silenced," by I. T. Meade (Ward, Lock), 5/0; "The Man from Downing Street," by William Le Queux (Hurst and Blackett), 6/0; "He that Received the Five Talents," by J. Clark Murray (Unwin), 6/0; "The American Prisoner," by Eden Phillpotts (Methuen), 6/0; "Tomorrow's Tangle," by Geraldine Bonner (Cassell), 6/0; "A Faithful Love," by G. Beresford Fitzgerald (Dugby, Long), 6/0.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS

- "The Four Georges," by W. M. Thackeray, "The Diary of John Evelyn," and "Tennyson's Poems, a Selection" (National Library) (Cassell), each, net 0/6;
 "The Building of the Ship," by H. W. Longfellow, illustrated by Donald Maxwell (Lane), cloth, net 1/0; "The Guide to South Africa" (Sampson Low), 2/6; "The Church in Cecilia's House," by Walter Pater (Brown, Langham), 0/3;
 "Targiewood Tales, the First Series, by Nathaniel Hawthorne (Astolat Press), net 3/0; "The Poems and Some Satires of Andrew Marvell" (Methuen), net 1/6; "The Fighting Troubadour," by A. C. Gunter (Ward, Lock), 0/6; "Hand and Ring," by A. K. Green (Ward, Lock), 0/6; "The Light of Meänasien," by H. H. Montgomery, D.D. (S.P.C.K.), 3/6.

JUVENILE

- "Stories of the Ancient Greeks," by Charles D. Shaw (Ginn), 2/6; "Potany Rambles, Part I: In the Spring" (Marshall), 0/10.

PERIODICALS

- "The Extensionist," "The Cosmopolitan," "Political Science Quarterly," "The Rapid Review," "The Independent," "Fortnightly Review," second edition, "The Oxford Point of View," "Uster Journal of Archaeology," "Review of Reviews," "North American Review," "Buddhism," "Literary News," "University Record," "University Extension Journal," "Our Hospitals and Charities."

Foreign

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

- Bousset (Prof. D. W.), Was Wissen wir von Jesus (Gebauer-Schwetachke) (Halle a. S.) 1 mark
 Jastrow, Jr. (Morris), Die Religion Babyloniens und Assyriens. 5. Lieferung (Giessen: Ricker)

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY

- Picot (M. Georges), Glaïstone.....(Hachette)
 Valot (Stéphane), Les Héros de Richard Wagner: Etudes sur les Origines Indo-Européennes des Légendes Wagneriennes.....(Paris: Fischbacher)

POETRY, CRITICISM, DRAMA, AND BELLES LETTRES

- Maurer (Théodore), Princesse Avril.....(Paris: Maison des Poètes)

EDUCATIONAL

- Gradenwitz (Ot.), Laterculi Vocum Latinarum: Voces Latinas et a Fronte et a Tergo.....(Leipzig: H. Rzel) 18 marks
 Hoops (Johannes), Englische Studien.....(Leipzig: Reissland)

PERIODICALS

- "L'Occident," "Monatschrift."

FORTHCOMING BOOKS, ETC.

AMONG other articles announced to appear in the March number of "The Antiquary" are the following: "Letters from France and the Low Countries, 1814-1819," by Richard Twining, communicated by his daughter, Louise Twining (concluded); "The Brasses in Milton Abbey, Dorset," by the Rev. Herbert Pentin, M.A. (illustrated); "The White Paternoster," by Miss E. C. Vansittart; "Notes on Some Derbyshire Fonts," III. (and last), by G. Le Blanc Smith (illustrated); "The Ashes of Innocent III.," by W. B. Wallace, B.A.—Miss Elizabeth Robins' new book, "The Magnetic North," is to be published by Mr. Heinemann on March 10.—Under the direction of the Royal Society of Literature, Mr. Henry Frowde is about to publish two interesting works. One is the "Chronicles of Adam of Usk," edited with a translation and notes by Sir E. Maunde Thompson. This contains the complete chronicle from 1377 to 1421. The unique British Museum MS., from which the same editor prepared an edition in 1876, was imperfect, ending with the year 1404, and lacking the concluding quire; and this was recently found among the Duke of Rutland's papers at Belvoir Castle. The other book is "Queen Elizabeth and the Levant Company," the history of a diplomatic and literary episode of the establishment of our trade with Turkey, edited by the Rev. H. G. Rosedale, D.D., with many facsimile illustrations of MSS. and plates.—Mr. Henry Frowde announces for publication on February 29, "The Titles of the Psalms: their nature and meaning explained," by Mr. J. W. Thirtle, a book which is believed to represent an entirely new departure in Biblical criticism. There has long been a disposition to describe the problem of the Psalm titles as no longer capable of solution; but Mr. Thirtle claims now to have found the lost key. The complete Psalter, according to the Revised Version, is included in the volume, with the titles discriminated and briefly explained.—Mr. John Lane announces that he has obtained the English rights of the novel which has recently created such a sensation in Germany—"Life in a Garrison Town," by Lieutenant Bilse.

THE strange art phenomenon called "L'Art Nouveau" is discussed in "The Magazine of Art" for March, by the leading painters, designers, architects, and sculptors of the day, with extraordinary animation. The contributors to this opening chapter in the March number are: Messrs. Walter Crane, C. F. A. Voysey, T. G. Jackson, R.A., Alfred Gilbert, R.A., W. Goscombe John, A.R.A., George Clausen, A.R.A., E. A. Abbey, R.A., B. W. Leader, R.A., J. M. Swan, A.R.A., and Lionel Smythe, A.R.A.; and those who are to follow will include Messrs. G. Frampton, R.A., G. D. Leslie, R.A., Henry Woods, R.A., H. W. B. Davis, R.A., G. H. Boughton, R.A., W. D. Caröe, Ernest George, and Professors Moira and Beresford Pite.

Letters from a Silent Study

[The following series of notes, more or less critical, on life have been given to me. The writer wished to tell the truth—a desire which may be regarded as a legitimate claim to any reader's consideration and indulgence.]

XI.—On the Neighbour's Burden

WHEN I was an extremely young man—persons under six-and-twenty years of age now seem to me extremely young—I had a long illness caused by an accident in the hunting field. I suffered a great deal of pain which lowered for ever perhaps my estimate of earthly delight, and I read an enormous number of books—which has deepened my affection for literature. Literature, I must own, far better than life bore the test of torments, exhaustion, sleeplessness, and the dependent, irritating business of a slow convalescence. The books I read were of every kind and on all subjects. For the steady ache, a fine novel full of sound characterisation keeps the nerves under command. For the intermittent spasm,—lyrics, ballads, sonnets and short poems are best. For the later period, when the body is serenely weak and the mind gains an heroic activity, essays, sermons, memoirs and histories—so long as the volumes containing them may be held by a tired hand—give the brain full play and the imagination something more vivid than experience. Actual experience is often so quiet, and, in comparison with its description by the accomplished, so unreal. During the latter weeks of my existence on the sofa, an enthusiastic friend, who has since become a nun, used to bring me pocket editions of the Prophets, the Gospels and the Epistles. They were bound in cloth: they were beautifully printed: the whole epic of Job, for instance, did not seem heavier than a letter, and the prophecies of Isaiah were as light as an ordinary song. These enticing books spoilt me for all others: I kept one of them always under my palm, and thus I became well acquainted with the Sacred Text. My enthusiastic friend—a pious, calm, impersonal sort of woman—showed much sympathy for my case, and indeed, for all cases where patience might be considered under a tax. She had an earnest desire to bear her neighbour's burden. "Let us bear one another's burdens," was her favourite entreaty. I meditated; I weighed arguments; I consulted the theological authorities; I fell back on my own knowledge. Alas! one cannot bear one's neighbour's burdens—you may break your own heart out of sheer pity, but your neighbour will be not a whit less oppressed, and, if he has a woe, its gnaw, for all your kindness, will not be a degree less voracious. Many moral precepts have thus a galling irony, and people, when they find that their tenderness is unavailing, blame themselves because they cannot find, or give, the comfort they have been piously taught to expect will follow from the sharing of a grief. This is not denial of the power in sympathy, counsel, affection, or comradeship; the power of such gifts is incalculable, but they cannot be transmitted, they can only be exercised for the neighbour's benefit or encouragement. They cannot lessen the burden; they cannot affect those unuttered and unutterable thoughts which dart through the soul; those hours of absolute and unreachable solitariness, those moods when no one really counts and nothing really matters—when the burden, in fact, is so excessive that it becomes its own cure by numbing every faculty and every feeling. I am the last person to restrain enthusiasm, and so, while I listened to the generous ideals of my girl friend, I tried to share her evident joy at the prospect of being able to help the unhappy. "You see," she said, "I am strong. I have wonderful nerves: I am sure I can put my shoulder to many wheels and feel none the worse for it."

She became a Nun: I saw nothing of her for a number of years. Then I met her a short time ago in extraordinary circumstances. I had been calling on an old acquaintance who is now an eminent surgeon. As I came out of the house a cab drew up at the door, and two nuns—one of whom was elderly and the other a year or two her junior—got out. The older of the two started when she saw me; she uttered my name; she paid the cabman; then she said, turning to me, "I'll write to you." I walked home and I was haunted by her face—it had changed as a woman's veil changes by much wearing; that is to say, it had lost its clearness and crispness—but the real countenance behind it did not seem to have changed. The next morning I received her letter.

"I have never forgotten," she wrote, "our old talks. You were quite right. I have done my best, but I do not believe that my shoulder—which is almost worn out by the pressure of other people's wheels—has done any practical good. They would have arrived, or not arrived, at their journey's end just the same—with or without my aid. My vanity would prefer to believe that I had been of infinite service. You saw me yesterday helping a Sister out of a cab. She has to suffer surgery. I can imagine all that is passing in her mind, but I am powerless to help her. When the ordeal comes she must face it alone, bear it alone, and endure whatever may follow—alone. And this example is a very common example of one's humiliating ineffectiveness when the neighbour's hard hour is at its hardest. If you had ever been cynical, I should never have told you this. We both wished, however, to see facts squarely, and we both resolved not to deceive ourselves—no matter how much we deceived, unintentionally, other people. I do not deceive myself in this instance. Much of the sympathy that is offered is an excuse for domineering or a display of supposed moral superiority: much, on the other hand, is the purest fellow-feeling and compassion. Nevertheless, the neighbour's burden cannot be borne."

I decided, after reading this, that the writer was neither an unhappy nor a disappointed woman. She had merely accepted a truth which is forbidden till we smile upon it. Then it grows milder. It is useless to fume, to fuss, to clasp and unclasp one's hands, to pace the floor, to knit one's brows, to fret, to expostulate. All such natural demonstrations of anxiety ease you, no doubt, but they do not ease the afflicted neighbour. Your own burden, by force of pity, may grow to resemble his, but his will remain unaltered—not to be shared or lessened. To know this, and to comprehend it, is not the beginning of egoism, but the first seed of real unselfishness—an admission of one's limitations.

JOHN OLIVER HOBBS.

[Copyright 1904 by MRS. CRAIGIE in the United States of America.]

Egomets

IPREFER to discuss books with those who disagree with me to talking them over with those whose opinions are precisely my own. In this, I fancy, I am rather exceptional, for the booklover as a rule likes to chat with his friend about those authors whom they both love. Now to me this has little of interest and a deal of irritation. I have a good friend who is a worshipper of Goldsmith, but from a point of view so dissimilar to my own that he angers more than he can ever please me. Goldsmith is a god of my idolatry, I worship him as a man of great heart and of great humour; my friend bows before him simply as being a master of limpid English in a time when turgidity and Latinism was the rule. He was so, of course, but that was to me the least of his graces; in fact it is Goldemith the man rather than the writer that is my friend.

Those who disagree with me in my book loves, so long as they are not dogmatic, raise my enthusiasm, for I am an enthusiast upon occasion and on due provocation. I look upon myself as a missionary to the heathen and love to preach, in the hope of securing a convert to my literary creed. I have met men who have failed to obtain sustenance from, to take some out-of-the-way examples, Cowley, Howell, Swift (who is more talked of than read), Peacock, Hawthorne, Poe; to such I open out in a manner that astonishes them and sometimes myself; over the joys of reading the works of these writers I grow heated and argue as keenly as other men do over religion and politics. And if I do succeed in converting my opponent to my way of thinking, I am suffused with a glow of righteousness. I then thank God that I am not as other men are, mere pedants in their reading, and I lay my head upon my pillow knowing that I shall—or should—sleep the sleep of the just bookman.

Then there is another class of men to whom I love to talk of some favourite author, those who are entirely ignorant of his works. How great a delight it is to introduce a friend—or even a stranger—to some undiscovered country, to works of which he has merely heard, to a writer who to him is but a shadow of a name. I remember once a youth who said to me not "What are Keats?" but "Who is Carleton?" I took him by the button—it was in my own room—led him to a chair by the fireside and talked to him. I told him many things and as I spoke I felt that I was an apostle of literature preaching to those in darkness. I told him of Carleton's greatness, of his sombre power, of his truth to life. I told him that if he would learn somewhat of Irish life he should take Carleton as teacher, not such writers of farces as Lever and Lover. I grew warm, I inspired him with desire, and now he admires Carleton as greatly as I do myself. Had I not done a good work?

There has been complaint made sometimes that the lovers of literature are only too few. Well, is there not a call then for literary missionaries? Should not we who are booklovers go forth and preach to the heathen? We need carry with us neither staff nor scrip; nor need we travel unto far lands; here at our doors are numberless bookless, ignorant folk—let us speak to them of the joys of the happy land of literature and in bringing blessings to them we shall be blessed ourselves.

E. G. O.

Personalities : Joseph Conrad

SINCE Mr. Joseph Conrad wrote "The Nigger of the Narcissus" there has been no question of his being a personality in modern literature, and personalities in modern literature are not too numerous. His point of view, his knowledge, his mode of expression are emphatically his own.

I have a theory that it is almost impossible to entirely understand a man's work without knowing something of the man. The personality of the artist is often the explanatory note of his art. This is, of course, the apology of the journalist who is responsible for interviews and personal sketches, and there is much to be said for it.

Unfortunately, perhaps, the man whose work is most worth understanding is generally most loth to supply this personal annotation. Genius is often shy, and to this rule Mr. Joseph Conrad is not an exception.

I once "interviewed" Mr. Conrad and I vividly remember the terror with which he regarded me when he met me at the station. Happily I was soon able to convince him I had no curiosity for trivial impertinences, and it was my fortune, while chatting to him in an old-world farmhouse garden through a long summer afternoon, to catch something of his unique individuality.

Joseph Conrad is a Pole and a sailor—in itself a strange combination. Born far inland, he caught the sea fascination in some mystic way in his youth and was never contented till he lived upon it. Essentially a stylist in English, it is only to him a borrowed language, though his love for it may perhaps be not a little due to the fact that he learnt it from East Coast fishermen with whom he worked for a while.

I can think of no other instance of a foreigner learning to write English as Mr. Conrad writes it, while certainly few native writers have anything approaching his veneration for its beauties and its possibilities. He takes infinite pains to express thoughts and ideas in what to him is the most perfect manner. In a real sense he is an artist in words.

Here then are the facts of the personality that surely illustrate the work—a Pole, one of the strange unconquerable race that Seton Merriman called the "Frenchmen of the North," a sailor with a poet's insight and imagination, and a foreigner with a knowledge of more than one other language, deliberately choosing English for the expression of his imaginings.

In appearance Mr. Conrad suggests the seaman. His figure is stalwart and short, his dark beard well trimmed, and his walk nautical. Meet him near the docks and one would write him down "ship's captain" without hesitation.

But his eyes, curiously distinctive and striking, mark him out from his kind. Ship captain he may be, but his eyes proclaim him an artist.

It is some time since my talk with Mr. Conrad, but he is not a man to be easily forgotten, for, apart from his personal charm, he has all the qualities to include him within Schopenhauer's famous definition of genius: "The mind of genius is among other minds what the carbuncle is among precious stones; it sends forth light of its own, while the others reflect only that which they have received."

One remark of Mr. Conrad's is worth quoting as illustrating his attitude to criticism:—

"Praise and blame to my mind are of singularly small import, yet one cares for the recognition of a certain amplexness of purpose."

Science

The Future of the Japanese

THE present war raises some biological problems of the gravest possible character, so that one may attempt to consider them, despite the large proportion of speculation that is involved. And even granting the dubiety of many of my assumptions, the questions involved are of a general truth, which is incalculably important, and independent of the validity of any particular illustrations.

Amongst the many analogies between the Western Islanders of Europe and the Eastern Islanders of Asia, peoples occupying symmetrically disposed positions on either side of the greatest mass of land on the earth, there is also this, mean what it may, that they are both of a mixed origin. As regards ourselves, everyone is familiar with the facts, which are among the few of any significance that we learn in history at school: not that the significance of them is there pointed out or even recognised. And though the Japanese can probably boast not quite so mixed a descent as our own, and though he shows, at the present day, much more uniformity of type than we do, yet the ancestry of this consistently dark-eyed, black-haired people is of considerable complexity. The Ainos of Yedo, the aborigines of the Japanese islands, are certainly represented in the modern Japanese. Where they came from; how long ago they reached the islands from the Asiatic continent where humanity was born, or whether they were cut off from the main land by some geological cause, we will not inquire. At any rate, they may be taken as representing one strain in the Japanese of to-day. Another such is quite certainly Chinese, another is Korean, and a fourth unquestionably Malayan. Probably Papuan invasions did not affect, in any appreciable measure, the composition of the race, which would, of course, have suffered thereby.

We may take the modern Japanese, then, with their quickness of thought and corresponding quickness of act, their marked adaptability to change of environment—as proved by their rapid and successful adoption of Western ideas, and their very high and enviable ethical sense, as typifying some of the good results which all biology has proved to result from judicious cross-breeding. Needless to say, it would require much more knowledge of the historical aspect of the subject than I possess, and much more study than I have given it, to enable me dogmatically to assert that this mixture of race is the real cause of the difference between the Japanese people to-day and their neighbours, the Koreans and Chinese. At any rate, whether this be so or not, biology clearly asserts that it might be so. Such a result as we see in the Japanese or ourselves is the result that should follow the happy commingling of peoples sufficiently different yet sufficiently allied.

And in considering the future, I would ask your attention to those last words, sufficiently allied. For well we know that whilst in-breeding, purity of race, ultimately leads to that degenerate state illustrated by such of the monarchies and aristocracies of Europe as have not been saved by the very events of which they are least proud, yet we know with equal certainty that consequences the most lamentable follow the admixture of races too diverse. This is the fact which induced Spencer to give his advice to Japan—advice the profound wisdom of which the future will certainly demonstrate, and which, being part of Truth, is ipso facto independent of criticism. Speaking with the voice of that biology which he re-made if he did not create it, Spencer warned the Japanese against the results of inter-marriage with the Aryan races. Despite the supposed philological evidence, which is highly dubious, I fancy no one who has handled a few European and Japanese skulls would question that the common origin of the two is well-nigh as remote as the common origin of any two human races can be. And if you care to accredit biological truth, you are face to face with a grave problem, as I said in starting, when you consider the future of the Japanese.

Assume that brains beat brawn in the present war: or assume that reaction delays a little longer the course of human evolution; at any rate some day Japan will get a footing on the mainland of Asia. No fears of "race-suicide" need worry her. Her teeming peoples will one day encounter, not as now in battle array, but in peaceful intercourse, the races of Aryan origin. If we are to believe a tithe of what we hear, the Aryan is not insusceptible to Japanese charms. No one who looks far enough ahead can doubt that Aryan and Mongol will fuse some day. But we hope that, for the sooner solving "the riddle of the painful earth," that commingling may be a slow and gradual process. East need not be always East, nor West always West; but woe to those who forget the lesson of the poet's assertion as to the present; East is East and West is West. You will not achieve the brotherhood of man without reference to biology, believe me.

C. W. SALEEBY.

Dramatic Notes

MADE ABROAD" will soon be the cry again at the leading theatres in London; it is now so at the Garrick, the New Theatre and the Imperial. At the last named Mr. John Davidson is responsible for a version of Victor Hugo's "Ruy Blas," under the title, "A Queen's Romance." From Mr. Davidson's pen I had rather have received original work. His version of "Ruy Blas" must not be judged as a translation, but as an adaptation, and as such is, it need hardly be said, soundly and on occasion finely written, but does not as a whole provide a very "living" play. The fault is partly Mr. Davidson's, partly Mr. Waller's, to whose methods "Ruy Blas" is not suited. Mr. Waller, with his striking presence and splendid voice, can be great in moments of excitement or of scorn—he is a magnificent soldier but not a persuasive lover. In the outburst of scorn for the trafficking politicians of Spain seated around the council table, and in his tempest of rage with the villainous Don Salluste, his acting rings true, but as the lover of the Queen he does not touch us, does not lay any claim upon our sympathies. He is all the more unsympathetic, all the more unreal, by reason of the contrast between his robust acting and the polished, sincere performance by Mrs. Patrick Campbell of the Queen.

It is a pleasure to see once again this actress in a really sympathetic part: most of us have grown tired of her women with a grievance against the moral code of society. In the present version of "Ruy Blas" the Queen is but an attenuated part, but Mrs. Campbell makes the most of the opportunities left her. Her voice, the expression of her face, her quiet mien and gestures in the second act, where she bemoans her lot as a queen, cut off from all human intercourse, deprived of all her rights as a woman, the actress touches a note of high tragedy, all the higher because, though deep and searching, her expression of emotion is quiet, natural and restrained. In truth, Mrs. Patrick Campbell has never done better work and that is high praise. Mr. Charles Fulton lacks restraint, being a stagey and unconvincing villain. Why will most of our villains on the stage wear their villainous hearts upon their sleeves? On the other hand, Mr. Thomas Kingston struck the true note of bravado as Don César. Miss Lydia Thompson was mistakenly permitted to play the Duchess of Albriquesque in comic opera vein; there was no trace of the grand lady in her performance.

I HOPE there is foundation in fact for the rumour that Mr. Waller's next venture will be a Shakespearean revival; is it too much to hope that he will give us "Macbeth"? He would play the Thane of Cawdor in splendid fashion, making of him the strong-hearted soldier that he is, and Mrs. Campbell would be admirably suited as Lady Macbeth. The contrast in the styles of the two performers would be exactly the contrast required by the two characters as drawn by Shakespeare, so seldom played as they should be.

I HAVE not seen M. Alfred Capus' play in its native tongue, so cannot say whether Mr. Comyns Carr's adaptation, "My Lady of Rosedale," is a version or a perversion of the original. Whatever it may be in this connection it is not a very interesting play; one of the chief characters pursues a course which she knows must cause the greatest distress to those who have only annoyed her, yet her motive for so doing is of the feeblest; the last act winds up in a perfect coruscation of coincidences; altogether a milk and watery entertainment. The only interesting feature is the dialogue, which is always neat and often witty. Sir Charles Wyndham plays with a character which makes no call upon his abilities; Miss Mary Moore has nothing to do and does it with her usual charm; Miss Gertrude Kingston is over-emphatic, as the motiveless and ill-natured person already mentioned; Mr. Eille Norwood acts incisively and naturally as a very objectionable husband—the best drawn character in the piece; and Miss Mabel Terry Lewis shows a great advance in her art: she makes the most of her natural gifts, which are very considerable, including those two first-rate qualities—the ability to keep quiet in emotional scenes and to put tears into her voice. On the whole the play is not worthy of the performers; in short, a disappointment.

WHEN a distinguished writer of fiction turns his attention to dramatic work, his effort naturally arouses considerable expectation of something if not strong at any rate fresh, and such is the short play "The Jail Bird" by Mr. "Maarten Maartens." It is brightly written, sound in style, and novel in its setting. Those who contemplate a visit to "Little Mary" will be foolish if they miss seeing "The Jail Bird." As for "Little Mary" she improves upon acquaintance; the prologue is, as I have said before, a gem of the first water, and the remainder of the piece is highly entertaining, not only worthy in itself but brilliantly acted by Mr. John Hare and Miss Nina Boucicault, an actress of very great gifts.

THE best performances in Berlin are now to be found at the Neue Theater under the direction of Herr Reinhardt; the finest actors and actresses, Frau Sorma among them, are engaged by him, and even the smallest parts are filled to perfection, while the most careful attention is paid to the subsidiary arts of scenic decoration, costume and music. The latest successes have been Bernard Shaw's "Man of Destiny" and Maeterlinck's "Sister Beatrice," with Max Marshall's delightful music. The former play is scarcely worthy of the fine acting and setting here allotted to it. But nothing could be artistically more satisfying than the Maeterlinck play. It was in every way an absolutely beautiful representation. How delightful it would be if Herr Reinhardt and his company could be persuaded to pay London a visit and show us how it is done.

A FINE performance of Lessing's "Minna von Barnhelm" is now to be seen at the Deutsche Theater, Berlin, which is crowded every time it is given.

IN "The North American Review" for February, there is an interesting paper upon "The Art of a Stage Manager," by Mr. Brander Matthews, Professor of Dramatic Literature in Columbia University. The writer points out that the stage manager is to the general public an unknown power in the stage world, that his face is not familiar on the posters or his name printed large upon the play-bills, while as a fact he is responsible in a great degree for the goodness or the badness of the performance, "for the acting and for the costumes, for the scenery and for the properties, for the lighting and for the incidental music; not so much indeed for any one of these things as for the harmony of the whole." Or as he puts it more fully in another passage: "That the task of the stage-manager is more difficult than that of the conductor is due to the fact that the composer has prescribed exactly what share each instrument shall take, the conductor having this full score in his possession; whereas the stage-manager receives from the author only the spoken words of the play, with but summary indications as to the gestures, the movements, the scenery and so forth. He has not a full score, but only a sequence of themes incompletely orchestrated, and with the missing passages to be supplied at his own discretion. And as the richness of the harmony depends largely upon his ability to amplify properly the hints of the author, the stage-manager is, in fact, almost a collaborator of the playwright; he is forced into a more intimate relation with the dramatist than that which the conductor bears towards the composer."

SIR HENRY IRVING

(Taken at Manchester in 1865.)

BUT the danger to-day is that plays are sometimes over stage-managed, the play is lost in a wilderness of scenery, furniture, effects, stage-business and so forth; or to put it another way, the play is too often a skeleton clothed with garments provided by the stage-manager and scene painter. It may be answered that our plays to-day are so dead and inhuman that they call for and need brilliant embellishments to render them attractive; if this be true, the drama is moribund and only raree-shows are alive. But this argument does not apply to, for example, the plays of Shakespeare, which are so often under-acted and over-decorated.

CONCERNING conventional stage business Mr. Brander Matthews has some pertinent remarks: "If the older plays, either tragedies or comedies, seem to us sometimes richer in detail than the more modern pieces, we shall do well to remember that these earlier dramas have profited by the accretions of business and of unexpected readings due to the unceasing endeavour of several generations of actors and of stage-managers. The plays of Shakespeare that are most frequently performed, the comedies of Molière also, have accumulated a mass of traditions, of one kind or another, some of these being of hoary antiquity." Living conventions are very well and very useful; dead habits had best be cast off as soon as may be. Our actors are apt to over-elaborate their "business," and are in little danger, alas! of doing justice to fine parts by fine, quiet, human performances. Still, the traditional stage business for Shakespeare performances have always an antiquarian interest and are useful not seldom in giving a clue to the exact meaning of the text, and I echo the wish that "some stage-manager of scholarly tastes should provide us with a record of the customary effects to be obtained in the performance of each of Shakespeare's plays, as these have been accumulated in the theatre itself." If an actor would oblige, perhaps Mr. H. B. Irving will do so?

ONE more quotation from this very interesting article and I must leave the subject, at any rate for the present: "The expert playwright of every period when the drama has flourished abundantly, has always adjusted the structure of his play to conform to the conditions of the theatre of his own time; and the more adroit of the dramatists of to-day have been swift to perceive the necessity for a change of method, since the thrust-out platform has been succeeded by the stage behind the picture-frame. They are relinquishing the rhetorical devices which were proper enough on the platform-stage, and which seem out of place on the picture-stage. They find their profit in accepting as a principle the old saying that 'actions speak louder than words.' They are abandoning the confidential soliloquy, for example, which was quite in keeping with the position of an actor in close proximity to the spectators—in the midst of them, in fact—and which would seem artificial and unnatural now that the actor is behind the mystic line of the curtain. They are giving up the explanatory 'aside'—lines spoken directly to the audience, and supposed to be unheard by the other characters on the stage."

Musical Notes

BY all the signs of it the forthcoming Elgar Festival is going to be a very big event, and the King and Queen have shown their customary tact and judgment and appreciation of the time of day by the personal interest in the undertaking which they are known to be displaying. If only society in general would follow their Majesties' excellent example by supporting more energetically than they do the better class concerts of the day, it would be all to the benefit of the art. In this connection one may note the cordial bearing of the King and the Prince of Wales towards the representatives of British music, and in particular towards Dr. Elgar, at the recent concert of the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society, while the presence of the Queen at the Richter concert on the previous evening (when "Also sprach Zarathustra" was the chief work in the programme) was further evidence of the sympathetic interest with which latter-day developments of the art are followed in high places. In an ideal world neither music nor any other art would be dependent for its prosperity upon the patronage of the great. But as things are, much benefit may unquestionably accrue therefrom.

MR. PERCY PITT is a composer to be reckoned with. His work may not always appeal to the multitude, but its cleverness is undeniable. As a master of orchestration, in particular, he is almost unrivalled—among British composers at all events. Nor are the wonderful colours which he produces interesting only on their own account. They have, beyond their purely musical value, significance and meaning. This aspect of Mr. Pitt's art is exemplified afresh in his new set of songs heard at the last Symphony Concert. Perhaps "songs" is in reality hardly the right term for them—symphonic miniatures with a voice part obbligato would more nearly meet the case. In this, of course, they resemble many kindred works by Richard Strauss, Hugo Wolf and other moderns. It is only a pity that in Mr. Pitt's case the subject-matter of his music is not always on a level with its treatment.

MISS MURIEL FOSTER has distinctly "arrived." Hardly anyone, indeed, has "come on" more remarkably during recent years—a fact to which the audience at her recent concert bore gratifying witness. Her position is so well assured, indeed, that one need be less chary in expressing the belief that she has even so a good deal further yet to go before she can be considered to have reached her goal. She does so well that she ought to do a great deal better. Hers is indeed a somewhat curious case. She sings to all seeming with profound feeling, and yet leaves one too often absolutely cold. Somehow she seems unable to lose herself entirely in her work. A sense of self-consciousness never leaves her, and this is fatal to the highest results. Unfortunately there is no defect much more difficult to cure.

SOME of the evidence given in the course of the action for libel brought the other day by Mr. Conried, of the New York Metropolitan Opera House, against a Munich journalist was rather interesting. According to Herr Possart, for instance, the well-known Munich Intendant, Mr. Conried undertook that if five directors of German theatres gave him a promise not to perform "Parsifal" in 1913, when the rights of Wagner's heirs expire, he on his part would not produce the work in America. Presumably, however, no such self-denying ordinance on the part of the directors in question was forthcoming—if, indeed, Mr. Conried, when he made his rather absurd suggestion, ever supposed that it would be. The implied conclusion, however, that "Parsifal" will be freely produced throughout Germany as soon as the law permits, throws into still greater relief the absurdity of the opposition offered on sentimental grounds to its presentation in New York.

MUSIC and longevity seem often to go together—a truth of which there is certainly no more conspicuous living instance than that wonderful old man Señor Manuel Garcia, who, all being well, enters on his hundredth year next month. Another is Mr. Wilhelm Kuhe, who, though born as long ago as 1824, still retains his musical faculties to an astonishing extent—as he demonstrated in a wonderful fashion quite recently. The talk turning on the "Waldstein" sonata, Mr. Kuhe observed that he had not either played or heard the work for thirty years, and thereupon sat down and played the sonata right through from memory without a single halt or hitch.

A VARIANT of Cornelius' oft-quoted saying that Weber died in trying to become Wagner, would seem to be the recent observation of a Viennese critic, apropos of a revised version of "Euryanthe," that "Weber wrote Wagner's earliest opera." How the whirligig of Time brings in its revenges! Who could have dared to predict in those far off days when the youthful Wagner, then a mischievous schoolboy, hung about the streets of Leipzig to catch even a glimpse of his adored idol the composer of "Der Freischütz," that a time would come when such a view of their relative positions would find general acceptance? But no one would have rejected more indignantly than Wagner any attempt at disparagement of the older master. Is it not about time by the way for Covent Garden to bethink itself once more of a revival of one or other of Weber's operas? No work of Weber has, I think, been heard in London now since 1894, when a not very happy presentation of "Der Freischütz" was given at Drury Lane.

I SPOKE of the whirligig of time. Another instance was contained in a recent issue of an esteemed contemporary possessed, as it daily assures the world, of enviable popularity, wherein the critic of a Cairo paper was ponderously chaffed for his heterodox opinions concerning Wagner's music. "When the 'Ring' is produced in Cleopatra's land," concluded this facetious paragraph, "we sincerely hope that this same writer's views on the subject will find their way to this country. They should prove illuminating." Yet not more so, I imagine, than those criticisms of the tetralogy which found expression in the columns of that self-same journal some quarter of a century since, and which, under the title "Letters from Bayreuth," still afford entertainment and instruction to the curious in volume form.

APART from the reduction of its price another change of some interest is to be noted in connection with the "Daily News," whose capable musical critic, Mr. E. A. Baughan, is henceforward, it appears, to be responsible in addition for the dramatic criticism of that journal. This doubling of functions obviously means a considerable strain upon the energies of even the most industrious, and I trust that Mr. Baughan may not find his heavy task too much for him. Those who have long followed his musical criticisms with interest will certainly read with pleasure his views on matters dramatic. To a certain extent, of course, dramatic criticism forms part of the functions of every musical critic—in relation, that is, to the opera.

Art Notes

MR. BAILLIE is showing at his charming galleries in Hereford Road, Bayswater, amongst other things, the last work of poor Oscar Eckhardt, who died, after years of suffering, as he was on the eve of making a wide reputation. There are some delightful examples of his art at this exhibition of the drawings that he left behind him; and it is a pitiful and haunting thing to stand before them and to reflect that he was putting gaiety of colour and lightness of subject upon paper with deft hand whilst his heart must have been aching at the approach of death which he knew must leave his widow without the means of livelihood. I can imagine no more ghastly conditions under which to have painted the blithe, joyous water-colours "At the Opera" and "The Battle of Flowers." The gaiety and the frolic are in the hand, whilst the brain must have been reeling sickeningly. There are drawings on these walls that would brighten many a rich man's home; and the prices are almost pathetically low; and their purchase means a godsend. Whilst on the subject of Mr. Baillie's gallery, I look forward to the day when this man of taste shall migrate to regions within hail of Piccadilly Circus; for the old dealers are sadly hide-bound; and a fresh discriminating view like his might and should give us a Baillie Gallery within easy access of Piccadilly. The day might then come when a Royal Academician is ashamed to ask "Who was Beardsley?"

THE Leicester Galleries continue to keep up the high interest of their one-man show. To-day may be seen, thereat, the work of Edwin Abbey, R.A., and of Frederick Sandys, who ought to have been R.A., and whose lack of R.A.-ship will remain one of the many eternal disgraces to the immortals. First as to Edwin Abbey: here may be seen the original drawings, chiefly in pen line, for the superb series of Shakespeare's comedies—drawings which not only created a school of artists, but which placed Edwin Abbey amongst the foremost illustrators of our time. To all lovers and collectors of that delightful series of his that appeared in "Harper," it will be a delight to see the originals, four or five times the size of the published drawings. The drawing of Falstaff being carried out in the clothes-basket is most delightful. How Abbey has caught the rollicking, joyous, full-blooded comedy of the spacious times of Queen Elizabeth! How splendidly he has caught the spirit of Shakespeare, that combination of romance and comedy that no age has known since, unless it be that flicker of dramatic glory that gave us "The School for Scandal"—a glorious promise that died with Sheridan and Goldsmith. Abbey catches the atmosphere of his subject so freshly, with such splendour of composition. Enters Theseus, and at the words a rich and splendid pageant tops the high steps and moves its dignified length along. Claudio pins up his lines to the tomb of Hero, and how gravely the beautiful wrought-ironwork and the solemnity of the rich tomb are pronounced! The scent and air and mood of the scene are caught with a beauty and a perfection of handling that make of these pen-and-ink drawings a series of masterpieces. In "The Tempest" we are in a haunted atmosphere—an atmosphere of voices that speak out of the void—an atmosphere of magic wands and enchantments. In "The Midsummer Night's Dream," Queen Titania moves on gorgeous butterfly wings. In "The Winter's Tale" we are in the very world of ancient classic days. Whatever the background to the play, there we are transported by the magic of this man's deft fingers, and live the life and breathe the air of the place. Edwin Abbey is a very king of illustrators. He reached to fame as almost a young man. Honours come pouring upon him. Every medium yields its secret to his skill. He is at the top of the hill.

AND Sandys! A man no longer young at a time when Abbey was achieving his first successes, he is to-day an old man with his youth's skill and beauty of line in his fingers; yet he is without honours and without fortune; this man who was the peer of Rossetti and Millais and Holman Hunt and Madox Brown and Leighton. His oil paintings of old ladies are part of the high achievement of England. His line in the modelling of the beauty of the head is as young and fresh to-day, as full of exquisite sensitiveness and nervous musical quality as it was in his early manhood. He makes of the coloured chalk a medium that is the despair of artists, a beautiful maker of beautiful things. He has a sense of form which the greatest of the Greeks would have honoured. And yet—by some strange "cussedness" of fortune, by that strange whim of luck that showers or withholds high honours, he is to-day a man of small account as men account success, a man without honours as the world counts honours. There are not half-a-dozen men in the Royal Academy whose work is fit to rank with his high achievement in the illustration of the mid-nineteenth century; not half-a-dozen to approach him in nervous exquisite expression of the harmonious line. He is one of those men fated to be held in high honour when he has passed away for a century or so. Yet perhaps he would give all his future fame for a few years of real appreciation now—of freedom from care—for a little tithe of fame. Happy the man who possesses some of these beautiful things. Happy the woman who, being limned by his hand to-day, shall one day hand her portrait to her grandchild and say, "When I was young and beautiful like you, Sandys drew this picture of me."

As I think over the Pastel Society's winter show this year, the piece of work that remains in my memory is "Kingston Bridge," by H. M. Livens—the dreamy poetic sense, the mood, the sombre strength, the forceful composition, the grand manner of the thing haunts me. It dominates the memory of all else; yet I can recall the facile mastery of the Frenchman Legrand, the telling portrait of the charming ten-foot high "Mrs. Konody" by Byam Shaw, out of the well-placed and well-spaced work of artists, most of which reaches a remarkably good standard of accomplishment. Altogether a most interesting show.

AN exhibition of contemporary engravings, drawings, and maps, which will give a very complete idea of the aspect of the streets and country which now compose London, and of its inhabitants during the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, will be opened at the Fine Art Society's, New Bond Street, to-day (the 20th). Collections have been made by one or two diligent connoisseurs, but have hitherto been seldom shown to the public in panoramic form, as will be the case here. The Society has acquired one of these collections, which has taken over a quarter of a century to put together, and is practically unique as regards water colours and engravings of Hampstead, Highgate and Northern London, but these will not be included in the present exhibition, which deals only with London between the Thames and Regent's Park.

I FANCY the high prices realised for the Bulteel collection of coloured engravings at Christie's last week will make the owners of the like works of art very anxious to put their wares upon the market. When that, to me, rather mediocre plate of Ward's, after Hoppner's "Daughters of Sir Thomas Frankland," wins 600 guineas into the purse of its owner, coloured prints are surely at the zenith of their glory. Wheatley's "Cries of London" seems to be as much sought after as ever. And Bartolozzi's "Honble. Miss Bingham," after Sir Joshua, fetched 320 guineas. Ah! if some of us had only realised years ago what a mine lay in those old family portfolios of engravings that went to the auction-room when the old people died, what delights were ours to-day!

THE new number of the quarterly "Books and Book-Plates" with its delightful cover is out, and is somewhat disappointing as to its book-plates. Surely half-a-crown is a high price for this little magazine!

OLD LONDON
IN THE
REIGNS OF THE GEORGES.
AN EXHIBITION
OF 300
ENGRAVINGS AND DRAWINGS illustrating the above is now open at
THE FINE ART SOCIETY,
148, New Bond Street.
CATALOGUE (48 pages) INCLUDED IN ADMISSION
THE EXHIBITS ARE FOR SALE.

University Extension

The Suburban Lecture

THE suburban lecture concerns two widely different individuals. Plainly, he who claims first consideration is the man who finds his home in the suburbs. Lectures at Richmond, for instance, are organised for the benefit of those who live in that town. But while remembering that important point there is another individual to take into account—the Londoner himself. The mother city cannot provide everything—or, at least, everything at once. And what more natural than to turn to the suburbs? What more agreeable to the student to know than that certain courses are being delivered within, say, half an hour's run of the metropolis? There are people who will make light work of an evening journey to such flourishing and up-to-date suburbs as Kingston in order to see a "piece" that does not happen to be "on" at the moment at any of the immediate theatres. Why not so, therefore, with lectures and lecture-goers? Kingston Theatre was built for Kingston just as the Richmond Lecture Hall is intended for Richmond, and if the interest of the moment draws a wider world to the former surely the influence can be extended in the case of the latter.

There is a third individual to be noticed who concerns himself with the suburban lecture, who, blessed with plenty of time, is imbued with a kind of mania for attending lectures of any nature whatever, the primary object in his case being to fill up his "programme" for the day. He is happy if there is a lecture he can attend; will take delight in visiting outlying districts (on a fine afternoon going so far as Barnet or Harrow) and will cheerily penetrate to the gloomiest of halls. Such an one is pursuing what he hopes to be the rightful course to enable him "to burn always with a hard, gem-like flame." Well, perhaps he succeeds, but he is not the individual to concern us for long. There are some, however, whose work will permit them to give up, once a week, say, an afternoon, or failing that, an evening, to some such lecture beyond the limits of their city, that they may participate in a course of mental food which they feel to be necessary. And to these the love of the thing—the charm of the suburban excursion—will follow naturally. For, after all, what is the underlying incentive in the case of that third individual mentioned above (doing his round of the suburbs more for a change of scene and occupation than for any more definite aim) but that fascination of the suburbs sometimes felt by weary Londoners.

Will not this feeling be greater (if perhaps less conscious) if it is first and foremost a specific lecture which has brought you into the suburban belt?—just as you would as readily go out to Whitechapel. You feel justified in your course—how many can truly say that?—it is no mere afternoon jaunt. And this is indeed a phase of Extension work that approaches one more step towards that university life which you have missed, but of which you somehow begin to feel the glamour.

How easy to conceive the ideal! How easy, again, to put into practice that ideal when it only concerns the few. But what a difference when we come to think of the vast majority! I have dwelt rather longer than was well, perhaps, on a pleasant side of educational work. But I had an ideal in my mind. I was thinking of the suburban library with lecture-hall included in it—a lecture-hall full, a library well used; a colony of "extension" students not content till they had quarters of their own (an "extension club"), then to become an off-shoot of the Central Association in the metropolis.

But I must hark back to the real state of affairs, for I was rather hasty in speaking recently of the large number of lecture-courses in the suburbs. They are, in fact, rather neglected. Many "centres" do exist, but without the attendant work, and at present Hampstead people, for instance, are obliged to resort to the central courses if only for want of anything nearer home. For it is around the immediate "home" that the influence of university extension teaching must be exerted. The average City man will neither stay in the City till eight o'clock, nor return thither after once leaving for the day, however strong the educational magnet. But given an opening for intellectual development in his suburban home, he will value it. Local associations should be started, or if any exist they should make themselves heard.

I hope to show on another occasion that this side of the question is just as important and capable of development in the case of the outlying "centres" around the large provincial towns.

Correspondence

"All-Round Readers"

SIR,—

"... good, sound all-round readers are becoming exceptional, and the spread of education has only increased the thirst for knowledge at second hand."—THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, 23 January, 1904.

To my mind this statement is equally as serious as those contained in your issues of January 16, page 63, and January 30, page 115, and I for one consider it is time to call "Halt!"

Do the vast majority of readers confine their attention to newspapers? May I refer you to a letter—of a delightfully healthy tone—published in your issue of 18th April, 1903, from Mr. W. C. Berwick Sayers, sub-librarian, Central Public Library, Bournemouth. It does one good, under the pressure of your reiterated pessimistic statements—given I have not the slightest doubt in good faith—to read in "sober fact" the strenuous life of those Shakespeares and Miltons.

It would be very interesting to have more opinions from a similar source. May it not be allowed that journalism—even from a literary point of view—has been raised to a standard higher than it has ever been, and that having appealed to George Meredith, Thomas Hardy, George Gissing, Andrew Lang, Oliver Lodge, M. Maurice Maeterlinck, to mention but a few names, newspapers may be responsible for many converts to serious reading.

I had the pleasure of reading in a newspaper an article by Hubert Bland on George Gissing, and finished it with the feeling that here at any rate was a formidable recruiting sergeant for sound literature. I hope this extract from the two-column article will be forgiven, as it refers particularly to the point at issue:—

If you want to read Gissing in his most autobiographical mood read "Born in Exile." It will not "amuse" you, but I think I can promise that it will impress you, impress you with a sense of the writer's power, of his acute psychological observation, and above all, it will enable you to understand, if not to sympathise with the temperament of the man.

Now if but a few of the average men are induced to read such an article as this (and as an appreciation of George Gissing's work I have yet to see its equal in any English literary paper), may they not be firmly directed to the most convenient book shop? Would this be unprofitable reading? On my way home, according to wont, I dropped in the unobtrusive bookshop of Mr. Hill Blacklow—the name by which he is known to the writer—and the education rate collector—is no necessity here. I had a special interest in calling to-day for I was to become the possessor of Lionel Johnson's "The Art of Thomas Hardy." Our book chat had received more than its usual share of interruptions—for business was brisk to-day—and my book and I were already at the door when from behind a goodly heap of assorted literature came the voice of Mr. Hill Blacklow: "Seen to-day's 'Daily Wonder'?" I had fled.—Yours, &c.,

O. GOWAN.

"Shakespeare and Bacon"

SIR,—About Bacon's lack of the "poetical faculty" Dr. Stolz is positively certain. "I like English poetry," he says, "but Bacon is too dry, without fancy, for me to name him a poet." I am afraid I may once more wound the susceptibilities of the foreigner by mentioning the fact that a certain English poet named Shelley once disagreed with the opinions expressed by Dr. Stolz, when he said, "Lord Bacon was a poet. His language has a sweet and majestic rhythm which satisfies the sense, no less than the almost superhuman wisdom of his philosophy satisfies the intellect;" and James Spedding, Bacon's greatest biographer, put it on record that "I infer from this sample that Bacon had all the natural faculties which a poet wants—a fine ear for metre, a fine feeling for imaginative effect in words, and a vein of poetic passion." Then a poet called Bulwer Lytton ventured to write about Bacon: "Poetry pervaded the thoughts, it inspired the similes, it hymned in the majestic sentences of the wisest of mankind." While even Macaulay declared: "The poetical faculty was great in Bacon's mind."

Then, we are informed, Bacon had no "fancy." Answer from Walter Savage Landor: "The little volume of Bacon's 'Essays' exhibits not only more strength of mind, more true philosophy, but more originality, more fancy, more imagination, than all the volumes of Plato."

Next we have the Dr. Stolz dictum: "Never a philosopher was regarded as a poet." Answer from Coleridge: "Bacon was not only a great poet, but he was also a great philosopher." The poet comes before the philosopher.—Yours, &c.,

GEORGE STRONACH.

SIR,—I was rather sorry to notice the revival of the Bacon-Shakespeare question in THE ACADEMY. Mr. Stronach, I believe, fought for the Baconians in your columns several months ago, and he does not seem convinced by any of the very excellent arguments then brought forward against him. It is impossible to argue on this question, because it is merely a matter of artistic perception. It seems inconceivable to me that any cultured man should be found on the side of the Baconians. Cryptograms and bilateral ciphers are, of course, nothing but nonsense. The question can only be settled by a comparison of the works of Shakespeare and of Bacon. Here we find convincing evidence to hand. No man in his right senses can hold that the verse which Bacon has left us was written by the man who wrote Shakespeare's plays. Those middle-period comedies of Shakespeare, where the outsidings of life (untouched by any brooding light of mystery) provide the themes, could not have been written by a man of Bacon's temperament. Bacon had no such delight in beauty for its own sake. He could not regard the tale as the thing. His was the philosophical mind. His delight was to raise some vast moral issue or to reach the last subtlety of psychological delineation.

There are three different aspects of life which one never finds united in one writer—the ideals of truth, beauty, and goodness. Truth is the ideal of the philosopher; beauty is the ideal of the true poet or artist; and goodness the ideal of the moralist. A great deal of one of these and a touch of another may be found in one man. In Bacon himself it seems to me that we have a great deal of the philosopher's ideal of truth combined with a touch of the ideal of goodness. Beauty is not his chief ideal, as it is with Shakespeare, and must be with all true poets and other artists. The temperament of Bacon, therefore, is almost the very opposite of the temperament of Shakespeare.

This, as I have said above, is merely a matter of artistic feeling. But, as such evidence is not enough for Baconians we must find something further.

Mr. Stronach will acknowledge, I suppose, that we can see from his plays that Shakespeare was of a very Catholic temperament. He was, above all, a Humanist. Whether he approved of democracy or not we cannot say. Most probably he never thought about it at all. In "Coriolanus" Shakespeare does not treat the people ungenerally. He recognises that their feelings are generally right, though their view of facts is often perverted by interests or stupidity. In a word, he recognises that their hearts are as sound as their heads are volatile. With all this I believe that Mr. Stronach will agree.

Now take Bacon. He is far too grave to be a true Humanist. Hence we actually find him saying: "I do not love the word people." One of his chief characteristics is a lack of sympathy for the popular mind—a flagrant dislike of all democracy. Bacon lived in the Court, and he wrote as one writing for courtiers and nobles.

Mr. Stronach asks, "Where did the man of Stratford get his culture?" I might suggest that he got it chiefly from the book of the world and not only from the world of books. There is nothing really erudite in Shakespeare. His plays are more like the spontaneous outpourings of an artistic imagination than the laborious lucubrations of a great intellect. Apologising for so long a letter.—Yours, &c.,

One Oak, Ilkley.

R. B. APPLETON.

[This correspondence must now close.—ED.]

Clough and Tennyson

SIR,—In regard to the authorship of the lines "Tis better to have loved and lost than never to have loved at all," I send you the following: "In treating of friendship, love, and marriage I shall confine my remarks to the general tenor of them, to that cautious family prudence, to those confined views of partial, unenlightened affection which exclude pleasure and improvement by vainly wishing to ward off sorrow—and thus by guarding the heart and mind destroy all their energy. It is far better to be often deceived than never to trust; to be disappointed in love than never to love." "Vindication of the Rights of Woman," 1792, by Mary Wollstonecraft. Shelley. Vol. I.

I think this the origin of the thought in both Clough's and Tennyson's lines.—Yours, &c.,

GREENCASTLE, INDIANA, U.S.A.

SIR,—As you printed my question, you will, I am sure, allow me space to express my regret at the turn taken by the discussion. A correspondent in the "Daily Express" at once raised the old bogey of plagiarism. I had never previously doubted that in his verses Clough was avowedly and deliberately imitating Tennyson. I cannot now believe in Mr. Churton Collins' suggestion of "unconscious" echoing. Unless my memory is playing me false, it is, I feel sure, not a mere conjecture but a recorded fact that Clough read "In Memoriam" before it was published. In "Peschiera" he adopted the same metre—then little known—he modelled his style on Tennyson's, and he chose as the key-note of his piece a variant of two of "In Memoriam's" most striking lines. Surely he intended his verses to be an example of the imitation that is described as the sincerest form of flattery. The purpose of my question was to find out if Clough inadvertently published his poem before Tennyson's great work appeared.

I have an additional reason for regretting that I have unintentionally caused some to accuse Clough of plagiarism. I cannot help feeling that he is just now suffering undue depreciation. No doubt at one time he was absurdly over-praised, but since Mr. Swinburne's vigorous denunciation, Clough has been the target for many sneers. References such as that which occurred in THE ACADEMY a few weeks ago are not pleasant for those who believe, like myself, that in spite of his many defects the author of "Qua cursum ventus" had a genuine lyrical gift.—Yours, &c.,

Blackheath, S.E.

W. ALDERSEY LEWIS.

University Extension

SIR,—The campaign of Dr. Emil Reich for the popularising of bibliographical methods is one which must meet with the approval of all students. The reader on his first visit to the British Museum is appalled by the enormous mass of the General Catalogue. Even after frequenting the Reading Room for many years few readers attain to anything more than a bowing acquaintance with the bibliographical helps so (comparatively) lavishly provided for their use. I honestly believe that the number of readers who are fully able to use the resources of the museum might be counted on the fingers of one hand.

Just one word in reference to the first question put to Dr. Reich. Why not go direct to P. B. Watson's Bibliography of the Pre-Columbian discoveries of America? This seems a more direct method than working from the Chinese end of the question.—Yours, &c.,

St. Bride Foundation.

R. A. PEDDIE.

SIR,—Many of your readers must have been gratified to notice the increased space you have been devoting in the columns of THE ACADEMY to the University Extension movement. It synchronizes happily with the strong effort the University of London has recently made to extend the scope of the Extension lectures by adding a real continuity to the various series. Hitherto it has been frequently urged that the promoters of the movement never quite appreciated the large number of men and women who would welcome any scheme which aimed at systematizing their general reading. A series of eight or ten lectures upon one of the physical sciences or an important literary epoch made no appeal to such a class. The courses upon general history now in progress at the University of London, however, exactly meet the need. They are designed to cover a period of three years, which is sufficient to permit of a comprehensive view of at least the chief features of universal history. The breadth of the subject necessitates the main problems of literature and art being kept continually in mind. It must be evident how thoroughly this is in accord with the spirit that should actuate the Extension movement. The amateur scholar is constantly happening upon some analogy which illuminates his particular hobby. Above all he is provided with the definite aim favourable to a steady course of reading which, to quote from your current editorial note, "braces the whole mental being."—Yours, &c.,

ERNEST H. SHORT.

80, Fleet Street, E.C.

SIR,—I am sure that I am voicing a wide-spread opinion when I say that you have done great service to the work of the University Extension scheme in publishing the useful articles which have appeared in recent issues. Nothing is needed so much as to arouse and to stimulate attention to a work which has lagged behind in many provincial centres merely for lack of a strong lead. I note the formation of a Central Association of U.E. Students from an advertisement in your pages and trust that this organisation may be able to extend its operations and form provincial centres to follow up the lectures which are from time to time given. For London such an organisation is invaluable. There is scope, however, for work outside the metropolis. The larger centres and towns are now equipped in most cases with museums and art galleries, whilst the Carnegie libraries have been no mean addition to resources by the smaller towns. How to use these institutions is still a lesson to be taught.—Yours, &c.,

W. GAVIZZE KING.

Ragged School Union and Shaftesbury Society

SIR,—In view of the celebration of the Diamond Jubilee, the Council of the Ragged School Union and Shaftesbury Society, of 32, John Street, Theobald's Road, London, W.C., have in preparation a volume giving the history of the early stages of the movement.

May I be allowed to ask your readers to send to me any reports, letters of interest, illustrations, newspaper cuttings, or any information bearing upon this work in the past, which will tend to make the record complete and add to the interest of this earliest organised movement to deal with the condition of the slum child.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN KIRK, Secretary.

A Correction

SIR,—In the interesting article on the "Kelmescott Press" in THE ACADEMY of February 6, an unintentional mistake was made by the writer, Mr. Ernest Radford.

There exist two libraries at the St. Bride Institute—the official institute librarian being myself, and the present acting-librarian of the technical library department only is the gentleman named by Mr. Radford, i.e., Mr. R. A. Peddie.—Yours, &c.,

St. Bride Foundation.

F. W. T. LANGE.

"Academy" Questions & Answers

Questions and Answers for this column must be addressed to THE EDITOR, THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, 9, East Harding Street, London, E.C. The envelope to be marked in the top left-hand corner "A.Q.A." Full name and address must be sent, not necessarily for publication. Each Question or Answer must be written on a separate sheet of paper and on only one side of the paper. The Editor will not undertake the forwarding of any correspondence. Questions must be confined to matters of Literature, History, Archaeology, Folk-lore, Art, Music, and the Drama. The Editor reserves the right of deciding whether or not any Question or Answer is of sufficient interest to be published.

COMPETITION

Until further notice, four prizes, of the value of 5s. each, will be awarded weekly for the two best Questions and the two best Answers contributed to "Academy" Questions and Answers.

The Editor's decision must be considered absolutely final and no correspondence whatever will be entered upon with regard to the awards. The prizes will go to those Questions and Answers which are deemed to be of the greatest general interest, and brevity in all cases will count as a merit.

The names and addresses of prize-winners will not be published, but the winning Questions and Answers will be indicated by an asterisk (*).

The prizes will consist of 5s. worth of books to be chosen by the several prize-winners. The name and address of the booksellers where the book or books can be obtained will be given.

Each prize-winner in the United Kingdom will be advised that a credit note has been sent to a bookseller as early as possible in his (or her) immediate neighbourhood, and that on demand he (or she) may choose a book or books to the value of 5s. Winners outside the United Kingdom will receive a cheque for 5s.

Non-adherence to the rules and regulations of "Questions and Answers" will imply disqualification.

No Questions or Answers received after Monday will be considered eligible for the current week's competition.

No competitor can win a prize more than once in three months.

Questions

LITERATURE

*"THE JESSAMY BRIDE."—Was this name, given by Goldsmith to his friend Mary Horneck, a nickname of his own, or was it a character in an early play, and was it taken by him, and applied, as describing her sweet, graceful appearance? In Forster's "Life of Goldsmith," I find it spoken of as "a nickname." In Professor Masson's introduction to Goldsmith's "Works," Globe Edition, I find that he invented the name "Little Comedy" for the elder sister, but Masson speaks of the younger as "The Jessamy Bride," as Goldsmith called her. Can someone tell me if Goldsmith originated the sweet nickname?—C. C.

CARLYLE.—Can any reader tell me where in Carlyle's works the lines are to be found, beginning:—

"So here hath been dawning
Another blue day;
Think,—wilt thou let it
Slip useless away?"

Are they original, or a translation from the German?—M. A. C.

"SPRING IN ENGLAND."—Will some reader locate me the following quotation: "Give me back one day in England, for it's Spring in England now"? I do not refer to Browning's lines in the same spirit.—M. (London).

AUTHOR WANTED.—Can any of your readers tell me anything about the couplet which I quote from memory:—

"Though the day be never so long,
At length it ringeth to Evensong?"

I believe I read it many years ago in Southey's "Book of the Church," but I have not been able to verify the quotation. I am under the impression that it dates from the sixteenth century.—H. B. F.

AURORA LEIGH.—

"He stood
In Florence where he had come to spend a month
And note the secret of Da Vinci's drains."

Da Vinci visited Florence, and was renowned as engineer as well as artist. Do these words refer to his technical skill as an engineer, and if so what was "the secret"? Or have they some inner and less evident meaning?—A. L. G.

*AN OLD CHARADE.—In a small book—privately printed, I believe—containing reminiscences of Jane Austen, some charades written by her or other members of the Austen family appeared. All had answers appended except one, which the editor gives as still waiting its solution:—

"Without me divided, fair ladies, I ween,
At a ball or a concert you'll never be seen,
You must do me together, or safely I'd swear,
Whatever your carriage, you'll never get there."

Can any of your readers furnish a plausible answer?—F. (Cambridge).

AUTHOR WANTED.—

"His soul is at one with the reason of things that is sap to the roots.
He can hear in their changes a sound as the conscience of consonant spheres;
He can see through the years flowing round him the — (?) lying under the years."

—H. C. P.

UNRHYMED VERSE.—Prior to Collins' "Ode to Evening" and Kirke White's "Lines on an Early Primrose," are there any similar distinguished efforts of unrhythmed verse following the same measure?—H. R. S.

GENERAL

FINGER NAILS.—When I was a child I was told that the white marks which appear from time to time at the roots of the finger nails and grow up with the nails, signified the following, respectively: counting from the thumb:—

"A gift, a friend, a foe
A letter to write, and a journey to go."

What is the origin of this idea?—Haltand.

DAISIES.—Many references are made in modern poets to the attribute of still life possessed in some strange measure by the daisy. I give one or two instances:—

"Now resteth that unquiet head
Beneath the quiet daisies."
"A Life Drama"—Abe Smith.
"Tread lightly, she is near
Under the snow—
Speak gently, she can hear
The daisies grow."

Is there any scientific verification of this attribute?—H. R. S.

THOMAS A KEMPIS.—Was Thomas à Kempis ever canonized? I am under the impression that he was not, though I quite feel that he was more worthy than many who were. I ask the question because in THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE last week, there is a picture of a "Monument to St. Thomas à Kempis at Zwolle."—H. B. F. (Hastings).

Answers

LITERATURE

DEDICATIONS.—The dedication of books is exhaustively treated in Mr. Henry B. Wheatley's "Dedication of Books to Patron and Friend, &c.," published in "The Book-Lover's Library," by Elliott Stock, in 1887. Another book which should be consulted is Mr. W. C. Hazlitt's "Prefaces, Dedications, Epistles, selected from Early English Books, &c.," printed for private circulation (50 copies only) in 1874.—Henry T. Folkard (Wigan).

ORIGIN OF RHYME.—Rhyme was not used either by Kelts or by the early Norsemen, and, as an accompaniment of verse, cannot be traced farther back among European nations than to the rymours of Normandy, the troubadours of Provence, the minnesingers of Germany, and the monks, who, after the fall of the Roman Empire, added rhyming terminations to the Latin metres which were chanted or sung in the Church service. The early Anglo-Saxon poetry is without rhymes, but it is sometimes used in the later. The early Spanish ballads sometimes have rhymes, sometimes only assonances, and sometimes, as in the old romance "The Cid," are without either.—A. R. B.

"PROSERPINA."—The story will be found in Ovid's "Metamorphoses," Lib. v.:

"Quo dum Proserpina luco
Ludit, et aut violas, aut candida lilia carpit;
Dumque puellari studio calathosque vinumque
Implet, et ocellales certat superare legendos;
Pene simul viva est, dilectaque, raptaque Diti:
Usque adeo prope amor. Deo terribilis moesta
Et matrem, et comites, sed matrem vapius, ore
Clamat; et utrumvis vestem laniarat ab ora,
Collecti flores lunicis cecidere remissis."

It is interesting to notice the words in italics (including the proper name "Dis") occur in the Shakespeare passage, suggesting that the poet had these very lines in his mind. Further on we have the "wagon" (currus).—Index.

"DOGBERRY."—The misapplication of words seems to have originated with Shakespeare's "Love's Labour's Lost," with the flattering burlesque of the illiterate who vain would, but cannot, speak impressively in the person of "Dull, a Constable." See also the "Two Gentlemen of Verona" (Launce) and "Henry V." (the Hostess). Shillaber's "Mrs. Partington" and Sketchley's "Mrs. Brown" have apparently exhausted the "funny" capacities so far as further imitations are concerned.—S. C.

"TERPANDER'S BIRD."—In Messrs. Smith, Elder's complete edition of Browning's works, in 2 vols., a footnote explains: "Terpander, a famous Lesbian musician and lyric poet B.C. 670." Classical dictionaries add that his birth-place, Antissa, was famous for its nightingales.—S. C.

"SILURIST."—Henry Vaughan, "Silurist" poet, 1632-1695, assumed the title of "Silurist," which had a geographical meaning. "Silures," Aubrey states, "contained Brecknockshire, Herefordshire, &c." ("Aubrey's Lives").—Henry T. Folkard.

[Similar replies from M. A. C., C. R. S. (Bury), and S. C. (Hove).]

AUTHOR FOUND.—The author of the quotation—

"Farewell, may no thought pierce thy breast of thy treason, Farewell and be happy in Hubert's embrace," &c. &c., is Andrew Lang. It occurs in his "Essays in Little" in the essay on Thomas Haynes Bailey.—F. E. G.

GENERAL

GENERAL WADE.—General Wade—the same who commanded the English Army in the rebellion of '45—was sent in 1724 to reconnoitre the Highlands, and his report to the English Government as to the measures he considered necessary for the civilization of the country resulted in his being appointed Commander-in-Chief in Scotland. In 1738 he commenced the construction of those important military roads which brought the inmost fastnesses in the North and West of Scotland within touch of the rest of Great Britain. His engineering triumphs are recorded in the historic bull—

"Had you seen these roads before they were made
You would lift up you hands and bless General Wade," which was inscribed on an obelisk which formerly stood on the road between Inverness and Inverary. Forty stone bridges were also built by Wade's "highway-men," as he facetiously termed his working soldiers.—M. A. C.

[Similar replies from C. R. S. (Bury) and H. R. S.]

*"CHURCH WINDOW."—The conceit is evidently a rather too literal interpretation of our Lord's repeated adjuration: "Except ye become as one of these, ye cannot enter the kingdom of heaven," "Ye must be born again," &c.—H. R. S.

THE GLASSENURRY THORN.—Glassebury, now Glastonbury, is near Wells in Somersetshire, in the ancient Isle of Avalon. It is said to be the site of the first British Christian settlement. Legend tells how, after the Crucifixion and burial of the Lord Jesus, Joseph of Arimathea, with twelve companions, set out from Jerusalem, bearing with them the holy Grael, and coming to the Isle of Avalon, received from the heathen prince Arvirgus—

"an isle of marsh whereon to build,
And there he built with wattles from the marsh
A little lonely church."

And planting there his staff as a sign that his pilgrimage was over, it took root, and throwing out leaves and shoots, became a tree of thorn, which every year as Christmas Day came round burst into blossom, caring not for snow or frost, in perpetual remembrance of the Infant Christ.—M. A. C.

[Similar replies from C. R. S. (Bury) and H. B. F. (Hastings).]

*"COUNTING-OUT" VERSE.—Ena, dena, diner, &c., are corrupted forms of the Welsh numerals; but no two versions ever agree fully, and are variously known as drover's sheep scoring numbers, put mnemonically and self adapted to individual usage. I met with them at a Kentish preparatory school seventy years ago; but they were first publicly discussed by the late Mr. A. J. Ellis; see THE ACADEMY for February 1874. For comparison, the following list may suffice:—Ena, den, diner; oin (Irish), dan (Irish), teora (Irish), un (Welsh), dou (Welsh), tri (Welsh); ein (German), tein, tethera; in, tin, tethera; aina, tyan, tethera; yan, taen, tedderte; yaena, taena, teddera. These were all taken down orally from illiterate men, but the family likeness is well preserved.—A. Hall.

[Reply also from L. F. (Oxford).]

*"COUNTING-OUT" VERSES.—My childish version of the old "counting-out" rhyme differed slightly from that of "Pet Marjorie," being longer and more elaborate. It was as follows:—

"Wonery, twoery, tickery, seven;
Alibi, crackaby, ten and eleven;
Pin, pan, musky-dan,
Twiddle-um, twoddle-um, twenty-one;
Black fish, white trout,
Korie, orie, I say,
That you shall be put out
Of this G, A, M, E,
Which spells game game, game."

It never occurred to me to wonder how I had learnt the odd old jingle.—F. A. H.

*NOT FIT TO HOLD A CANDLE.—Your correspondent "M. T." (Ilkley) is wrong in attributing to Byron the epigram on Handel and Buononcini. Its author is John Byrom (1692-1763), poet and stenographer.—M. A. C.

NOTE.—Several correspondents send questions which are readily answered by reference to the "National Dictionary of Biography," or similarly easily accessible works in any public library. Others ask for well-known lines from authors which should be in every private library, giving as an excuse that they have for the moment escaped their memory. There is no space in these columns for such questions.

PRIZES.—The asterisks denote the two questions and two answers to which prizes have been awarded. The winners can obtain, on application at the following booksellers, Five Shillings' worth of books. Notices have been despatched to the several winners and to the four booksellers whose names follow:—

Mr. Elijah Johnson, 30, Trinity Street, Cambridge.
Mr. Alex. Black, 18, Island Street, Galashiels, N.B.
Messrs. Crowe and Brash, 92, Heaton Road, Newcastle-on-Tyne.
Messrs. Miles and Co., 95, Upper Street, Islington, N.

STATEMENTS have been circulating to the effect that the recent issue of Second Debenture Stock by the British Electric Traction Company, Limited, was not a success, and the price of the Shares has been falling in consequence. As a matter of fact the issue was entirely underwritten by responsible Firms, and the failure of the Public to take up the whole of the Stock offered does not affect the financial position of the Company in the least degree, as of course it will get its capital just as if the Public had subscribed for the whole issue.

The Far East — Books to Read Now

Mr. Heinemann begs to announce the publication of two important works touching the Far East Question.

For JAPAN, CHINA, KOREA, and SIBERIA,

Read The World's History.—Vol. II.

The 2nd Volume of this work (of which Volumes I., III., IV. and VII. have already appeared) is now ready, and deals with the territories and peoples at present forming the Stage and Dramatis Personæ of one of the Greatest Dramas of the World's History.

The Myths, Gods and Heroes, Religions, Dynasties, Social and Political development, aims and ideals of the various pure and blended races, as well as the geographical configuration (aided by the most recent maps) and climatic conditions of the countries they occupy, are described with the greatest literary skill and historical accuracy. This Volume will be found a sine quâ non to those desirous of understanding fully the factors which have contributed to the great awakening of an Eastern people to the consciousness of its mission of Civilization.

A SECOND EDITION OF

KOREA.

By ANGUS HAMILTON.

15s. net.

This Book, fresh from the pen of an Eye-witness of the social and political condition and customs of the Koreans and their destined lords, the Japs, has attracted so much attention during the past two weeks that the whole of the First Edition has been exhausted. To understand the Hermit Kingdom this book is a necessity.

WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, London, W.C.

A NEW EDITION.

JOURNEY TO LHASA AND CENTRAL TIBET.

By SARAT CHANDRA DAS, C.I.E., of the Bengal Educational Service, Member of the Asiatic Society, Bengal, &c.
With Map and Illustrations. 1emy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

[Just out.]

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

MARLBOROUGH'S "SELF-TAUGHT" SERIES of EUROPEAN and ORIENTAL LANGUAGES.

Contains Travel-Talk for Railway, Steamboat, Customs, Hotel, Naval and Military Terms, &c., Vocabularies and Grammar, &c., with ENGLISH PHONETIC PRONUNCIATION.

RUSSIAN NORWEGIAN
SWEDISH
DANISH

Self-Taught.

Wrapper, 2/- each;
cloth, 2/8 each.

HINDUSTAN EGYPTIAN ARABIC TURKISH

Self-Taught.

Wrapper, 2/- each;
cloth, 2/8 each.

E. MARLBOROUGH & Co., Publishers, LONDON, E.C.

DRAMATIC STORIES IN VERSE.

By OSWALD CRAWFURD, Author of "The Ways of The Millionaire."

TWO MASQUES. Crown 4to, price 5s. net.

THE SIN OF PRINCE ELADANE. Crown 8vo, price 2s. 6d.

From the Daily Chronicle.—"Mr. Oswald Crawford has shown the way to a new field for verse that should prove rich in fruit of a modest but very attractive kind."

PUBLISHED BY CHAPMAN & HALL, Ltd., 11, Henrietta Street, London.

The Truth About the German Army.

TOLD BY

LIEUT. BILSE,

who is now suffering six months' imprisonment in the fortress of Metz for telling it. His novel has been suppressed by the German Government, but truth flourishes under persecution, and over half-a-million copies have been sold on the Continent, translated into various languages.

MAGNA EST VERITAS ET PRAEVALEBIT.

An English Translation of Lieutenant BILSE's Novel will appear next week, entitled:

LIFE IN A GARRISON TOWN

LIFE IN A GARRISON TOWN

LIFE IN A GARRISON TOWN

(Aus Einer Kleinen Garnison.)

With a Portrait of the Author, a Summary of his Court-Martial, and an Introduction by ARNOLD WHITE.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

JOHN LANE, PUBLISHER, LONDON & NEW YORK.

"THE TIMES" LITERARY SUPPLEMENT.

A Special Literary Supplement is published with The Times on Friday. This Supplement is an impartial and authoritative organ of literary criticism and a comprehensive and trustworthy medium of literary intelligence. It can be had with The Times of Friday alone.

Subscriptions, inclusive of postage, for The Times of Friday:—

	3 Months.	6 Months.	12 Months.
Inland ...	3s. 3d.	6s. 6d.	13s. 0d.
Foreign ...	4s. 4d.	8s. 8d.	17s. 4d.

CONTENTS OF FRIDAY, FEB. 26, 1904.

Literature.

English Literature and Society in the Eighteenth Century.
The Diary of Sir John Moore.
The Russian Advance.
Prolegomena to the Study of Greek Religion.
The Origins of Ernest Renan.
Political Theories of the Middle Ages.
The Windsor Armoury.
Studies in Shakespeare.

Literature—continued.

Highways and Byways in Sussex—
Thackeray's Critical Papers—
Prof. Tylor's Primitive Culture—
The Worship of the Dead.

Art.

The Portraiture of Mary Queen of Scots.
The Art of the Italian Renaissance.
Science.
Observations of a Naturalist in the Pacific.

"THE TIMES" LITERARY SUPPLEMENT is also sold with the Mail, or

"THE TIMES" WEEKLY EDITION, upon payment of an additional penny.

Address THE PUBLISHER, The Times,
Printing House Square, London, E.C.

SMITH, ELDER & Co.'s NEW BOOKS.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF
Mr. SIDNEY LEE'S "QUEEN VICTORIA."

With Portraits, Map, and Facsimile Letter,
crown 8vo, 6s.

QUEEN VICTORIA: A Biography.

By SIDNEY LEE,

Editor of "The Dictionary of National Biography."

Scotsman.—"Mr. Lee's Life of Queen Victoria stepped, immediately on its first appearance, into the position of a standard work of biography on both sides of the Atlantic. . . . A handsome new 'popular' edition should bring the book to the knowledge and possession of a wider circle of readers at home and abroad."

Athenaeum.—"Pending the production of the authoritative biography written by royal command, we cannot conceive, indeed, that a more satisfactory account of the Queen's unselfish labours can possibly be produced."

NOW READY, with 2 Coloured Plates, 32 Illustrations, including 2 Portraits of the Author, and a Sketch Map, demy 8vo, 14s. net.

A NATURALIST IN THE GUIANAS.

By EUGENE ANDRÉ, F.R.G.S.,
F.S.A., F.Z.S.

*The author is orchid hunter for the Hon. W. Rothschild. The volume relates his perilous travels on an unexplored tributary of the Orinoco.

WITH A PREFACE BY Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD.

NOW READY, demy 8vo, 16s.

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE NEW TESTAMENT.

By Prof. A. JÜLICHER.

Translated by JANET PENROSE WARD.

In this work Prof. Jülicher gives an account, first, of each separate document of the New Testament, going into such questions as authorship, date, and the circumstances under which it was written; next, of the gradual rise of the Canon; and lastly, of the main features of Textual History. His standpoint throughout is that of the free historical inquirer, and he has devoted special attention to the intricate problem of the authorship of the Johannine Writings. The points of agreement and difference between him and Dr. Harnack will be found of great interest to the student.

THE CORNHILL MAGAZINE For MARCH. Price One Shilling.

CONTENTS:

- THE TRUANTS.—Chaps. 7-9. By A. E. W. MASON.
COLONIAL MEMORIES.—III. A Modern New Zealand. By LADY BROOM.
DEBITA FLACCO. By E. H. PEMBER, K.O.
HISTORICAL MYSTERIES.—III. The Case of Allan Breck. By ANDREW LANG.
HERBERT SPENCER. By HECTOR MACPHERSON.
A DAY OF MY LIFE IN THE COUNTY COURT. By His Honour JUDGE PARRY.
THE STRUCTURE OF A CORAL REEF. By Prof. T. G. BONNEY, F.R.S.
FRENCH HOUSEKEEPING. By Miss BETHAM-EDWARDS.
A HUNGRY HEART. By HUGH CLIFFORD, C.M.G.
BALLADE OF ST. MARTIN'S CLOCK. By L. H.
THE WRECK OF THE "WAGER." By W. J. FLETCHER.
THE POWDER BLUE BARON. By Mrs. ALFRED SIDGWICK.

LONDON:

SMITH, ELDER & Co., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS.

THE MONEY-MAKER. By GEORGE OHNET. Translated by F. LEES. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s. [March 10.]

WHAT OUGHT SHE TO DO? By FLORENCE WARDEN. Author of "The House by the Marsh." Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s. [March 17.]

V.C.: A Chronicle of Castle Barfield and of the Crimea. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY. Author of "Despair's Last Journey." Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.
"Brisk and spirited. . . . sure to be enjoyed by everyone who takes it up."—Scotsman.

PATSEY THE OMADAUN. By M. MCD. BODKIN. Author of "Dora Myrl, the Lady Detective." Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.
"Racy of the soil, and almost as good as Lover's classic 'Handy Andy.'"—Outlook.

THE ORANGE GIRL. By WALTER BESANT. With eight Illustrations by F. PEGRAM. A NEW EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.
"Sir Walter Besant at his very best."—Guardian.

THE WOMAN OF MYSTERY. By G. OHNET. Translated by F. ROTHWELL. A New Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.
"A good story."—T. P.'s Weekly.

THE CAT'S-PAW. By B. M. CROKER. Author of "Diana Barrington." With 12 Illustrations by F. PEGRAM. A New Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. [March 3.]
"An exceptionally clever novel."—Times.

YOUNG MRS. CAUDLE. By GEORGE R. SIMS. Author of "Mary Jane's Memoirs." Fcap. 8vo, 1s. cloth, 1s. 6d.
"It does a man good to read such a book."—Referee.

MARSH-COUNTRY RAMBLES. By HERBERT W. TOMPKINS. Author of "Highways and Byways in Hertfordshire." With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s. [March 3.]

BRITISH VIOLIN-MAKERS. Classical and Modern. By the Rev. W. MEREDITH MORRIS, B.A., A.T.S. With numerous Illustrations, Portraits, and Facsimiles. Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 10s. 6d. net.

A CONSPIRACY UNDER THE TERROR: Marie Antoinette—Toulon—Jarjays. By PAUL GAULOT. Translated by CHARLES LAROCHE, M.A. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, with Illustrations and Facsimiles, 6s. [Shortly.]

PHIL MAY'S SKETCH-BOOK. Containing 54 characteristic Caricoms by the famous Humorous Artist. A New Edition. Large folio, cloth, 2s. 6d.

ELIZA'S HUSBAND. By BARRY FAIR. Author of "Eliza," &c. Fcap. 8vo, picture cover, 1s. cloth, 1s. 6d.

THE FOOLISH VIRGINS. By ALFRED SUTRO. Author of "Women in Love." Fcap. 8vo, picture cover, 1s. cloth, 1s. 6d.

A PRODIGAL'S PROGRESS. By FRANK BARNETT. A NEW EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

MANY WAYS OF LOVE. By FRED. WHI-HAW. With 8 Illustrations by WARWICK GOBLE and B. SCHUMACHER. A New Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

NEW TWO-SHILLING NOVELS.
Picture cloth, flat backs.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY MIRACLE. By LOUIS ZANGWILL.

ZAMBRA THE DETECTIVE. By HEADON HILL.

WANTED! By DICK DONOVAN.

POPULAR SIXPENNY BOOKS.

ROME. By EMILE ZOLA.

NO NAME. By WILKIE COLLINS.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

MACMILLAN & Co.'s NEW BOOKS.

New Book by the Author of "Elizabeth and Her German Garden."

THE ADVENTURES OF ELIZABETH IN RUEGEN.

With Map. Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Times.—"There is nothing whatever to say about it except that it is delightful."

HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS IN
SUSSEX. By E. V. LUCAS. With Illustrations by FREDERICK L. GRIGGS. Extra Crown 8vo, with flat back and gilt top, 6s.

Punch.—"A charming volume. My Baronite fancies the next best thing to going on a little tour through Sussex is to sit down and read Mr. Lucas's chat about its highways and byways, the eye dwelling with pleasure on the sketches of Mr. Griggs."

GATHERED POEMS OF ERNEST MYERS.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

MACMILLAN'S EDITION OF DICKENS. Reprints of the First Editions, with Introductions, Biographical and Bibliographical, by CHARLES DICKENS, the Younger. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. per vol.

NEW VOLUME.

GREAT EXPECTATIONS AND HARD TIMES.

MACMILLAN'S EDITION OF THACKERAY.

NEW VOLUME.

CRITICAL PAPERS IN
ART. STUBBS'S CALENDAR. BARBER COX. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 3s. 6d.

MACMILLAN'S ILLUSTRATED
POCKET CLASSICS.
NEW VOLUMES.

Foolscap 8vo, cloth, 2s. net; or in leather limp, 3s. net.

CORIDON'S SONG: and other Verses from various Sources. With Introduction by A. DOBSON, and Illustrations by HUGH THOMSON.

DAYS WITH SIR ROGER DE COVERLEY.

With Illustrations by HUGH THOMSON.

March Numbers Now Ready.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.

Price 1s. Annual Subscription, post free, 12s.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE. ILLUSTRATED.

Price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, post free, 16s.

The MARCH Number contains:—

A VISIT TO BISMARK. By HENRY VILLARD.
THACKERAY'S FRIENDSHIP WITH AN AMERICAN FAMILY.—V. Unpublished Letters, including Letters to Miss Libby Strong. (Conclusion.) By W. M. THACKERAY.
THE SEA-WOLF.—III. By JACK LONDON, Author of "The Call of the Wild," &c.
And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE FOR CHILDREN.

ST. NICHOLAS.

Price 1s. Annual Subscription, post free, 12s.

The MARCH Number contains:—

TWO LADS OF OLD KENTUCKY. Story. By V. Y. REMNITZ.
THE "BLACKSMITH NATION"; or, the Story of a Bar of Iron. By W. B. HARWOOD.
A COMEDY IN WAX. Serial Story. By B. L. FARJEON.
And numerous other Stories for the Young.

MACMILLAN & Co., Limited, London.

The Academy and Literature

No. 1660. Established 1869. London: 27 February 1904.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17/6 a year.]

Literary Notes

THE movement for an adequate memorial to Shakespeare in London bids fair to prove successful, if we may judge from the energy and enthusiasm of those who have the matter in hand and at heart. I take this opportunity of correcting an error in last week's notes on this subject: the name of the gentleman who has already generously promised large monetary assistance should have been given as Mr. Richard Badger.

would neither live nor last, we have enough theatres already at which, if need be, Shakespeare representations could now and again be organised. A Shakespeare theatre would be a commercial enterprise, holding forth no possibility of financial success.

THE institute suggested in last week's ACADEMY would, I believe, both live and last. I see it in my mind's eye as a

ONE OF THE SUGGESTED SITES FOR THE LONDON SHAKESPEARE MEMORIAL

[Photo. Booker and Sullivan, Chancery Lane.]

THERE will, of course, be differences of opinion as to what will be the best form for the memorial to take, but such differences will surely cease when some definite scheme has been carefully elaborated and put before the public; then all, whatever may be their private pet projects, must heartily support the scheme adopted. For my own part I desire to see a living, lasting memorial; a statue will last, but once unveiled will rapidly descend into a mere item in guide-books, visited by a few Londoners, stray Americans and other visitors. A theatre centre of Shakespeare enthusiasm and scholarship, a meeting place for students and a proud possession of London citizens. I trust I shall be forgiven for going somewhat into detail. First of all as to architecture: can there be any doubt that the building should be in Tudor style, such a building as Shakespeare must have seen in his own London? Then as to accommodation: a good entrance hall, which might be decorated with replicas of the statues and busts of the poet; then sufficient rooms for a library, galleries for pictures, accommodation for the librarian and keeper, and spare ground for future extension. In the library should be gathered together all editions of the plays and poems, works of every character dealing with them and books treating of Shakespeare's London. In the picture gallery and museum copies of the portraits of Shakespeare, portraits of critics, commentators and players, pictures, maps, plans and relics of Shakespeare's London. The large gallery should be sufficiently commodious to seat a considerable audience for costume recitals of the plays, for meetings of societies, lectures, assemblies and so forth.

THEN the stern money side of the question. If a demand be made by a large body of representative citizens the London County Council, it is to be hoped, would see its way to make a grant of sufficient ground out of that now being cleared between Westminster and Lambeth, for the Shakespeare Institute should look out upon Shakespeare's beloved Thames. Then money will be wanted for the building and for an endowment fund for maintenance, salary of the librarian and keeper, &c., &c.; £200 or £300 a year from the County Council would not be felt by the ratepayers, but would break the back of the necessary endowment; a further source of income would be the letting of the large gallery to associations, Shakespeare societies and other bodies, and a small fee—6d.—might be charged to visitors to the galleries. The library should be under much the same regulations as the British Museum. A separate fund would probably have to be raised for the purchase of books.

SUCH an institute as that outlined above would, I believe, prove beneficial and popular; its usefulness would increase from year to year; it would be a living memorial. But whatever scheme it be decided to put forward, there can be no question that London should have a worthy memorial of her greatest citizen, a memorial of the man, the poet, the dramatist, the actor and of his London. We have many splendid buildings still in our midst which adorned Elizabethan London, as recent illustrations in THE ACADEMY have shown; few are the passers-by who even glance at them, thinking that Shakespeare looked upon them too. Fewer still are those who realise how much we know of Shakespeare's London, how detailed is the knowledge of it we can obtain from contemporary books and pamphlets, maps and views, and for the right understanding of Shakespeare's plays an intimate knowledge of Shakespeare's London is essential. Therefore it is fitting that this proposed memorial should be a memorial not only of the great citizen but of the great city in which he dwelt.

I GIVE, on the previous page, a view of one of the sites suggested for the Shakespeare Memorial: it is close to Lambeth Bridge; the view is taken looking from the river, Romney Street is on the right and Horseferry Road is to the left, outside the picture. There is another possible site to the north of Romney Street, larger some three times than that in our view.

STILL in regard to the Shakespeare memorial, I regret to see that Mr. Sidney Lee has lent the weight of his name to the proposal to found a Shakespeare theatre and school of dramatic art. Such a scheme is not a memorial in the ordinary sense of the word, but a commercial undertaking of a very risky nature. As to the site, Mr. Lee renews the old suggestion of selecting a position in Kingsway; has he considered the cost? He admits the scheme to be expensive and adds to the cost by making the impractical suggestion that the scene storehouse, &c., should be attached to the playhouse! Why waste money thus? The idea of a repertoire theatre should be kept quite distinct from that of the Shakespeare memorial. One more point: does Mr. Lee really believe that he can see Shakespeare better acted in France than in England?

THE First Annual Meeting of the London Shakespeare League was held on Tuesday, the 23rd, a large number of members being present. The chair was taken by Mr. T. Fairman Ordish. Next week I hope to refer in detail to the League and its work.

DWELLERS by the Clyde are intensely proud of the place their turbid river has taken in the annals of steam navigation, and two books which are to be issued in the spring should give them some justification for their pride. One of these is "The Rise and Progress of the Clyde Passenger Steamer during the Nineteenth Century," written by Captain James Williamson, the manager of the Caledonian Steam Packet Company, who will begin his narrative with the paddle-propelled steamer "Comet," launched in 1812, and associated with the name of Henry Bell, and will close it with the description of the turbine "King Edward," launched in 1901. Between these dates he will have to chronicle the building of over 300 steamers for the Clyde passenger service alone; but the volume will be relieved from technical dryness by the author's reminiscences of men and of the growth of the towns along the coast following on their increased accessibility by steamboat.

THE other volume is biographical in character, but it also will exhibit a phase in the evolution of marine engineering on the Clyde. It is "The Life of Robert Napier," written by Mr. James Napier, and to be published by Messrs. Blackwood. The claim to recognition of Robert Napier, the Dumbarton blacksmith, is not so much that he made the reputation of the river as an engineering centre, as that in the capacity to which he subsequently rose, of adviser to the Admiralty, he counselled the discarding of wooden vessels for the Navy and their replacement by iron ships, of which the first were built by his own firm. The sailor is proverbially superstitiously conservative and the introduction of iron ships was strenuously opposed; but perhaps we must go to America for the concrete objection to the change. Admiral Farragut, the commander of the Federal Western Gulf Squadron, was urged by his government to use an iron ship, but he resolutely refused, saying he declined to "be sent to hell in a tea-kettle."

AN addition to the growing catalogue of books treating of place-names is likewise promised by Messrs. Blackwood in the "Influence of the Pre-Reformation Church on Scottish Place-Names." The author is Mr. J. M. Mackinlay, and his aim has been to trace the influence of the Church in local nomenclature in the light of philology, history, topography, ecclesiology and folk-lore. The great bulk of the material of which the volume will be made up has already appeared as newspaper articles.

THE Glasgow Society of Artists, a small body of the younger art-workers of the city which has Mr. John Hassall for president, has a dainty little show at present open in Sauchiehall Street. The exhibits number just over seventy, and are marked by a high standard of excellence, with here and there an evidence of the extravagance of youth. Not a few of the exhibitors are ladies, including Miss Bessie Macnicol, Miss Jessie King, Miss H. Paxton Brown and Miss D. Carleton Smith. Mr. Hassall shows his "All the King's Horses and all the King's Men," Mr. Tom Browne has two pictures, and other leading exhibitors are Mr. Harry Spence, Mr. R. Russell Macnee and the brothers Orr.

MR. GEORGE MEREDITH has practically recovered from his recent illness, and although not as strong as he would like to be, is much more himself again than he has been for some time past. He is still staying with his daughter, Mrs. Sturgis, at Leatherhead, and on fine days may often be met in the streets of the little town usually driving in a donkey-chair. Mr. Meredith is not now writing and indeed does not intend devoting himself to hard work for some time to come.

"THE AWAKENING OF MRS. CARSTAIRS" is the title of a novel which will be issued next month by Mr. Morton, of Edinburgh. The authoress, who chooses to be known as Olivia Roy, is, we understand, the wife of a well-known author moving in London literary and artistic circles. The story tells, in diary form, of the awakening, by another man, of the emotions of a young woman whose marriage was based on no deeper feeling than friendship for the man who was her husband. The identity of Olivia Roy is likely to cause some speculation.

THE large number of letters written to THE ACADEMY, expressing thanks for the articles recently printed therein upon University Extension, testify to the general sense that though much has been accomplished much more remains to be done. Apparently it is felt that although lectures are very good things in their way they are not the beginning and end of education; it is felt that something should be done to organise students and to make learning for them living and interesting. Also it is felt that although there are already many centres there should be many more, that there should be more continuity in the teaching and that every effort should be made to teach those in outlying districts as well as those in the great centres; also that an endeavour should be made to render practically useful for educational purposes the large number of museums and free libraries with which the country is studded.

How are these aims to be achieved? First, by more complete organisation, by turning into one main stream the many scattered efforts which are already at work; London, Oxford, Cambridge, Birmingham, Manchester and other centres should work together. The Central Association of University Extension Students has made a good start upon this work of unification and if it meets with the support it deserves should soon become the unifying body which is required. Already amongst its supporters are Lord Reay, its President, Lord Avebury, Sir Martin Conway (Cambridge), Dr. Emil Reich, the Bishop of Ripon, Sir Henry Roscoe, and Mr. T. H. Warren (President of Magdalen College). The good work of utilising our public collections has been started by Dr. Emil Reich and Major Martin Hume in their lectures at the British Museum.

BUT to be successful this Association must become the head of a national not of a local movement, and those who are willing to assist in increasing the scope and usefulness of the University Extension movement will be well advised to put themselves in immediate touch with the Central Association. Full details of its objects and the work it has already accomplished can be obtained from the honorary secretary, Mr. Max Judge, 7, Pall Mall, London, S.W.

MR. GEORGE MOORE makes some quaint "avowals" in this month's "Pall Mall Magazine." It would take too long and possibly not prove edifying to discuss all his statements, but to one or two of the most curious I may be forgiven for drawing attention. For "The Imaginary Portraits" Mr. Moore would give all Browning; luckily he has not the power to do so. Then we read, "I think Fielding was the first English author about whom it can be said that he sat down to write for money." Of course Mr. Moore may say anything he likes, but no one can accept the truth of the above wild statement; let us remember Shakespeare and his fellow playwrights; did they write for art's sake alone? Thackeray "seems to us to-day no more than an eminently respectable and commonplace person"; dear, dear! "The English novel began with Fielding and ended with Jane Austen"; again, dear, dear! But really Mr. Moore must not poke fun at us in this way, he should remember that some of his readers may take his funning for earnest.

It is not often the case that the loss of one man throws a shadow over so wide an area of the intellectual field as did the death of S. Arthur Strong at the early age of forty. Librarian of the House of Lords, as well as to the Dukes of Devonshire and Portland, Professor of Arabic at University College, London, as well as Lecturer in Assyriology there and at Cambridge, his official duties were many and exacting. He had devoted no small amount of work to Oriental studies. He published in 1891, for the Pali Text Society, the editio princeps of the Mahā Bodhi Vamsa, a difficult but valuable history written in Pali prose of the so-called Tree of Wisdom. Soon after this important work was finished, Mr. Strong devoted his attention more closely to Arabic and Assyriology. In the "Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society" there appeared, in 1891 and 1892, several articles on Assyrian Texts, in which he showed a mastery of the subject. To the new series of the "Records of the Past," edited by Professor Sayce, he contributed a number of translations. To the "Proceedings of the Society of Biblical Archaeology" he contributed, in Vol. XVI., 1894, a note on a fragment of the Adapa-Legend; in Vol. XVII., 1895, an additional note on the Adapa-Legend, some Assyrian Alliterative Texts. To "Delitzsch and Haupt's Beiträge zur Assyriologie," Vol. II., he sent a valuable article on Some Oracles to Esarhaddon and Assurbanipal, 1894. To the "Assyrian and Babylonian Record" he sent A Prayer of Assurbanipal and Three Cuneiform Texts, in 1892. The "Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society" for 1895 contains the Arabic text of a history of Kilwa, with a critical introduction and analysis. The text of the "Futūḥ al Habashah, or Conquest of Abyssinia by Shihāb al Dīn Ahmad," was published in 1894; and for some time before his death Mr. Strong is known to have engaged upon an edition of an Arabic history of Jakenak, Sultan of Egypt.

THESE published works would constitute a creditable record by themselves, but as noticed in The Times of January 19, Mr. Strong was also contributing to widely different branches of literature and art. The present writer had the privilege of attending for a short while his Cambridge lectures on Assyriology and was struck with his exceptional teaching ability. He knew exactly where to distinguish the difficulty inherent in the subject from that due to ignorance or insufficient preparation. Hence every lesson was a real stride forward in the acquisition of knowledge. He never lost his interest in classics which had been his subject for his degree.

AMONGST others controlled by the International Copyright Bureau are works by Goldberger, Bishenden, Arthur Schnitzler and other well-known continental authors and playwrights.

Bibliographical

IT may be of some interest and utility if, with reference to the lamented death of Sir Leslie Stephen, I give a chronological list—fairly complete, I think—of his published volumes or brochures. The first and second of these, apparently, belong to the year 1865, in which he issued "Sketches from Cambridge, by a Don," and "'The Times' on the American War." After these came the following works, large and small: "The Playground of Europe" (1871, re-issued 1894 and 1899), "Free Thinking and Plain Speaking" (1873), "Hours in a Library" (in three series, 1874, 1876, and 1879, re-issued 1892), "The History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century" (1876, third edition 1902), "Johnson" (in "English Men of Letters" series, 1878), "Pope" (in the same series, 1880), "The Science of Ethics" (1882), "Swift" (in the "English Men of Letters" series, 1882), "Life of Henry Fawcett" (1885), "What is Materialism?" (1886), "An Agnostic's Apology and other Essays" (1893, re-issued 1903), "Social Rights and Duties" (1893), "Life of Sir James F. Stephen" (1895), "Studies of a Biographer" (1898 and 1902), "The English Utilitarians" (1900), "Religion and Ethics" (1900), "George Eliot" (in the "English Men of Letters" series, 1902), and "English Literature and Society in the Eighteenth Century" (1904). He wrote, further, a prefatory chapter to the works of Samuel Richardson (1883), a biographical preface to Margaret Veley's "A Marriage of Shadows" (1888), a memoir of J. D. Campbell prefixed to his "Coleridge" (1896), a prefatory note to E. Legouis' "Early Life of Wm Wordsworth" (1897), an introduction to James Payn's "The Backwater of Life" (1899), an "In Memoriam" for the memoir of George Smith, the publisher (1902), and an introduction to "The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table" (1903). He was the editor of the works of Fielding (1882), W. K. Clifford's "Lectures and Essays" (1886, re-issued 1901), and the "Letters of J. R. Green" (1901). I need not dwell upon his editorship of the "Cornhill" and "The Dictionary of National Biography," and I do not profess to record his fugitive contributions to periodical literature.

I remember being rather taken with a little two-stanza lyric which appeared in Mr. Ernest Myers' volume of "Poems" in 1877. It ran as follows:—

Stay me no more; the flowers have ceased to blow,
The frost begun;
Stay me no more; I will arise and go,
My dream is done.
My feet are set upon a sterner way,
And I must on;
Love, thou hast dwelt with me a summer day,
Now, Love, begone.

I was a young man at the time, and this pleased me. Now, in my middle age, I open the "Gathered Poems of Ernest Myers," just issued, only to find my old favourite transmogrified into this:—

Hold us not here; the flowers have ceased to blow,
The frost begun;
Hold us not here; we will arise and go,
The dream is done.
Our feet are set upon a sterner way,
And we must on;
Ease, thou has dwelt with us a summer day,
But now begone.

There is also a third stanza, wholly new to me. It is, no doubt, characteristic of the middle-aged Muse that in these later lines "ease" should be substituted for "love."

With reference to my paragraph last week re Mortimer Collins, an Acton correspondent writes to remind me that a volume of "Selections" from Collins' verse was published by Mr. Bentley eighteen years ago. I am aware of the fact, and have the volume before me at this moment. It does not, however, come up to my idea of a Collins anthology, for it includes too much of his more trivial work, and is, moreover, put together without (apparently) any definite plan. The compiler's loyalty has too often paralysed his judgment, and there is still room for a selection which shall be at once slighter and more choice. "Are you aware," remarks my correspondent, "that Mortimer Collins' name is not in the new edition of Chambers's 'Encyclopædia of English Literature'?" Neither," he adds, "are those of Edward Maitland (author of 'The Pilgrim and the Shrine'), H. D. Traill, A. J. C. Hare, Charles Gibbon, and others. Considering the names of many actual living people admitted, I think," says my correspondent, "this is extraordinary." It is.

The late Sir LESLIE STEPHEN

[Photo. Elliot & Fry, Baker St., W.]

Another correspondent, writing from Bristol, asks me to mention that the late Canon Ainger contributed to the volume called "Wordsworthiana" (Macmillan, 1889) two papers—one on "Wordsworth and Charles Lamb" and one on "The Poets who helped to form Wordsworth's Life"; also, that he wrote the memoirs of Alfred, Charles, and Frederick Tennyson, and of George Du Maurier (as well as of Lamb) in the "Dictionary of National Biography"—a fact very generally known. "It is to be hoped," adds my correspondent, "that some of his scattered contributions to literature may be given a more permanent form."

I note that announcement is made of a new novel which is to be called "Heart's Desire." That, obviously, is a good title; but it was used by Vanda Wathen-Bartlett as the name of a tale published by her in 1899, and that lady has therefore a prior claim to it.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews

La Fondation Thiers

LE ROMAN SOCIAL EN ANGLETERRE (1830-1850), DICKENS, DISRAELI, MRS. GASKELL, KINGSLEY. Par Louis Cazamian. NOVALIS : ESSAI SUR L'IDÉALISME ROMANTIQUE EN ALLEMAGNE. Par E. Spenlé. (Paris: Société Nouvelle de Librairie et d'Édition.)

THE literary lounge in Paris will readily call to mind that fine new building at the corner of the Rond Point Bugeaud, near the Porte Dauphine. It is the library and headquarters of the Thiers Foundation, a worthy memorial of a great man. At the death of Madame Thiers it was found that she had left a very considerable sum of money wherewith to perpetuate the name and fame of her husband, the first President of the French Republic. Her sister and heiress, Mlle. Dosne, carried out the wishes of the founder. Fifteen young students, under 26 years of age, are housed, fed, and granted a yearly pension so that they may pursue their occupations or studies independently of any lack of means. They remain in the institution for one, two, or three years, during which time they are expected to make some more or less important contribution to literature. These contributions, if judged to be worthy, are printed and published at the expense of the Foundation. During its eleven years of existence some sixty pensionnaires have passed through the institution, including legal, philosophical, philological, historical, geographical, medical, mathematical, and chemical students. A list of their published works forms an important addition to contemporary scientific literature. The works named at the head of this column are two fascicules issued by the Fondation Thiers, and they very worthily uphold the serious intentions and purposes of the Endowment.

M. Louis Cazamian is a very earnest, thorough and conscientious student of early and mid-Victorian literature, and has brought to his study of the contemporary novel a profound knowledge of the social and political circumstances of the period. He rightly attempts no nice appreciation of the literary styles and values of the four authors of whom he mainly treats—Dickens, Disraeli, Mrs. Gaskell, and Kingsley—but confines himself, very properly, to the conditions of public and private life which formed them, and which they in their turn helped to form, or at any rate, to influence. It is the work of the scholar and the historian, not the impression of the literary critic. He says, for instance, "Dickens is before everything else, a personality. His opinions are inseparable from his experience and his character. Only his biography explains to us the nature of his 'class sentiment,' and the complexity of his attitude towards society, made up as it was of tendencies contradictory in theory, but between which the temperament of the man established a sentimental bond." And again, in another passage: "The social teaching of Dickens is spread throughout his work. The thought of the misery, and the feeling of the inequalities between man and man, are never absent therefrom. Nowhere does his lightness of heart, or the happy spirit of the story, allow one to forget for long the sadness of class-struggles. The opposition of rich and poor forms the frame, sometimes hidden, but always present, of the dramatic and moral construction of his work."

M. Cazamian is no less happy with regard to Disraeli, whose "prodigious suppleness and faculty of assimilation enabled him to revive the most profound sentiments of the English public, and whose intuitive intelligence permitted him to understand and formulate the new requirements of the times. This sympathy, this conviction, were they sincere? A difficult, perhaps an insoluble question."

No student of history and literature can afford to disregard this important contribution to our knowledge of the period.

According to M. Spenlé, Novalis is the key to German Romanticism. Other contemporary writers, such as the brothers Schlegel, and Tieck (a trio of great Shakespearean scholars), may have covered a larger field in romantic literature, but not one of them succeeded in penetrating so far into its essential profundity as "Novalis." This thesis is arguable, although, as the author admits, "the works of Novalis are among the most enigmatic in German literature." Still it will be agreed by all that Novalis—more indirectly perhaps than directly—exercised a vast formative influence not only on the literature of his country, but even on the aspect of life, which was reflected far beyond the immediate geographical confines of Germany. Pessimism, irony, intuition and real sympathy with what he deemed to be the philosophy of nature, combined to give Novalis an unassailable place in the hierarchy of philosophers, and M. Spenlé has written a fascinatingly sound book on the man and his work. One may not always agree with his opinions and deductions, but one is bound to admit the sincerity and thoroughness of his dissertation. Novalis stands much where he stood before, but the new lights, the important part that his work played in its time, and the germs of philosophic truth which have since spread throughout the literature of the world, have not hitherto been so lucidly set forth.

"Junipère"

JUNIPER HALL. By Constance Hill. (Lane. 21s. net.)

NOT many, even of the most faithful students of Fanny Burney and her times, will recall without an effort the precise locality of Juniper Hall; and even when they have read Miss Constance Hill's explanatory sub-title, "A Rendezvous of Certain Illustrious Personages during the French Revolution, including Alexandre d'Arblay and Fanny Burney," they will still, it may be, wonder where Miss Hill has found material for this large and handsome volume. In Mr. Austin Dobson's delightful biography of the author of "Evelina," Juniper Hall is mentioned but once in the index, and scarcely more times in the text. But Miss Hill, as was shown in her agreeable book on "The Homes and Friends of Jane Austen," is a very pious worshipper of the genius loci, and her account of Juniper Hall is wanting neither in charm nor usefulness.

In the sad days which followed the deaths of Dr. Johnson and "Daddy" Crisp, Fanny Burney found evident comfort in frequent visits to the Locks at Norbury Park, and her sister, Mrs. Phillips, who was then established in a little cottage near the Park at Mickleham. Close at hand, in the valley of the Mole, was, and is, Juniper Hall, the not undignified mansion which has provided Miss Hill with a congenial theme and an attractive frontispiece—the latter engraved from a water-colour by Dibdin. Writing from Mickleham to Fanny, in 1792, Mrs. Phillips said: "We shall shortly, I believe, have a little colony of unfortunate (or, rather, fortunate, since they are safe) French noblesse in our neighbourhood. Sunday evening Ravelly informed Mr. Lock that two or three families had joined to take Jenkinson's house (Juniper Hall), and that another family had taken a small house at Westhumble, which the people very reluctantly let; upon the Christian-like supposition that, being nothing but French Papishies, they would never pay. Our dear Mr. Lock, while this was agitating, sent word to the landlord that he would be answerable for the rent." The family at Westhumble was that of Madame de Broglie, and the party at Juniper Hall included then the Marquise de la Châtre, M. de Norbonne, ex-Minister of War, M. de Jaucourt, and most important of all, M. Alexandre d'Arblay. Later came Madame de Staël and Talleyrand, then an attractive man who had scarcely reached middle age. Miss Hill is much given to recalling, with almost sentimental fervour, the joy with which she has gazed upon a house, or sat beneath a tree, in company with the ghosts of Fanny Burney and her friends; but it is easy to forgive her enthusiasm when one thinks of this brilliant little society, and of the dramatic contrast between the quiet hospitality of the Surrey village and the lurid horrors so narrowly escaped. No one would wish to pain Mr. Dobson or Miss Hill by saying that in the society of Madame de Staël and Talleyrand, one might without difficulty have forgotten the existence of Fanny Burney: yet it is true that the first half of Miss Hill's book would be just as interesting if it told nothing but the history of these émigrés. D'Arblay himself had been maréchal de camp and Adjutant-General to Lafayette, and, by the aid of many judicious quotations, Miss Hill presents him in a very engaging light, as a man profoundly loyal to his friends and his cause. "He has a sincerity, a frankness, an ingenuous openness of nature," wrote Fanny in the early days, "that I had been unjust enough to think could not belong to a Frenchman." Of the visits constantly interchanged between the residents, Miss Hill gives admirably vivacious descriptions; and when at last she comes to the episode of the love-affair between M. d'Arblay and Fanny, she writes with an obvious enjoyment of the situation that is—perhaps naturally—to seek in Mr. Dobson's more reticent pages. We hear all about the proposal, the acceptance, and Dr. Burney's reluctant consent; the walls of Camilla Cottage rise before our eyes "like an exhalation" out of the profits of that dull book which Horace Walpole called the "deplorable Camilla"; and one leaves the history of "Junipère," as some of the refugees called it, with real regret. Miss Hill has been at some pains to collect fresh material, epistolary and pictorial, for her pages, and in spite of some superfluous digressions and a certain fervency of phrase which it is no longer accurate to call feminine, her book is agreeably picturesque and stimulating.

SIDNEY THOMPSON.

Cruikshank as Painter

CRUIKSHANK'S WATER COLOURS. With introduction by Joseph Grego. (Black. 20s. net)

It was lately my very unpleasant duty, in these columns, to animadvert upon what seemed to me to be the ill-advised resurrection of certain unfortunate book illustrations from the pencil of the artist who was known to his friends and admirers as the "inimitable George." Considered unworthy of publication at the time of their execution some thirty or forty years ago, they were now presented to a public which knows him not, as good examples of his workmanship, nay more! as ranking him amongst the book-illustrators of genius. As a matter of fact they were, with two or three exceptions, as perfunctory and valueless as any work that Cruikshank ever did, and his greatest admirers must confess that when he was bad none emulated better than he the little girl with the curl on her forehead. Thus it was that a great reputation was in danger of being blown upon, and one of our able-men getting written down as vulgar, mechanical and incompetent.

The publication of the present volume fortunately goes some way towards redressing this grievance. It is therefore with the more satisfaction that I now find myself able to recommend, though not altogether without reservation, the beautiful volume which lies before me—a volume which it will be the pleasure of every good Cruikshankian to add to his already well-stocked shelves. For the opportunity to do so they must, I imagine, thank Mr. Joseph Grego, but they will not bless him for the turgid and inexpedient introduction with which he has thought fit to preface the volume. This and the fact that the title of the book raises hopes not destined to be realised are unfortunate blots upon a production which does credit alike to the publishers, Messrs. A. and C. Black, and the colour-printers, Messrs. Carl Hentschel & Co. And first a word with Mr. Grego, not upon his literary style, concerning which it would be difficult to write with becoming seriousness, but upon the unsavoury matters which he has thought fit to resuscitate in his introduction.

Cruikshankians are only too well aware of the extravagant claims which the disappointed artist made to work which was as undoubtedly due to the genius of Dickens and the industry of Ainsworth as the illustrations were to his own skill with the pencil or the etching needle. I was at pains to put the whole matter on a proper footing in a small volume published some seven or eight years ago, and I must confess to some resentment at seeing Cruikshank's pamphlet, fortunately for his reputation hitherto difficult of access, dragged into the light of day and presented without the arguments for and against the claims contained therein, as though it held the final and incontrovertible truth.

Mr. Grego would have done better to have left this fatuous opusculum to moulder away on the shelves which hold the eccentric lucubrations of other lop-minded men of genius. It is, of course, perfectly true that both Dickens and Ainsworth found Cruikshank a most stimulating and valuable collaborator when he was in an amiable humour; but to suggest a subject for, or to discuss the details of, a work of fiction however elaborately with its writer, cannot for a moment be held to justify a claim to artistic origination or joint-authorship.

But enough of stricture. Putting aside the introduction, we have in the three beautiful series of hitherto unpublished water-colour drawings here presented to us a revelation of Cruikshank's versatility which should go far to revive a somewhat waning reputation. For this I, for one, render Mr. Grego my heartiest thanks. True, the matter is familiar enough to every admirer of "the man that drew the awful Jew," but the manner is as unfamiliar as it is delightful. Here we find the artist realising in water-colours with unexpected felicity the illustrations to "Oliver Twist," "The Miser's Daughter," and Maxwell's "Irish Rebellion;" with which, in black and white, all the world is, or ought to be, familiar.

It is unnecessary here to dwell upon their charms. They must be seen to be appreciated. It is enough to say that the best of them, which are to be found in the last series, for movement, invention, and mastery would do credit to von Menzel himself; and what better claim to respect could be made for them than that?

G. S. LAYARD.

THE KINSHIP OF NATURE. By Bliss Carman. (Murray. 6s.)

FROM the days of Dryden—nay, from the days of Ben Jonson and Cowley—poets have had a tendency to fall into essay-writing. In modern times the tendency has increased rather than diminished; and it has throughout been of such advantage to the essay that the reviewer must needs look kindly on it. Ben Jonson, Cowley, Dryden, Leigh Hunt (to stop short of the present day) form a lineage illustrious enough amply to justify the practice. The poet's prose is usually excellent prose; sometimes rich, and seldom other than idiomatic and pure. The latest recruit to the growing band is Mr. Bliss Carman, a Canadian poet of deserved repute this side the water, with a lusty and individualised joy in nature. It is the outward eye, rather than the "inward eye" of Wordsworth, which inspires the nature-poetry of Mr.

Carman, on whom is the roving impulse of the New World. Does a like inspiration show itself in his prose?

Well, these essays are not altogether as his verse. The essential man of the poetry is discoverable also in the prose, if you understandingly look for him. But Mr. Carman's philosophy is very much more to the front, more predominant, one might almost say more exclusively evident, in these essays. We say "philosophy," because such is the term loosely applied nowadays to all theorising upon problems of life or nature. But in the stricter and older sense of the term, Mr. Carman, like most poets, is too in love with the concrete for his speculations to be classed as philosophy. But a poet's thought by any other name will smell as sweet. Briefly, these essays are dominated by a conviction that the faculties of men at large are oppressed, confined, in part atrophied; and that in giving them free play lies the salvation of society. Commercialism, there is the enemy. It is commercialism which suppresses some of the noblest and most necessary faculties in the masses of men.

Body, mind, and soul, cries the author, are all equal; he can make no distinction of nobility between them. So, likewise, taste, reason, and conscience are to him equal faculties, and to be cultivated equally. Human happiness lies in the equal cultivation of all human faculties "to a normal degree in a normal way." No one faculty should be thought inferior to another faculty, or depressed in favour of another faculty. Let the bit be taken off all these powers of humanity, and let them race neck-for-neck. Freedom for every faculty of man. To distrust the result is to "believe in the ultimate evil of the spirit"; for if the good be stronger than the bad, the less repression the better. Release all human powers, and full steam ahead.

Such is Mr. Carman's theory. He is, in effect, a democrat—if we might not say an anarchist, or at least a socialist—carrying his democracy into the region of thought. The native righteousness of human nature, therefore liberty and equality for all the faculties of humanity—such is the logical outcome of the poet's democracy applied to speculative principle. We are not concerned to dispute or agree with, but merely to emphasize it. What really and chiefly concerns him, however, is the suppression of one human faculty—the faculty of taste, the native perception of beauty. All work should be art, should be the expression of the workman's self, and therefore a joy in the doing of it. Modern conditions make this impossible. Brutalise the workman by stamping out individuality or the chance of individuality in his work. There is in his work no outlet for himself, therefore he has in his work no joy. Art is divorced from life, and becomes etiolated; life, divorced from art, becomes base. There must be freedom for the common workman as there is freedom for the thinker and artist; that is the radical, only cure. We are minded to ask, is there freedom for thinker and artist in the modern Western state, gripped by the dollar and the driving-wheel? But, however we may view the all-sufficiency of Mr. Carman's cure and theories, there can be no question that commercialism is, as he declares, the enemy, the crushing and throttling influence upon modern life. Nor are these essays without abundance of other things: happy natural observation which recalls the writer's poetry, suggestive artistic theory. One essay, "Rhythm," reads like a variation on the subtle essay of an English poet and prose-writer; but has its own observation and personality. Always the style is pure, clear, direct, with that undeniable quality which comes from the habit and exercise of poetry. "Trees" is Mr. Carman the poet, pure and simple; and very delightful it is. It is a gain to know Carman the essayist; though he does not weaken our preference for Carman the poet. Which, probably, is as he would have it be.

FRANCIS THOMPSON.

IVAN LE TERRIBLE. Par K. Waliszewski. (Plon-Nourrit.)

THE latest of M. Waliszewski's fascinating series of monographs of Russian monarchs, which he entitles "The Origins of Modern Russia," is as interesting and as informing as any that has yet appeared. Waliszewski has the gift of a beautiful style, and evidently regards history as an art and not a science. The book is particularly interesting at the present juncture, since much in it has a bearing on the Russia of to-day.

Waliszewski points out how the great empire of the North develops, both internally and externally, by a system of avalanches. At long intervals a sudden displacement of the centre of gravity produces a rapid forward movement followed by a longer or shorter period of stagnation. In the vast task assigned by fate to the Russians, it is inevitable that they shall meet obstacles and gird themselves up for effort. Just at present their domestic progress seems at a standstill, and their foreign policy firmly fixed in the grooves formerly followed. Their activity has been absorbed by the conquest of a new domain destined to extend to the Chinese seas on one side, and to the Persian Gulf on the other, a conquest that is likely to cost them dear. But not the less are the domestic problems, the solution of which is for the time being left aside, growing slowly and surely to a head.

The beginnings of Russian progress are, according to Waliszewski, to be sought in the reign of Ivan the Terrible, who was the first Russian monarch to assume the title of Tsar. Everything that was accomplished later by Peter the Great and Catherine II., the acquisition of the Baltic coast, the annihilation of the last vestiges of the Tartar power, the conquest of Siberia, the opening of political and commercial relations with all the countries of Europe, the introduction into Russia of the elements of foreign culture, and the reorganisation of the empire on the same bases as those on which it rests at the present day—all these things were inaugurated by Ivan the Terrible. Hence the reason of Waliszewski's monograph.

To understand Russian history it is necessary to understand the relations between the Tsar and his people, and the best description of those relations is to be found in the Muscovite cycle of historical chants. There the Tsar is by no means repulsive; he is accessible to human feelings, severe but just and even generous. His semi-sacerdotal position naturally sets him above criticism, but he undoubtedly wins sympathy. The people are with him even in his worst crimes, and if they cannot applaud, they respectfully close their eyes, or cover what revolts their conscience with the mantle of fiction. Ivan the Terrible was level with the morality of his age, and it may truthfully be said that in no country of Europe does sixteenth century history resemble an idyll. Indeed, in some ways a false idea has attached itself to Ivan's surname. The Russian word grozny has not the same signification as the English word terrible: it means rather a man who is respected as it becomes a man of the highest rank to make himself respected. In the days of Tsar Ivan, material greatness and brutal force were almost synonyms, but Ivan had imagination, wherein he differed most strongly from Peter the Great, one of the most positive spirits that ever lived, and both Ivan and his people deluded themselves as to the value of the end pursued and the extent of the sacrifice demanded.

To us, the most interesting portion of Ivan's career is that which concerns his relations with Queen Elizabeth. He was a veritable Anglo-maniac. Naturally anxious for alliance with a Power whose navy, trade and credit were beginning to rule the world, it also occurred to him that England might be a place of refuge in case he was driven from his own country. He even tried to marry an English wife, Lady Mary Hastings, daughter of the Earl of Huntingdon, and made it a condition that if he so honoured England, she must lend him her army and her fleet against Bathory. Shakespeare's reference to the ambassadors from Muscovy in "Love's Labour's Lost" will be remembered. Needless to say, nothing came of the negotiations, although to the last moment Ivan cherished the idea of visiting England. The interviews between the Tsar and Bowes, the English ambassador, quoted at length by Waliszewski, are most entertaining. Indeed the whole book is delightful and an example of the way in which history should be written. To understand Russia in the twentieth century, it is well to get acquainted with Russia in the sixteenth century, and there can be no better opportunity of so doing than that offered by this volume.

ENGLISH LITERATURE AND SOCIETY IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.
Ford Lectures, 1903. By Leslie Stephen. (Duckworth.
5s. net.)

A NEW volume by Sir Leslie Stephen has always been welcome, because it was sure to contain the quintessence of sanity and common sense. It was sure to be based upon knowledge, and inspired not only by impartiality but by frankness. Sir Leslie's utterances were never mere echoes. If they repeated what had been said before, they were none the less his own deliberately-formed opinions. In the present instance, discourses which were intended to be read and actually were read, though not by their author, aloud to audiences, gain, we consider, by being set forth in type. For in this review of the literary and social characteristics of a century, the writer is even more than usually concise in style and in expression. He covers a large extent of ground with remarkable and even embarrassing rapidity. He is so allusive that a perusal of his pages can hardly be recommended to anyone who is not already well acquainted with the subject. Possessing that preliminary acquaintance, no one can fail to be delighted with this luminous survey of the conditions under which literature was produced in England during the century named. Sir Leslie helps the reader to understand how largely the authors of that period were influenced by their environment—how greatly governed their efforts were by the class or classes they addressed. Take, for example, the dramatists of the Restoration: "There were, we must remember, only two theatres under Charles II., and there was a difficulty in supporting even two. Both depended almost exclusively on the patronage of the court and the courtiers." To the taste of the court and of the courtiers they consequently appealed. It does not follow from this that the whole nation, or even all London, revelled in cynical pictures of immorality. "A very small minority of the people can ever have seen a performance." By-and-bye the man of letters looked for appreciation not only to the "nobility and gentry," but to the wits of the coffee-houses, and later still, to the middle-classes who rejoiced in such products as "The Spectator" and "Clarissa Harlowe." This reminds us of an example of Sir Leslie's frankness as a critic. "I will confess," he says, "that the last time I read 'Clarissa Harlowe' it affected me with a kind of disgust." He was shocked by the elaborate detail in which Richardson tells the story of Clarissa—"rubbing our noses, if I may say so, in all her agony, and squeezing the last drop of bitterness out of every incident." Again, in regard to the "Spectator": "Spite of the real charm which every lover of delicate humour and exquisite urbanity must find in Addison, I fancy that the 'Spectator' has come to mean for us chiefly Sir Roger de Coverley. It is curious, and perhaps painful, to note how very small a proportion of the whole is devoted to that most admirable achievement, and to reflect how little life there is in much that in kindness of feeling and grace of style is equally charming." With Sir Leslie's general conclusions it is possible everybody may not find themselves in complete agreement—as, for instance, where he says that "Literature must be produced by the class which embodies the really vital and powerful currents of thought which are moulding society." This is true, of course, of the popular literature of every epoch: the accepted literature of an epoch is always that which gives effective expression to contemporary emotions and ideas. But all that is really great and permanent in a writer is independent of his surroundings; the literature which lasts is that which gives consummate form to the elemental passions and aspirations of humanity.

SCHILLER UND DIE NEUE GENERATION, EIN VORTRAG. Von
Ludwig Fulda. (Berlin: J. G. Cotta. 75 pfennig.)

IT is well sometimes to pause and ask ourselves why certain authors who long held the ascendancy fall to low estate and are neglected by the new generation. The caprices of fashion, though they may count for something, are, as a rule, not so very largely responsible for such sweeping changes. Fulda, in the admirable lecture in which he tries to account for the eclipse that Schiller has undergone among the educated classes in Germany, has, we think, hit the right nail on the head. He makes the time-spirit responsible. Goethe's influence has increased. While Schiller is no longer much read; he has ceased to be an important influence in the people's life. The reason must be sought in the extraordinary change that has taken place in the political and social life of Germany, and more especially in the intellectual and spiritual life, during the last third of the nineteenth century. In 1859 the ideal of the German citizen was summed up in the words unity and liberty. Since that time, those ideals have been partly realised and partly pushed aside. Unity has come to pass, and to those who possess it Schiller's glorification of it is unneeded. The meaning attached to the term liberty has also changed, and if the serving of a prince means rapid advancement, no one refuses, although in his inmost heart a man still cherishes "Männerstolz vor Königsthronen." With freedom of thought it is the same. Men say, "Thought pays no customs duty," that is, we think what we please, and say, if it comes to that, something different. Idealism, too, is out of date and Schiller is an idealist of the purest water. Nowadays we conceal our real feelings under a mask of calm sobriety; pathos and sentiment we avoid like the fires of hell. Schiller was pathetic and even sentimental. Schiller said, "The brave man thinks of himself last." The individualist of our day says, "The strong man thinks of himself first." Then women are no longer satisfied with the place in society assigned them by Schiller, and they therefore cease to read him.

The naturalistic tendencies of modern literature are also against the appreciation of Schiller's peculiar genius. His strength rests on the typical, that of the naturalistic writer on the individual. Schiller aims at giving us inspiration, naturalism at giving us a mood or a temperament. Goethe's star has risen as Schiller's has set, and perhaps for this reason: Goethe teaches us to enjoy the world we live in, he heightens its charms for us and demands that we shall recognise and revel in its beauty. Schiller desires us to imagine a better world and to aim at its realisation. From that point of view, Goethe is the poet of the possessors, Schiller that of the needy and aspiring. So the people, who in 1859 were needy and aspired, but who are to-day in possession, have turned from Schiller to Goethe.

But all the same, Schiller's star can never suffer total eclipse. There will always be those who are needy and who aspire, and such seek in art and poetry not the adornment of life but its consolation. The adherents Schiller has lost in the upper and middle classes of society he will find again two-fold and three-fold in the lower classes. And when the calm and happiness of the others is disturbed, then will they, too, turn again to Schiller. Then will men once more listen to the voice of the poet of the "Bells," and Schiller, the Tyrtæus of the moral struggle, will walk equal with Goethe, the high priest of beauty. If Goethe is like the sun which first made day, day (says Fulda), Schiller is like the moon whom men honour as their kind friend, their most trustworthy guide as often as it is night.

The point of view is of extreme interest, the criticism touches some of the blots on the culture of the present time and helps to explain the neglect of other great authors beside Schiller.

HANOVER AND PRUSSIA, 1795-1803: A STUDY IN NEUTRALITY. By Guy Stanton Ford, B.L., Ph.D. (New York: The Columbia University Press. 8s. net.)

THIS volume is one of a series of monographs on historical, political, and economical subjects, edited by the Faculty of Political Science of Columbia University. It is the fruit of much study of archives in London, Berlin, Hanover and Dresden, and of the diplomatic and historical works in existence dealing with the period. Dr. Ford has gone into his subject with American impartiality and German thoroughness. Perhaps his necessary reliance on German sources for most of his material may have somewhat Teutonised his style. There is no need to call Hanover a "Zankapfel" when the English "apple of discord" would express the same familiar metaphor. A writer for English-speaking readers should not credit these readers with too great knowledge of German. No doubt the historical students and scholars for whom this publication is meant mostly know German; no historian can afford to neglect that language. But it is not good to be unnecessarily foreign.

The period of study is interesting, but not from any momentous events or any remarkable skill even in diplomacy. Great events there were, but they only indirectly affected Northern Germany. In 1795 Prussia withdrew by the Treaty of Basel from the French Revolutionary War, in which she had joined reluctantly and without effect. An army and general in earnest would not have been stopped by a mere skirmish at Valmy. In 1803 Napoleon, disregarding the distinction, which the rulers of France before him had recognised, between Great Britain and Hanover, occupied and practically annexed the latter country. Between those periods Prussia had directed her energies towards keeping herself and North Germany neutral. In this Hanover, ruled by a governing clique in the name of George III., acquiesced. But between these dates, Prussia, forced into the Armed Neutrality of 1800 by Czar Paul and the First Consul, occupied Hanover herself as a retaliation for the action of British ships and prize courts towards neutral vessels. This action, which entirely stultified the previous policy of Prussia, was forced on that state by the threats of the mad Czar; but it was generally attributed to Prussian hunger for the convenient territory that would close the great gap between Prussia's eastern and western provinces. I think Dr. Ford allows too little weight to this ever-present idea. Hanover was the bait which Napoleon dangled before Prussia to keep her apart from his enemies. It was the knowledge that he did not mean the offer sincerely that led to the war of 1806. In fact, the desire to have Hanover and the plan of a North German Confederation under Prussia are the two keys of Prussia's policy from 1795 to 1806, as the possession of Silesia and the partition of Poland explain her policy before that time.

Anyone who seeks to unravel this sordid record of selfish diplomacy can have no better guide than Dr. Ford. I wish he would generalise a little more; and in his prefatory sketch of Hanoverian history (page 26) he states, as nearly all writers do, that the first overtures for the Anglo-Prussian Alliance of 1756 came from George II. The Newcastle Papers make it quite clear that Frederick the Great made the first overtures to George II. early in June, 1755. This point, of course, comes outside Dr. Ford's period.

A TRUE HISTORICAL RELATION OF THE CONVERSION OF SIR TOBIE MATTHEW. Edited, with a Preface, by A. H. Mathew. (Burns and Oates. 3s. 6d. net.)

MR. MATHEW, by giving us this autobiographical document, has deserved well. The narrator was the son of a Dean of Christchurch; a great-grandson of Matthew Parker, Archbishop of Canterbury; and a grandson of Barlow, who consecrated him. He became a Roman Catholic, was ordained priest, and shortly before his death was professed as a member of the Society of Jesus. He wrote well the excellent English of his day—a day in which, indeed, it has been said no man could write ill. And he wrote with an admirable sincerity out of a full heart. Those were days in which it was ill arguing with an archbishop: "If my Lord of Canterbury were angry before, he was enraged now, and spake of nothing but prisons and other punishments of a worse kind, and declared that he would presently commit me." This was upon Matthew's return from Italy, whither as a young man he had travelled for the sake of learning the language and amusing himself after the fashion of the country. There, at Rome, he had fallen in with Father Persons (or Parsons) the Jesuit (responsible perhaps more than any other member of the Society for the sinister reputation it still enjoys among the British lower middle class), who seems to have handled him with wise discretion and honestly enough, giving him for consideration passages from the Fathers and the Scriptures pertinent to the controversies of the times. It is of interest, perhaps, to note that the same reference to St. Augustine's controversy with the Donatists that from the pulpit of Sardinia Street Chapel, and the mouth of Wiseman, struck Newman dumb was among those which together wrought conviction in this Anglican of the sixteenth century. Also, by way of contrast, one notes with a smile that, while still very far from proposing submission to the Church, he frankly placed himself at Rome under the protection of the head of the Holy Office, whose attitude towards the young man was a model of kindly hospitality.

The book is a human document of wider than merely controversial interest.

THE LITERATURE OF THE HIGHLANDS. By Magnus Maclean, M.A., D.Sc. (Blackie. 7s. 6d. net.)

LONG before the non-Gaelic-speaking reader has reached page 159 of this volume he will have formed a conclusion which Dr. Maclean has there put into words for him thus: "To English-speaking people who are dependent upon translations for their knowledge of the songs and poetry of the Gael, these latter must appear very poor and insipid in comparison with the artistic productions of their own language. Even the best, the most lauded efforts of men like Alexander Macdonald, Duncan Ban Macintyre and Dugald Buchanan seldom show in their English dress half so fine as the original. Few," he adds, "would ever divine that in the tuneful Gaelic these poems are of the most exquisite order." The Englished poems do not, as a whole, impress one with their poetic beauty, and we are at a critical disadvantage when Dr. Maclean presents us, as he frequently does, with a Gaelic sample, and calls upon us to admire its structure. But, taking largely on trust the estimates of quality offered to us, we still find the book genuinely attractive. Containing as it does the author's third series of Celtic lectures at Glasgow University, it treats of the poetry (and such scanty prose as exists) of the Highlands after the Forty-Five, and deals with names not unfamiliar to Lowland ears. His method is a combination of biography and criticism, with examples of the work of the various authors who have "flourished" since the Forty-Five (the golden age, he tells us, of Highland poetry), beginning with Alexander Macdonald—who had the distinction of being the first to publish a volume of original Gaelic poems—and continuing down to and including several of those still living who turn Gaelic verses. Dr. Maclean has enthusiasm for his subject, and wide knowledge of all that pertains to it; he has, moreover, a literary style touched with the Celtic glow that carries the reader along without conscious effort. In the result we have a volume exactly adapted to form a sufficiently complete history for the English reader, and calculated to inspire the literary efforts of those who are lucky enough to be able to use, in addition to the common speech of these islands, the language in which, according to Gaelic tradition, Adam first addressed "our general mother."

MONNA VANNA. By Maurice Maeterlinck. Translated by Alfred Sutro. (Allen. 3s. 6d. net.)

"MONNA VANNA" will disappoint the admirers of M. Maeterlinck, for from no standpoint can it be judged a good play. The plot—thanks to the vagaries of the Lord Chamberlain's Examiner of Plays—is already so well known that but brief reference need be made to it. The theme of the drama is that Monna Vanna, wife of Guido Colonna, consents to go at night, clad only in her cloak, to the tent of Prinzivalle, the commander of the Florentine forces besieging Pisa, who makes this sacrifice the condition of his assisting the famine-stricken city; she goes; she finds in Prinzivalle a child love, of whom for years she had lost sight; she returns unharmed, accompanied by Prinzivalle, and in the end we are left to determine for ourselves whether she deserts her naturally infuriated husband or not. The latter point we need not discuss, but the central theme seems to us unnatural and unnecessary. Prinzivalle talks to Monna Vanna, when she comes to his tent, of the pure love he has borne for her ever since he had met her as a child in Venice, and she believes him! Believes this tale from the man who has made this horrible demand from her! In any case the horrible, but not tragic, detail of his demanding that she should come to him clothed only in her cloak should have been avoided by M. Maeterlinck. Had the author treated his subject otherwise, as he might easily have done, he might have given us a fine tragedy on the theme of a wife's sacrifice of her honour for the lives of her starving fellows. As it stands the drama is impossible and repellant.

But even setting aside his treatment of the theme, M. Maeterlinck has not done himself justice. The motives of the characters, certainly of Prinzivalle, are unnatural and unconvincing, and the conduct of Monna Vanna's father-in-law, Marco Colonna, when he returns from the Florentine camp to announce Prinzivalle's demand, is preposterous. He declares that the enemy "are not barbarians, thank God! They received me as an honoured guest," and "I saw Prinzivalle; I have had speech of him . . . he is humane and generous"! And so on! And Marco is not held up to us as a foolish fond old man, but as wise and good! No, there is no humanity in this play, though there is much fine writing.

Mr. Alfred Sutro has done his work so well that the translation reads like an original; higher praise could not be given.

Fiction

ANGELS AND DEVILS AND MAN. By Winifred Graham. (Cassell. 6s.) Miss Graham's title is a misleading one, for in her sufficiently amazing pages we encounter no actual fiends or angels, and certainly never catch a glimpse of anything human and real enough to be styled man. We have, however, a mysterious old savant, who lives in a haunted house and who discovers how to read thought by means of a specially-constructed ear-trumpet, a heroine "aglow from the light of a better, brighter world," a woman of the world, a professed adventurer and some other personages. In the course of the story the Professor detects a projected murder—the motive of which gratuitous crime it must have taxed even his ear-trumpet to discover—brings the cynic and the woman of the world together, and accomplishes other remarkable feats. He is even equal to playing all the parts assigned him in the following interesting mixture of metaphor: "Upon all acquaintances the Professor took an immediate hold, riveting their imagination, and acting as a loving guide, manual or chart . . . attracting like a magnet." In the end this magnetic personage destroys his invention and dies, the heroine at his side "like a guardian angel, with drenched violet eyes," and the reader is left to recover as he may from the administration of such a dose of Marie Corelli and water.

STELLA FREGELIUS. By R. Rider Haggard. (Longmans. 6s.) This conflict between the wholesome and unwholesome is described by the author as a "tale of three destinies," and offered apologetically as a "modest story," in no sense a romance, or of the character perhaps expected. The author's name, however, on the title page ensures a story of unusual interest and characterisation always clear. But the problem itself—the possible conflict which may exist between earthly duty and spiritual desire—is uncomfortable. To put the matter clearly, Morris Monk, a young electrical engineer, of ancient lineage but bankrupt estate, is to be married, at the urgent suggestion of his father, to a really charming cousin, Mary Porson, an heiress. And then, unhappily, Stella, a parson's daughter, of Norse ancestry, penniless and a mystic, is cast up on the shore and forced to take refuge in Monk's house. The earthly duty in this instance is very clearly defined, and is as pleasant a lot as can well fall to mortal man: the projected nuptials call for no life-long renunciation; there is genuine affection both sides. On the other hand, the spiritual desire is unnecessary in kind, and obviously disastrous in effect. Conflict number one is determined by the drowning of Stella, and Monk is at liberty to marry Mary. Monk is happy in his married life, but the memory of the dead remains; the lid of the domestic cauldron is well screwed down, but the flame of a possible and spiritual indiscretion grows in strength. The author somewhat unfairly throws the blame on Mary; Monk begins to avoid his wife; to shake off her wholesome influence; to betake himself to his lonely workshop, to read old diaries, neglect food and sleep, and generally to cultivate the morbid side of life. He longs to conjure up Stella; and she comes, or he acquires the power to see her, not as a sheeted and melancholy spectre, but as his spiritual bride. We leave Monk to die, unfaithful in his madness to all that was really useful; true to his character perhaps, but false to his earthly duty, false to his manhood.

MYRA OF THE PINES. By Herman K. Viele. ("Red Cloth Library." Fisher Unwin. 6s.) The setting, at least, of this story is unusual and somewhat romantic. Given a little log house in the midst of the pine woods, eight miles from anywhere, inhabited by an absent-minded inventor who casts horoscopes for correspondents at a dollar a head, his wife who writes stories to fit illustrations and advertise articles of household interest, and Myra, their daughter, an unusually pretty girl with bronze hair, anything may happen. The only thing, as a matter of fact, that does happen is the advent of a lover for Myra, and her rejection of the well-meaning but otherwise unattractive agent for the property. We never recollect to have met before a pig woman in the pages of a book. Those who feel a curiosity as to her personality should read "Myra of the Pines." It is written in a pleasant, smooth style, and, if not particularly exciting, is nevertheless agreeably amusing. But then one cannot expect exciting things to happen in a solitary hut eight miles from anywhere.

JARWICK, THE PRODIGAL. By Tom Gallon. (Ward, Lock. 6s.) Randal Jarwick, an escaped convict and general consorter with thieves, relates his own exciting adventures in this volume. His adventures begin with his escape from prison, and end a week later with his return thereto. To say it was an exciting week is to describe it feebly. On the first day of his flight he falls in with his father, himself the daring and unscrupulous leader of a gang of thieves, posing as an eccentric philanthropist. He stumbles into the arms of his father over the corpse of a murdered man. After that adventures are fast and furious. To suit his father's plan Jarwick poses as the long-lost son of a justice of the peace, in order to enable his father's gang to rob the house. But to describe the complications and varied incidents of this story would be to re-write "Jarwick, the Prodigal." The chase after the mysterious seaman's chest which contains the body of the murdered man is reminiscent of "The Wrong Box." Jarwick's blind father, the malevolent and crafty murderer and thief, is a clever and convincing character. This story can be recommended to the reader in search of excitement.

LE SECRÉTAIRE DE MADAME LA DUCHESSE. Par Léon de Tinseau. (Calmann-Lévy. 3 fr. 50.) We have here a brightly written novel in epistolary form. The principal scene is a country house, the residence of a duke who had repaired his finances by a marriage with the daughter of a rich iron-master. We are introduced to a house-party on a grand scale, and live for a time with persons whose most serious occupation in life is to amuse themselves. They are not, some of them, without intellectual leanings and powers, but solely frivolous ends are aimed at. We confess to feeling little interest in the persons and their doings. Even the struggles of the secretary, a good-looking, good-hearted young man of the middle class, against the many seductions of the luxurious life into which he is thrown, and against those of a fair, heartless lady, do not greatly arouse our enthusiasm. Happily catastrophes are averted, and all ends satisfactorily to the sound of marriage bells. The contrast which the author draws between middle-class virtue and aristocratic vice is, we think, too sharp. Neither class of the community has a monopoly of morals; Vauvenargues came very near the truth when he said, "The common people and the nobles have neither the same vices nor the same virtues." There are members of the aristocratic body who lead the simplest and straightest lives, exercising the best possible influence on all with whom they come in contact, while there are members of the middle class whose lives are selfish and hypocritical to the last degree. The most sympathetic characters in the novel are the duchess's son and daughter: the former is a soldier, the latter a girl in the schoolroom. They seem to combine the graces of the aristocrat with the more solid virtues of their hard-working maternal ancestors. Whether it was the author's intention to emphasise the good of such marriages as that of the duke and duchess we cannot undertake to say, but as we leave the son engaged to a rich and charming American beauty, the duchess's grandchildren will probably benefit still more by the mixture of races and temperaments.

Short Notices

SIENA. By Edmund G. Gardner. ("Mediæval Towns." Dent. 4s. 6d. net.) This study of "Siena" is worthy of the delightful series to which it belongs, and of Mr. Gardner's reputation as critic and historian. It can have been no easy task to draw into so small a compass the complex story of "soft Siena," as the wildest of Italian cities was ironically called. Mr. Gardner has, however, fulfilled his task with admirable completeness and lucidity, though at times the reader, recalling his more distinctly literary work, is inclined to regret that the strict limits of space have given him little scope for style. Even under such conditions, however, the author's distinction of touch can be felt, while the curiously apt use of Dantesque images and allusions calls to mind the fact that he is authority on all that concerns the Tuscan poet. In the little volume we have the story of Siena from the far mythic days when the smoko rose black and white from the altars of Apollo and Diana and gave the city the colours of her shield, to the time when the Republic, after its superb defence, fell before Cosimo de' Medici and the power of Spain. The chronicle is singular and fascinating, for Siena's alternations of savagery and piety, artistic luxury and mystical exaltation were as strange as was the fact that the untamed town amid its feasts and its excesses kept in its art to an unworldly idealism which mirrored little of the actual life. "These most turbulent of Italian people," writes Mr. Gardner, "who, in de Commine's phrase, 'are ever in division and govern their Commonwealth more fondly than any other town in Italy,' chose that their painters should give them an art which was exclusively the handmaid of Religion." From the confusion of the Siennese annals shines out the lofty and mystical figure of Saint Catherine, whose almost unparalleled career is treated by Mr. Gardner with very reverent sympathy. Scarcely less interesting, at least to the profane mind, is the life story of another of Siena's great citizens, Enea Silvio Piccolomini, Pope Pius II., whose extraordinary personality, at once that of poet, humanist and crusading zealot, unites and typifies so many phases of his day. Skilfully interwoven with the historic narrative, Mr. Gardner gives us an account of the churches and galleries of the city, together with much valuable art criticism. Lovers of the work of Sodoma may think the author a trifle severe on "Bazzi's beautiful melodrama," but in the main the comments are as sympathetic as they are well-grounded. The additional chapters take us to Lecceto and San Gimignano, and in these we miss the exquisite drawings by the late Miss Helen M. James which embellished the earlier portion of the book. Her beautiful work added much to the charm of a volume no less indispensable than delightful to every student of Siena.

PRACTICAL MORALS, A TREATISE ON UNIVERSAL EDUCATION. By John K. Ingram, LL.D. (Black. 3s. 6d. net.) This book is not a treatise on ethics, but a description of the Positivist conception of Education. It is utterly impossible to believe that the book can have any influence whatever, save as an indication of the influence of the last half of the nineteenth century, which might never have said its say, as far as Dr. Ingram's book is concerned. The extraordinarily dogmatic tone of the author may be illustrated by such phrases as "encouraging in every one the vicious effort to rise above his class," "Sidereal Astronomy, which is merely matter of curiosity" and (of "Darwinism") "an unproved hypothesis, and one beset with difficulties . . . unfit to form an element of universal education." We cannot but admire a great deal that the author has to say, we cannot but recognise the great value of the work of Auguste Comte to the world—work which was a dignified, impressive and high-striving close to the pre-evolutionary epoch. It has its value even now, despite the falsification of many of his predictions and the introduction of a new conception which has utterly swept away his finely-conceived but utterly artificial system. It is to be regretted that Comte's followers should have become obsessed with the idea that nothing has been done since his time. The great Frenchman died in 1857, two years before the "Origin of Species" was published, and three years before the "System of Synthetic Philosophy" was begun. This book is deeply instructive as showing us the measure of the epoch-making achievement that began in the pregnant fifties of last century. Fortunately there is not the remotest possible chance that any one will ever be subjected to the astonishingly artificial system of education which Dr. Ingram here so pleasantly expounds.

THE TWELVE APOSTLES. By the Rev. George Milligan, B.D. THE POST EXILIC PROPHETS. By the Rev. J. Wilson Harper, D.D. (The "Temple Series of Bible Characters and Scripture Handbooks." Dent.) Two useful additions to this excellent series; useful reminders to those who know much, to those who know little useful instructors.

SUFFOLK. By William A. Dutt. Illustrated by J. Wylie. ("The Little Guides." Methuen. Leather 3s. 6d. net, cloth 3s.) Of the making of guide-books there is no end, and no end could be desired if all were as portable and as full of information as these little guides. Mr. Dutt, as was to be expected, has done his duty well by one of the most interesting of our Eastern counties. The illustrations and the map add greatly to the value of the volume.

EFFEUILLEMENTS. Par Hélène de Zuyten de Nyevelt. (Paris: Alphonse Lemerre. 4 frs.) A bare two score poems go to make up a charming volume of good paper, clear type and pleasant photographic reproductions. The poetess has grace, delicacy, and much felicity of diction. Such verses as "Palette automnale" and "Une Chauve-Souris passe" are as clever as need be, and the haunting charm of "Rebellion," headed with a Byronian quotation, has a quaintness and suggestive profundity which prove the artist in words. Many of the poems are prefaced by quotations from English writers, such as Keats, Shakespeare and Shelley, which should enhance the interest of the book for English readers.

PRINCESSE AVRIL. Par Théodore Maurer. (Se trouve à Paris en la Maison des Poètes. 1 fr.) A tiny garland of very delicate verse. The poem which gives its name to the booklet opens with these lines:—

"Frère Princesse Avril, ton doux nom de légende

Serait à ta beauté délicate de fleur.

Soeur du lys virginal, tu lui pris sa paleur

Pour t'en aller vers Dieu comme une pure offrande."

Other poems such as "La Terre fleurie" and "La mère berce l'enfant" fully carry on the high promise given in M. Maurer's previous book of poems "Plaisir d'Amour"; he is by no means a "minor" French poet. Much may confidently be expected from him.

Reprints and New Editions

TANGLEWOOD TALES. By Nathaniel Hawthorne (sic). (Curtis 3s. net.) A pretty edition of these ever delightful tales. There is a regrettable misprint on the title page which may, however, make the volume of value to collectors.

THE POEMS AND SOME SATIRES OF ANDREW MARVELL. With an introduction and notes by Edward Wright. ("The Little Library." Methuen. 1s. 6d. net.) This reprint has a particular interest as it contains some new readings of the satires and includes the insertion of one or two long passages from MSS. sources. We are glad to find so warm an admirer and yet a keen critic in the writer of the introduction. He calls Marvell "the poet of the English country side, at that delicious moment when there is wafted upon the air of spring the odour of summer flowers." This pleasant green volume, admirably printed and containing an excellent frontispiece, should find a ready welcome.

New Books Received

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL

- Balmforth (Ramsden), The Bible from the Standpoint of the Higher Criticism: The Old Testament..... (Sonnenschein) 3/6
 Harper, D.D. (The Rev. J. Wilson), The Post-Exilic Prophets..... (Dent)
 Milligan, B.D. (George), The Twelve Apostles..... (")

POETRY, CRITICISM, DRAMA, AND BELLES LETTRES

- Maclean (Magnus), The Literature of the Highlands..... (Blackie) net 7/6
 Rihani (Ameen F.), translated and selected by, The Quatrains of Abu'l Ala..... (Richards) net 5/0
 Rain, M.A. (Rev. Thomas), Browning for Beginners..... (Sonnenschein) 2/6
 Skeat (The Rev. Professor Walter W.), done into Modern English by, Chaucer's "Knight's Tale or Palamon and Arcite"..... (Moring) net 1/0
 Jingles, Free Trade Rhymes, Recitations, and Songs..... (Nottingham: Caxton Press) 0/1
 Muir (R. J.), Plato's Dream of Wheels..... (Unwin)
 Mantzius (Karl), translated by Louise von Co-sel, A History of Theatrical Art in Ancient and Modern Times, Vol. III. The Shakespearean Period in England..... (Duckworth) net 10/0
 Young (Ruth), Verses..... (Longmans) net 2/6

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY

- Helmolt (Dr. H. F.), edited by, with Introductory Essay by the Right Hon. James Bryce, D.C.L. The World's History, A Survey of Man's Record, Vol. II. Oceania, Eastern Asia, and the Indian Ocean..... (Heinemann) cloth net 15/0, leather net 21/0
 Howe (Mary) and Hall (Florence Howe), Laura Bridgman, Dr. Howe's Famous Pupil and What He Taught Her..... (Hodder and Stoughton) 7/6
 Gordon (General John B.), Reminiscences of the Civil War..... (Constable) net 13/0
 A Faithful Minister, A Brief Memoir of the late Rev. Walter Senior, M.A., by his Son, W.S.S. (Stock) net 2/6
 Maurice (Major-Gen. Sir J. F.), edited by, The Diary of Sir John Moore, 2 vols. (Arnold) net 30/0

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY

- Hill (Constance), Juniper Hall, a Rendezvous of Certain Illustrious Personages during the French Revolution..... (Lane) net 21/0

ART

- Corkran (Alice), Frederic Leighton..... (Methuen) net 2/6
 Great Masters, Part IX..... (Heinemann) net 5/0

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY

- Ingram, LL.D. (John K.), Practical Morals, a Treatise of Universal Education..... (Black) net 3/6
 Andr , F.R.G.S., F.Z.S. (Eng ne), A Naturalist in the Guianas..... (Smith, Elder) net 14/0

EDUCATIONAL

- Browne, M.A., M.B. (Edward G.), The Lub bu 'L-Albab of Muhammad 'Awfi, Part II..... (Luzac)
 Gardiner, M.A., D.Sc. (George B.) and Gardiner, M.A. (Andrew), A Latin Anthology for Beginners..... (Arnold) 2/0

MISCELLANEOUS

- Hall, M.D. (G. Rome), The Black Fortnight, or The Invasion of 1915..... (Sonnenschein) 1/0
 Rowntree (J.) and Sherwell (A.), Principles and Methods of Direct Popular Control of the Liquor Traffic (Scotland)..... (Macniven and Wallace) 0/3
 The Carnegie Trust for the Universities of Scotland, Third Annual Report 1903..... (Edinburgh: Trust Offices)
 Peddie (R. A.), List of Early Printed Books..... (St. Bride Institute)
 Smith (R. H.), Table of Multiplication, Division, and Proportion for the Ready Calculation of Wage Premiums, &c...... (Constable)
 Masse, M.A. (H. J. L. J.), Pewter Plate, A Historical and Descriptive Handbook..... (Bell) net 21/0
 Pertwee (Ernest), edited by, Routledge's XXth Century Humorous Reciter..... (Routledge) 1/0
 Gilbert (Henry), edited by, The Literary Year Book and Bookman's Directory, 1901..... (Allen) net 5/0
 Zimmermann (Dr. H.), translated by L. Desroise, Calculating Tables..... (Asher) net 6/0

FICTION

- "Old Shropshire Life," by Lady Catherine Milnes Gaskell (Lane), 6/0; "The Law of Life," by Anna McClure Sholl (Heinemann), 6/0; "Room Fire," by Hamilton Drummond (Ward, Lock), 6/0; "Patsy the Omdalun," by M. McD. Bodkin, K.C. (Chatto), 3/6; "The Master-Rogue, the Countess of a Croesus," by David Graham Phillips (Richards), 6/0; "Jarwick, the Prodigal," by Tom Gallon (Ward, Lock), 6/0; "In Low Water," by Nat. Gould (Everett), 2/6; "Myra of the Pines," by Herman K. Viole (Unwin), 6/0; "The Filigree Ball," by Anna Katherine Green (Unwin), 6/0; "The Interloper," by Violet Jacob (Heinemann), 6/0; "White Star: The Story of a Hachorse," by O. Darcy Friel (Everett), 3/6; "The Despoilers," by Edmund Mitchell (Cassell), 6/0.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS

- "The Merry Wives of Windsor," edited by H. C. Hart (Methuen), 3/6; "The Kingdom of God is Within You," "What Shall We Do," and "King Assarhadon," by Leo Tolstoy (Free Age Press), each net 0/6; "The Egregious English," by Angus McNeill (Richards), net 1/0; "The Book of Snobs," by W. M. Thackeray (Richards), net 1/0; "The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," by Edward Gibbon, Vol. III. (Richards) net 1/0; "Critical Papers in Art," by W. M. Thackeray (Macmillan), 3/6; "Studies in Jocular Literature," by W. Carew Hazlitt (Stock), net 1/6; "Introduction to the History of Civilization in England," by H. T. Buckle, annotated by J. M. Robertson (Routledge), 5/0; "History of the London Stage and its Famous Players (1576-1903)," by H. Barton Baker (Routledge), 7/6; "Adonais," by Percy B. Shelley, faithfully reprinted from the edition of 1821 (Methuen) net 2/0; "Leviathan," by Thomas Hobbes, edited by A. R. Waller (Cambridge Press), net 4/6; "The Odyssey of Homer in English Verse," by A. S. Way, M.A. (Macmillan), net 6/0; "Great Expectations" and "Hard Times," by Charles Dickens (Macmillan), 3/6; "Edgar Allan Poe's Tales: A Selection" (Cassell), net 0/6; "An Agnostic's Apology," by Sir Leslie Stephen (Watts & Co.), 0/6.

PERIODICALS

- "The Atlantic Monthly," "The Printseller and Collector," "The Royal," "The Independent," "The Smart Set," "The Girl's Realm," "Ulna: the Manchester Grammar School Magazine," "Fall Mail Magazine," "The Woman at Home."

Foreign

POETRY, CRITICISM, DRAMA, AND BELLES LETTRES

- Sp nle (E.), Novallis, Essai sur l'Idealisme Romantique en Allemagne..... (Paris: Hachette)
 Cazamian (Louis), Le Roman Social en Angleterre (1830-1850) (Dickens, Disraeli, Mrs. Gaskell, Kingsley)..... (Paris: Soci t  Nouvelle de Librairie) 7.50 frs.
 Palestira, XXXVI, Thomas Deloney, Von Dr. Richard Sievers..... (Berlin: Mayer and M ller) 6.60 marks
 Neundorff, Pr. Phil. (Bernhard), Entstehungsgeschichte von Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield..... (Berlin: Mayer and M ller) 2 marks

FORTHCOMING BOOKS, ETC.

ALL admirers of Turner's Liber Studiorum, and more especially those of limited means, will heartily welcome the edition announced by Messrs. George Newnes, Limited. This is an oblong 4to. (11 $\frac{3}{4}$ by 8 $\frac{3}{4}$), priced at 10s. 6d. net, whereas copies of the original fetch, to-day, anything from £100 to £850 when they are sold at auction. A newly devised method has made it possible, in surface printing, to follow more closely than ever before the marvellous subtlety and harmony of tone of the originals: an excellence which was due to the manner of their production, in which great leading lines were etched in, chiefly by the master himself, after which the plates were worked upon in mezzotint by others, but always under Turner's own supervision. There will be a short historical introduction by Mr. C. F. Bell, of the Ashmolean Museum, an acknowledged authority on the subject.—The Astolat Press will issue next month two additional volumes in the popular "Oakleaf" series of reprints, viz., "The Vision of Sir Launfal," by J. R. Lowell, and "The Story of the Holy Grail" from Malory.—The same publishers also have in preparation an edition of Milton's Poems in one volume, illustrated by Mr. William Hyde, with original etchings, mezzotints and engravings on copper.—"Hellenism and Macedonia," by Dr. N ocl s Kasas, Rector of Athens University, which Mr. Keith Thomas will publish next week, seeks to show in concrete form the true state of affairs in Macedonia.—Mr. Earl Hodgson is giving, in a book to be published next week by A. and C. Black, the result of his long experience in trout fishing. The wind, the light, the temperature and other atmospheric conditions are considered in a manner which, though novel, the publishers deem to be in the right vein and convincing. Inset at the beginning of the volume is a model book of flies for stream and lake, arranged according to the months. The flies, numbering fully 150, are all reproduced in colour facsimile.—Under the title of "A Bush Honeymoon and Other Australian Stories," Mr. T. Fisher Unwin will publish on February 29 a volume by Mrs. Palmer Archer, a Queensland writer who will now make her first appearance before the English public.—On February 29 Mr. Unwin will publish in his "Red Cloth" Library a new volume of stories by Mr. Louis Becke, "Chinkies' Flat."—A new Yorkshire periodical in the interest of local antiquities and customs, more particularly of the West Riding, is to be commenced in March. It will be issued monthly, and will be entitled "Yorkshire Notes and Queries," and published by Mr. Elliot Stock.—Messrs. Harper and Brothers will publish shortly an important work by Mr. Archibald R. Colquhoun entitled "Greater America." This work, on which Mr. Colquhoun has been engaged for the past two years revisiting many portions of "Greater America" and renewing his acquaintance with the United States, presents the Great Republic of the New World in a new light.—Mrs. John Lane has now followed up her article on "American Wives and English Husbands" which appeared in the "Fortnightly" some years ago, by another on "Entertaining" for the March number of the same review.

Egomet

I HAVE to my surprise received many letters from unknown correspondents concerning these my egotistical outpourings. Will the writers of these kindly notes permit me not only to thank them, but to say that I feel towards them as if they were my friends? When first I began to write these egometistical notes I feared that they would be of interest to myself alone and it is gratifying to find that they have appealed to kindred souls. We booklovers, after all, are citizens of a great republic of letters, a republic where poverty is not counted a crime and where wealth is welcomed chiefly as a means of purchasing books, a republic that admits no distinctions of country or of race, a republic where rank does not exist and where the only qualification for citizenship is the love of books.

Between citizens of this world-wide republic should not liberty, fraternity and equality ever exist? Liberty to love each other even though we be personally unacquainted, liberty to read and to admire all good literature or only that portion of it which may appeal to our individual tastes, liberty to say our say of the writers we worship without giving offence to those whose opinions do not coincide with our own. Fraternity, for all booklovers are brothers, who do not quarrel as brothers are wont to do, brothers who may live together in amity however great may be the differences of taste and judgment. Over politics, over religion, over one question and another of more or less importance, men have ever and will ever dispute with rancour, but in the republic of letters, while there must be differences, all of us can agree to differ and to meet with a kindly good humour the vagaries of our brothers.

Equality too; all bookmen are equal however varied their abilities may chance to be, equal in that they all love books and find sustenance in them. Our literary as our physical digestions are not equally robust, but that matters not; books are food for the mind to all of us, therein we are equal as all men are equal in that they must eat to live, though many live to eat. All bookmen read to live, for the mind of a bookman calls for sustenance as well as his body, and many bookmen live to read, of which number I confess I am one. The murmur of the world is a noise to me; the hearts of men and women interest me more than the rise and fall of empires or the clash of arms. Where better can I learn the secret heart of men and women than in the books they have written? Read between the lines every book contains something of autobiography. My circle of friends and of acquaintances is reasonably large, yet how little compared with the number of men and women in the world and how difficult it is to pierce beneath the mask that covers the face of the dearest friend.

But books present to me a picture of human nature, past and present, if therein there lies any difference, varied, subtle and unlimited. Study the works of any great writer as the outpouring of a man's or of a woman's soul and heart. Therein to me lies the wonder of books. Shakespeare to me is no mere poet, no mere playwright, no superhuman phenomenon as so many critics would have him be; but a fellow man and a fellow sinner, a fellow of infinite jest, of infinite heart, of infinite feeling; a man like myself who knew sorrow and joy, hope and disappointment; not a god but a god-like man. As I walk the streets of this noisy modern London I often have him by my side and what a companion he is! I walk with him not this noisy modern city, but the busy, bustling country-town London in which he dwelt; now and again we stand before some famous building—the Tower, the Temple, the Abbey Church of Westminster—and he tells me tales of the brave days of old, brave days but brutal, putting heart and life into the dry bones of history. Or we step into a tavern, and he points out to me, as we drink our sack or our Rhenish, the jolly folk amid whom we sit—Falstaff, Prince Hal, Ben Jonson, Bardolf, Kit Marlowe, Burbage, Dame Quickly and many another. Or of a night, as the chimes are sounding from the church towers and the moon rides high, he breathes into me the spirit of poetry, the mystic beauty of the silver Thames, the night shadows of men's souls, the pathos of the sleeping town, the loves, the hates, the despairs of human souls. O rare Will Shakespeare!

Such is he to me, such in less degree are others. To what do they stand to you, who with kindly eye read these lines and write to me as friends? If books are to you what they are to me, let us shake hands as brother bookmen and fellow citizens.

E. G. O.

Sir Leslie Stephen

SIR LESLIE STEPHEN had the double advantage of both being and looking a Man of Letters. His face, even when he was a Cambridge don, had the pale cast of thought; he exaggerated the stoop of the student; he wore the locks of the poet. In later years, when he walked from his house at Kensington Gore to the Athenæum—with a ground-devouring tread reminiscent of the days when he stalked from Cambridge to London, fifty miles, in twelve hours—he was recognised as an evident personality, a literary one and a picturesque one. A dozen years or more ago, strangers familiar with the portraits of authors thought, at first flash, that Tennyson had passed them. But the two men were not really alike, except in their unlikeness to all others. When they were seen together—say when the poet was declaring that Jane Austen was next to Shakespeare in English literature—they must have looked as different from each other in their faces as they assuredly were in their critical judgments. For Sir Leslie Stephen, if not a supreme critic, was at least a sane one.

The son of Sir James Stephen who was as great a talker and in some moods as great a bore, as he was a great organiser and great tyrant at the Colonial Office ("Mr. Over-Secretary Stephen"), Leslie went with his brother FitzJames to Eton; then to King's College (where F. D. Maurice was a professor); and on to Cambridge where, in 1854, he was elected to a Tutorial Fellowship at Trinity Hall—a post for which he qualified himself by taking Orders, as did his friend, Henry Fawcett, a couple of years later. So far as he had a religious history, it came to the end of a chapter in 1863; and he wrote the "Finis" with a cool and steady hand. Looking back in later life he said that it cost him no regret to part with the Christian creed—a confession which singularly divides him from nearly all those contemporaries of his among Men of Letters who have suffered religious catastrophe or even experienced religious development. Newman, for instance, felt that "life was over" when the wrench came that took him from the Anglican to the Roman communion; and Renan blended tears with his ink when he wrote, in words that move even those who have never believed, of the old time when the Litany of the Blessed Virgin made music in his ear and in his heart. Sir Leslie Stephen said that his own parting with Christ cost him no grief; and that, I think, must be held to be, among the "notes" of his personal character, the most salient note of all. His grandfather on his mother's side was the Rev. John Venn, of the Clapham school of Evangelicals; his grandfather on his father's side was a lawyer who shared likewise the religious and philanthropic sentiments of his friend Wilberforce—a devout follower of the "Clapham sect"; and his father, too—we have it on the authority of his greatest intimate, Sir Henry Taylor—was "fervently religious." Leslie Stephen could break therefore with late as well as with early traditions, and yet feel no pang; nor could he have wept, like Newman, after his Ordination vows, at "the thought of what he had then become." Perhaps this insensibility was not unconnected with his lack of the love of association—he did not care, he said, to look at a cottage because Wordsworth happened to have lived in it.

Yet in other respects heredity had its full share of influence on his life. Many secular advantages came to him as his father's son, advantages of friendships among the rest. Even the fact that he was Thackeray's son-in-law added a final touch to his marvellous fitness for the editorship of the "Cornhill Magazine." He held that post between the years 1871 and 1883. There and in the "Pall Mall Gazette" and the "Saturday Review" he published the admirable papers which, when issued in volume form, established him as a writer with whom readers were happy to spend "Hours in a Library," and in whose company they could recur to the "History of Thought in the Eighteenth Century"—a century with which his own turn of mind had much in common. His editorship of the first volumes—about a third of the whole—of the "Dictionary of National Biography" threw, at the last, these earlier experiences into the background; but they were his happy ones. The end of his "Cornhill" editorship, when it came, was accelerated by his amiability. He hated the editorial necessity of saying "No" to friends, and to friends' friends, and to the friends of the friends of friends.

One "mark" of his magazine editorship should be remembered. Great writers, in its pages, had been allowed to break through the rule of anonymity with full signatures. Leslie Stephen established a sort of second grade—to the young and little known writer of particular merit should be conceded his initials; and that is how we first met with "R. L. S." at the foot of a "Cornhill" article on "Victor Hugo's Romances," an article of which Stevenson used to declare (surely paying tribute to the sympathy and the understanding of the dictator-editor) that it was the first of his in which he had found himself able to say things in the way he felt they ought to be said. Mr. Sidney Colvin introduced Leslie Stephen to Stevenson; and there is an ever fresh pathos, which no perversity has power to disturb, in the familiar letter of Stevenson's about his first meeting with Henley, written in Edinburgh in 1874: "Yesterday Leslie Stephen, who was down here to lecture, called on me and took me up to see a poor fellow, a poet who writes for him, and who has been eighteen months in our infirmary. It was very sad to see him there in a little room with two beds, and a couple of sick children in the other bed. Stephen and I sat on a couple of chairs, and the poor fellow sat up in his bed with his head and beard all tangled, and talked as cheerfully as if he had been in a king's palace, or the great King's palace of the blue air." Leslie Stephen mourned when the Henley article came to undo, as it seemed, that good day's work. Perhaps it consoled him for his failure to effect, what he once planned, a visit from Stevenson to Carlyle. When Stephen went to Chelsea with the proposal that he should, on some future occasion, bring a young Scot who was keen to meet Carlyle, and who had taken to the study of Knox, the sage would only grunt that he did not see why anybody should want either to see his "wretched old carcass," or to say anything more about Knox. By a strange coincidence, Leslie Stephen was down to speak at a dinner of his favourite Alpine Club on the evening of the day on which the news of Stevenson's death darkened London; and he spoke of that passing away with an emotion which many who knew him only in his work have felt this week in hearing of his own.

WILFRID MEYNELL.

Science

The Yellow Peril—or Promise

I AM certain that some readers of my article of last week may have felt that I was taking a great deal for granted in speaking so confidently of a future fusion of the white and yellow races. Whilst giving my insignificant assent to Spencer's advice that the Japanese should, for the present, avoid inter-marriage with Europeans, I yet declared that such inter-marriages would one day be a matter of common occurrence, and hinted at the entire desirability of the event. As for the "Yellow Peril," the assertion of which is the latest move of the Continental press, and of which we have heard much lurid and foolish talk in time past, I made not so much as an allusion to it.

But the question is well worthy of discussion, and highly in need of consideration in a somewhat more reasoned manner than that to which we are accustomed. For if, indeed, there be a Yellow Peril, then it is a peril indeed—to us, if not to the future of humanity; whilst if there be not, there must certainly be alternatives well worthy of the gravest thought.

The present talk of the Yellow Peril, whilst unconsciously dealing with an essentially scientific subject, has all the characters that distinguish the ideas of any untrained mind. Most notably of all, it starts with an unproved assumption which, if disposed of, leaves it without any trace of a foundation in facts. The assumption, of course, is that a racial war—I use the word war in the usual sense—is the inevitable result of a racial awakening such as we anticipate for the Mongolian. But before anyone expects to be seriously regarded in this matter, before he has any right whatever to further hearing, he must first either demonstrate or give reasonable grounds for the probability that racial war is the inevitable consequence of the modernisation of the Mongol. And, to accomplish this, he obviously must consider all the possible alternatives, and give reasons for regarding them as less likely than that against which he would warn us. Now at least three possibilities are patent to the meanest mind. (It is not a high order of intellect, but merely a logical and scientific method of approaching the question that is here needed.) Thus the white race may exterminate—or subjugate—the yellow as the consequence of a racial war, or the yellow may exterminate—or subjugate—the white, or the two may fuse without war. Before we indulge in wild speculation about the Yellow Peril we must dispose of the first and third of these possibilities—not to mention others, such as the likelihood that each race has its appointed term, and that without any yellow invasion, the white race may come, by inevitable law, to a natural end produced by internal causes. I submit that this way of approaching the subject is no more or less than reasonable, and that the conclusions to which some protagonists of Russia are at present rushing, have precisely the worth that attaches to all conclusions based upon unproved assumptions.

Now, as to the first possibility—that the white race will exterminate, or subjugate, the yellow—there is at least one most significant fact which is, at all times and in almost all connexions, worth remembering. It is that the birth-rate in nearly all “civilised” countries—that is to say, the birth-rate amongst white races—has been falling for many years past, and is steadily, generally and perhaps inevitably falling to-day. Sorry indeed should I be to attempt the task of explaining this phenomenon; but I certainly believe that it is not a symptom of an inevitable race-decadence, but that it is, on the contrary, a preventable and largely voluntary consequence of our present mode of civilised life. There is absolutely no evidence whatever in favour of the view that a similar phenomenon is to be observed in China and Japan. There is, on the contrary, every reason to believe that the yellow race is increasing, at the present time, more rapidly than the white. Numbers, of course, are not everything; but at this stage in Far Eastern events there is no need to observe that the brains are not wanting to the race which might have received the promise to Abraham. It multiplies as the “sands of the sea,” but these yellow sands run to brains as well as grit. Wherefore I believe that the white race has small promise of exterminating—or subjugating—the yellow.

The argument at present, therefore, is in favour of the Yellow Peril, and would perhaps be welcomed as conclusive by anyone to whom the third alternative had not presented itself. But we must not forget it. Perhaps we may hazard the guess that European civilisation will make less prolific the race that adopts it, just as it has lessened the fecundity of the race which credits itself—I understand—with having invented it. (We may remember that our civilisation was born in Western Asia, and not in Greece, as the Hellenists would no doubt have us believe.) Let us grant, then, that the rate of increase of white and of yellow may ultimately become very similar. What is to happen? Well, if you believe—which I do not—that the white race is already nearing the term of its career, nothing better could happen for the world than that, by an infusion of new blood, it should be rejuvenated, or, at any rate, that the best elements of its life should be represented in a new World Race. But if you do not believe that the white race is already thus dying of old age, and if you recognise, as you must, that war plays, as the centuries pass, an ever lessening part in the world drama, and that it is in the highest degree improbable that white and yellow should regard such an appalling criterion as desirable or even conceivable, then you are left with the alternative of peaceful fusion. Already this process has begun in the treaty ports of Japan, and in Tokio. If you believe that each race would prefer war to fusion you deny the lesson of the past that race-hatred, strong as it still is, yet is characteristic of a primitive stage and of primitive peoples. It has played a great part—like war, its offspring—but science has pronounced its doom. Science has given us means of communication which are daily and rapidly reducing the size of the planet on which we live. Race-hatred, the product of ignorance, misunderstanding, lack of appreciation of each other's past, and utter absence of the conceptions that science has given us, is a thing doomed—thank Heaven—to die. Science looks for the day—of its own bringing—when humanity shall have a single consciousness and a united front in the last war—in which union will indeed be strength, as disunion in the past has been impotence—the war which man will wage, with a success of which the history of his evolution from the dust is a guarantee, against the evils within and the evils without—or, in other words, against that which must be conquered in the heredity and environment that have produced him.

C. W. SALEEBY.

Dramatic Notes

IT is not often that the dramatic critic pays two consecutive visits to the theatre and is rewarded by being provided with ample food for thought and with two interesting, human plays. Yet such was the good fortune that came to me last week, the two plays being the adaptation of M. Brieux' “La Robe Rouge” under the title of “The Arm of the Law” and Mr. W. Somerset Maugham's original play “A Man of Honour.” Each piece is an earnest and almost entirely successful attempt to deal with real problems of life and in each the situations are natural, the characters truly drawn and the dialogue terse and effective.

“THE ARM OF THE LAW” possesses no love story, but deals with a phase of French law, which may be summed up as the examination of prisoners before trial by the examining magistrate, which, if M. Brieux' picture be true, is a relic of the mediæval examination by torture, mental in place of physical. Mouzon, an examining magistrate, has but one object in life—self-aggrandisement, which he can most easily achieve by bringing malefactors to book and by permitting no crime to pass by without someone having been punished for it. Being without a conscience he sets to work to prove Etchepare guilty of a murder of which he is in reality guiltless, and but for the conscience of Vagret, the public prosecutor, would have succeeded in doing so by means the most despicable. In the examination preceding the trial Mouzon uses every effort to make Etchepare confess, he tortures the wretched man and his wife in a manner truly fiendish. In the end despite Mouzon the prisoner is acquitted, but at the trial a past sin of the wife, Yanetta, is brought to light for the unholy purpose of breaking down the prisoner and of prejudicing him with the jury, the result being that Etchepare throws his wife from him with rage and contumely. The play holds the attention from first to last; our sympathies are played upon and—the one real blot upon the piece—our horror is aroused, it being questionable whether any dramatist is justified in bringing horror before our eyes. In any case the physical violence, once or twice too apparent, should have been avoided. Another matter with which I find fault is the concluding scene in which Yanetta murders Mouzon. It is melodramatic and unnecessary; the close of the play would be finer, more truly tragic if the curtain fell upon the pathetic figure of the abandoned Yanetta. The scene is laid in Mauleon, a small town situated on the French borders of the Lower Pyrenees.

Of the acting in “The Arm of the Law” it would be difficult to speak too highly. Mr. Arthur Bourchier is excellent throughout as Mouzon, every gesture and word is true and effective, he has created a sinister figure which will linger long in the memory; Miss Violet Vanbrugh is very good as Yanetta, but her passions would be made more real if there were occasional periods of calm amid the storm and stress, a few notes of restrained agony amid the outbursts of rage and despair. No one who has watched his previous performances will be surprised at the success of Mr. Jerrold Robertshaw in the difficult part of Etchepare, difficult in that it might so easily have been overacted. Mr. Robertshaw shows great discretion and acts with sincerity and power.

LOVERS of good plays and good acting should hold it their duty to support such plays as “The Arm of the Law” and “A Man of Honour”; the dramatist who takes his art seriously and does indeed hold up the mirror to nature has a claim to encouragement which should not be denied by those who wish well to the theatre. If Mr. Maugham has not written a perfect play in "A Man of could by no effort make happy, and then he would have had our entire sympathy and best wishes. But it is almost ungracious to complain at all concerning such a fine work, upon which we may base the hope that Mr. Maugham may prove to be the dramatist for whom we have so long been calling.

Sir SQUIRE BANCROFT

[An early photograph taken Birmingham in the 'sixties.]

Honour," he has, at any rate, written one which is very interesting, suggestive, and full of promise. His theme is an old one—are there any new themes in life? Old but treated with freshness and truth to human nature. Basil Kent considers it incumbent on him as a man of honour to marry Jenny Bush, a barmaid, although he does not love her and is more than half in love with Mrs. Murray, a wealthy widow. The marriage turns out a failure, the couple are thoroughly incompatible; Kent's passion for Mrs. Murray increases and is returned; the wife discovers that "there is no room for her," commits suicide, and Kent is left free, though what use he makes of his freedom we are left to guess. This sketch of the plot reads commonplace, but the play is anything but that, only commonplace so far as the realities of life can be called so. The tragedy, for it is such, marches on with the sure step of fate, stage conventionalities are absent, each character works out his or her fortune, and the spectators watch the play as they would watch, sympathise with, and share in a tragedy in the lives of those with whom they mix in everyday life. It is painful but it is true. The only fault I have to find is that Mr. Maugham has chosen the wrong man for the central figure; Kent should have had a stronger moral fibre; having taken up his burden he should have proved strong enough to bear it, to the degree, at any rate, of concealing his passion for the second woman. He could have separated from his wife, with whom it was impossible for him to live and whom he

Good plays make good actors, and there were several good performances in "A Man of Honour." Mr. Ben Webster did not shirk anything in the part of Basil Kent, he brought out clearly the many sides of the character; Miss Muriel Wylford was absolutely true as Fanny, never exaggerating the pathos or the emotion: a really memorable performance; and Mr. George Trollope was admirable as the despicable cockney cad, James Bush; all, indeed, were good. Again, let us hope that such a play and such acting will meet with due and prompt reward of popular success.

THE performances of "Romeo and Juliet" at the Court Theatre go far to prove that sumptuous mounting is not necessary for an interesting production of a Shakespeare play. But Mr. J. H. Leigh should have taken a little more care and have used greater taste in the selection of his scenery; magnificence is not called for, but discretion and artistic sense are needed. The Hall of Capulet's House and Juliet's Chamber show how much can be done and what beauty achieved by simple means. The acting is on the whole fairly good, the actors speak their words clearly and enter into the spirit of their parts. Mr. Charles Lander, however, lacks passion, his love is but cold; on the other hand Miss Thirza Norman is really charming as Juliet and Juliet should charm us. She is girlish, sweet-voiced, and pretty, rousing in us a deep sympathy for her pitiful fate. A Juliet to see and to remember.

MR. ANTHONY HOPE hit upon a theme for an excellent farce and Mr. Harrison Rhodes persuaded him to utilise it for a light comedy in three acts; or was it the reverse way? Collaboration presents difficulties to the critic who would rightly apportion blame or praise, not that in the case of "Captain Dieppe" there is much call for the latter. It is all so old-fashioned and so full of stage conventions: compromising letters, coincidences, detectives, black-haired villains, unnatural misunderstandings, jealous husbands, flirtatious wives and so on and so forth. The scenery is quite beautiful.

ARTHUR SCHNITZLER's work always demands attention and is always interesting. A new five-act drama, "Der Einsame Weg" (The Lonely Road) has just been produced at the Deutsche Theatre, Berlin. It both attracts and repels us. It presents the tragic history of two men, each an egotist in a different way, who have gone through life destroying instead of building up, and thus when they begin to grow old and to feel a need of human sympathy and affection, cannot win it anywhere. The underlying moral teaches that unselfishness and kindness towards others are sure to bring forth fruit, while lack of such qualities lead to the lonely desert. Needless to say the play was perfectly acted.

MR. J. M. BARRIE's "Quality Street," called "Im Stillten Gässchen" in the German version, had but a moderate success at Leipzig.

FRENCH playgoers must be getting somewhat tired of anti-semitism on the stage. "Décadence," M. Guinon's new play just brought out at the Vaudeville, should have been called "The Two Races." But the plot is really only an old friend with a new face. Formerly the daughter of a ruined nobleman, who had mortgaged all his property, married a rich ironmaster to set things right. Now she marries—at least in stageland—a rich Jew. Guinon certainly shows quite impartially the faults of both sorts of people, the pampered aristocrat and the self-satisfied Jew. Their words are always violent, and their actions weak. The last act is the best where the rich husband points out to his aristocratic wife, who loathes poverty, how very poor she will be if she deserts him for her lover, the marquis. He succeeds in winning her back, the material part of her that is, but her soul belongs to the marquis. The play is, of course, thoroughly well acted by the Vaudeville Company.

"LA BOULE," the chef d'œuvre of Meilhac and Halévy, is to be revived shortly at the Variétés, after an interval of fifteen years, with a splendid cast.

JANE HADING has just given four performances—"La Châtelaine," "Frou-Frou," "La Princesse Georges," and "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray"—with immense success at the Royal Theatre, Athens. The last was a veritable triumph.

A FLEMISH version of Schiller's "Maria Stuart" has been attracting large audiences to the Flemish Theatre in Brussels.

MUTTER LANDSTRASSE. DAS ENDE EINER JUGEND. Schauspiel in drei Aufzügen von Wilhelm Schmidt-Bonn. (Berlin: Fleischel. 1m.)

THE tone and mood of an old folk-song breathes through this little prose play. It is the work rather of a poet than of a dramatist, and of a youthful poet. It depicts the return of a prodigal son who was not received with feasting and rejoicing. The scene in which his father brutally tells him it is hunger, and not love and remorse, which has driven him home, is full of point and insight. He shows Hans how his carelessness, his want of consideration for others, has brought suffering and misery on those he pretends to love, on his father, his mother, his wife, his child. Finally the father offers to take charge of the wife and child, but for Hans he will do nothing, he must wander farther along the road; and it is only then that Hans seems to realise that the fault of it all lies with himself. Trude, the wife, ill and hungry as she is, at first refuses to separate herself from her husband, whom she passionately loves, despite his misdoings. But at length Hans decides to go, and takes a pathetic farewell of Trude while she sleeps the sleep of exhaustion. He hears the Minstrel calling to him in his music:—

How beautifully you play, Minstrel! You ought to stand in a richly furnished and brilliantly lighted hall, and there draw such sounds from your fiddle, instead of wandering along the road in torn shoes. What is there in the open road that makes a man like you set it above everything on earth? How beautifully you play! What is all the suffering that comes from men compared with the everlasting peace that comes from those sounds. . . . The Minstrel tells me clearly that it's the open road which passes before your door. I will traverse it, over the hills, and see what lies behind them. That's the last consolation for such as I am. Those whom men cast out, the white road receives. It shall accept me as a son. There is the empire over which I am king, there am I as free as a bird. There are meadows and sunshine and the song of birds, and all is mine. Where

I please, I lay myself down in the grass and look up to the sky. I accompany any one I choose a little way and gladly listen to him, and if none smiles a welcome at me, I continue alone. Every mountain spring is mine, and all the fruit.

At times bald realism prevails in the talk, at others, as the above example sufficiently shows, the author lets his characters give voice to their inmost feelings in the most poetical language. Indeed, it is just the beauty of the words and of the sentiment that lies behind them that inclines us to forget the lack of true dramatic and psychological development. As to characterisation, the author is perhaps most successful with the women and with the wandering minstrel who, with a benign wisdom, observes mankind. And yet not without subtlety is it indicated that Hans, despite his worthlessness, wins plenty of love: from women, from casual travellers on the road, from his father's dogs who refuse to harm him, and from the servants who refuse to turn him out by violent means, even at their master's bidding. The atmosphere of the little play reminds us of Maeterlinck. Its charm is indubitable. We remember reading a little while ago an English novel, "The Winding Road," by Elizabeth Godfrey, that made on us much the same impression as this German play.

Musical Notes

THE controversy which has been waged in a contemporary concerning the music of Brahms has been interesting and instructive. The correspondent who maintained that those who cannot perceive the beauty of Brahms' music had no right to speak on the subject was going too far in saying this, of course. As Mr. R. A. Streatfeild properly pointed out, it is not only the function but the duty of the critic to express his own opinions whether these be right or wrong and whether they have the support of established authority or not. But while one may admit that anyone has a perfect right to call Brahms' music dull or dreary or dismal, or anything else, it is equally indisputable that such an one must be an object of sincere pity to those more happily constituted in this respect.

No doubt much nonsense has been written concerning Brahms by some of his more extravagant worshippers. No doubt, too, it is still too early to determine what position in relation to the greater masters Brahms will ultimately take. No doubt, further, he did put his name to many compositions which have little but their technical excellence to commend them. To represent that everything which Brahms wrote is of equal or of enduring value is absurd. But every composer has a right to be judged by his best, and when one calls to mind the glorious compositions in almost every form to be numbered among those which Brahms left the world, it becomes matter for sheer amazement that anyone possessed of any musical perceptions at all should fail to be moved by these. When one thinks of such chamber works as the B flat quartet, the clarinet quintet, and the first sextet, of such orchestral music as that contained in any of the symphonies, or of such choral music as the German Requiem supplies, or of such songs as "Wo bist du meine Königin," or "Meine Liebe ist grün," or "So willst du des Armen," or scores of others which might be named, it is hard indeed to resist the conclusion that the anti-Brahmsites must really be tone deaf.

MOREOVER while conceding theoretically the right of every musician to his own opinion on such matters there are limits even here. If one were to come forward for example and declare, as a musician, that he found Beethoven, say, insupportable and reckoned him a wholly overrated master, one would admire his courage but would hardly respect his critical faculty. He would be perfectly justified in saying these things if he thought them. At the same time he would be giving himself away as an authority upon the art. Only a rabid partisan would attempt to place Brahms on the same footing as Beethoven. Yet there are certain works of Brahms, such as those above named and many more, inability to enjoy which seems to me hardly more inexplicable—I have in mind of course the case of cultivated musicians—than inability to appreciate Beethoven or Mozart.

In this matter of composers and their worth, it is not always realised that even in the case of the greatest masters it is only authority after all which establishes their fame—the consensus of opinion on the subject, that is to say, on the part of educated musicians. Neither the excellence nor the worthlessness of any music can be scientifically demonstrated. There is no means of actually proving that the C minor symphony, say, is a greater composition than the “Washington Post.” It is open to anyone to maintain the contrary if he feels disposed to do so. And by way of reply it can only be pointed out that the majority of cultivated musicians are against his view. Which is, of course, the argument of authority and nothing else. While, therefore, to come back to the point from which I started, every man is entitled to his own opinions concerning Brahms or Beethoven or Sousa, or any other composer, it is none the less pertinent and proper to cite against him the counter opinions of acknowledged judges in order to convince him of the error of his ways.

“AMORELLE,” the latest of the musical pieces (words by Mr. Barton White and music by M. Gaston Serpette), is not a very notable addition to the list, but in the person of Mr. Willie Edouin it enjoys the services of a comedian who may be trusted in due course to make the most of what, at present, can only be regarded as a somewhat unpromising part. On the opening night matters went very heavily, it must be confessed. But one would never think of pronouncing judgment on a musical comedy on the strength of its first performance, which properly should be regarded merely in the light of an experimental sketch to be worked on at will by all concerned until the desired result has been attained. When such needful changes have been made in the case of “Amorelle,” no doubt with the aid of such popular artists as Miss Mahelle Gilman, Miss Claire Romaine, Mr. Sydney Barraclough and others, it will develop into a sufficiently amusing entertainment.

In one of the musical comedies now running, a syndicate is described as a “large body of men entirely surrounded by money.” It is interesting to read that such an organization has been created with a view to obtaining control of the various operatic houses in Italy. Precisely how this rather considerable undertaking is to be accomplished on the strength of a modest capital of £4,000 is not indicated. But the statement is interesting as affording evidence of the fact that even in operatic Italy, where the subsidy system prevails, the result has not been all that could be wished. In point of fact the tendency of recent years has been all against the continuance of these grants in aid—various towns which formerly granted subsidies having latterly discontinued them. For particulars whereof see the recently issued Return.

A PARODY of Tchaikowsky's “1812” overture in the shape of an “Overture Anti-solenelle, 1903,” is a feature of the current programme, I notice, at the Palace Theatre. The composer is given as one Finckowsky, whom it is not too speculative perhaps to assume to be related to Mr. Herman Finck, the capable conductor of the orchestra at that attractive place of entertainment. In which connection is it not rather surprising that musical jeux d'esprit of this order are not more frequently attempted? Why should the skit and the parody be confined to literature? When will a musical humourist arise who shall do for the art of Wagner and Richard Strauss what Calverley, Seaman, and a score of others have done for the art of Tennyson and Browning. There would assuredly be no lack of material. Such things are done in private, of course, and occasionally in public by the popular entertainer. But why are they never published?

SOME of my readers may be glad to be reminded that the usual performance of Bach's “St. John” Passion music are being given on Fridays throughout Lent at St. Anne's, Soho. It is rather deplorable that in London we should be more or less dependent for such performances on the efforts of a small church choir and a scratch orchestra. But the enterprise displayed in the preparation of these special services at St. Anne's year after year, under the direction of the church's accomplished organist Mr. E. H. Thorne, is deserving of heartiest recognition. It was, I believe, the late Sir Joseph Barnby who originated these particular performances, which goes to remind one of the useful truth that the good, as well as the evil, which men do occasionally lives after them.

MURET-SANDERS' GERMAN DICTIONARIES.

MURET-SANDERS' ENCYCLOPÆDIC DICTIONARY of the ENGLISH and GERMAN LANGUAGES. Unabridged Edition. 4 vols. royal 8vo, half calf, £4 4s. Used in all Government Offices and Libraries.

MURET-SANDERS' ENGLISH-GERMAN and GERMAN-ENGLISH DICTIONARY for Schools and General Readers. Abridgment of the “Encyclopædic Dictionary.” 2 vols. 8vo, half calf, 16s.

MURET-SANDERS' ENGLISH-GERMAN and GERMAN-ENGLISH POCKET DICTIONARY for quick Reference and Conversation. 1 vol. 16mo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

London: H. GREVEL & Co., 33, King Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

THE TATLER

EDITED BY

CLEMENT SHORTER.

The Lightest, Brightest, and most Interesting

SOCIETY and DRAMATIC PAPER
EVER PUBLISHED.

THE TATLER

An Up-to-Date Society Paper.

Society and the Stage Richly Illustrated Week by Week.

The Best Printing.

The Best Paper, The Best Contents of any Paper of its kind.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY.
PRICE SIXPENCE.

Can be obtained of all Newsagents, and at all Bookstalls.

Offices: GREAT NEW STREET, E.C.

Art Notes

I WAS glad to see that the Old Water-Colour Society had elected with Mr. Sargent and Mr. Tuke and Mr. Cameron, so exquisite an artist, and poet in his art, as Mr. Cadogan Cowper. Mr. Sargent it would be ridiculous to praise at the summit of his high career; and Mr. Tuke's open-air painting is as well known as Mr. Cameron's etchings and largely handled water colours with their rich warm yellow, brown, and scarlet preferences. But Mr. Cadogan Cowper is an artist's artist; and I fancy that most people will raise eyebrows of inquiry at his name. Yet he is one of our few living poetic painters. His six months' of assistantship to Mr. Edwin Abbey have been a happy completion to his schooling at the Academy. There was just the chance that his exquisite and graceful art and his dainty fancy might escape the rewards of public appreciation; but his election to the Old Water-Colour Society is a happy augury of his future success, and he deserves early recognition.

At the Fine Art Society's rooms in Bond Street may be seen an interesting little collection of water-colours by Mr. Wilfrid Ball, showing his wonted dexterity and skill and quickness of vision. In the other rooms there is on view a remarkably fine collection of engravings and drawings of the "London of the Georges," which will be of more than usual interest to collectors. The artistic merit of many of these old prints is sometimes as high as their old-world fascination; for in and through them all runs the strange fascination that old historic London holds for all who have imagination. Every day she changes her complexion like some perverse beauty. To dwell amongst these old pictures of her for an hour is to live in a London that is wholly different to the London of our days—her doorways, her very windows, seem to have changed; and yet, through all her disguises, we hear the same fascinating voice. Her dress seems but an affair of fashion after all—in and under all is the London that we know, a city by itself, a city like none other in all the vast world. Had Christopher Wren dressed her as he designed, she would even so have stamped her personality upon the splendid dress he would have had her wear. Many of these fine engravings would make charming decorations for the wall; and all of them hold something of fairy in them—a glimpse of the land that was "once upon a time."

At the Dutch Gallery in Brook Street is an exhibition of the lithographs of Fantin-Latour, which contains such fine works as his flower-piece, "Bouquet de Roses," and his large, and perhaps one of his most masterly pieces, "Hélène." In the "Hélène" we have his arrangement in black and white at its highest; and there is a sense of beauty in the nude, the lack of which is generally the chief fault in his lithography, his figures of women being heavy and clumsy in form. The lithograph of the roses is a masterpiece—in the sense of colour and the magic of the thing. Here also is his piece dedicated "à Stendhal," which shows his light touch to great perfection, especially after the eye has become rather cloyed with the vibrant trick of his florid pencil; and here also is his beautiful "Solitude" (Schumann) in its second state. Mr. van Wisselingh never gives us a commonplace exhibition.

At the Modern Gallery Mr. T. W. Allen shows a large number of his landscapes in oils, water-colours, and charcoal.

At Agnew's Galleries in Bond Street is an exhibition of works by the great English masters of water-colour that must mean the placing of a considerable sum of money on the walls of this small room. David Cox and Turner are well represented, and amongst the masters there is a

View from Mr. Cosway's Breakfast Room, Pall Mall, with the Portrait of Mrs. Cosway
Painted by W. Hodges & R. Cosway; engraved by W. Birch, 1789.
(Exhibited at the Fine Art Society's Gallery.)

"Venice" by Müller that places him amongst the greatest of them all.

MISS MARGARET THOMPSON shows a number of water-colour drawings of the interiors of the historic houses of Hatfield, Warwick, and Knole at the Stafford Gallery, whose managers have begun to produce their coloured reproductions of Mr. Nicholson's delightful water-colour drawings of Oxford, and there is no doubt that these will be eagerly sought after by the undergraduates and the hundreds of those who love the glorious scenes of their youth with the love of youth. Oxford is indeed fortunate in having caught the fancy of William Nicholson.

MESSRS. SOTHERAN have on view at their well-known bookshop in Piccadilly a selection from the illustrations for the Bible, drawn by Tissot. Perhaps one of the strangest freaks in the history of nineteenth-century artists was the sudden desertion by Tissot of trivial modish social subjects, and his passionate aim to illustrate the Bible. One can imagine no more unpromising training. It was perhaps an essential part of such a man's nature that he should aim at painting the scenes in a purely realistic manner, and, calculating that in the East the fashions change but slowly, he essayed to reproduce the story of the genius of the Jews in terms of to-day. The loss in imagination and emotion was inevitable—to approach the grandeur of the Biblical story with the realistic spirit is to play at being a god in a billy-cock hat. But given the realistic point of view, Tissot did as quaint a Bible story in pictures as the world has seen. It is when he has a chance of displaying humour, odd to say, that his art serves him best, as in the boy Joseph being sold to Potiphar. The quaint decorative effect of the flying ducks overhead as the lad Ishmael draws his bow to let fly an arrow is really quite fine. But it is nearly always when Tissot is furthest away from what one may call the Biblical spirit that he is happiest in his designs.

THE annual volume of "Art," the first volume of that artistic venture, makes a handsome book, and is a good guide to contemporary Dutch and Belgian art. It contains a paper on the sculptor Meunier, a reproduction of Rubens's glorious landscape in the Royal Museum at Brussels, and an excellent half-tone block of Rembrandt's portrait of himself as a young man from the Pacully Collection in Paris.

THE Royal Society of Painter-Etchers and Engravers have a gallery as small as their name is cumbersome; but the gallery contains several charming things. The accomplished and musical line of the Frenchman Helleu a'most sings in a very beautiful portrait of "Mademoiselle C.," and his fine craftsmanship gives distinction to some half-dozen other etchings at this year's show. Mr. Brangwyn shows the same grasp and mastery over etching that he has shown over every medium that he has used; indeed, both he and Mr. East display a large masterly quality and a poetic sense in the etched plate which sound a welcome note of the grand manner amidst much that is only too trivial and hesitating and "finicking." Amongst several plates that it would be a delight to possess was Mr. Hartley's "Twilight." Altogether a most interesting show. The special exhibition this year from the work of the old masters is a series of engravings by Andrea Mantegna.

MESSRS. METHUEN publish a wholly charming series of art monographs, entitled "Little Books on Art," which are a wonderful half-crown's worth. The number on "Greek Art" is good reading; and gives very fair illustrations of the different stages in the development of the great art of this wondrous people. But in the "Sir Joshua Reynolds" we get a really excellent biography, and considering the size of the book, a remarkably good series of illustrations of Sir Joshua's genius. This book is supplemented by "A Little Gallery of Reynolds," of which I cannot speak so highly, for the illustrations ought to have been double the size. In all these little books the cover-designs are a model of good taste. Altogether Mr. Sime is to be heartily congratulated on his little life of Reynolds, and the publishers on the very good illustrating of the same. The volume on Watts by Mr. Sketchley naturally does not lend itself to a very frank biography of a living man; but there is much interesting matter within its small limits, which if not so masterly in its grip of biography as Mr. Sime's "Reynolds" makes excellent reading. I am glad to see that the author supports Mr. MacColl in his passionate appeal to the nation to have a bronze cast of Watts's superb equestrian statue for Kingsway. It is a strange comment on the lack of the love of art in our public bodies that the Government should not have leaped to secure so great a masterpiece for the beautifying and glory of London. It is a fortunate thing for art that artists are imbued with the glory of their art and not dependent on the vulgar eyes of political demigods. Methuen's "Little Books on Art" are valuable gems.

I SEE that a monument is to be raised to the memory of the founder of the "Graphic," Mr. W. L. Thomas. It is a wonder to me that the men who benefitted in pocket and in reputation by the shrewd good sense and business capacity of this able man have not so raised a monument by private subscription—for he made many careers and started the argosies of several men's fortunes. He made only one great blunder in his life—he served his political party in a blind dog-like way that ensured his being passed over in the showering of honours. If there is one editor in London who deserved a baronetcy more than another for his loyalty to his party it was W. L. Thomas. But he never understood politics, far less the way to win prizes from party; he never caused his party a moment of uneasiness; and he met his reward by being passed over. The most fitting reward would be for the party he served so well to honour the dead man's family; but his friends and all such as benefitted by his business astuteness could do worse than raise a bronze bust to his memory.

F. C. G. is to be congratulated on the artistic promise of his son, Mr. A. Carruthers Gould, whose exhibition, with the works of Mr. H. Fischer at the Doré Gallery, discovers him as a colourist and a poet in the translation of nature's moods. I would only say this, that in some of the twilight landscapes, true and delightful as is the colour by which the mood of evening is given, there is such a thing as overdoing the flat silhouette of trees in the waning light, and the suggestion of the leafage would often have given a valuable sense of roundness and what one may call "tree-iness" without destroying the value of the silhouetted trees, at the same time that it would have enhanced the charm of the landscape.

Is the International Society of Sculptors, Painters, and Engravers going to lose its strength by internal dissensions? Why is Mr. Derwent Wood resigning? What are all these rumours and counter rumours? Ah! the sturdy old Royal Academy has only to sit still and wait, and—the great rivals break to pieces and dwindle and fall to ruin; the "house opposite" becomes divided against itself; and the Royal Academy nods and smiles and continues to act as a "private society."

ONE of the most interesting of forthcoming exhibitions of one-man work will open at Hanover Gallery, in Bond Street, on March 15. The artist is a Belgian who has studied in Brussels and now resides in Surrey. M. Edouard van Goetheim paints en plein air with taste, conviction and a great deal of talent; his pictures of beach, boats and babies have a peculiar and individual charm which should render the exhibition particularly delightful.

THE Annual Exhibition of the Royal Amateur Art Society (President, Her Majesty the Queen) will be held this year at Moncorvo House, Ennismore Gardens, by kind permission of Mr. and the Hon. Mrs. Gretton, on March 5 to 8 inclusive, in aid of the usual London charities. Intending exhibitors should apply to the Hon. Sec., the Hon. Mrs. Mallet, 38, Rutland Gate, S.W.

IN connection with the above, a loan collection of miniatures by the late George Engleheart and John Smart will be shown. Owners of works by these artists who are willing to lend them for exhibition are requested to communicate with the Hon. Sec. of the Loan Annex, the Hon. Sybil Legh, Royal Court Hotel, Sloane Square, S.W.

University Extension

A Suggestion to the Provinces

I FEEL indebted to the writer of the third letter on University Extension in last week's ACADEMY. He has forestalled me in laying stress on this lagging behind in the provinces. "Lack of a strong lead" is the root of the matter. In many cases there would seem to be no lead at all. I have frequently made lengthy stays in provincial towns in different parts of the country, and I do not remember ever to have come across any evidence of the working of the movement. It is true that I have not been looking for such evidence, being then unconscious of this educational force. But that surely is the proper test of its influence. When, by accident or design initiated by yourself, you come into contact with this force, when you know the existence even of this "Extension" business and understand its aims and inner workings, you begin to know something about the courses of lectures. Back in London, you suddenly discover from the printed matter you have succeeded in obtaining that there was a course of lectures, important to you, being delivered in — all the time you were making it your abode. Such information is then of little use.

The above must be the facts in scores of cases. All the burrowing has to be done by each individual; there is no canvassing for Extension students, no propagating of the movement. It would be interesting to have testimony of this from others, and some of the experiences of provincial readers on their introduction to University Extension.

Yes, we have museums, libraries, art galleries, and "Carnegie-libraries"—"How to use these institutions is still a lesson to be taught," says the correspondent I have already referred to.

How to assimilate knowledge is the keynote of all education. By merely getting together the materials you do nothing. The provincial libraries (Carnegie ones or otherwise)—many already with a museum or gallery incorporated—surely offer the easiest of starting points for a live working of the Extension Movement. The librarians have it in their power to develop a great work. Let them take the recent Bibliographical lecture* at the British Museum as a suggestion for similar lectures at their own libraries. Delivered under the auspices of the local centre, such a lecture would create a desire for more—people would begin to clamour for that absent "lead." You would no longer be liable to remain for long in the town without any knowledge of the educational work going on around you. And, after all, there is no starting of the machine to be achieved. Everything is all there ready, just waiting to be pushed a little faster. But, especially to one cognisant of the energy apparent in the London movement, the Provincial wheels are rolling very slowly. It will be easier to do the work that must be done if help is applied now before any parts actually cease from working owing to sheer inaction of those primarily responsible.

* See THE ACADEMY, February 6.

THE Spring Announcements Number of THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE will be published on March 19. All communications for this issue should reach us by March 10 at latest.

Correspondence

Shakespeare Memorial

SIR,—As a humble member of the London Shakespeare Commemoration League, and as one wishing to support in the small degree possible to me the aim of that League to erect, at last, in London—shamed, surely, by its long indifference and even by its present apathy—a suitable memorial to London's poet, may I be permitted to say a word, I hope not out of season at this juncture?

Since the relation of the work of Shakespeare to the London of his time was so ably demonstrated by Mr. T. F. Ordish in his book on "Shakespeare's London," it has been, I suppose, apparent to those interested in the subject that the commemoration movement must issue in a memorial, or the patriotism on which London prides itself be proved an empty pretence. London's Shakespeare! Shakespeare's London! Is there not a thrill in the mere conjunction of the words? Could pages of eloquence carry an appeal more directly to a citizen's heart? And so, at last, the spell begins to work. Active steps are to be taken. Mr. Ordish, in the "Cornhill Magazine" of the present month, suggests—most opportunely it seems to me—a site. Mr. Badger comes forward with a munificent donation. Other subscriptions will now, no doubt, pour in, and in a short time we shall be confronted with the consideration of the form which the memorial shall take.

It is on this matter, and before the process of crystallisation overtakes this plan or that, I would wish to speak my word of warning.

The suggestion made by the founder of the League that the memorial should take the shape of a reproduction of the old Globe Theatre has been, I think, happily abandoned by him, and a scheme for the erection of a modern theatre is now favoured. Such theatre to be built (by public subscription, of course,) on a site granted by the London County Council, and endowed, I believe, by the State. This seems to me but a small improvement on his former proposition, but that is matter for future debate. What I would say is, let no one's pet scheme take the field till public opinion is ascertained. Let us wait until the great sleepy public is fully aroused from its lethargy—the process has well begun—and is frantic—as once aroused, the British public is sure to become—to record itself alive to its duties and its privileges. Then the London County Council, which in the meantime could become the trustee of a fund of which Mr. Badger's generous offer could form the nucleus, will be moved to grant a site, either that suggested at Westminster or some other, and a suitable memorial to Elizabeth's poet will at last be created in Edward's London. All this it seems is now on the way to accomplishment, but it is a moment which demands general enthusiasm, not criticism directed to any particular point. The ultimate aim must not be jeopardised by conflicting egoism, and the fads of individuals. In the matter of a memorial to Shakespeare, the poet not of a clique but of worlds, let none be of a party—all for the State.

And now, having said the word (with your kind permission) which the occasion seemed to demand and reason to dictate, let me, with feminine inconsistency, record the fact that, when the time is ripe for such selection, I myself shall vote for the form suggested by Mr. Badger himself—a form I think more likely to be the people's choice, less likely to lead to conflict of opinion than that of a theatre: a statue. In the age of Rodin, with English sculptors like George Frampton available, surely it might likewise be a work of Art!

I seem to see a wide, open space, planted, let us say, with "the woodbine, the sweet honeysuckle," the lily, "mistress of the field"; with "violets dim, but sweeter than the lids of Juno's eyes," "the marigold that goes to bed with the sun, and with him rises weeping"; "with 'hot lavender,' and those 'fairest flowers of the season' . . . our carnations and streak'd gilly flowers"—with these, and that green among them all "which by any other name would smell as sweet"—the flowers which Shakespeare loves. And rising from the centre of such space, sacred to the plants and blossoms which "to his music ever sprung," on huge, rough hewn base, and each standing forth on rough hewn base of its own, clear against the sky, those dearer creations of his brain; and so, up and up the enduring rock still figures standing forth, and still and still — until above them all stands the poet, looking down with mildly brooding brow upon the surging millions, moved at last to record the fact that he is Theirs and that they Love him.—Yours, &c.,

Shropham Manor.

MARY E. MANN.

SIR,—In entire sympathy with your notes in to-day's issue on the proposed Shakespeare memorial in London, I desire to place upon record my profound conviction, which I am sure is shared by very many Shakespeare lovers, that the memory and study of the poet will be much better served by some such scheme as you suggest, than by either a statue or a theatre. The atmospheric conditions of London render out-door statuary an artistic impossibility. We have a hundred instances of this in our streets and squares. A Shakespeare Theatre would be a profitless and superfluous institution. The national cult of the poet, so far as the great theatre-going public is concerned, is little beyond mere lip-service. Mr. Tree and Mr. Benson give, in their respective manners, adequate representations at frequent intervals. Within my theatrical recollection there has rarely been a time when there has not been at least one theatre playing Shakespeare, and this number has often been increased to three and even four.

Remains, therefore, the proposal for a permanent institution for Shakespeare study in London. There is no need to enter into rivalry with Stratford-on-Avon, which will always retain its place of honour as the Mecca of the poet's lovers. But Shakespeare spent by far the greater part of his working life in London. The town, as he knew it, was intensely different in nearly every respect from the London of to-day. But there are many prints, relics, memorials and maps of Elizabethan London, and it should not be a difficult matter to collect, on loan, or by purchase, a representative selection thereof, to convey to the student a comprehensive and homogeneous survey of the London in which Shakespeare lived, acted and wrote. To such a permanent exhibition I would add a lecture-room, where Shakespearean societies, public and private, might meet and debate; a representative portrait gallery of great Shakespearean actors, critics and commentators; and finally, a Shakespearean library, to which loans and donations should be craved, so as to make it as representative as possible.

Such an institution, I take it, would in time form a worthy memorial to our greatest poet, and would redeem London from the somewhat undesired stigma of failing to honour him adequately.

The nucleus of a fund with this object being, as I understand, already provided, there should surely be little difficulty in increasing it to the total amount required. It should have the hearty support of every lover of Shakespeare and London—and every right-thinking man and woman is both of these.—Yours, &c.,
February 20, 1904. F. S.

"Tolstoi and the Babies"

SIR,—It is pleasing to hear of Mr. Saleeby's delight that "a Student in Holy Orders" should regard the doctrine that the All-Good Father made human nature "desperately wicked" as "colossal nonsense," for I am sure that all other students of theology would regard it in the same light.

The doctrine of original sin teaches, as far as I know it, that the supposed universal tendency in human nature to sin, rather than righteousness, is the consequence of a human act; what I want is some authority for the statement that "the theologians assure us" that it was implanted in man by a Divine Act.—Yours, &c.,
STUDENT IN HOLY ORDERS.

[The theologians assure us of the existence of an All-Good and omnipotent First Cause, without which there could obviously be no human act, sinful or otherwise. They also assure us that human nature is "desperately wicked." It is not my fault that the two statements are incompatible, but it is the right of everyone—and I have exercised my share in it—to put the two assertions together, and thereby demonstrate the palpable contradiction between them. But of course I quite understand that the only chance for dogmatic theology is to prevent the comparison of its contradictory assertions. Isolate the noble belief in an All-Good First Cause in one cerebral convolution, and the "desperately wicked" theory in another, and the theologians claim you as a disciple; but utilise the association fibres between those two convolutions, and of course they repudiate your conclusion as "colossal nonsense," but it is of their making. Had I inquired of a theologian how he reconciled All-Goodness in the Cause and desperate wickedness in the Caused, he would have said, "Ah! that is the mystery." I prefer my challenger's phrase, "colossal nonsense."—C. W. SALEEBY.]

A Psychological Mystery

SIR,—Your contributor, who relates his startling experience in regard to preknowledge of the verbal contents of unread books, has happened upon what seems to be an absolutely insoluble psychological enigma; and, in having foreknowledge of the very words of unfamiliar (or rather unperused) works, he seems to be unique.

Appropos of this subject, the following words of Samuel Warren are not devoid of interest:—

"I do not know how to express it, but I have several times had a consciousness of mere ordinary incidents, then occurring, having somehow or other happened before, accompanied by a vanishing idea of being able to predict the sequence."

Still, this latter is probably a common experience—I, for one, have frequently observed it—but to find the very sentences in a new book familiar is indeed amazing.

Pre-existence seems a too chimerical hypothesis to be tenable.

Can it be that memory is hereditary? Have we here a kind of atavism?—Yours, &c.,

Alderwasley, near Wirksworth,
Derbyshire.

J. B. WALLIS.

Byron's Seamew.

SIR,—

"The Night-winds sigh, the breakers roar,
And shrieks the wild Sea-mew."

—"Childe Harold," T. 13.

It is assumed that the poet means a gull, say, larus marinus, or "great black back," whose cry is hoarse and disagreeable; that, however, does not appear to have been the original meaning of the word seamew, for indeed it has descended to us from classical antiquity.

Homer, Iliad ix., 563, introduces us to the word "halcyone" in his version of the history of Althoea of Calydon in Etolia, she was mother to the hero Meleager, whose wife Cleopatra had her name changed into Halcyone; this story is introduced as an episode to influence Achilles, for Meleager likewise got sullen and abstained from battle until an impending catastrophe occurred, when he reappeared and ended the contest.

Ovid (Mett viii., xi.) is very diffuse on the pathetic story of Ceyx, husband to Alcyone, who, lamenting his decease, they by divine intervention were both changed into mournful sea fowls, who pair together.

Chaucer, in his short poem on the death of the Lady Blanche, dilates at great length on part of Ovid's narrative; he describes himself as a victim to insomnia, so he reads himself to sleep and then dreams about the visit of Morpheus disguised as Seys (for Keux) to comfort Alcione; but he drops all allusion to the birds. Indeed we have another version whereby Ceyx is metamorphosed into a Keux, variously defined as a diver, a dipper, or a coote, totally different birds to the halcyone; how then could they pair together and nest among the sea-wrack, floating on the surface of the Arctic Ocean.

Now the gull is a sea bird and some species do breed in England; among them Yarrell defines a sea-mall, and a maw gull, varying his orthography to sea-maw and sea-mew; there is also a smew. We know all about the "sea" in A. S., and the mew; but the earliest mention of the compound known to me is in the "Promptorium Parvulorum," an early Anglo-Latin vocabulary, circa 1499, with the following variants: mowe, byrd, or semewe.

Semow byrd, with three definitions: (1) aspergo [a diver or dipper] to replace the Keux; (2) Alcio, i.e., the human female, Alcione; (3) alcedo, the Latin form of Alcyone, supposed a kingfisher.

So the kingfisher, known to science as alcedo, represents the fabulous birds in whose favour a period of peaceful calm, known as halcyon days, was conceded in midwinter, that the incubation of thier progeny might prosper; but our kingfisher is a land bird that preys on freshwater fish.

This change was especially designed to perpetrate the dolours of the human Alcione, and we see that the whole scheme of such process is a survival of metempsychosis; and its artificial character is proved by the amount of alliteration involved in the names chosen; thus the glossy blue, or resplendent azure, found in the kingfisher's plumage, may pair with the Greek kuanos; and the English suffix "mew" certainly represents the plaintive voice of the widowed Alcione. The kingfisher, among primitive people, was quasi-sacred, for in central Asia the pelt is preserved as an amulet, a bright breast ornament. This suffix mew, maw, mow, varies to mell or mall, French miauler (to mew).

The late Mr. Waterton protested against any attempt to class the Halcyone as a "gull"; he points out the different structure and incapacity for oceanic flight; still the fishing habit may stand as a survival of past existences and represent a true physical metamorphosis in the struggle for existence. The real interest of this investigation is matter of literary criticism about Shakespeare's text, in the "Tempest," where Caliban offers his services, thus :—

"Sometimes I'll get the young scamels from the rock."

It is proposed to substitute "cliff" for rock, and to read scamels for scamels; but scammel is an established patronymic and scambler, of Norfolk, has a grant of armorial bearings from 1591, most probably for shamble as a Lenten diet, mainly of cod or shell fish.—Yours, &c.,

Highbury.

A. HALL.

University Extension

SIR,—All who are interested in the University Extension Movement will be grateful to you for the article which appeared in your issue of January 30, but there seems to be a suggestion in that article that the Extension work of the older Universities is in some senses dropping behind, and that a stimulus to it is required similar to that which has recently been given to the movement in London. I should be the last to deny that stimulus is always healthy, but I must demur to the suggestion that the Extension work of this University is in any way dropping behind. From the report just presented to Convocation, a copy of which I have the honour to enclose, you will see that the year which ended on September 30, 1903, marks the highest point attained by the work of this Delegacy since its inception. During the year then ending no less than 1,886 lectures distributed in 199 courses were delivered in 149 centres scattered throughout all parts of England; the number of students who were in regular attendance at the courses was 21,485. I should cordially agree that there is still room for expansion, but it would be difficult to find in these figures any evidence that the older Universities are dropping behind; nor am I aware of any grounds for the statement in your article that "London is going to become the centre of the movement under the University of London."—Yours, &c.,

Examination Schools, Oxford.

J. A. R. MARRIOTT.

Poets in School

SIR,—Attention has recently been called once more to the use of the masterpieces of English literature in the schoolroom—and in particular the selection of Gray's "Elegy" for recitation was instanced. It is, indeed, doubtful whether such pieces should be given, good as they undoubtedly are for elocution. How many people cannot remember the days when Mark Antony began his oration "Friends, Romans, Countrymen, lend me your ears! I come to bury Caesar"? But if the practice of using such classics for recitation by a class of boys or girls who cannot possibly appreciate them is open to doubts as to its advisability, there is even more ground for objecting to the custom of pressing them into the service of the grammar lesson. The writer well remembers analysing and parsing certain words during a grammar examination in the passage :—

"The hour has almost come
When I to sulphurous and tormenting flames
Must render up myself."

When the revelation that "Hamlet" was "jolly" (O! that school-slang!) came, through a visit to Forbes-Robertson's production, the ghost was unconsciously tabulating his speech in the mind of one auditor into "Hour, subject: has come: predicate," &c., &c., to the accompaniment of the inevitable piano-practice that always seems to go on during examinations.

The same association always attends the reading of—

"There in the tranquil evenings of summer, when Brightly the sunset Lighted the village street," and the picture is spoiled by those unforgotten struggles with parts of speech. How often we used to rebel among ourselves against "Hamlet's blessed old bletherings"! What else could be expected? We were between twelve and sixteen, and the only one among us who had read the play through gave a decided opinion that "he ought to have upped and done for his uncle, and saved all those acts of talk and queer grammar."

"Julius Caesar" was distinctly better. Plenty of things happened, and we gloried in the murder and battle scenes, and in the quarrel between Brutus and Cassius. When it came to learning by heart the different readings of Johnson, Warburton, or Malone, however, our enthusiasm wavered, and it is more than doubtful whether we remember one single instance of the various discrepancies among the commentators.

A flavour of these compulsory delvings among the immortals has clung to our voluntary reading ever since. The mind, during the school days, is not able to digest such ripe material. "Lays of Ancient Rome" are the most lofty heights to which the immature mind, unless of very exceptional quality, can scale. As to the deliberate pulling-apart of words to show the skeleton beneath, it cannot too strongly be condemned, where the passages chosen are of such a character as the Ghost's speech. It cheapens the scene for ever after, to have so denuded it of its grace and beauty, pulled it apart, and put it together again, at a time when no conception of the spirit that animates it is there to hide from us that they are just words made into a sentence, like "Please pass the salt." Apart from this side of the matter, elocution and grammar books give far more suitable examples for use. The construction of blank verse is not at all favourable to the gaining of a practical knowledge of the analysis of ordinary English grammar. A sentence specially constructed to puzzle a scholar will do so, if not more effectually than a passage from Shakespeare, certainly to a more direct and useful end, and one which will be of more practical benefit to him. Horatio might have replied to, "To what base uses we may return," "Indeed we may, my lord, when we are quoted, recited, analysed, parsed, murdered, and hacked about by raw schoolboys and schoolgirls, and even sometimes paraphrased," for even this latter useless desecration is constantly committed.—Yours, &c.,

H. P. H.

The Stage Society and Maxim Gorki

SIR,—In reference to your unfavourable comment in a recent ACADEMY upon the Stage Society and Gorki's "Lower Depths" or "Doss House," may I be permitted to point out that—whether owing to an inefficient translation, to incongruous acting, to a want of conviction on the part of the actors, or to a combination of all three defects—the British Press seems to have gathered quite an erroneous interpretation of Gorki's idea and meaning. As an article in last month's "Fortnightly Review" attempts to show, Gorki's aim is to make it clear that even in the "dust bin" of the lowest strata or depths of humanity objects of intrinsic value may occasionally be discovered by people who will take the trouble to rescue them. Apart from this general aspect I would add that to anyone acquainted with Russia's present social unrest, Gorki's play is a study of absorbing interest. That when rightly rendered it does not lack of dramatic force and even deep psychological import, has, I think, been proved by the fact that the German adaptation of the play has been well received in Germany's capital, where it has been running for over eighteen months in a specially critical theatrical centre. The success, indeed, of the German version has been so great that a scheme has been set on foot to perform it in Russian in various Russian towns. It is a pity that such a new and original departure as Gorki's complex study, both in sociology and character, should have so completely missed its mark in this country.—Yours, &c.,

ALEXANDER KINLOCH.

"Academy" Questions & Answers

Questions and Answers for this column must be addressed to THE EDITOR, THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, 5, East Harding Street, London, E.C. The envelope to be marked in the top left-hand corner "A.Q.A." Full name and address must be sent, not necessarily for publication. Each Question or Answer must be written on a separate sheet of paper and on only one side of the paper. The Editor will not undertake the forwarding of any correspondence. Questions must be confined to matters of Literature, History, Archaeology, Folk-lore, Art, Music, and the Drama. The Editor reserves the right of deciding whether or not any Question or Answer is of sufficient interest to be published.

COMPETITION

Until further notice, four prizes, of the value of 5s. each, will be awarded weekly for the two best Questions and the two best Answers contributed to "Academy" Questions and Answers.

The Editor's decision must be considered absolutely final and no correspondence whatever will be entered upon with regard to the awards. The prizes will go to those Questions and Answers which are deemed to be of the greatest general interest, and brevity in all cases will count as a merit.

The names and addresses of prize-winners will not be published, but the winning Questions and Answers will be indicated by an asterisk (*).

The prizes will consist of 5s. worth of books to be chosen by the several prize-winners. The name and address of the booksellers where the book or books can be obtained will be given.

Each prize-winner in the United Kingdom will be advised that a credit note has been sent to a bookseller as early as possible in his (or her) immediate neighbourhood, and that on demand he (or she) may cooee a book or books to the value of 5s. Winners outside the United Kingdom will receive a cheque for 5s.

Non-adherence to the rules and regulations of "Questions and Answers" will imply disqualification.

No Questions or Answers received after Monday will be considered eligible for the current week's competition.

No competitor can win a prize more than once in three months.

Questions

LITERATURE

CHARLES DICKENS' NAMES.—A contemporary recently raised the question as to the correct spelling of Charles Dickens' third baptismal name, whether "Huffham" or "Huffam," concerning which his biographers differ. In the Portsea Parish Register the entry of the Baptism renders it with the second "h," while the Marriage Register at St. Luke's Church, Chelsea, omits it. Appropos of the latter document, it may be pointed out that the novelist's signature is simply "Charles Dickens." The entry also records that the parties were married by licence, that the bride was a minor, that the officiating minister was the curate, the Rev. R. W. Morrice, and that the witnesses were the respective parents of bride and bridegroom and Dickens' friend and fellow journalist Thomas Beard, whose signatures are likewise appended. There is no doubt that "Huffam" is the correct spelling of Dickens' third Christian name, and Forster assures us that Dickens himself so spelt it "on the very rare occasions when he subscribed that name." As the late Mr. Robert Langton explains, it was the surname of the Charles Dickens' godfather, Christopher Huffam, "described in the London Post-Office Directory as 'Rigger to His Majesty's Navy, Limehouse Hole.'" It would be exceedingly interesting to discover an autograph signature of Dickens in which all his baptismal names are given.—F. G. Kitton.

"MOTHER-IN-LAW."—Not only in "Pickwick," but in "Nicholas Nickleby" and later works, Dickens persists in making his characters refer to a step-mother as "mother-in-law." If there is any authority for this apparent mistake I shall be glad to know of it.—F. G. Kitton.

WELSH TRIADS.—We owe to Geoffrey, of Monmouth, a nucleus for the Arthurian Cycle and various apocryphal distortions of Roman history; his completed "Chronicle" was translated from Latin into Welsh, and accepted by the natives as genuine history. But they do not appear to have any national records of an earlier date; thus, while the existence of Oonobelluna is attested by a copious coinage, and we learn from valid sources of his sons, named Caratacus and Togodumnus; but Geoffrey substitutes Guiderius and Arviragus, while the father is called Cynfein. Is this last name authentic, and have the Triads been printed in Welsh with an English translation?—Querist.

AUTHOR WANTED.—In 1830, Tennyson, in conversation with the Bishop of Ripon (Boyd Carpenter), on the "conflict of the powers of light and darkness," repeated the lines:—

"The Lord let the house of a brute to the soul of a man,
And the man said 'Am I your debtor?'
And the Lord—'Not yet, but make it as clean as you can,
And then I will let you a better.'"

Are these lines original or quoted, and if the latter, who is their author?—P. C.

MAETERLINCKIANA.—Can any of your readers tell me if I can get a modern edition of John Ford's "Tis a pity, she's a whore," adapted by Maeterlinck under the title of "Annabella," 1895?—Goh-mia.

"RICHARD BARNFIELD."—How is it that every publisher (so far as I have noticed) inserts in their editions of Shakespeare's poems the ode "As it fell upon a day"? Is it not absolutely certain that Richard Barnfield wrote it? I have never seen any contradiction to Ellis, who gives it as Barnfield's in his "specimens," incidentally remarking it had been—this was prior to 1800—"attributed" to Shakespeare.—K. M.

GYPSY EXPERIENCES.—Who is the author of the papers on "Gypsy Experiences," published in the "Illustrated London News" in December, 1851, and reprinted in F. Himes Groomer's "In Gypsy Tents"? In the preface to that work the writer of the "Experiences" is stated to have died while the reprint was passing through the press, i.e., in 1850, or possibly the end of 1849.—A. W.

AUTHOR WANTED.—

Are the following lines by Shelley? If so, in which of his poems shall I find them?—

"I loved—Oh no! I mean not one of ye,
Or any earthly one, though ye are dear
As human heart to human heart may be.
I loved—I know not what—but this low sphere
And all that it contains, contains not thee,
Thou whom seen nowhere, I feel everywhere,
Dim object of my soul's idolatry." —P. R.

TICKLE ME, TOBY.—In Carlyle's "Past and Present," Book II., chapter VIII., I find the following: "And the Prior responds, 'Willelmus Sacrista is a fit man, bonus vir est,'—for all his red nose. Tickle me, Toby, and I'll tickle thee." Who and what was Toby?—G. O. W.

SHAKESPEARE AS LAWYER.—There are several passages in Shakespeare which suggest that he was well versed in the law. Is it possible that he served in some capacity in an attorney's office during the interval between leaving school and his marriage?—Clames.

[See review of Mr. Churton Collins' "Shakespeare Studies" in last week's ACADEMY.—Ed.]

GENERAL

TRANSVAAL VOLKSLED.—Can any one refer me to an English version of the Transvaal Volkslied?—H. R. S.

BOWING.—What is the earliest reference to the act of greeting by raising the hat or cap? When did it come into general use? Is there any book on historical forms of greeting, such as shaking hands; the military salute, &c.?—M. S.

REFERENCE WANTED.—

What was the, in 1800, "well-known story of the squire and the Apple Pie"? It is alluded to in a work on Cambridge.—K. M.

JESSIE.—What is the origin of the name "Jessie," and can it be traced in Great Britain before the eighteenth century? Does "Jessica" occur anywhere before the date of Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice"?—A. W. (Tonbridge).

Answers

LITERATURE

"SPRING IN ENGLAND."—

"Give me back one day in England
For it's spring in England now."

The quotation is from Rudyard Kipling's poem entitled "In Spring Time," published in the "Departmental Ditties."—Erbod.

"RUNAWAYS." In the expression "Runaway's eyes may wink," has received countless interpretations, but not one commentator has discovered that the word "runaway" formerly meant a watchman. In Thomas Brewer's "Life and Death of the Merry Devil of Edmonton" (1631) we read: "By-and-by came the constable with the bloody runnawain to bear Smug to the stocks." If we turn to the original comedy, 1607 (once attributed to Shakespeare), we find that Smug is taken by "the master constable and the watchmen," clearly showing that in Brewer's day, at least, "runaways" were equivalent to "watchmen," thus at once explaining "Janit's" puzzling reference. "AN-HEIRES," in the line "Will you go, An-heires?" Everything has been suggested, from "my nheers" to "cavaliers." But an American friend once pointed out that "mine host" uses out-of-the-way words, such as "cavaleiro justici," and that his "An-heires" was simply what a scribe writing to dictation would put down for "Anheires" the attic Greek for "men"—another proof that Shakespeare knew Greek!—Edina.

[Answer also received from W. H. P.]

"LAMBKINS."—Does not Pistol mean that they live merrily, with the sportive carelessness of young lambs, and that in such a manner they are to go and "condole the knights"?—W. H. P.

[Answer also received from H. C.]

AUTHOR FOUND.—The correct form of the couplet is:—

"For though the day be never so longe,
At last the belles ringeth to evensong."

The author was Stephens Hawes, a minor poet of the sixteenth century, and the couplet occurs in his principal poem, "The Pastyme of Pleasure" (1506), which was printed by Wynken de Worle in 1517.—W. F. Cobb.

[Answers also received from T. H. M. (Newcastle), P. R. (Hertford), K. K. (Belfast), Edina (Cambridge), C. R. S. (Bury), A. L. G. (Leek), J. N. (Hull), and M. A. C. (Cambridge).]

"JES'AMY BRIDE."—Jesamy is a name for a fop who wears jasmine in his button-hole, but a writer in "Notes and Queries," 1897, suggests that "jesamy" is equivalent to "jasmine," and that Goldsmith simply used the word to express Mary's sweetness, daintiness and grace.—Charles R. Sanderson.

"BABY."—I think the idea is to be found in an earlier writer than Sir Philip Sydney. In Ellis' "Specimens of Early English Poets" under the head of "Uncertain Authors," of the reign of Henry VIII., will be found some verses called "A Praise of his Lady," in which occurs the following lines:—

"In each of her two chrysal eyes
Smileth a naked boy;
It would you all in heart suffice
To see that lamp of joy."

One edition gives "lamb" for "lamp."—K. M.

"SILURIST."—Answers received from A. S. S. (Keighley) and M. T. (Jarrow).

GENERAL

CHURCH WINDOW.—This mode of representing the departure of the soul is a traditional one in art. It probably originated with the ancient Egyptians, who represented the soul as a bird with human head and arms hovering over the mummy. The idea is common in early Christian art and appears in the catacomb frescoes in the form of the Orans—a female figure with out-tretched arms. An early lead medal of the martyrdom of St. Lawrence shows a figure rising from the dead body. The realistic spirit of medieval art emphasized the idea further: by representing the figure issuing from the mouth of the body.—H. F. D.

[Answer also received from R. G. (Nürnberg).]

"THE OX WITH THE CRUMPLED HORN."—The reason for walling the ox with the crumpled horn was probably because the animal with such a peculiar and unusual growth was considered lucky. Unusually formed objects are frequently encountered as charms or amulets. Among the many attempts at an explanation of the sign of the "Crooked Billet" it has not been remarked that a crooked billet was probably adopted as a sign because of its singular irregularity among other billets composing the bundle, and its consequent predilection of good-luck.—J. H. McM.

"ENIGMATIC DATE."—I have recently been occupied much in elucidating an incorrect date of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, but I have never met with so strange a date as that given by "W. P." I should suggest it stood for 1490 and explain it thus: the "r" is probably partly obliterated "x," so that necessarily will read ninetee. This of course still leaves the "1" to be accounted for; my not this being accident, a surmise, and not part of the printed matter? If on the other hand "W. P." has been told "1490" stand for "14" I confess I have not met with a similar case nor do I see how it could. Will "W. P." give the name of the author and printer? I do not know the book "Fasciculus Temporum," my collection of fifteenth-century books being small, but I am forming an index of rare and extraordinary printed dates and should be glad to help to the elucidation of this one.—K. M.

a. AN OLD CHARADE.—"Coachman."—J. L.

b. "A skirt is essential. Fair ladies, I ween,
Without one in public you'll never be seen.
And if you should venture without as escort
Tho' swift be your horses, you risk to get hurt."

—K. B. (Amsterdam).

c. "Without a dress of proper mien
You ladies never will be seen.
Without address you'll drive and drive,
And yet you never will arrive!"

—K. K. (Belfast).

d. Linchpin.—F. G. F. (Bervie).

PRIZES.—The asterisks denote the two questions and two answers to which prizes have been awarded. The winners can obtain, on application at the following booksellers, Five Shillings' worth of books. Notices have been despatched to the several winners and to the four booksellers whose names follow :—

Mr. R. C. Annandale, 9, Queen Street, Hull.
Mr. William P. Davies, 50, King Street, Carmarthen.
Messrs. J. Poole & Co., 104, Charing Cross Road, W.C.
Mr. James G. Bisset, 85, Broad Street, Aberdeen.

NOTE.

An attempt has been made—possibly unintentionally—to make use of the Questions and Answers columns of THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE for a quite illegitimate purpose. An enquirer wrote asking the origin of a certain quotation. The question was duly inserted, and it then appeared that it was one of a series of quotations in a weekly contemporary, for the identification of which prizes were offered. This is a serious misuse of the privileges of the "A. Q. A." columns, and whilst it is impossible entirely to obviate this form of misuse, it is hoped that a timely warning may be sufficient to deter others from like malpractices. The columns are entirely for the purpose of mutual exchange of interesting information and not to assist in the winning of prizes in other papers.

Mr. Andrew Melrose's List.

SECOND EDITION.

MEN OF THE COVENANT.

By ALEXANDER SMELLIE, M.A. Medium 8vo, gilt top, 480 pp., with 27 Illustrations, 7s. 6d. net.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE:

"The enthusiasm which rings through these pages is as genuine and almost as intense as though the author himself had lurked by moor and moor and listened to the fiery denunciations and pleadings of James Renwick and Richard Cameron. . . . These brief character-studies . . . give a real impression of those dour and heroic sealoats who fought and preached beneath the Banner of Blue."

SECOND EDITION.

MEN OF THE COVENANT.

Dr. D. Hay Fleming in the BOOKMAN:

"Mr. Smellie's new book will greatly widen the circle of his admirers. Those who enjoy a book of high-toned religious thought will find much to their taste in 'Men of the Covenant,' as will also those who delight in biographical sketches well told. . . . As he is endowed with a well-balanced mind and the power of expressing himself in clear, nervous English, and, above all, is in true sympathy with the aspirations of the men who endured so much and fought so well, the outcome is a singularly interesting volume. It is sure to be popular, and it deserves to live."

IMPORTANT NEW WORKS IN THEOLOGY.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE ESCHATOLOGY OF JESUS;

or, The Kingdom Come and Coming.

BEING THE BRUCE LECTURES FOR 1903.

By LEWIS A. MUIRHEAD, B.D. Demy 8vo, 6s.

THE FINGER OF GOD.

Studies and Suggestions in the Miracles of Jesus.

By the REV. T. H. WRIGHT. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

THE CRITICAL REVIEW:

"There has not been published for a quarter of a century a more suggestive, informative, and competent book on the Miracles of Jesus. . . . The spirit of it is admirable, to the preacher it is stimulating, and, not least, it is written in a style at once delightful and distinguished."

SECOND EDITION.

Dr. AMORY BRADFORD'S LATEST WORK.

THE GROWTH OF THE SOUL.

By AMORY H. BRADFORD, D.D. Price 5s.

The English Edition of Dr. Lyman Abbot's New Work, which has attracted so much attention in America.

THE OTHER ROOM.

Tokens of Immortality.

By LYMAN ABBOT, D.D. Price 3s. 6d. net.

NEW EDITIONS OF POPULAR BIOGRAPHIES.

FIFTH EDITION.

HENRY DRUMMOND.

A Biographical Appreciation.

By OUTHBERT LENNOX. Price 2s. 6d. net.

FOURTH EDITION.

JAMES CHALMERS.

Missionary Pioneer.

By OUTHBERT LENNOX. Price 2s. 6d. net.

London: ANDREW MELROSE, 16, Pilgrim Street, E.C.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

THE CAMBRIDGE MODERN HISTORY.

Planned by the late LORD ACTON.

Edited by Dr. A. W. WARD, Dr. G. W. PROTHERO, and STANLEY LEATHES.

To be completed in 12 vols. royal 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 16s. net each.

NOW READY. 16s. net.

Vol. II. THE REFORMATION.

Times.—"It is the best account of the great century of the Reformation available to English readers; and if generally studied, especially by the clergy, it would dispel many foolish, but pernicious misconceptions of the nature of the Reformation, and of the inheritance it has left us, which, we fear, are widely spread by current manuals."

Vol. I. THE RENAISSANCE.

Third Impression. 16s. net.

Vol. VII. THE UNITED STATES.

Second Impression. 16s. net.

TERMS TO SUBSCRIBERS.—Subscriptions will be received for the Complete Work at £7 10s. net, which may be either paid in advance or by payments of 12s. 6d. net for each Volume on publication. A Prospectus will be sent on application.

THE GROWTH OF ENGLISH INDUSTRY AND COMMERCE IN MODERN TIMES.

By W. CUNNINGHAM, D.D., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. Third Edition. Demy 8vo. In Two Parts. 25s. net.

Part I. THE MERCANTILE SYSTEM, pp. i-xxxviii, 1-608.

Part II. LAISSEZ FAIRE, pp. i-xii, 609-1039.

Westminster Gazette.—"One of the finest studies in economic history that has yet been produced in this country. Dr. Cunningham is never dull; he writes vividly as well as learnedly, and his work can be read from beginning to end without fatigue by any reader who is interested in the social history of the country."

THE POEMS OF GAIUS VALERIUS CATULLUS, with an English Translation by FRANCIS WARRE CORNISH, M.A., late Fellow of King's College, Cambridge. Fcap. 4to, white buckram, 7s. 6d. net.

ALCUIN: His Life and Work.

By C. J. B. GASKOIN, M.A., sometime Scholar of Jesus College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

A BOOK OF ENGLISH POETRY

FOR THE YOUNG. Arranged for Preparatory and Elementary Schools. By W. H. WOODWARD, Professor of Education in the University of Liverpool. Extra fcap. 8vo, 2s.

A SECOND BOOK OF ENGLISH

POETRY FOR THE YOUNG. Arranged for Secondary and High Schools. By W. H. WOODWARD. Extra fcap. 8vo, 2s.

CAMBRIDGE ENGLISH CLASSICS.

THOMAS HOBBES: LEVIATHAN; or, The Matter, Foime, and Power of a Commonwealth, Ecclesiastical and Civil. The text edited by A. R. WALLER. Large crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

THE STUDENT'S SHAKESPEARE.

Designed for Candidates preparing for the Higher Certificates, Senior Local, and similar Examinations.

THE TRAGEDY OF HAMLET.

Edited for the use of Students by A. W. VERITY, M.A., sometime Scholar of Trinity College, Cambridge. 3s.

Pall Mall Gazette.—"It is not often that one can be forced into enthusiasm by a text book, but we have here a perfect example of the manner in which Shakespeare should be read and studied."

THE TRAGEDY OF MACBETH.

Edited for the use of Students by A. W. VERITY, M.A. 2s. 6d.

Guardian.—"An edition of rare merit, suited to the highest study of the poem."
School World.—"A storehouse of learning, marvelously full and well arranged, and appears destined to provide quite a standard edition for the purposes of all higher examinations."

NOW READY. No. 1.

THE CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY

PRESS BULLETIN, containing Notes on Books published by the Cambridge University Press. The Bulletin will usually be published early in each University Term, and will be posted free of charge to any address.

London: C. J. CLAY & SONS, Cambridge University Press Warehouse, Ave Maria Lane.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIUMS

Newspapers making a special feature of Reviews and Advertisements of New Books, &c.

The Best, Brightest, & Most Interesting Paper
THE DAILY CHRONICLE
 10 or 12 Pages Daily.
 POPULAR FEATURES ARE :—
 The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes
 Full Résumé of the Principal Musical,
 Art, and Dramatic Events.
 SCIENCE & ART SPECIALLY DEALT WITH Full Reports of All Current Events and Special
 Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE BEST GUIDE TO THE BEST BOOKS.
THE LITERARY WORLD.
 Every Thursday. ONE PENNY. Monthly, 6d.
 Although published at a penny, this journal is a literary organ of the highest class. Its establishment dates from 1837, when it was founded in order to supply popular reviews of current literature. The newest books in fiction, biography, theology, travel, poetry, art, and science—in fact, in every department of literature—are reviewed in its columns by a staff of experienced writers, including several well-known men of letters.
 London: JAMES CLARKE & Co., 13 and 14, Fleet Street, E.C.

THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.
 ESTABLISHED 1821.
Published Daily. Price One Penny.
 Has a circulation peculiar to itself among the more cultivated classes of Great Britain in every district; and claims, with justice, to be one of the leading papers in the country.
 Contains special columns devoted to literary matters.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE.
 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily.
 THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN
 AND HIS FAMILY.
 Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.
Special Columns for New Books
 Next to Literary Matter every Day.
 OFFICES: NEWTON ST., HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE WESTMINSTER GAZETTE
 has been PROVED to be far ahead
 of any other London evening paper as a medium for publishers' announcements.
PUBLISHERS' COLUMNS DAILY.
 A Classified Survey of the Week's
 Publishing appears every Saturday.
 Offices: TUDOR STREET, LONDON, E.C.

THE FREEMAN'S JOURNAL
 1763.
 The Oldest, Best and Most Influential
 Newspaper in Ireland, with the largest circulation.
 London Office (with special wire), 211, Strand.

SHEFFIELD DAILY TELEGRAPH.
 ESTABLISHED 1855.
 The principal morning paper published in South Yorkshire. Enjoys a National reputation.
 Special Publishers' page every Wednesday.
 Reviews and criticisms carefully and cleverly written.

THE NORTHERN WHIG (Belfast).
 ESTABLISHED 1824.
 The leading commercial paper in Ireland.
 A special literary page weekly.

THE LEICESTER DAILY POST.
 The only morning paper in the district.
 Suitable medium for Publishers' Advertisements.

YORKSHIRE DAILY OBSERVER.
 ESTABLISHED 1834.
The Leading Liberal Paper in Yorkshire.
 It is the only morning newspaper published in Bradford (Pop. nearly 300,000), and comprises within the area of its special circulation Leeds, Halifax, Huddersfield, Dewsbury, and all the great industrial centres of the West Riding.
Literature, Art and Music are leading features.

THE LIVERPOOL COURIER.
 ESTABLISHED 1808. DAILY & WEEKLY.
 "The Liverpool Courier" is a first-class newspaper having a very large circulation in Lancashire, Cheshire, and North Wales.
SPECIAL PUBLISHERS' PAGE
EVERY FRIDAY.

THE YORKSHIRE POST
 (LEEDS).
 ESTABLISHED 1754.
 The Leading Provincial Daily.
 Has the Largest Postal Circulation in England.
SPECIAL REVIEW DAY
WEDNESDAY.

THE DUNDEE COURIER
 Has double the circulation of any Morning
 Paper North of the Forth.
 Literary Notes on Mondays.
 Reviews on Wednesdays.
 London Office, 109, Fleet Street, E.C.

THE IRISH TIMES.
 DUBLIN.
 The largest and most influential circulation
 in Ireland.
 Special page of book reviews every Friday.
 London Editorial Offices: 153, FLEET STREET.
 Advertisement Offices: 61, FLEET STREET.

THE ABERDEEN FREE PRESS.
 The Morning Newspaper for Aberdeen
 AND THE
 Northern Half of Scotland.
 Reviews of Books appear on Mondays and Thursdays, and on other days as required.
 Book Advertisements are inserted on Literary Page.
NEW BOOKS ARE PROMPTLY REVIEWED.
 LONDON OFFICE: 149, FLEET STREET, E.C.

UNIVERSITY EXTENSION

LECTURES IN LONDON
AT THE UNIVERSITY.—TUESDAY, at 8, and
 WEDNESDAY, at 3.30, DR. EMIL REICH, on "The Beginnings of Rome: Discussion of Niebuhr's, Mommsen's, Pais's Theories."

AT GRESHAM COLLEGE.—TUESDAY, at 8,
DR. J. HOLLAND ROSE, on "Garibaldi and the Kingdom of Italy."
 THURSDAY, at 8, DR. EMIL REICH, on "Political Science: Applications."

AT BIRKBECK COLLEGE.—WEDNESDAY, at 6.30, MAJOR MARTIN HUME, on "The Literature of Travel and of War."

Central Association of University Extension Students

President

RT. HON. LORD REAY

Vice-Presidents

RT. HON. LORD AVEBURY, F.R.S.
 SIR LAUDER BRUNTON, F.R.S.
 SIR MARTIN CONWAY, M.A.
 SIR JOHN EVANS, K.O.B., F.R.S.
 Major MARTIN A. S. HUME.
 MR. ALFRED MILNES, M.A.
 DR. EMIL REICH.

THE BISHOP OF RIPON.
 DR. R. D. ROBERTS.
 SIR HENRY E. ROSCOE, F.R.S.
 DR. JOHN HOLLAND ROSE.
 SIR ARTHUR W. RUCKER, F.R.S.
 DR. CHARLES WALDSTEIN.
 MR. T. H. WARREN (Oxford).

Chairman of Committee: Mr. MARK H. JUDGE.

THE objects of the Association are to make the Lectures as widely known as possible, and generally to promote University Extension Work.

Students, and others interested in the objects of the Association are invited to become Members. The Membership Subscription is Five Shillings per annum.

Local Associations and Committees are invited to become Corporate Members, paying the same Subscription as individual Members, and electing representatives to attend the Meetings of the Central Association.

Individual Members and Corporate Members receive the Extensionist free by post.

Honorary Secretary: MAX JUDGE, 7, PALL MALL, S.W.

(Telephone 3309 Central.)

PUBLISHERS' MEDIUMS

Newspapers making a special feature of Reviews and Advertisements of
New Books, &c.

The Best, Brightest, & Most Interesting Paper.
THE DAILY CHRONICLE
10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes.
Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events.

Science and Art specially dealt with.
Fullest Reports of All Current Events and Special
Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

The Leading Religious Newspaper.
THE CHRISTIAN WORLD
Every Thursday. One Penny.
The Largest Penny Religious Paper.
From 80 to 120 Columns. Stands in the front rank of Religious Newspapers.

London:
JAMES CLARKE & CO., 13 & 14 Fleet St. E.C.

THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN

Established 1821.

Published Daily. Price One Penny.

Has a circulation peculiar to itself among the more cultivated classes of Great Britain in every district, and claims, with justice, to be one of the leading papers in the country.

Contains special columns devoted to literary matters.

THE WESTMINSTER GAZETTE

has been PROVED to be far ahead
of any other London evening paper as a medium for publishers' announcements.

PUBLISHERS' COLUMNS DAILY

A Classified Survey of the Week's Publishing appears every Saturday.

Offices: TUDOR STREET, LONDON, E.C.

SHEFFIELD
DAILY INDEPENDENT
ESTABLISHED 1819.

Review Days—Wednesdays and Fridays.
EDITORIAL NOTICES appear also in the Editor's
"PERSONAL IMPRESSIONS."
PUBLISHERS' ADVERTISEMENT COLUMN side-by-side with REVIEWS, &c.

47 Fleet Street, & 21 Fargate, Sheffield.

THE FREEMAN'S JOURNAL

1763.

The Oldest, Best, and Most Influential
Newspaper in Ireland, with the largest circulation.

London Office (with special wire), 211 Strand.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE

10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily.
THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN
AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best
Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books
Next to Literary Matter every Day.

Offices: NEWTON ST., HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

NEWCASTLE DAILY JOURNAL

Established 1832.

The Conservative Newspaper for the Counties of Northumberland, Durham,
Cumberland, and Berwickshire.

SPECIAL REVIEW DAY—SATURDAYS.

London Office (special wire), 100 Fleet Street, E.C.

SHEFFIELD DAILY TELEGRAPH

Established 1855.

The principal morning paper published in South Yorkshire. Enjoys a National reputation.

Special Publishers' page every Wednesday.
Reviews and criticisms carefully and cleverly written.

The Far East—Books to Read Now

Mr. Heinemann begs to announce the publication of two Important works touching the Far East Question.

For JAPAN, CHINA, KOREA, and SIBERIA,

Read The World's History.—Vol. II.

The 2nd Volume of this work (of which Volumes I., III., IV., and VII. have already appeared) is now ready, and deals with the territories and peoples at present forming the Stage and Dramatis Personae of one of the Greatest Dramas of the World's History.

The Myths, Gods and Heroes, Religions, Dynasties, Social and Political development, aims, and ideals of the various pure and blended races, as well as the geographical configuration (aided by the most recent maps) and climatic conditions of the countries they occupy, are described with the greatest literary skill and historical accuracy. This Volume will be found a sine qua non to those desirous of understanding fully the factors which have contributed to the great awakening of an Eastern people to the consciousness of its mission of Civilization.

A SECOND EDITION OF KOREA.

By ANGUS HAMILTON.

15s. net.

This Book, fresh from the pen of an Eye-witness of the social and political condition and customs of the Koreans, and their destined lords, the Japs, has attracted so much attention during the past two weeks, that the whole of the First Edition has been exhausted. To understand the Hermit Kingdom this book is a necessity.

WM. HEINEMANN, 21 Bedford Street, London, W.C.

The Far Eastern Problem RUSSIA'S POSITION IN ASIA

FROM PARIS TO NEW YORK BY LAND

By HARRY DE WINDT

Profusely Illustrated with Maps and Photographs by the Author.
Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net; by post, 13s.

* * Second Impression in the Press.

St. James's Gazette.—"A rattling book. One of the most exhilarating volumes of travel we have read. The story is a graphic piece of writing, is of world-wide interest, and a valuable addition to the literature of travel."

Daily Chronicle.—"Remarkable as a feat of human endurance and pertinacity."
North Mail.—"Takes second place only to Nansen's great work."

GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd., 3 to 12 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS (Select Trade) for the COVER PAGES of the ACADEMY should be sent not later than Noon on Thursday to 9 East Harding Street, E.C. Terms, &c., on application.

Special cloth cases for binding the half-yearly volume of the ACADEMY can be supplied for 1s. each. The price of the bound half-yearly volume is 8s. 9d. Communications should be addressed to the Publisher, 9 East Harding Street, E.C.

NOTE.—Amateurs and others owning Photographs of Literary, Musical, Artistic or Dramatic interest are requested to communicate with the Editor of this Journal, 9 East Harding Street, E.C.

CONTENTS OF THE Nineteenth Century and After for MARCH.

THE UNITY OF THE EMPIRE. By the Right Hon. Lord TURING
RUSSIA, JAPAN, AND OURSELVES. By C. A. W. POWNALL
RUSSIA'S FINANCIAL POSITION. By O. ELTZBACHER
THE PROPOSED EDUCATIONAL COORDINATE: A NONCONFORMIST REPLY. By the Rev. JOHN HUGHES
SIR GEORGE COLLEY IN SOUTH AFRICA: MR. MORLEY'S CHAPTER ON MAJUBA. By Mrs. BEAUMONT (Lady Pomeroy-Colley)
THE FRANCISCAN LEGENDS IN ITALIAN ART. By EMMA GURNEY SALTER
THE SNAKE-DANCERS OF MISHONGNOVI. By R. B. TOWNSEND
INDIA AND TARIFF REFORM. By SIR EDWARD SASSOON, Bart., M.P.
THE RECOGNITION OF THE DRAMA BY THE STATE. By HENRY ARTHUR JONES
WHAT IS A UNIVERSITY? By WALTER FREWEN LORD
THE FLIGHT OF THE EARLS. By PHILIP WILSON
THE WAR OFFICE REVOLUTION AND ITS LIMITS. By SIDNEY LOW
SOME DUTIES OF NEUTRALS. By SIR JOHN MACDONELL, C.B., LL.D. (Associate of the Institut de Droit International)
LAST MONTH: (1) By Sir WENYSS REID. (2) By EDWARD DEEY, C.B.

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., Ltd.

A STRIKINGLY MODERN BOOK

Immediately will be Published.

THE AWAKENING OF MRS. CARSTAIRS BY OLIVIA ROY

Crown 8vo. 6s.

 The story tells in diary form of the awakening, by another man, of the emotions of a young woman whose marriage was based on no deeper feeling than friendship for the man who was her husband.—Olivia Roy is the wife of a well-known London Author.

Edinburgh: GEORGE A. MORTON, 42 George Street.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Ltd.

PRUDENTIAL ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Office—HOLBORN BARS, LONDON.

Invested Funds exceed £50,000,000.

Summary of the Report presented at the Fifty-fifth Annual Meeting, held on March 3, 1904.

ORDINARY BRANCH.—The number of Policies issued during the year was 74,358, assuring the sum of £7,396,050, and producing a New Annual Premium Income of £396,780.

The Premiums received during the year were £3,814,856, being an increase of £163,398 over the year 1902.

The Claims of the year amounted to £1,523,686. The number of Deaths was 6,611, and 5,685 Endowment Assurances matured.

The number of Policies in force at the end of the year was 712,097.

INDUSTRIAL BRANCH.—The Premiums received during the year were £5,846,554, being an increase of £155,647.

The Claims of the year amounted to £2,100,824. The number of Deaths was 210,839, and 3,246 Endowment Assurances matured.

The number of Free Policies granted during the year to those Policyholders of five years' standing who desired to discontinue their payments was 95,938, the number in force being 912,984. The number of Free Policies which became Claims during the year was 19,788.

The total number of Policies in force at the end of the year was 15,200,390; their average duration exceeds ten and a quarter years.

The Assets of the Company, in both branches, as shown in the Balance Sheet, are £51,217,377, being an increase of £4,062,176 over those of 1902.

The Staff Provident Fund, which was founded in 1898 for the benefit of the outdoor staff, shows a satisfactory increase for the year, the total amount standing to the credit of the Fund being £127,077.

Messrs. Deloitte, Dever, Griffiths & Co. have examined the Securities, and their certificate is appended to the Balance Sheets.

FREDERICK SCHOOLING, Actuary.

D. W. STABLE, Secretary.

THOS. C. DEWEY, } Joint General
WILLIAM HUGHES, } Managers.

The full Report and Balance Sheet can be obtained on application.

THE TATLER

EDITED BY

CLEMENT SHORTER

*The Lightest, Brightest,
and most Interesting*

Society and Dramatic Paper

EVER PUBLISHED.

THE TATLER

An Up-to-date Society Paper.

Society and the Stage Richly Illustrated Week by Week.

The Best Printing.

The Best Paper, The Best
Contents of any Paper of its kind.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Can be obtained of all Newsagents, and at all Bookstalls.

Offices: GREAT NEW STREET, E.C.

THE TATLER

EDITED BY

CLEMENT SHORTER

The De La More Press Publications

NEW VOLUMES OF "THE KING'S CLASSICS," NOW READY.

KINGS' LETTERS. Letters of the Kings of England, from Alfred to the Coming of the Tudors. Newly edited from the originals by ROBERT STEELE, F.S.A. With a Portrait of Henry V. as Frontispiece. 2s. 6d. net; quarter-bound vellum, 3s. 6d. net.

By PROFESSOR SKEAT. CHAUCER FOR MODERN READERS.

CHAUCER'S KNIGHT'S TALE: or, Palamon and Arcite. Done into Modern English by the Rev. Professor SKEAT, Litt.D. With Frontispiece. 1s. net; quarter-bound vellum, 2s. 6d. net.

JUST PUBLISHED.

ALL ABOUT SHIPS AND SHIPPING.

A Popular Handbook of Nautical Information, by FRANCIS MILTON, with six Coloured Plates and many Illustrations in the text. Specially designed attractive cover stamped in colours. 5s. net.

* * * In addition to chapters dealing with many branches of nautical information, this valuable little book contains a list of the ships of the Royal Navy and the fleets of the principal Shipping Companies, illustrated by small drawings indicating the various types of vessels, and coloured plates of flags; and also of vessels typical of various periods of our naval history.

"In every way this is one of the most complete little manuals of the sea and the sea services we have seen."—Lloyd's Weekly.

STEVENSON'S SHRINE. The Record of a Pilgrimage by LAURA STUBBS. With many Illustrations and a Map. Part I. Auckland to Tonga. Part II. Vavau to Samoa. Part III. Vailima and the Shrine. Cloth gilt, 7s. 6d. net. Grey boards, 5s. net.

"The book is well written, and is graced by a number of beautiful photographs." Scotsman.

The King's Poets.

The Volumes of the series named "THE KING'S POETS" are uniform in size, type, paper, and binding with those of "THE KING'S CLASSICS," of which "THE KING'S POETS" is a Section.

The object of "THE KING'S POETS" is to present a Series of Poetic Texts of commanding interest in a literary background which will exhibit the full significance of each work.

THE FIRST VOLUME NOW READY.

WORDSWORTH'S PRELUDE. With an

Introduction and Notes by W. BASIL WORSFOLD, M.A. The volume is furnished with a Reproduction of the Portrait of Wordsworth by H. W. Pickersgill, R.A., in the National Gallery, and a Map of the Lake District. 3s. 6d. net; quarter-bound vellum, 5s. net.

ALEXANDER MORING, LTD., 298 REGENT STREET, W.

"THE TIMES" Literary Supplement

A Special Literary Supplement is published with The Times on Friday. This Supplement is an impartial and authoritative organ of literary criticism and a comprehensive and trustworthy medium of literary intelligence. It can be had with The Times of Friday alone.

Subscriptions, inclusive of postage, for The Times of Friday:—

	3 Months	6 Months	12 Months
Inland ...	3s. 3d.	6s. 6d.	13s. 0d.
Foreign ...	4s. 4d.	8s. 8d.	17s. 4d.

CONTENTS OF FRIDAY, MARCH 4, 1904.

Literature.

Andrew Marvell.
England in the Mediterranean.
The Annals of Tacitus.
Ireland in the New Century.
The Religious Life of London.
The German General Staff and the South African War.
French Emigrés in Surrey.
Colonel Anstruther Thomson's Reminiscences—Confession & Absolution—Liquor Licensing.

Fiction.

The Royal Quaker.
Unto Each Man His Own.
Green Mansions.

Art.

Cruikshank in Water Colour.
Bryan's Dictionary.

Drama.

"Férréal" and "La Robe Rouge."

"THE TIMES" LITERARY SUPPLEMENT is also sold with the Mail, or

"THE TIMES" WEEKLY EDITION, upon payment of an additional penny.

Address THE PUBLISHER, The Times,
Printing House Square, London, E.C.

SWAN SONNENSCHN & Co.'s NEW BOOKS.

Dictionary of Contemporary Quotations (ENGLISH)

By HELENA SWAN. Small demy 8vo, 608 pp. 7s. 6d. Just issued. This is the latest addition to Sonnenschein's Reference Series. Other volumes already issued:

8vo, each 7s. 6d., all Fully Indexed

Dictionary of English Quotations

By Col. P. H. DALBIAC, M.P. 516 pp. Third Edition.

Dictionary of Classical Quotations

Texts and Translations. By T. B. HARBOTTLE. 650 pp. Second Edition.

Dictionary of French and Italian Quotations

By Col. DALBIAC and T. B. HARBOTTLE. 572 pp. Second Edition shortly.

What Great Men have Said About Great Men

By W. WALE. 590 pp.

"Will at once be promoted to the shelves which contain the truly welcome books of reference."—Globe.

"A monument of painstaking research, as near perfection in point of completeness as such a work could very well be."—Daily News.

Dictionary of Historical Allusions

By T. B. HARBOTTLE. Second Edition shortly.

Fatigue

By A. MOSSO, Professor of Physiology in the University of Turin. Translated by M. and W. B. DRUMMOND. With Diagrams. 348 pp. 4s. 6d.

"A book for the student and educationist. The subject constitutes one of the most fascinating chapters in the history of medical science, and all educationists, at any rate, should obtain the book."—Yorkshire Post.

Some Popular Philosophy

By GEORGE H. LONG. 2s. 6d.

"Many will be glad to have the opportunity of getting hold of a book which treats high topics in a way that can be appreciated without much previous training in mental gymnastics."—Notts Guardian.

A NEW AND INTERESTING HISTORICAL ROMANCE.

Cristina

A Romance of Italy in Olden Days. By EMILY UNDERDOWN (Norley Chester). With 4 Plates by A. TWIDLE. 6s.

"Her simple tale may be commended for its artless telling."—St. James' Gazette.

"A story altogether charming."—Literary World.

"A graceful little story."—Guardian.

"The outstanding features of the time are depicted with knowledge and skill, and a picturesque and engaging romance is evolved."—Glasgow Herald.

"A happy blend of history and fiction."—Catholic Fireside.

SWAN SONNENSCHN & CO., Limited.

J. M. DENT & CO.'S LIST.

"THE TEMPLE BIOGRAPHIES."
 Edited by DUGALD MACFADYEN, M.A.
 With Portraits and other Illustrations.
 Crown 8vo, each volume 4s. 6d. net.
 JUST PUBLISHED.

ROBERT BROWNING

By EDWARD DOWDEN, D.C.L.
 In style and treatment this book is similar to Prof. Dowden's book on Shakespeare.

MAZZINI.

By BOLTON KING,
 M.A.

G. F. WATTS,

R.A.
 By THE REV.
 HUGH MACMILLAN,
 D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E.

JUST PUBLISHED.

SAVONAROLA

A City's Tragedy.
 By NEWMAN HOWARD.

4s. 6d. net.
 "If we know anything of that rare thing called poetry, this play is the true matter, great in theme, great in conception, and great in form. An assurance of style, a dignity without parade, a plain poignancy of thought and expression, are essential for lasting work, and all these gifts are Mr. Howard's."—Athenaeum.

USEFUL COMPANIONS TO THOSE VISITING THE CONTINENT.

"Mr. Gardner tells the story of each and all the thousand and one beauties of 'Siena' in a most scholarly and careful fashion."—Daily Telegraph.

A NOTABLE NEW ADDITION IN THE MEDIEVAL TOWN SERIES.

SIENA

By EDMUND G. GARDNER.
 With numerous Illustrations from Reproductions and Topographical Drawings by HELEN M. JAMES.
 Fcap. 8vo, 4s. 6d. net, cloth; 5s. 6d. net, leather.

IN THE SAME SERIES.

ASSISI.	FLORENCE.	ROME.
BRUGES.	MOSCOW.	ROUEN.
CAIRO.	NUREMBERG.	SEVILLE.
CHARTRES.	PERUGIA.	TOLEDO.
CONSTANTINOPLE.	PRAGUE.	VERONA.

Please write for Complete List, with names of Authors, Prices, &c.

THIRD EDITION NOW READY.

VENICE

And its Story.

By T. O'KEY.

With 112 Illustrations (50 being in colour) 11. 1s. net.
 "The claims of Venice on the attention of men of our times are manifold; the merchant sees in it a predecessor of our commerce; for the artist and the architect it is a holy city; the historian sees in it the gateway of medieval Europe opening on the east; the politician studies a form of government stable for centuries, and its effect upon its subjects; the philosopher seeks the inherent causes of its decay."—Athenaeum.

Studies of certain of the immediate followers of St. Francis of Assisi and those associated with the early days of his order.

SONS of FRANCIS

By ANNE MACDONELL.

With 9 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

LATEST ADDITIONS IN THE Temple Classics

With Photogravure Frontispiece.
 1s. 6d. net, cloth; 2s. net, lambskin.

HORACE'S ODES
 SCHILLER'S WILLIAM TELL
 DANTE'S CONVIVIO
 GEOFFREY of MONMOUTH'S HISTORIES
 STORY of CUPID and PSYCHE
 VIRGIL'S AENEID
 BEDE'S ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY
 HOWELL'S FAMILIAR LETTERS. (3 vols.)
 VERBA CHRISTI The SAYINGS of JESUS CHRIST. (Greek and English.)
 AUGUSTINE'S CITY of GOD. (3 vols.)
 THUCYDIDES' PELOPONNESIAN WAR. (2 vols.)

29 & 30 BEDFORD ST., LONDON, W.C.

Elliot Stock's New BooksNEW AND EXCITING NOVEL.

In crown 8vo, in tasteful cloth binding, with Frontispiece, 2s. 6d.

A MODERN MAN HUNT.

By PHILIP H. LOCKWOOD, Author of "Storm and Sunshine in the Dales."

NEW STORY.—In crown 8vo, handsomely bound in cloth, 6s.

CROSS PURPOSES: A Story of the Franco-German War.

By JEAN MERIVALE.
 NOW READY.—NEW VOLUME OF THE CHEAP EDITION OF THE BOOK LOVERS' LIBRARY.

In foolscap 8vo, printed on antique paper, and tastefully bound, 1s. 6d. net.

STUDIES IN JOCLAR

Literature. A Popular Subject More Closely Considered. By W. OAREW HAZLITT.

NOW READY, CHEAP EDITION.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, price 2s.

ALFRED THE GREAT. A

Chronicle Play in Six Scenes. By W. H. PINDER.
 "The action of the play is brisk and pleasantly stimulating."—Western Times (Exeter).

"Its literary qualities make it more than worthy of perusal, and its dramatic possibilities may be found deserving of attention by those who are desirous of presenting something novel."—Evening Post (Exeter).

THIRD EDITION.

Much Enlarged. In crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

THE HOME NURSE: A Hand-

Book for Sickness and Emergencies (formerly known as "Sick Nursing at Home"). By S. F. A. CAULFIELD, Author of "The Lives of the Apostles," "True Philosophy," "House Mottoes and Inscriptions," etc.

"It is a volume that every house should possess. Every chapter is brimful of information."—British Weekly.

"A work containing much useful information and many practical suggestions."—Literary World.

ELLIOT STOCK,

62 PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

The Academy and LiteratureSPECIAL SPRING*ANNOUNCEMENT NUMBER.

The issue for March 19 will be a double number, including a Special Supplement, which will contain, in as complete a form as possible, a Catalogue of all the New Books announced for publication during the forthcoming Season.

Considerable attention will be given to the arrangement of the lists. The books will be classified according to subject and importance, prices will be given, and each series of announcements arranged in such a way as to be most useful for future reference to Booksellers and Book-buyers.

CASSELL'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

New Six Shilling Novels
NOW READY.

"Red Morn."

By MAX PEMBERTON.

"Far above the ordinary run of modern novels."—Punch.

Angels and Devils and Man.

By WINIFRED GRAHAM.

"The novel is one of the cleverest we have read this season."—Ladies' Field.

To-morrow's Tangle.

By GERALDINE BONNER.

"A strongly conceived and powerfully written novel."—Pall Mall Gazette.

The Despoilers.

By EDMUND MITCHELL.

"The plot is decidedly ingenious in its unraveling."—Globe.

MANCHURIA AND THE FAR EAST.

Popular Edition. Now Ready, price 3s. 6d.

The Real Siberia.

Together with an Account of a Dash Through Manchuria.

By JOHN FOSTER FRASER.

With Numerous Illustrations. Thirteenth Impression.

Popular Edition. Ready Shortly, price 3s. 6d.

America at Work.

By JOHN FOSTER FRASER.

With 38 Full-page Plates from Special Photographs. Tenth Impression.

Popular Edition. Ready Shortly, price 3s. 6d.

The New Far East.

By ARTHUR DICKEY, F.R.G.S.

Chairman of the Council of the Japan Society. Illustrated.

POCKET EDITION OF WORKS BY R. L. STEVENSON.

New Volumes Ready Shortly.

The Black Arrow.

Cloth, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net.

The Master of Ballantrae.

Cloth, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net.

"The Pocket Editions of 'KIDNAPPED' and 'CATRIONA,' published last autumn, achieved an immediate popularity, and have already been re-printed to meet the large demand."

"Messrs. Cassell's pocket editions of Stevenson are delightful, the form being both choice and convenient."—Athenaeum.

CASSELL & Company, Ltd.,
LONDON, & all Booksellers.

The Academy and Literature

No. 1661. Established 1869.

London: 5 March 1904.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17s. 6d. a year.]

Literary Notes

MISS M. E. FRANCIS (Mrs. Francis Blundell), whose serial, "Lychgate Hall," now running in the weekly edition of "The Times," will be published in this country and America by Messrs. Longman, is working in collaboration with Mr. Sydney Valentine on a dramatic version of her story "Fiander's Widow," published in 1901. The same writer is also contemplating an original three-act play.

SHAKESPEAREANS will be interested in the picture in this week's issue of the statue by Louis Hasselriis, the Danish sculptor living in Rome, which will be erected at Elsinore this year. Of the inscriptions upon the memorial one will be the quotation from Saxo's Danish Chronicle—"Valiant Amleth, worthy of immortal fame."

THE London Shakespeare League, founded in 1902, is doing and has done much good work, as is clearly shown in the latest annual report of the Association. The celebrations in April last were most successful, including a performance of "Twelfth Night," by the Elizabethan Stage Society, a lecture by Professor Gollancz on "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and the reading of a paper on "Shakespeare's London" by Mr. Ordish. Not the least interesting feature of the Commemoration was the Public Dinner held in the Victoria Hall at the Criterion Restaurant. Dr. Furnivall occupied the chair, and received a pretty compliment from the Dinner Committee in the shape of a handsome floral tribute. Sprigs of "Rosemary for remembrance" were laid at the side of every place at the table. The speech of the Chairman was in a happily reminiscent vein. He recalled a conversation with Browning, and the poet's words—"Well, Furnivall, what possesses me more than anything else is the royal ease of the man. Here are we striving and jostling on the lower slopes, and then Shakespeare just comes in among us, and passes through and seats himself on his throne above us and we are silent." "Take your Shakespeare," exclaimed Dr. Furnivall in another passage of a most animated and eloquent discourse, "and read the plays in their chronological order—that is, in their order of production—and you will feel yourself in contact with the man himself; you will observe the growth of his mind and the increasing power of his art, as if he were a personal friend; and all this rot about Bacon, all this twaddle about cryptograms, all this silliness about cyphers, will drop off you like water!" The attendances were highly satisfactory. The nucleus of a Shakespeare library has also been formed. The Commemoration festivities for this year bid fair to be more extensive and even more popular; I hope to provide details of them shortly.

As will be seen from the letters printed in the correspondence columns this week, there is considerable divergence of opinion as to what will be the best form for the London Shakespeare Memorial. Three propositions have been put forward—i., a Monument; ii., a

THE ELSINORE SHAKESPEARE MEMORIAL

Theatre; iii., a Picture Gallery and Library. On one point there is fortunately no second opinion—that there should be a memorial of one character or another. As I have said before, whatever scheme may be finally decided upon must be supported by all, no matter whether it be their pet project or not.

ON Saturday last the lecture room (including the gallery) at the British Museum was again filled by members and friends of the Central Association of U.E. Students. The occasion was a lecture on the Parthenon by Dr. Emil Reich, organised by the above Association in order to throw light on the lectures on Greek History and Art in Dr. Reich's course on History at the University. In every way it was a great success, and the Central Association is doing inestimable good by these supplementary lectures. Major Martin Hume is to lecture in the same room on March 26, when the subject will be "Some Living Documents in the Spanish MSS. Catalogue." Major Hume is giving a course of lectures at Birkbeck Institute on "Spanish Influences upon English Prose Literature."

THIS year being the centenary of Herder's death, the English Goethe Society also had its celebration, which took the form of a meeting at the Medical Hall, on the 24th ult. Dr. Karl Breul, Reader in Germanic at Cambridge, gave a most interesting paper on the famous German writer and philosopher to whom the world at large and England in particular owe so deep a debt of gratitude. Herder powerfully influenced Goethe at Strassburg. The latter caused him to be called to Weimar, where, by his writings and translations, he did more than any one else to introduce English literature to his fellow-countrymen. Percy's "Reliques," the "Volkslieder," and "The Cid" were dwelt on by the lecturer as well as the "Ideas on the History of Mankind." His and his wife's friendship for a long time graced Goethe's life; still his last years were marred by great bitterness of spirit.

THE Thackeray letters conclude in the March issue of "The Century," and contain some interesting matter. There is pleasant confirmation of an oft-made statement in "The old Major" (Thackeray's stepfather) "grows to be more and more like Colonel Newcome every day." Of his own "young women," one of whom became the wife of the late Sir Leslie Stephen, he says, "I am afraid the two Lambert girls in 'The Virginians' are very like them, but of course deny it if anybody accuses me." Of his new home at Palace Green he writes, "If I live, please God, I shall write the history of Queen Anne there," and again, "I want, if I can afford health and time, to write the life of Queen Anne in that room with the arched window which has a jolly look-out on two noble Kensington Garden elms." His income in 1860 he puts at about £5,000. Here is a tantalising semi-clue: "A friend of mine is coming out to N.Y., to whom I shall give a letter. He is a queer fellow, the original of the Chevalier Strong in 'Pendennis.'" Does that letter of introduction still exist? If so, to whom was it given?

VERY topical and full of informing matter is "The Fortnightly" under Mr. W. L. Courtney's editorship. In the March number, beside political and general articles may be noted "The Collected Poems of Christina Rossetti," by Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer, "Entertaining," by Mrs. John Lane, and "How they Teach Acting at the Paris Conservatoire," by L. J. Mrs. John Lane's paper is spirited and amusing.

THE "Chicago Tribune" throws light upon the Poe poem recently printed as a new discovery, but, of course, the light may be false. I quote the following paragraphs as interesting and amusing:

In the year 1876, living in the State of Indiana was an ambitious young man named James Whitcomb Riley. His ambition ran to poetry. He could not, however, get the great magazines of the country to further it and his contributions to the local papers died with their birth. To a friend he once laughingly complained if he could sign his poems with a big name they might not only be accepted by the magazines, but win him fame.

Then a friend demurred. Thereupon young Riley wagered he could write a poem, sign it with a big name, and it would be copied far and wide. As a result of this wager there appeared in the Kokomo (Ind.) "Sentinel" a copy of verses entitled "Leonanie," with the following explanatory introduction:

"In the house of a gentleman of this city we saw a poem written on a flyleaf of an old book. Noticing the initials, 'E. A. P.,' at the bottom, it struck us possibly we had run across a bonanza.

"The owner of the book said he did not know who the author of the poem was. His grandfather, who gave him the book, kept an inn in Chesterfield, near Richmond, Va. One night a young man, who showed plainly the marks of dissipation, rapped at the door and asked if he could stay all night, and was shown a room.

"When they went the next morning to call him to breakfast he had gone, but had left a book, and on the fly leaf he had written these verses."

Riley won his wager. The poem was widely copied throughout the newspapers. It was eagerly commented upon and accepted by some as a genuine Poe treasure trove, and it was scornfully rejected by others. But among those whom it imposed upon was so good a poet, so keen a critic, as William Cullen Bryant.

VERNON LEE devotes her study in Literary Psychology in this month's "Contemporary" to "Carlyle and The Present Tense." The following quotations are interesting:

"It seems an idiotically obvious remark, yet one is apt to feel a little shock of surprise when its truth is brought home to one: the present tense makes things present; it abolishes the narrative and the narrator. This can be verified, as the relation of relief and colour is best verified in pictures, by a process of reversing, like standing a picture on its head. The ballad gives us this. For in the ballad the bulk of the telling is sometimes in the present tense, and the effects are obtained by a lapse into the past. For instance:

He has gotten a coat of the even cloth,
And a pair o' shoon of the velvet green;
And till seven years were come and gone
True Thomas on earth was never seen.

Here the ballad-monger, like the uneducated folk of our own day, experiences a difficulty in following an action without actually witnessing it, hence he speaks in the present; but when he wants to sum up the result, he unconsciously employs the past tense, which makes an end of the business. And of course the alternation with the past tense produces by contrast an extremely lively tense of the present. In more artistic ballads the past tense is prevalent, and there is a jump into the present at the moment of passion and action, with a very solemn drop back into the past to give the result. Thus, in the Braes of Yarrow:

Two has he hurt, and three has slain
On the bloody braes o' Yarrow;
But the stubborn knight crept in behind,
And pierced his body thorough.

Again:

She's ta'en him in her arms twa,
And given him kisses thorough;
She sought to bind his mony wounds,
But he lay dead on Yarrow.

It is surely no mere coincidence that the past tense should here recur as soon as the action is finished."

"The present tense, therefore, which is a rough and ready dramatic trick in the ballad, and a vulgar dodge for realisation in a writer (for all his genius) of the superficial psychology of Dickens; the present tense is also the natural form of the lyric or the prophecy. For men like Shelley, Browning, or Carlyle, it is the tense of the eternal verities, which, from their very nature, have not been, but, like all divine things, always are."

MR. ANDREW LANG is a master of Historical Mysteries, and thus introduces in "Cornhill" "The Case of Allan Breck":

"Who killed the Red Fox? What was the secret that the Celts would not communicate to Mr. R. L. Stevenson, when he was writing 'Kidnapped'? Like William of Deloraine, 'I know but may not tell'; at least, I know all that the Celt knows. The great-grandfather and grandfather of a friend of mine were with James Stewart of the Glens, the victim of Hanoverian injustice, in a potato field, near the road from Ballachulish Ferry to Appin, when they heard a horse galloping at a break-neck pace. 'Whoever the rider is,' said poor James, 'he is not riding his own horse.' The galloper shouted, 'Glenure has been shot!'

'Well,' said James to his companion, 'whoever did it, I am the man that will hang for it.'

Hanged he was. The pit in which his gibbet stood is on the crest of a circular 'knowe,' or hummock, on the east side of the Ballachulish Hotel, overlooking the ferry across the narrows, where the tide runs like a great swift river.

I have had the secret from two sources; the secret which I may not tell. One informant received it from his brother, who, when he came to man's estate, was taken apart by his uncle. 'You are old enough to know now,' said that kinsman, 'and I tell you that it may not be forgotten.'

Let all good Stevensonians read the paper; the story is quite fascinating.

THE Clarendon Press promise several books which should meet with a warm welcome; I note more particularly "A Collotype Facsimile of those Portions of Shakespeare which found no place in the First Folio," namely, Pericles, Venus and Adonis, Lucrece, the Sonnets, and The Passionate Pilgrim; "Elizabethan Critical Essays"; and "Selected Drawings from Old Masters in the University Galleries and in the Library of Christ Church, Oxford" (Part II.).

THE "Letters of Lord Acton to Mary Gladstone," edited, with an Introductory Memoir, by Mr. Herbert Paul, will be issued early this month by Mr. George Allen. As the editor of the volume tells us, "A merciless intellectual critic Lord Acton could hardly help being. He had so trained his mind that it rejected instinctively a sophism or a false pretence. His intimate friends agreed that he was the raciest and most stimulating of companions, with an instinctive perception for the true significance of a hint, so that they never had to tell him a thing twice, nor to explain it once."

THE most interesting contribution to "Harper's" is an article, excellently illustrated, on "The History of The Alphabet," by Dr. Henry Smith Williams. There are also some letters from Hawthorne written to his friend and publisher, W. D. Ticknor; here is a curious passage from them:

"... I hate England; though I love some Englishmen, and like them generally, in fact. I shall be true to my country, and get on with John Bull as well as I can. The time will come, sooner or later, when the old fellow will look to us for his salvation. He is in more danger from his allies than we are either from them or from him. The truth is, I love England so much that I want to annex it, and it is by no means beyond the scope of possibility that we may do so, though hardly in my time. I would far rather have it than Cuba."

In the same letters there is an unusual appreciation of Leigh Hunt:

"... I saw Leigh Hunt, whom I like very much, partly, perhaps, because he is half an American. I wish you could do for him some of the good offices which you do for other English authors, by republishing his works. It is strange that he has not a greater popularity on our side of the water, since he possesses many of the literary characteristics which we are quick to recognise. His poetry I know very little about, and should not care much about reading it; but his prose essays are as fine as anything in the English language."

MISS MARY JOHNSTON

[Photo. Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York.]

And this about Reade.

"I saw in London, among about a thousand other noticeable people, your author, Charles Reade—a tall, stoutish, fair-haired, light-complexioned man, thirty years old or upwards. He did not make a very strong impression upon me. I like his books better than himself; not that I saw any fault in him, either."

But as a whole the letters do not tell us very much that we should miss if untold.

MESSRS. CASSELL send me Part I. of "The Russo-Japanese War," to which Mr. Arthur Diósy contributes an introduction on the causes of the conflict. Naturally, the accounts of the fighting cannot be considered in any way final, but are most useful as a summary of our present knowledge of the state of affairs and will prove very acceptable to those who desire to follow the events of the war with intelligence. The illustrations are all very good, and the maps and plans excellent; so, too, are the paper and the print.

THE Literary Year Book for 1904 (Allen) shows many signs of steady improvement, and indeed it is a work of reference of very great usefulness to all literary workers. The literary summary of 1903, by Mr. Henry W. Nevinson, is a model of the difficult art of condensation.

Bibliographical

THE seventh (and last) volume of the verse section of the latest and best edition of the Works of Lord Byron (John Murray) runs to 458 pages. Of these, 228 are devoted to an elaborate and comprehensive Bibliography of Byron's poetry, with 32 pages of contents and summary—260 altogether. Mr. E. H. Coleridge, the editor, is to be congratulated on the successful completion of his laborious task, which is a matter also for self-congratulation by all students of Byron. Only those who have done such work themselves can realise how large is the measure of time, energy, and judgment which has to be expended on it. Here are details of 113 editions of the "Poetical Works" of Byron; of seven French translations of them, of thirteen German, of one modern Greek, of four Italian, of two Polish, two Russian, one Spanish, and one Swedish. Then come details of 26 Selections from the Poems, and of one Armenian, six French, three German, and three Italian versions of such. Next the "Miscellaneous" collections, and translations of them, are dealt with; and, finally, we have the bibliography (with translations) of all the separately published Poems and Collections, arranged alphabetically according to their titles. The biography and criticism of Byron are not dealt with in this volume; and in the meantime an admirable essay in that direction is to be found in Mr. J. P. Anderson's appendix to the volume on Byron in the "Great Writers" series.

Of the remaining 200 pages of the volume before us 100 are devoted to a valuable Index to the contents of the whole seven volumes of verse; while ten are accorded to an Index of First Lines. That leaves 88 pages for the text of "Jeux d'Esprit and Minor Poems, 1798-1824"—73 in all; 45 from the one volume of the Works in 1837, 18 collected from various sources, and 10 now printed and published for the first time. (At least, Mr. Coleridge says 10, but I can find only 9.) These newly published pieces include two satiric ballads aimed at Gally Knight, an alternative version of the "Windsor Poetics," a love-song (quite in the Byronic manner), a (war) "Song to the Suliotes," an autobiographic scrap ("Of rhymes I printed seven volumes"—this was in February, 1818), a distich, and two other trifles—all of them more or less illustrative of the writer's mind and character, and therefore sufficiently welcome. The pictorial illustrations (including a fine portrait of the Countess of Lovelace) number nine.

To me, and I dare say to many others, the Thackeray letters in this month's "Century" are, on the whole, rather painful reading. They have, however, some touches which possess a biographical bearing, such as the references to the novelist's candidature for Oxford and his squabble with Edmund Yates, and there are also allusions to "The Virginians" which have a literary interest. Thus, in November, 1857, Thackeray writes: "I don't think 'The Virginians' is good yet, though it has taken me immense trouble, but I know it will be good at the end. I tremble for the poor publishers who gave me £300 a number—I don't think they can afford it, and shall have the melancholy duty of disgorging." "This series" of letters, the editor of the "Century" tells us, "were written to a single American family"—which is rather a bad slip of the editorial pen.

The Dryden House edition of Sir Nathaniel Wraxall's "Historical Memoirs of My Own Time, 1772-1784," will presumably be taken from the original edition, in two volumes, issued in 1815. Will it also include Wraxall's "Posthumous Memoirs of his Own Time," which appeared in three volumes in 1836? The two sets of Memoirs were brought together in 1884, in five volumes edited by Mr. H. B. Wheatley, who annotated them, and, moreover, was able to supply, from manuscript, some chapters hitherto unpublished. One never hears of any proposal to reprint Sir Nathaniel's "Curiosy remarks made during a Tour through some of the Northern Parts of Europe in 1775-76," or his "Tour through the Western, Southern, and Interior Provinces of France" (1784).

One hopes that the promised volume about Beattie (of "Minstrel" fame) will be rich in allusions to his distinguished contemporaries. Concerning this minor bard himself, quite enough would seem to have been already written. There was the Life, by Alexander Bower, in 1804; and then the Life, by Sir W. Forbes, in 1807 (reproduced in 1824). Then there were the two volumes of Letters in 1820. There is also a French Life, by C. A. Mallet. Of short biographies, prefixed to editions of Beattie's Works, there have been several—notably those by Park, Chalmers, W. Mudford (1809), A. Dyce (1854), G. Gilfillan (1854), J. S. Gibb (1864), T. Millar (1880). And, meanwhile, who dreams of reading Beattie?

A fresh reproduction of Turner's "Liber Studiorum," must always be welcome, when adequately done, and the one which is forthcoming is sure to have its public. It is, however, only five years or so since we had an edition of the "Liber" in two volumes, itself reproduced (if I remember rightly) from that edited by Mr. Stopford Brooke, in 1882. In 1890 had come the "Selection" from the "Liber" of which the most interesting feature was, perhaps, the introductory essay by Mr. Frederick Wedmore. In 1861 the Department of Science and Art published, in folio, photographs of thirty of Turner's "Liber" drawings. Ten years later, also in folio, came the "Liber" in three volumes, with the whole of the original etchings reproduced in autotype.

Mr. George Allen's new and pretty editions of "Sesame and Lilies" and "The Crown of Wild Olive" serve to remind one that both of these books were first published by Messrs. Smith, Elder, the former in 1865, and the latter in 1866. "Sesame and Lilies" went into a second edition in the year of its issue, Ruskin supplying a preface for the reprint. The fifth edition was published by Mr. Allen in 1882. It will be remembered, also, that in 1902, Mr. Allen, cutting the book in two, printed "Of Kings' Treasuries" and "Of Queens' Gardens" separately on vellum. The history of "The Crown of Wild Olive" has been less eventful.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews

An Humble Alloy

PEWTER PLATE. By H. J. L. J. MASSÉ. (Bell. 21s. net.)

THERE is something almost pathetic in the sudden elevation of the humble alloy bearing the unpretending name of Pewter to the rank of a fine art, examples of which are eagerly sought by connoisseurs and after being long neglected on some kitchen dresser are now promoted to an honoured place on the carved oak overmantel of their descendants of valuable heirlooms. Fortunately, in the golden days of pewter, it was customary to use it for ecclesiastical as well as domestic purposes, and the numerous excellent illustrations of Mr. Massé's volume include, with many noble examples of English tankards, Scotch "tappit hens" or covered jugs and eared porringers, German flagons and dishes, &c., various beautiful and rare specimens of French and Flemish bénitiers, engraved sepulchral discs from Mont St. Michel, English and foreign chalices and alms-dishes and other church utensils, which, being subject

THREE TYPES OF CHURCH FLAGONS

(From "Pewter Plate" [Bell].)

envied possessor. The life story of certain specimens would indeed read like a romance and would be even fuller of thrilling episodes than that of Hans Andersen's immortal tin soldier. The exhaustive monograph of Mr. Massé, the able organiser of the present exhibition at Clifford's Inn, treats the subject from the technical and æsthetic rather than the popular side, and in his determination to omit nothing that can be of service to the connoisseur or collector, the author has perhaps somewhat overlooked the claims of the general public, to whom the personal equation is always of such absorbing interest. In spite of this, however, his work is a most useful one and admirably supplements the erudite "History of the Pewterers' Company" of Mr. Charles Welch, the learned librarian of the Guildhall, who has kindly allowed his fellow enthusiast to describe the touches or distinctive marks of Pewterers preserved in the Company's Hall from the reproductions given in his own more costly volume.

In his Introductory Remarks Mr. Massé suggests that "the chief cause of the disappearance of much old pewterware was the maker's custom of recasting the various objects when they had become damaged instead of repairing them," an incidental proof of the low esteem in which they were held. "Travelling pewterers," he adds, "went their rounds carrying with them one or two moulds and a few tools," often, especially in France, doing quite a brisk trade in recasting plates and dishes. Unscrupulous hawkers and tinkers, like the wicked magician of the "Arabian Nights," often exchanged old ware for new in spite of its being illegal to do so, little dreaming that in relegating their ill-gotten goods to the melting-pot they were depriving their to comparatively little wear and tear, often survived their secular contemporaries.

It is in Mr. Massé's opinion impossible to revive the real old art of Pewter-making, and the attempts to do so have only resulted in failure. "Manufacturers," he says, "have produced the wrong kind of alloy; it is far too crude and white, . . . too brittle and hard, and there is no nice feeling in it," it has moreover none of the soft pearly grey colour which is half the charm of genuine old pewter and over-decoration has replaced the simple dignity of earlier forms. In view of the hopelessness of a renaissance of true art-ware the directions given by Mr. Massé as to the cleaning and repairing of old specimens are of great value and it is a pity that they cannot be published separately for the education of ignorant servants, who in their zeal for a bright surface often do irreparable mischief. NANCY BELL.

A Doughty Dame

DUCHESS SARAH: THE SOCIAL HISTORY OF THE TIMES OF SARAH JENNINGS, DUCHESS OF MARLBOROUGH. Composed and arranged by One of Her Descendants, Mrs. Arthur Colville. With ten photogravure plates, and two other illustrations. (Longmans. 18s. net.)

MRS. COLVILLE seems to have a feeling that history has never quite done justice to the first Duchess of Marlborough. Perhaps her uneasiness was unnecessary. It is more than possible that the Duchess has not been in the thoughts of the world at all. In the story of the Esmonds, one remembers, the lady, at a critical stage of the Jacobite plot, is felt to be lurking, momentarily, in the background; but were it not that we refresh our memories of the great novel now and then, the Duchess would be forgotten. Why is Mrs. Colville so anxious about her ancestress? The Duchess was a beautiful woman, and that is good; but there is really no reason for believing that she would have been a person of importance had she not had the good fortune to marry a youth who turned out to be a military genius of the highest rank. In days of old the wife of a soldier so distinguished was necessarily a power at Court; and that the Duchess of Marlborough was until, our enemies abroad having been fairly well subdued, Queen Anne was free to ease herself from the dominance of the Duchess. The Sovereign, it is true, may have been ungracious, even ungrateful; but Mrs. Colville and the other descendants of the Duchess have really very little to complain of. Their ancestress feathered the Marlborough nest extremely well.

When all is said and done, that is the outstanding truth. If the Duchess had a touch of genius, it was for business of the commercial kind. She was in charge of the accounts of the Royal Household, and managed them efficiently. Other persons in the same position had winked at secret commissions to servants and "officials"; but the Duchess was strictly honest. Perhaps her biographer is justified in thinking that such integrity was remarkable. These pages imbue into us a general feeling that in Mrs. Colville's estimate the age was one in which all notable men and women, save her ancestress, were of easy virtue in money matters. Still, it must not be supposed that the sole claim of the Duchess to the esteem of posterity lies in the fact that in a period of pillage she did not steal. Her virtue was more than negative. Besides being a faithful keeper of the Royal accounts, she was a faithful founder of the fortunes of her own family. Year in, year out, during the whole of her career, she kept a vigilant eye on the interests of her posterity. She went into the City at the age of seventy-nine to bid for Lord Yarmouth's estate, which she hoped to get, as it dovetailed with some of her property. She wished to leave a good fortune to her descendants, in hopes that they might be entirely independent of Courts and parties, and expresses a wish that they will join with a king only when he has the welfare of the nation at heart, and a minister only when he is for the good of the king.

To this day Blenheim is a splendid proof that what may be called the material part of the Duchess's ambition was fulfilled. Some may even think that the most modern of her many descendants is accomplishing to the letter the spiritual clauses of her testament. Others may have difficulty in feeling sure that independence in regard to the Minister springs solely from an agitated regard for the interests of the Monarch. That Mr. Balfour is averse from the good of King Edward seems hardly a tenable theory. Testamentary dispositions on the great scale always lead to trouble. Where Peter the Great tried his hand and failed, how was the Duchess Sarah to try hers with assurance of success? Peter said that Russia was ultimately to take the Indies; and, now that his heirs and successors cannot do as he ordained, it is declared that he never said anything of the sort. Let us, then, deal gently with the Duchess. It is really not the Duchess Sarah's fault that her descendants find it difficult to pursue the thorny path of party politics. Besides, the Duchess, when she had time to spare from money-getting, had interests which assured to her the best regards of THE ACADEMY. Mr. Pope found her attractive, and she was conscious of the distinction. "If you talk to Mr. Pope of me," she wrote to Lord Marchmont, "endeavour to keep him my friend, for I do firmly believe in the immortality of the soul as much as he does, though I am not learned enough to have found out what it is."

Clearly the Duchess knew her limitations. Her biographer has the same grace. Mrs. Colville fears that "want of literary experience" may have been the cause of imperfections in her work. One must not contradict a lady.

W. EARL HODGSON

Shropshire Lads and Lasses

OLD SHROPSHIRE LIFE. By Lady Catherine Milnes Gaskell. (Lane. 6s.)

To this collection of stories of life in Shropshire, the dates of which vary from the reign of Queen Anne to the closing years of the eighteenth century, no reader familiar with Mr. A. E. Housman's inimitable little volume "A Shropshire Lad" can come with a sense of strangeness. Cleeside and Wenlock Edge, Ludlow Fair and Shrewsbury Gaol, their names are all indelibly impressed on the memory. The very motives of stories and poems are at times visibly akin. Who that reads "Christ's Tree," with its sombre conclusion, but must recall the lines of the young yeoman who has slain his brother Maurice, "And here's a bloody hand to shake, and oh, man, here's good-bye!" And if in none of the stories does "Rose Harland, on her Sundays out, walk with the better man," there is the reverse of the picture in "The Holy Well," where pretty Thersa Stanley carries off stalwart Launcelot Shingless from under the very eyes of her rival Bell.

Stories of a remote countryside must of necessity concern themselves mainly with strong passions and lawless deeds, for it is in virtue of terror rather than of charm that they survive orally, for the garnering of the writer of a later day. Instances occur to the average reader at the first cast. Wilson's perennially juvenile "Tales of the Borders," Hardy's "Wessex Tales," Snowden's "Tales of the Yorkshire Wolds," and Mary Linskill's "Tales of the North Riding." These all have the legendary element developed with greater or less artistry. One of Lady Catherine Gaskell's characters, Priss, in "The Witch's Unguent," well expresses the mood that lies at the root of the majority of the happenings which result in such tales as these:

"Parson Sundays, and then let the devil have his due. 'Tis the only course for a long life and a safe 'un. I knows my duty, and I won't imperil my mortal soul by playin' fox and hare with both."

But if a daredevil or a ne'er-do-well is most often the stock from which a folk-tale blossoms, and tragedy follows close on the heels of exploit, the best specimens of the genre have another side which is all delight. This is the terseness of the rustic speech, so often packed close with shrewd obscurities and humorous expression. "Old Shropshire Life" fulfils this condition nobly. Who can forget such sayings as the following, gathered haphazard from its pages?

"Hearts and kisses be allus in fashion, same as colic and physic later. One comes afore t'other, but t'other allus comes."

"There's a deal of comfort in clothes, especially when you have the right sort and other folks the wrong."

"Thou art like a chip in milk, no harm and no good."

"He's not worth hiring who talks of tiring."

The desire of Joan Hannett to give her husband a "ham-burial" is one to be met with all up and down the land. But it would be interesting to learn if the belief is at all widespread that a cock hatched-out by an owl will make an invincible fighter, and what is the especial virtue of ale made from water saved in butts from the church roof.

Amongst the old card-games, of which many are mentioned, "Bold Davy" is provocative of curiosity as to its rules, and the precise difference between "Wheezy" and "Wheezy-Wee" might prove interesting if defined.

Many allusions to local wisecracks or simpletons, "Old Bold's Treasure," "Ippekin's Cave," "Mother Gormal's Geese," "Parson Jack's Black Horse," "Will Dangs' Sow," "Mike Dobson's Dog," and "Darnfold's Dog" (who tried to talk Dutch!) make one long for an appendix dealing with these mysterious personages, as the excellent glossary deals with Shropshire words. In a later edition—for Lady Catherine Gaskell's book is of the kind that "goes into editions"—this may be supplied, and the glossary extended by the inclusion of the meanings of a few words she has overlooked, such as a "litherman's load."

The titles of some of the songs alluded to—"The Lord He breathes through verdant green," "There is a world my heart doth know," and "Hang the branches round the hearth," for instance—make one long for a collection of "Shropshire Songs" to keep company with Mr. Baring-Gould's "Songs of the West."

But perhaps it is best to be thankful for the feast provided and avoid even the appearance of fault-finding, or the condemnation of Idonea by her aunt Joan Hannett may fall upon the writer:

"Why, at Day of Judgment she'd notice a feather in the archangel's wing if it didn't hang proper, even if Michael war blowing the last trump. Her wudn't miss a fault however great the glory. There's some as has eyes for light, and some for specs!"

Mention should be made of the excellent process illustrations, from photographs, of notable Shropshire buildings, which heighten the interest of the volume from the topographical point of view.

F. CHAPMAN.

Poetry and Poetics

UNSEEN KINGS. By Eva Gore-Booth. (Longmans. 2s. 6d. net.)

VERSES. By Ruth Young. (Longmans. 2s. 6d. net.)

THE KNIGHT'S TALE OF PALAMON AND ARCITE. Done into Modern English by Rev. Professor Walter W. Skeat. (De La More Press. 1s. net.)

ADONAI. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. From the Edition of 1821. (Methuen. 2s. net.)

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE POEMS OF TENNYSON. By Henry Van Dyke, D.D., LL.D. (Ginn. 2s. net.)

OF these books only two represent new contributions to verse. Miss Young's "Verses" may be briefly dismissed. They are pleasant, feminine, but weak; nowise distinguished from the mass of like publications. It is different with Miss Gore-Booth's "Unseen Kings." The book—especially the title-poem—belongs obviously to the school of Mr. W. B. Yeats; while on this same title-poem Maeterlinck has perhaps some influence in a few minor features. There is the haunting vagueness, the regret for "old, unhappy, far-off things, and battles long ago," the wistful longing, the unearthly, passionless passion, the engrossment in a world of legend and enchantment, which we peculiarly associate with Mr. Yeats. Nor is this all: the manner, too, is evidently his. Miss Gore-Booth, let us say frankly, has not compassed that elfin magic of which Mr. Yeats has the incommunicable secret. But it should none the less be said that she does attain a certain effect of mystery, a certain measure of enchanted atmosphere. She displays, indeed, a true imagination, a poetic gift of her own; and is far from a mere copyist. Her style and diction are choice and finished; while she has considerable power of imagery, and that imagery is really imaginative. Her book is one of much promise—and, indeed, performance.

The other verse-books belong to the past. Professor

Skeat, undeterred by many eminent failures in the like emprise, has followed in the footsteps of Wordsworth and others by attempting to modernise Chaucer. He has chosen for his attempt "The Knight's Tale," the miniature and masterly epic of Palamon and Arcite. His handling is exceedingly reverent; he has made the minimum of possible change, and the changes are effected as skilfully, we think, as could well have been done. It is about as good a modernisation of Chaucer as could be hoped for. And yet (we speak for ourselves) the intimate charm of the poetry has disappeared in the process. That is not his fault; it inheres in the subtle nature of poetry itself. Yet much remains for the general reader to whom the ancient English is caviare.

Of the "Adonais" we need only say that it is a faithful reprint, in a handy and cheap little volume, of the original edition published in 1821. Many Shelleians will be glad to have it.

Then a quiet, unpretentious, but at the same time sound and scholarly study of Tennyson's work; designed evidently for practical use. It well fulfils its purpose, being clear, concise, and judicial. We may specially call attention to the section on the sources of Tennyson's poems, in which Mr. Van Dyke successfully breaks a lance with Mr. Churton Collins. A good and useful book.

FRANCIS THOMPSON.

A Splendid Home

THE ART OF THE PITTI PALACE, FLORENCE, WITH A SHORT HISTORY OF THE BUILDING AND ITS OWNERS. By Julia de Wolf Addison. (Bell. 6s. net.)

THE Pitti Palace! At the words we seem to see in the splendid home that he built for himself, dominating Florence, the crafty old tyrant, Luca Pitti, where he sits brooding on his downfall, staring at his broken ambition, tricked by the wily Pietro de' Medici, tricked by the self-same roguery wherewith he himself had jockeyed this Pietro's father, old Cosimo de' Medici, out of power, and won his own reign of dictatorship over Florence. One sees the old fox striding there, baffled, looking out over Florence through the windows that he had boasted to old Cosimo should be built by the first architect of Italy, Brunelleschi; each window, he had sneered, should be larger than the great doorway of the palace of the Medici; and now he wondered, scowling, if the dead Cosimo de' Medici were leering out of heaven or hell, through their magnificent span, upon his overthrow by this son of his, Pietro, chuckling at the use of the same trick that had befooled the father. For in the Piazza Signoria was much murmur of the election of Pietro de' Medici, the place indeed being packed with the troops of the Medici, horse and foot. He knew his power was gone—had known it for hours—from the moment when Pietro, feigning sickness, had had his lying treacherous interview with him. How bitterly he must have laughed—had they not kissed?—nay, he the tyrant Pitti, had he not even wept? This betrothal of his daughter to young Lorenzo de' Medici had been but Medicean dust flung in his cruel old eyes by a fit son of that even more cruel house. Baffled, he had bowed his head supinely to his own ruin and the destruction of his friends and comrades. As a fact, however, it was not this builder of the palace who had begun the splendid art collection which was to become one of the wonders of the world, but the infamous art-loving Cosimo I. de' Medici, he who bought the palace from Luca Pitti's bankrupt grandson for his wife, Eleanor of Toledo—that princely picture-loving scoundrel of the Medici who slew his own son before his mother's eyes. What strange stories that old palace could tell! With an excellent and brightly written sketch of its history, the author begins her book, which, given Messrs. George Bell & Sons for publishers and Julia de Wolf Addison's blithe pen for the writing, opens with bright promise. But when it comes to describing the art-galleries—and their catalogue makes the bulk of these pages—the book becomes dull reading. The only hope of giving an idea of pictures is to give reproductions. If the author and publishers had done this, and been content to let Julia Addison's pen write a short life of each artist and the gossip about each picture, we should have had a nearly perfect book. The literary description of pictures is a tedious thing. And the quotations from literary celebrities upon works of art are generally pitiful reading. George Eliot and Hawthorne knew nothing of the art of painting. Did not even Ruskin fling contempt on Rembrandt and Whistler, and give honour to Miss Alexander and her dreadful giggled snowdrops! Surely Raphael's "Donna Velata" is a sadly overrated picture; as, indeed, Raphael is a sadly overrated genius. Surely Julia Addison does not really feel this half-concealed contempt for Rembrandt, who is one of the giants of immortality in the whole realm of art, a vast colossal figure of a man. Yet the book is worth the buying, if it were only that the author gives us a little reproduction of that exquisite work of Furini's, the "Allegorical Head"; indeed, Furini will rise from the dead even yet.

HALDANE MACFALL.

THE RISE OF ENGLISH CULTURE. By Edwin Johnson. (Williams & Norgate. 15s. net.)

THE author of this book was at one time in the ministry of one of the denominations. Beginning to write as an apologist, instead of discovering, he says, a solid basis of witnessed and accredited facts, he found "nothing but clear and irresistible evidence of the schemes and devices of a secret literary society, whose bold statements have again and again to be contradicted out of their own writings." There was, in fact, no Christian Church before the eleventh century. The histories and chronicles, the donations and charters, upon which later historians have built up the records of what are called the Dark Ages are all of them more or less clumsy contrivances of the Benedictine Order. Nay, the New Testament itself is a forgery of the same designing body. "Nothing is understood of English History until we see that it is a branch of Church History. Nothing is understood of Church History until we see that it is Benedictine History, and that Benedictine History is a branch of theological art." Gildas, who is assigned to the sixth century, is a monk who has an admirable command of the Latin Bible, "which no monk had or could have until the late fifteenth century." His name, therefore, covers the personality of a fifteenth-century Benedictine. He is certified by Bede, and Bede by William of Malmesbury, and so on. All these are but names in the catena of pretended evidences. The conspiracy was not merely local, it extended throughout the continent of Europe. Mr. Johnson takes us far and wide, pointing out to us on every side the baseless character of the evidence on which by the credulity of later ages has been set up the fabric of mediæval history. And he shrinks not at all from the logical conclusion. The historical conscience was yet undeveloped in the human mind; record of the past there was none—only a blind stretching back into a limitless, featureless waste of infinite time. A thousand years are to the Lord as one day, and to the monks one day was as a thousand years. The world in which they had slumbered they knew not at all how long was waking up around them; strange tales of absurd, impossible discoveries, subversive of all the known facts that they had heard and that their fathers had told them, were rousing men to curious and dangerous inquiry. It was necessary once and for all to assert the sober truth. For cosmogony and geography there was the book of Genesis; and for the Christian era, if there was no document, documents must be made. And they were made—on a handsome scale. Here was a state of things—the best possible, for by it they lived rich and at ease; it must be accounted for. The vague possible centuries of the past were mapped out in congruity with the monastic notions of what ought to have happened in them, even as the recluses made their maps of a four-square world with a four-square Jerusalem at the point of intersection of its diagonals. It would have been easy to invent a score of centuries, but as a matter of fact they limited themselves to eight or ten. For nothing less than this is the amazing conclusion which we are called upon to face: that the larger part of the so-called Middle Ages are to be wiped out; or, rather, that they never existed.

The author of "The Rise of English Culture" has been for some time dead, and the book itself has had to wait thirteen years for a publisher. We cannot suppose that the theory it advocates will meet at once with universal acceptance, but those who accept it will cling to it, no doubt, with the greater tenacity.

JAPANESE PHYSICAL TRAINING. By H. Irving Hancock. (Putnam's Sons. 5s. net.)

THE author describes this very interesting book as containing "the system of exercise, diet, and general mode of living that has made the Mikado's people the healthiest, strongest, and happiest men and women in the world." We are not prepared to endorse a good many of his statements; and indeed it was inevitable that, in dealing with a highly technical subject such as this really is, little errors in anatomy and physiology should creep in. At the same time, we must admit that these do not appreciably detract from the value of the work. It is, of course, a text-book, should you want one, of the system known as jiu-jitsu; but were that all, there would be no reason for noticing the book here. Much as this system would doubtless benefit many individuals in this country, he would be a blind guide who advocated any system of physical training as in need of urgent attention, whilst the physical unfitness of certain classes in this country is due to causes much more profound and much more clamantly asserting themselves to the discriminating ear.

The chapters of real value in this book do not deal with jiu-jitsu at all. A Japanese wrestler is now giving practical demonstrations of this art in London, and we hear that it is the latest feminine craze. Fortunately Yukio Tani had the good taste to refuse a challenge recently offered him by an Englishwoman. No further comment need here be made upon his art.

The really interesting things are those which the author tells us of Japanese diet and hygiene. It is with necessary admiration that one reads of their appreciation of night air—about which most Westerners still have their delusions—and their attitude towards alcohol. We fancy Dr. Archdall Reid, with his theories that the alcohol habit must pass over any race, and that abstemiousness is therefore to be found only amongst races whose ancestors have been thoroughly weeded out by alcohol, may have some difficulty in explaining away the case of the Japanese, whose saké is a beverage somewhat weaker than the average Rhine wine. They take their tea weak, too, do these wise people, declining to drink the tannic acid which a degenerate taste—wanting a little "body" in its tea—demands in the West. For opium they do not care, but of recent years they have adopted tobacco-smoking as a national habit, but not to the same extent as in Western countries. Fortunately the verdict of science is not with the author when he suggests that the—very moderate—

Japanese use of tobacco may work for the partial weakening of the race. Such an effect cannot be ascribed to tobacco except when it is used by the growing organism, on which it acts as a powerful and most subtly injurious poison.

The last point we have room to note is concerned with the Japanese diet, the principal ingredients of which—we mean principal in the sense of nutritious—are rice, fish, and eggs. They consume little meat, and the bulk of their diet is very much less than ours—as well it might be. Of course, it is arrant nonsense to claim that the Japanese obtain their strength from a vegetable diet. Animal products, such as fish and eggs, are an indispensable part of their food, which they know how to prepare so as to get the most value for the least digestive effort. The more one reads about the Japanese the paler becomes one's Aryan skin. They make one a little nervous!

Fiction

THE AMERICAN PRISONER. By Eden Phillpotts. (Methuen, 6s.) In power to seize one's thoughts and send them flying after fictitious events, Mr. Phillpotts is unexcelled. Not that he is a great artist; he is not even the Hardy of his Devonshire, despite his triumphant adaptation of peasant speech to humorous purposes. But he has a great creativeness, and the world of laughter and passion which he creates is a reality till we have explored it from end to end. "The American Prisoner" is a story of Dartmoor, laid during the war declared against England by America in 1812. Captured Americans were lodged by thousands in a vast circular enclosure on Dartmoor, and one of them is chosen by Mr. Phillpotts to gain the heart of a heroine whose father detests Cousin Jonathan. Villainy culminates in the person of a rather impossible wool-stapler, who quotes whenever he opens his mouth, but fails not of uncanny effect. The palm of picturesqueness belongs to his tool, an art-loving miser, who asks "Do a woman salt down reptiles and make her meal of blind-worms and berries if she have got a gold mine hidden?" Hers is, however, the theft of an amphora worth eighteen thousand pounds; and, thanks to her, Mr. Phillpotts fairly drives melodrama tandem. The parts of the book relating to the prisoners constitute historical fiction of exceptional freshness. Nature does not play the semi-deific rôle allotted her in "The River," but a stern scenery is admirably visualised. As a writer, Mr. Phillpotts indulges rather self-consciously in the unaccustomed word, but his dialogue flows apart from himself with a freedom which announces him a favoured listener as well as an excellent inventor. Fame blows an uncritical trumpet, but he deserves a blast from it, if indeed he deserves not a tune.

TO-MORROW'S TANGLE. By Geraldine Bonner. (Cassell, 6s.) It is seldom that one reads so unpretentious yet satisfying a piece of writing as "To-morrow's Tangle." The story throughout is admirably restrained and unforced, the style of narrative simple and clear. Yet it is by no means a commonplace or undistinguished book, either in plot or writing. The prologue, which gives the clue to the tangle of later years, takes place in the Californian mining district in the early 'fifties, when Jake Shackleton barter his helpless half-dying wife and her sickly infant, who have barely survived the dreadful hardships of the Utah desert, to a miner for a pair of horses. But Jake Shackleton does not continue his way alone—he takes with him his second wife, in order to marry whom he has become a Mormon. When we say that the miner cherishes the woman and her child, the heroine of the story, named after the beautiful Californian wildflower, Mariposa Lily, bringing the child up as his own daughter, and that Jake Shackleton becomes a millionaire, the tangle of to-morrow may be divined. The story of Mariposa takes place in that picturesque, lazy, cosmopolitan city of San Francisco—not the San Francisco of to-day, but the city of thirty years ago, when the mining craze brought strange people within its walls. Mariposa is an interesting figure in her early matured beauty, her Spanish dignity, and innate simplicity and sweetness of nature; in reality, a little girl masquerading in the guise of a triumphantly maturing womanhood. One of the best character sketches in the book is that of Mrs. Willers, the up-to-date American journalist, foolish and over-dressed as an afternoon caller, but self-reliant, alert, and withal womanly in her newspaper den. "To-morrow's Tangle" is an interesting novel much above the average.

CHINKIE'S FLAT. By Louis Becke. (Unwin, 6s.) Mr. Becke lays his first story—for the present volume is a collection of stories, notes, and reminiscences—in the wilds of North Queensland, and thus allows himself full scope for his undeniable vitality and unhackneyed expression. He knows the rough men of unfrequented places, he understands the elemental passions which guide them, but his ideas of love-making are distinctly primitive, and certainly dull. The publisher's note which accompanies this book leads one to expect "a strong love interest," and therefore one watches with intensity the possible developments which may result from the introduction into a mining centre of several young girls. The reader's heart quite justifiably is observed to flutter. The situation is there, in the shape of "Magnetic Villa," which offers to the miners a refined home from home; the men, bearded, good-natured ruffians, are undeniably there; the girls are there; but Mr. Becke fails to develop the latent possibilities, he seems to think the reader will let him off with a mere grouping on a veranda, or a stroll on the beach at 8 a.m. The situations, to put it mildly, come to nothing; and even the heroine, in desperation, finally proposes to her hero. There is a rescue from black tribes which is thrilling enough; and the pictures of social life are amusingly suggestive of possible home life in a Margate boarding-house. One looks to Mr. Becke for brilliant description and realistic presentment, and the reader will not be disappointed in "Chinkie's Flat" as far as the mining life and adventure are concerned.

V. C.: A CHRONICLE OF CASTLE BARFIELD AND OF THE CRIMEA. By David Christie Murray. (Chatto and Windus, 3s. 6d.) Let it be said that it is not the author's fault if nothing fresh can be written about heroic young men who dash recklessly across a fire-swept zone to rescue superior officers. The author who deliberately sets himself this task is bound by tradition to a certain type of hero, and to a heroine beautiful of course, and trusting come weal come woe. The victorious section of this book can be left to the reader's delectation without comment. But there is another side to the book, which deals with the simple villainy of Jervase, the hero's father, who is in partnership with Jervoyce, the hero's uncle. This brilliant couple convert an unproductive salt-pit into a noble property by running a little adit from their own worthless shaft into the rich one of a neighbour. And when discovery follows, Jervoyce, described as a pious sneak, betrays himself, and is hustled off to Spain; but Jervase stays to fight it out. A long night alone with the brandy decanter suffices to restore equanimity and to settle a plan of action. The psychology of the situation is mastered, roughly perhaps, but very surely; and the reader learns to appreciate the genuine power and imagination of the author. Old Jervase fights, his back to the wall, his hand on his cheque-book, to save his skin for his own sake and his name for his son's sake. This rough, dishonest, piratical, but affectionate old father alone makes the book worth reading.

LE CHEMIN DE LA GLOIRE. (Les Batailles de la Vie.) Par Georges Ohnet. (Ollendorff, 3fr. 50c.) Time was when a new story by Ohnet brought joy to the hearts of novel-readers. "Serge Panine" and "Le Maître de Forges" won a fully deserved popularity and sold in thousands. But of late that popularity has begun to wane; readers recognise Ohnet's conventional idealism, his mediocre style and his elementary psychology. His last book is scarcely free of those faults. The stage and the American millionaire are playing a large part in the popular French novel of the day. Even Paul Bourget and Anatole France in "La duchesse bleue" and "Histoire comique" have tried their hands at theatrical novels, and have not, it must be confessed, found in them their greatest triumphs. Rich Americans appear in almost every novel, but, so far as our experience goes, their faults are always unduly magnified, and their good qualities unduly ignored, except perhaps by Bourget and by Pierre de Coulevain, whose "Eve victorieuse" is probably the best novel ever written by a European about Americans. The theme of Ohnet's novel is the destruction of the artist's soul by luxury, but the treatment is commonplace and at times even wearisome. Given a musical composer who has attained recognition after a hard struggle with poverty and neglect, and who owes his success in large measure to his mistress, a singer who has splendidly interpreted his music, and an American heiress, a great beauty, who ardently desires to attach a celebrated artist to her millions, and we know exactly what will happen. The artist will abandon his mistress, marry the heiress, and live in a luxury and ease that will sap his energies and dry up the fountain of his inspiration. Fortunately in this case the artist perceives the error of his ways in time, and, compelled to choose between his art and his wife, unhesitatingly elects to live for the former. For a brief space of time the luxury-loving wife, who is singularly lacking in intelligence and charm for an American even when she is the possessor of millions, bears her husband company in the simpler mode of life which is the only one for an artist. But jealousy, for which there is not the slightest cause, of his former mistress, drives her to leave him for ever, to procure a divorce, and console herself by marrying a wealthy cousin to whom she had been engaged before she met the French musician. The work is too obtrusively didactic in tone, and too full of longueurs. Ignorance of American manners and customs is shown in writing of the heiress's father as Sir Brandon.

Short Notices

NEW POEMS. By Ronald Campbell Macfie. (Lane. 5s.) Conscious of having just so much space to fill, we are tempted, on ethical grounds, to employ it all with quotation from Mr. Macfie. Come to think of it, what good reason is there why one should not fill one's space with the best that may be put into it? Mr. Macfie, as the reader of "Granite Dust" well knows, is a veritable poet. There are a few such, of course, alive to-day: but this writer is of a more modern spirit than any of them, and comes near to making much contemporary verse read, by contrast, as anachronism. Mr. Macfie is modern in the best sense: in the sense that recognises the unparalleled intellectual awakening of the nineteenth century. His verse comes from a soul which neither denies nor sophisticates Truth. The nebular hypothesis, the theory of evolution, are accepted by him because he knows that they must be accepted. If modern science be incompatible with the poetic spirit, then these verses are inexplicable. To us they prove that which needed no proof: the profoundly significant truth, well urged by Keats and Tennyson, that Truth and Beauty are inseparably one.

Space fails for quotation from the fine blank-verse poem to the Queen, from the beautiful verses which Mr. Macfie heads with the last two lines from Mrs. Meynell's sonnet, "Renouncement," or from the many poems in which the surgent spirit of modern science is met and reconciled; but we quote in extenso a little poem, "Faith," in which a beautiful thought is beautifully realised:

If Faith were given human form,
Alive and warm,
I think thy steady-burning eyes,
Where Love and Hope and Courage dwell,
I think thy mouth, so sweet and wise,
Would suit her well;
For if not very Faith thou art,
Yet Faith abiding in thy heart
Hath wrought thy features to her will
And made them pure, and glad, and still

THOMAS DELONEY. Eine Studie über Balladenlitteratur der Shakspeare-Zeit. Nebst Neudruck von Deloney's Roman "Jack of Newbury." Von Dr. Richard Sievers. (Palaestra, XXXVI.) (Berlin: Mayer & Müller. 6 m. 60 pf.) Dr. Sievers has made a very careful and useful study of the ballads of Thomas Deloney (1543?-1607?), the silk-weaver, whose verse Michael Drayton found "full of state and learning." At the end is printed from the 1630 edition, now in the Bodleian, Deloney's "Pleasant History of John Winchcomb, in his younger years called Jack of Newbury." Three of Deloney's ballads are on the Spanish Armada. Dr. Sievers classifies the ballads thus: Narrative ballads (1) dealing with contemporary events, (2) with older history, and (3) with romantic subjects; Lyrical ballads: (1) humorous, (2) pathetic; and, lastly, Dialogues. The style and versification of the ballads are also described and criticised. It is a valuable contribution to the history and materials of English ballad literature, and no student of the subject should neglect the little treatise. The value of the series generally is much enhanced for English readers by its reprints at a moderate price of books which are not easily accessible.

ENTSTEHUNGSGESCHICHTE VON GOLDSMITH'S "VICAR OF WAKEFIELD." Von Bernhard Neuendorff. (Berlin: Mayer & Müller. 2m.) The application of scientific methods to pure literature which meet us at every turn give rise to many a sad reflection. In the pamphlet before us Goldsmith's beautiful prose idyll is subjected to as searching and minute a diagnosis as if it were a devastating disease. We learn every detail of the "outer history of its origin," every detail of the "inner history of its origin;" two alleged sources of the tale are proved to be erroneous, originals in life or literature are found for each character, for each episode, while the views of life—Dr. Primrose is likened to Job!—expressed in the work are carefully analysed. In the end Goldsmith is classed with Richardson, since both authors combine character-drawing with admirable description of the immediate environment of their characters, but Goldsmith is allowed to have progressed beyond Richardson, because to character-drawing he adds character-development. Despite all this panoply of learning and all this minute investigation, we prefer to remember that the late Sir Leslie Stephen says in his last book, "English Literature and Society in the Eighteenth Century," that "the greatest attraction of the Vicar is due to the personal charm of Goldsmith's character."

UNE VILLE D'EAUX ANGLAISE AU XVIII^e SIÈCLE: LA SOCIÉTÉ ÉLÉGANTE ET LITTÉRAIRE À BATH SOUS LA REINE ANNE ET SOUS LES GEORGES. Par A. Barbeau, de l'université de Caen. (Paris: Alphonse Picard et fils, 1904.) Why could not an Englishman have done this thing? Here is a soundly written, profoundly interesting, and thoroughly studied book dealing with the social and literary life at Bath during the reigns of Queen Anne and the Georges. It is a comprehensive and admirably drawn picture of the manners, the people, the times, and the influence of Bath on the non-political history of the period. True, we have our Ainsworth, our Beau Nash, our Christopher Anstey, and a library of Bath Guides, old and new, but M. Barbeau has delved far deeper. He has compiled a bibliography of some five hundred volumes, dealing more or less directly with Bath and its history. Not content with quoting from Goldsmith, Fielding, Smollett, Lady Jackson, Sidney Colvin, Allan Cunningham, Thomas Moore, Pepys, Peter Pindar, and a score of others, he has been successful in finding references to Bath, in its heyday, in dozens of obscure writers, whose contemporary descriptions, all duly acknowledged in full, in most carefully printed footnotes, enable him to present a very faithful series of views of the place and its people. The book is an epitome of information, scholarly, dispassionate, faithful, and studiously unexaggerated, the result most evidently of many years of the closest study. An appendix contains Mr. Swinburne's admirable "Ballad of Bath," and there is an excellent index. Altogether a most remarkable book.

Reprints and New Editions

a SESAME AND LILIES, b THE CROWN OF WILD OLIVE. By John Ruskin. (Allen: 3s. each net, leather; 2s. 6d. each net, cloth.) These two volumes should certainly take the place of honour among this week's reprints. They supply a long-needed demand in a most satisfactory manner. We have no doubt that many will hasten to avail themselves of these very moderately priced volumes. They fulfil in every particular Ruskin's own idea of books: "Valuable books should, in a civilised country, be within the reach of every one, printed in excellent form for a just price; but not in any vile, vulgar, or, by reason of smallness of type, physically injurious form, at a vile price."

CORIDON'S SONG, AND OTHER VERSES. With Illustrations by Hugh Thomson, and an Introduction by Austin Dobson. (Macmillan. 2s. net.) This charming collection of dainty sketches, illustrating various verses by divers poets, first published in 1894, again makes its bow to us. The paper on which the engravings are printed does adequate justice to the skill of the illustrator, while the whole "get-up" is pleasant and serviceable, so that we may often refresh our memory with a sight of these delightful sketches as the binding is not too delicate for frequent use. Of one thing we may be sure—we shall never tire of these dainty drawings.

LEVIATHAN. By Thomas Hobbes. (Cambridge English Classics. Cambridge University Press. 4s. 6d. net.) The first issue of this series is worthy of special attention. The aim of the Cambridge University Press in sending forth what we may hope will be an invaluable series is altogether praiseworthy and worthy of support. Briefly, their aim is to provide accurate texts of such works as are greatly and oftentimes neglected, and reprints of many books that are not at present accessible in a well-printed or authentic form. We note that two volumes of this series to be issued shortly are "The English Works of Roger Ascham" and "The Poems of Richard Crashaw." In all the volumes of these series the original spelling and punctuation will be faithfully preserved, the only change from the original edition being that the old type-forms of j, s, &c., will be made uniform with modern usage. We wish this venture every success.

GREAT EXPECTATIONS AND HARD TIMES. By Charles Dickens, with an Introduction by Charles Dickens the Younger. (Macmillan. 3s. 6d.) The description of the writing and conception of these two books and the extracts from his father's letters on the subject, as given in the son's preface, make very interesting reading. We never could bring ourselves to like the ending of "Great Expectations"; so that it is pleasant to hear that Dickens did not approve of it himself, but was persuaded to give the usual "happy ending" by Bulwer. "Bulwer, who has been, as I think you know, extraordinarily taken by the book, so strongly urged it upon me, after reading the proofs, and supported his view with such good reasons, that I resolved to make the change."

EDGAR ALLAN POE'S TALES: a Selection, with an Introduction by Tighe Hopkins. (National Library: Cassell. 6d. net.) Mr. Hopkins, in his short introduction to this selection of tales, gives a graphic and sympathetic sketch of Poe's life and writings. He says: "The spectacle of this delicate genius, with whom literature was a religion, wandering from publisher to publisher, 'with his fine print-like manuscript, neatly rolled,' and finding none but a beggar's market, is pathetic, if not quite unfamiliar; but what reward there is in posthumous renown has certainly been Poe's." The hundred-dollar prize story, "The Gold Bug," is included in this small volume.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS, ETC.

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON will publish immediately an important work by Professor William North Rice, Ph.D., LL.D., entitled: "Christian Faith in an Age of Science."—Last year Mr. T. Fisher Unwin brought out a book by Mrs. Aubrey Le Blond (better known perhaps as Mrs. Main) entitled: "True Tales of Mountain Adventure for Non-Climbers Young and Old." This first attempt to popularise the subject of Alpine climbing met with so satisfactory a reception that Mrs. Le Blond has been encouraged to prepare another book on the same lines. It will be published by Mr. Unwin on March 7 under the title of "Adventures on the Roof of the World," and will contain over 100 pictures, mainly from photographs by Mrs. Le Blond.—Professor Pasquale Villari's great "Life of Savonarola" has passed through many editions in England. Mr. T. Fisher Unwin is now bringing out a new issue at half-a-crown net, uniform in size and binding with the cheap edition of Mr. John Morley's "Life of Cobden." It has nearly 800 pages, and contains all the original illustrations.

New Books Received

Theological and Biblical

- Jülicher (Adolph), translated by Janet Penrose Ward, An Introduction to the New Testament (Smith, Elder) 16/0
Unbelief in Christian England, by a Mission Priest (Skeffington) 2/6
James, LL.D. (The Rev. M. H.), Death—And What Then? (Skeffington) 2/0

Poetry, Criticism, Drama, and Belles Lettres

- Cranmer-Byng (L.), rendered by, The Odes of Confucius (Orient Press) net 1/0
Collins (Edwin), translated by, Rabbi Bachye's "The Duties of the Heart" (Orient Press)

History and Biography

- Johnson, M.A. (Edwin), The Rise of English Culture (Williams & Norgate) net 15/0
Colville (Mrs. Arthur), Duchess Sarah, being the Social History of the Times of Sarah Jennings, Duchess of Marlborough (Longmans) net 18/0
Newmarch (Rosa), Henry J. Wood (Lane) net 2/6

Art

- Addison (Julia de Wolf), The Art of the Pitti Palace, Florence, with a Short History of the Building and its Owners (Bell) net 6/0

Miscellaneous

- Leigh (R. A. Austen), edited by, Eton under Barnard, 1754-1765 (College Press, Eton) net 2/0
Society for the Protection of Birds, Thirteenth Annual Report (The Society)
The Book of the Face, or the Art of Judging Character from the Features and Habits, by a Doctor of Philosophy (Drane) 0/6
Kassias (Néocles), Hellenism and Macedonia (Thomas) 0/6
Bracey, K.C.B. (Lord), Fifty Years of Progress and the New Fiscal Policy (Longmans) net 2/0

Fiction

- "Unto Each Man His Own," by Samuel Gordon (Heinemann), 6/0; "The Game of Love," by Walter Fuller (Drane), 6/0; "Strong Mac," by S. R. Crockett (Ward, Lock), 6/0; "Chinkie's Flat," by Louis Becke (Unwin), 6/0; "A Bush Honeymoon," by Laura M. Palmer Archer (Unwin), 6/0; "The Turnstile of Night," by C. N. Williamson (Hurst & Blackett), 6/0; "The Red Leaguers," by Shan F. Bullock (Methuen), 6/0; "Our New Selection," by Steele Rudd (Arthur Hoey Davis) (Bulletin Newspaper Co., Sydney), 6/0; "M.I.C.S.," by Burford Delannoy (Ward, Lock), 2/0 and 3/6; "A Consummate Scoundrel," by Guy Boothby (White), 5/0; "The Deliverance," by Ellen Glasgow (Constable), 6/0.

Reprints and New Editions

- "Chronicon Adm de Usk," A.D. 1377-1421, edited by Sir Edward Maunde Thompson, K.C.B. (Frowde), net 10/6; Keble's Poems, "Lyra Innocentium" (Parker), 4/0; The Works of John Ruskin: "The Crown of Wild Olive," and "Sesame and Lilies" (Pocket Edition) (Allen), net 2/6 each; "The Stage Shakespeare," "Henry V.," "Henry VIII.," "Twelfth Night," "A Winter's Tale," "Othello," "Much Ado About Nothing" (Collins) net 1/0 each; "The Works of Lord Byron," Poetry, Vol. VII., edited by E. H. Coleridge, M.A. (Murray), 6/0; "Coridon's Song and Other Verses from Various Sources," illustrated by Hugh Thomson, with Introduction by Austin Dobson (Macmillan), net 2/0; "The Works of Charles and Mary Lamb," Vol. IV.—Dramatic Specimens and the Garrick Plays, edited by E. V. Lucas (Methuen), 7/6; "The Tower of London," by W. Harrison Ainsworth (Methuen), net 3/6; "The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyám," translated by Edward FitzGerald (Methuen), net 1/0; "A Woman of Wiles," by Alick Munro; "In Deadly Peril," by Emile Gaboriau; "Kenilworth," by Sir Walter Scott; "The Sorceress of the Strand," by L. T. Meade (Ward, Lock), each, 0/6.

Periodicals

- "Leisure Hour," "Sunday at Home," "Boy's Own Paper," "Girl's Own Paper," "American Historical Review," "Longman's Magazine," "Pictorial Comedy," "All the World," "Friendly Greetings," "Cassell's Magazine," "Magazine of Art," "Windsor Magazine," "Connoisseur," "Cassell's History of the Russo-Japanese War," "Macmillan's Magazine," "Temple Bar," "Empire Review," "Century Illustrated Monthly Magazine," "Fortnightly Review," "Ainslee's," "Chambers's Journal," "Blackwood's Magazine," "St. Nicholas," "School World," "Photo-Miniature," "British Food Journal," "Contemporary Review," "Cornhill Magazine," "The Cosmopolitan," "English Illustrated," "Indian Antiquary," "The Dial," "Burlington Magazine," "Lady's Magazine," "Pearson's," "The Ibis," "The Artisan," "Westminster Review," "Independent Review," "World's Work," "Art."

Foreign

Theological and Biblical

- Archiv für Religionswissenschaft, herausgegeben von Albrecht Dieterich und Thomas Achelis (Leipzig: Teubner)
Pougin (Arthur), Essai Historique sur la Musique en Russie (Paris: Fischbacher)

Art

- La Bibliofilia, Rivista dell' Arte Antica in Libri, Stampe, Manoscritti, Autografi e Legature (Firenze: Leo S. Olshchki)

Miscellaneous

- Levy (Oscar) Das neunzehnte Jahrhundert (Dresden: Pierson) 2 m.
Bericht der Kommission zur Erhaltung der Kunstdenkmäler in Königreich Sachsen, 1900-1902 (Dresden: Meinhof & Sohne)
Bedier (Joseph) Hommage à Gaston Paris (Paris: Champion)
Barbeau (A.) Une Ville d'Eaux Anglaise au XVIIIe Siècle (Paris: Picard & Fils)

Periodicals

- Mois Scientifique, "The Bookseller: Revue Mensuelle et Journal Général de la Librairie Anglaise."

Letters from a Silent Study

[The following series of notes, more or less critical, on life have been given to me. The writer wished to tell the truth—a desire which may be regarded as a legitimate claim to any reader's consideration and indulgence.]

XII. On the Romantic Style

I FEEL a longing often for that atmosphere, that philosophy, that attitude, those gestures, those sentiments, and those actions—above all, those actions which we call romantic. Is there no romance left in life? Or, was the thing we now call romance ever, at any time, alive? One is told much about its traditions, but religion, in spite of its traditions, is an eternal element in man. If romance, as it is understood at present, were either a natural state or a genuine instinct, no amount of traditions could kill it. I see that it has been killed, and so I am urged to the conclusion that it had no supreme vitality in the first place. A few nights ago I attended the performance by some popular players of a famous romantic drama. The lady who represents the heroine was very pretty and ridiculous—the most delightful marionette conceivable. I could have watched her for hours: the charming face, the lovely black eyes, the helpless white hands, and the fingers covered with big rings, the brilliant clothes, the picturesque amazing head-dress—utterly unlike the sombre magnificent stillness of Velasquez, whose tragic art is so much admired, quoted, and compared with other arts in portraiture by people who have never been across the threshold of the galleries at Madrid. But Velasquez or no Velasquez, I adored the lady: she was a darling; I wanted to put her on my mantel-piece and dust her beautiful embroidered gown every morning, and cover it—and her—with Chinese silk every night. She murmured curious M'mms each time she spoke, and I did not care what she said so long as she said M—m—m first, and moved her splendid eyelashes up and down. I know she is a fine actress when she is not playing a romantic part, and if she were not a fine actress she could not have made herself such a priceless gem of a doll. She evidently said: "I am to be a physical impossibility—I will therefore be a mechanical triumph." And she succeeded. O why can't I have that bewitching object (and her changes of costume in a velvet box with a silver key) for ever on my mantel-piece!

But let me come to the men. Were cloaks ever quite so scarlet before? did their wearers ever throw them around and about themselves with so much play? did swords ever stick out so far beneath long tattered mantles? were tattered mantles ever so curiously tattered? did hats ever stand so perkily on heads? did plumes ever curl with such determined curlings? did collars ever sit so high in the back, or fall, with such abandon, from noble throats? did human beings ever strut, ever bellow, ever attitudinize, ever "ha! ha!" and "ho! ho!" with such overpowering imbecility? did lovers ever talk in such periods? I cannot believe it. What is worse—for me, perhaps—I should be so sorry if I were obliged, by irrefutable evidence, to believe it.

Spain is acknowledged to be the original home of romance, and the Spanish, of all European people, have changed very little in the course of the centuries. They are the least theatrical, least self-conscious race in the world: to see the peculiar naturalness which we call child-like, we must study Spanish men and Spanish women. Their movements are quiet; their faces are, for the most part, transparent—the character, either gentle or undisciplined, shines through: in speech, they are simple; in feeling, they are not subtle, but, on the contrary, very definite; their eyes are not given to flashing—they are usually steady and profound; they are neither very merry nor very sad, but they are graciously serious. In their loves the women have much in common with Irish women. They are as faithful and they are less discerning—that is to say, they give a blind love and they are not witty in detecting the ironies—many of them hard—in all affection. They are domestic women who bring up large families and control small households; they dress plainly; they have few luxuries, and they are exceedingly pious in a matter-of-fact way. How unlike the heroines of romance! The men are easily happy, easily gallant, and easily married. If they are quick-tempered, they are not swashbucklers; they are fond of children, and they are great admirers of beauty; they are abstemious eaters and drinkers; they are not eager for money; they delight in gardens and sunshine; they are not much given to talking; they smoke too much; they are, no doubt, unambitious; they are not dashing—they are, in fact, a little amateurish when, in small companies, they parade the streets to gaze up at girls on balconies, or when, in places of public amusement, they applaud their favourites—acrobats, for choice. They have a passion for acrobats and conjuring tricks. Women dancers are not popular—once away from Madrid where the customs are cosmopolitan. But again, how different from our heroes of romance! Imagine a hero of romance patiently watching a cabbage grow out of his sombrero! Imagine a hero of romance buying circus tickets for his wife and nine children! Imagine a hero of romance taking them all home in a tramcar to a little dinner of vegetable soup, ham, and fruit! As for the higher classes, the higher classes are precisely the same everywhere, and a Spanish grandee of the first rank might be an English duke of the old, old school sitting alone in his ancestral stronghold wondering at the new vagaries of society, or he might be one of the newest type of English aristocrat. In neither case would he resemble the romantic characters of romantic drama. Perhaps this is as well.

Nevertheless, I should like that priceless gem of a doll—she is modern and she represents an idea; she's an adorable symbol of clap-trap, and if she is not in the least like a Velasquez portrait, it is because she is so truly of this century, and so surely a sign of these times. No man alive could put her, as she is, on canvas. Mere superficial impressionism could do her no justice. She is herself a triumph over all the difficulties of Nature.

JOHN OLIVER HOBBS.

[Copyright 1904 by MRS. CRATCHE in the United States of America.]

Egomets

IT has ever been the fashion to laugh at literary critics for the varying verdicts they pronounce upon the books they are called upon to review. Is this just? Would not the wonder be if they did not differ in their judgments? Criticism is not an exact science, it is an art, and art is but the expression of the artist's emotion, be he man of letters or painter. Just as two painters will see with different eyes the same landscape, so will two critics read with different mental vision the same book. Critics do not vary in their opinions of modern works only, but also in those they hold of classics, differing in the latter cases more than they are sometimes willing to admit. What a fetish is literary fashion. Who dare confess that he has never read "Paradise Lost"? That he cannot read Montaigne's "Essays"?

It would not hurt our literature if there were a little more plain speaking about accepted classics. It is not necessary for me to deny that a book is good and great, simply because I am not able to appreciate or enjoy it. It would be marvellous indeed were my taste so eclectic that I could find beauties in all the writings that I am told—and believe—are beautiful. My mental vision is limited as is every man's to a greater or less degree, therefore there are certain great books that have for me no charm, charm they ever so many others whose opinions I respect and accept. This fact does not trouble my literary conscience; there are more books in the world that I desire to read than I can ever hope to peruse, why then should I expend any given time devouring those which bring me no mental sustenance, which only cause me mental dyspepsia?

It is the same with the men I meet. Some I instinctively like, some I dislike, though the latter are often, I know, interesting, able men; they do not interest me, however. It is not a matter of reason, simply a question of personality. Their personality does not square with mine; there I permit the matter to rest, contenting myself with my own familiar friends. So is it with my books; some I am qualified to enjoy, others are not meat for me. The meat, I know, is sound and sweet, but it is not to my taste, and why should I cloy my literary palate with sweets which are sour to my thinking? No, I will not destroy my individuality by endeavouring to force myself to admire every book that is admirable, nor will I offend my literary conscience by pretending to enjoy that which is distasteful to me.

There is only too great a tendency to-day toward sameness, in literary as in other matters. For example critics will squabble over the date of a play of Shakespeare, or over the position of a comma, but they all with one consent fall down and blindly worship at the shrine of St. Shakespeare, unable to see the spots upon the sun. Shakespeare to them is a god, not a man. I, for my part, love my author friends with all the greater love in that their faults make them human, giving me a sense of fellow feeling with them. Had Shakespeare been a saint and his works of god-like perfection, I verily believe his plays and poems would have appealed to me in vain. So with other of my loves, with Addison, Fielding, Goldsmith, Thackeray. And the upshot is just this, I must make my friends for myself; no recommendation from the most gifted of critics will persuade me to like a book unless that book is really to my liking; nor will I make pretence; I would be an honest book-lover or none at all.

Honesty! Am I with all my endeavour and my protestation an honest lover of books? Honestly I do love them with all my heart, but do I judge them honestly? Not a bit of it; did I do so I should be a saint and a god-like critic. But I pride myself upon being a mere man and none of the best. I love my prejudices; so does every man, as he will find if he looks himself in the face. I love my faults and try not to grow over-proud of my virtues, such as they are, especially of those virtues with which my friends credit me and which I know I do not really possess. I have my dislikes as well as my likings among authors, and never—never—will I bring myself to read—or—I am too great a coward to name the names, they are those of famous men and mighty, but I do not love them. But, on the other hand, I will do myself the justice to say that I can clearly see the blemishes of the books I love, and I love them all the more because, like myself, they have their weaknesses.

E. G. O.

Science

The Ways of Memory

HERE and now let me repudiate any inference from what follows that there is a single good word to be said by science on behalf of materialism. To enforce that repudiation, I intend next week to show how the most recent advances in physics—especially the physics of radium—and in psychology have reduced the doctrine of materialism to the level of a lying impertinence—which it always was, indeed.

My colleague who writes the column "Egomets" has described his sensations of recognition and foreknowledge in reading books that are new to him, and Mr. Wallis, in last week's "Correspondence," has criticised the matter. With him I hold the suggestion of pre-existence to be chimerical and untenable; and will only add the comment, for the benefit of the Hellenists, that thus is it now possible to dispose of a belief held by Plato! Then Mr. Wallis inquires whether memory is hereditary. In the sense that he intends, my answer would be no, but in another sense, yes. Heredity, indeed, may be regarded as cell-memory, may it not? Nor is it unthinkable that if the reproductive cells may remember and reproduce the tricks of gesture or tones of voice of a parent, they might even be regarded as reproducing ideas acquired by the parent. This, however, would be to hold, in its extreme form, the view that acquired characters are transmissible: whilst it is, of course, the obvious and unfortunate fact that the new generation does not start with the knowledge of the old, but has to make a fresh start at the beginning for itself.

But certainly I do not hold that the problem raised by "E. G. O." is "absolutely insoluble." On the contrary, I believe that a study of memory—ludicrously brief as this present must be—may suggest a rational solution.

Modern psychology holds—it has no choice—that every memory means a change impressed more or less deeply upon the grey surface of the brain or cortex cerebri, the apex and flower of the material universe, beside the wonders of which radium and its attributes are of a quite immeasurable triviality. When a singer, after long practice, learns to get a note well "forward" which was formerly "throaty," those cells in the motor area of his brain that control the muscles of his throat and tongue and palate have acquired by practice a memory which thereafter enables them so to co-ordinate the movements of those muscles as to ensure good "production." The effect of practice, as in any other art, mechanical, mental, or both, has been so to alter the constitution of the nerve-cells as to produce a new mode of action. Beyond a doubt, this is the physical basis of memory. And it is worth noting that no practice or thought ever adds a single unit to the total number of cerebral nerve-cells—about two thousand millions—with which one is born. Nerve-cells are significantly incapable of division and reproduction. All the experience of living merely modifies the state of the cells already present. That modification is memory.

Now let us go a step further. The cerebrum consists of two halves or cerebral hemispheres, the only direct connexion between which is provided by a number of "commissural" nerve fibres which cross over transversely from one side to the other, forming a white body known as the corpus callosum. The fibres in this bridge come from and represent every area in the hemisphere of either side. Now there still remains a popular belief that it is the front part of the brain that does the thinking. I have not space to discuss that view here, but the modern belief is that, for the processes of consciousness, no less than the entire cortex is needed—and no wonder. Nevertheless, each cerebral hemisphere may be regarded as probably a complete unit capable of producing consciousness, though the services of both in co-ordination are doubtless preferable. Now the co-ordination certainly takes place, as regards intellectual processes, by means of the corpus callosum. And here comes the theory.

Is it not possible that, now and again in certain persons, circumstances may interfere with the simultaneity—or approximate simultaneity—of action of the two hemispheres? The visual image of printed words, which passes—such is the arrangement of the fibres—from both eyes to both hemispheres, may be perceived by the one somewhat before the other.

Given all these data, any one may form a theory. This is mine, and I offer it for no more than it is worth. One hemisphere of "E. G. O.'s" brain perceives the words a second before the other, and sends across an account of them to the second hemisphere by means of the corpus callosum. Immediately thereafter, the words reach the second hemisphere straight from the book. But that hemisphere has already had private intelligence on the subject from its more rapid fellow: so when the new account comes in from the eyes it very naturally says, "By Jove, I've seen that somewhere before!" Its error is excusable, for it is only the rare exception for an appreciable interval of time to separate the action of the two sides. I am tempted to go further—to become more materialistic than ever, I may be told—and suggest that if one side of the body be next a fire, let us say, and therefore somewhat warmer, the scalp of that side will be warmer—and will contain more blood. The circulation of the scalp and of the cortex cerebri are connected, so that for the moment, and in persons whose vaso-motor apparatus is sufficiently sensitive, one cerebral hemisphere may be somewhat better supplied with blood than its fellow. Hence there will be momentary departure from synchronous action.

If all this strikes the reader as a very complicated and mechanical explanation of "E. G. O.'s" experience, I can only say that I did not raise the subject!

C. W. SALEEBY.

Dramatic Notes

CONCERNING dramatic literature we have many erudite volumes, but Dr. Karl Mantzius has provided us with that long-desired work, "A History of Theatrical Art." Dr. Mantzius comes to his task well equipped; he is a distinguished actor and stage manager at the Royal Theatre, Copenhagen, and has studied at the universities of Paris and Copenhagen with marked success; his dissertation before he "proceeded doctor" at the latter seat of learning being upon the History of the English Theatre in the Time of Shakespeare, which forms the third volume of the work under examination. As a scholar and as one practically acquainted with all the ins and outs of the stage, Dr. Mantzius had the means in his possession to write an accurate and illuminating history of theatrical art, and it may at once be stated that he has succeeded in his undertaking. There is much talk just now among lovers of the theatre concerning the present condition of English acting, much of which talk has been wild and whirling, by reason of the fact that many of those who have taken part in it have had but little, if any, knowledge of the art of acting, its history—for we can only understand the present by the light of the past—its difficulties, and its aims. To such as well as to all students of the theatre I can cordially recommend these three admirable volumes.

DR. MANTZIUS' work covers a vast field; he takes us with him from the first beginnings of the actor's art down to the close of the reign of Charles I. of England. The Chinese and the Japanese and the Indian theatres are passed in rapid review, and then the theatre of Greece is discussed in detail in one of the most valuable sections of the work. It is here, perhaps, more than anywhere else that the Doctor's experience as an actor serves him well; what are difficulties to the inexperienced are smoothed away by the practical knowledge of the expert performer. Volume II. carries us to the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, the early Church and secular plays are fully dealt with, and the section upon the Italian comedy, the commedia dell'Arte in particular, is quite admirable.

VOLUME III. brings us to this country and the London of Elizabeth and Shakespeare. There is much interest in the emphasis laid upon the influence exerted upon the English players by professional Italian actors who visited these shores, a point not so fully gone into elsewhere, if my memory serves me well. For my own part, I believe that the influence of foreign actors on the London actors of that day has always been underestimated, while the connection of miracle and mystery plays with the drama of Elizabeth has been over-estimated. Take it for all in all, this volume is an admirable summary of Elizabethan stage history, written with great knowledge and keen perception. Dr. Mantzius would be superhuman if there were not points upon which his opinions could not be accepted.

WHAT grounds are there for definitely stating that the Globe was the only theatre in which Shakespeare had any pecuniary interest as part proprietor? There is no proof, but there is surely probability, that he had some such interest in the Blackfriars Theatre. Concerning the "Merry Wives of Windsor," the author speaks of Sir John Falstaff "brought to life by order of the Queen"; was Falstaff dead then, and ought not this order of the Queen to be noted as unconfirmed gossip? It is, of course, a matter of opinion, and should be stated as such, that Malvolio was "a caricature of the sour and conceited Puritans." Anent these unpopular folk, we find Dr. Mantzius, as becomes a player, their bitter enemy; but, after all, they were human beings and sometimes did what was right; more than that cannot truthfully be said of most people. Why does Dr. Mantzius dogmatically assert that there were no prompters in those days? Actors in their methods were very much the same then as now, and it is not likely that they found it well to depend solely upon their memories. Is it not most probable that there was a prompter, probably seated upon the stage, or situated behind the curtain? However, all these are small points, and mostly matters of conjecture. What is certain is that Dr. Karl Mantzius has placed all students of the stage deeply in his debt, and that no one who would fully instruct himself in the history of the art of acting can afford to neglect these admirable volumes, each of which is provided with a bibliography and index. One real grumble: the bad new fashion is followed—is it new or old?—of not naming the sources from which many of the engravings have been drawn.

THE writer of "Musings without Method" in "Blackwood's Magazine" delivers himself this month of a terrific but over-emphatic onslaught upon the present condition of the drama and the stage in this country. In most of what he writes there is sound sense, but sometimes sound without sense. It is not the increase of musical comedy—inane as it often is—that is so disastrous; it is the decrease of serious drama and good acting that is to be deplored. With comedies our theatres are not ill provided and of competent actors of comedy we have not a few. The star system and the abuse of power by some actor-managers rightly come in for blame, but, after all, the star system is no new evil, and actor-managers such as Sir Henry Irving, Mr. John Hare, Mr. Forbes-Robertson and some others have done good work for the theatre.

NOR does the writer go deep enough when he lays upon the shoulders of our actors the deplorable fact that we "find few dramatic masterpieces to represent." A great playwright will write great plays be the tools to his hand for their representation never so bad. On the other hand, I quite agree with his arguments against the proposed institution of a subsidised theatre, though I shall shock him by saying that one of my reasons for agreeing with him is that to my mind a theatre always has been, always will be, and always should be a commercial undertaking. If there is not a sufficient public to support good plays and good acting, let there be no bolstering up the drama, turning it into a hothouse plant which would wither at the first breath of fresh air. I believe, as has been pointed out before in these columns, that a répertoire theatre could be formed upon a paying basis; if it cannot, the drama must become a matter of reading, not representation. One other point: the actor-manager is not master to-day "of all the theatres in London which are not given over to the cult of burlesque." Firstly, burlesque is practically non-existent; secondly, what of Mr. Frohman, who has "presented" us with "Quality Street," "The Admirable Crichton," "Letty," and "Little Mary," all well staged but not over-decorated, and all well played? The cure for the present condition of affairs rests with those of the public who want better fare; if they will ask for it they will obtain it.

THE Mermaid Society, which, under the presidency of Mr. Philip Carr, devotes its attention to the production, or rather reproduction, of old plays, announces performances of Congreve's "The Way of the World" at the Court Theatre on the evenings of March 20 and 21, and on the afternoon of the latter day. Seats for the two last performances can be obtained from the secretary of the society, 3 Old Palace Chambers, Old Scotland Yard, Whitehall.

AT the Royalty Theatre on March 26, in aid of the Irish Literary Society, the Irish National Theatre Society will perform in the afternoon Mr. W. B. Yeats' "The King's Threshold," and two little plays of Irish peasant life by Mr. J. M. Synge, "In the Shadow of the Glen" and "Riders to the Sea." In the evening, in addition to "The King's Threshold," will be given Mr. W. B. Yeats' farce, "The Pot of Broth," and Padraic Colm's "Broken Soil."

THE date of the Stage Society's matinée of "A Soul's Tragedy" by Robert Browning is now fixed for Monday, March 14. Owing to the great increase in the number of members of the Society, there will probably be no seats for sale to the public. The offices of the Society are at Trafalgar Buildings, Northumberland Avenue, W.C.

THE forthcoming publications of the Berlin "Society for Theatrical History" promise to be very interesting. Among them are two hundred unpublished letters of Iffland, the eighteenth-century actor, manager, and playwright, the stage history of Schiller's dramas, and a portfolio of portraits of the most famous actors and actresses from Neuberger to Ludwig Devrient. In the autumn the Society will publish, under the direction of A. L. Jellinck, the first number of an annual entitled "Archiv für Theatergeschichte" (Record of Theatrical History); besides miscellaneous articles it will contain a comprehensive bibliography of dramatic literature which should prove most useful to all interested in the subject. A subscription of twelve shillings a year entitles to membership and two publications.

Musical Notes

IN "The Darling of the Guards," the new burlesque at the Prince of Wales's, Mr. Arthur Roberts has a part after his own heart, and even Mr. Beer-bohm Tree himself could hardly fail to laugh at some of his funniments. The latest success of His Majesty's was obviously made for parody, and if Messrs. "David Burlesco and John Leatherlung," the authors of this "Skittle in One Throe and Seven Japanese Screens," have not developed all its possibilities in this respect, they have provided a sufficiently amusing entertainment which is sure to draw the public for a considerable time to come. Naturally much play is made with the incidents of the torture-chamber, from which, when the trap-door is lifted, the strains of "Good-bye, Dolly, I must leave you," are wafted, while Miss Edna May is quite translated in the Japanese costume and coiffure of "Say-So-San, daughter of Sago." In a word, the whole production is bright and entertaining.

AN interesting programme has been announced in connection with the Wagner and Mozart performances in the coming autumn at Munich, which may well have greater attractions for amateurs than Bayreuth in these days. "Tristan und Isolde," "Der Fliegende Holländer" (newly mounted), and "Die Meistersinger," in addition to the "Ring," are the Wagner works to be given this season at the Prinz-Regenten Theatre, while the Mozart operas to be performed at the charming little Residenz Theatre will be "Le Nozze di Figaro," "Die Entführung aus dem Serail," "Don Giovanni," and "Zauberflöte." The names of the artists are not yet announced, but with such conductors as Mottl and Nikisch at the head of affairs the quality of the performances can of course be relied upon. Mr. Hugo Görlitz is the British agent of these Munich performances, which are to run from the middle of August to the middle of September.

THE report that M. Jean de Reszke will become a naturalised Frenchman in order to undertake the management of the Paris Opera House after the retirement of M. Gailhard will require confirmation before it is generally credited. While it is true in the first place that M. Jean de Reszke has a decided affection for Paris, and in the second that he has been credited before now with views of his own on operatic management, those best acquainted with him will have most difficulty in fancying him discharging with success the duties of such a post as that referred to or finding such duties in any way congenial. It is equally difficult, moreover, to imagine such a coveted position being conferred on one not a Frenchman by birth, who has, further, given no proofs of any exceptional gifts as a manager—a position requiring not vocal but administrative skill.

THE season of opera in English announced by Mr. Ben Davies for the coming autumn promises to prove an undertaking of the first importance, inasmuch as it is avowedly designed to prove the initial step in a much bigger scheme involving eventually, if all goes well, nothing less than that permanent establishment of opera in the vernacular which has been so long and to all seeming so vainly desired. But the scheme will, of course, require the most careful and judicious management if this happy result is to be attained, and those behind the project cannot realise this too clearly. It will not be enough to start with one or two works and hope to build up therefrom. A repertory of some scope prepared in advance is essential to the success of any such scheme, and in every other respect the management should be of the best. What about a conductor, for example? If Mr. Wood's services could be secured, his co-operation alone would prove a tower of strength to the undertaking.

"LIVING MASTERS OF MUSIC," the new series of musical monographs which Mr. John Lane is publishing, makes a promising start with "Henry J. Wood" by Mrs. Rosa Newmarch, the editor of the series. Mrs. Newmarch goes hardly too far in describing her hero as the central figure, apart from creative artists, in English musical life to-day, and the well-written sketch of his career which she provides should possess interest for many of those thousands who at the Queen's Hall and elsewhere have thrilled responsive to his magnetic art. One fact recorded is rather interesting. When Mr. Wood and the Queen's Hall orchestra played at Windsor by command in 1898, the Queen, struck, like so many others, by his un-English appearance, demanded of Mr. Wood an assurance of his nationality from his own lips. But "our only conductor" is in point of fact not wholly English, since his mother was of Welsh origin, and to this Celtic strain may doubtless be ascribed not only, as Mrs. Newmarch suggests, his striking physiognomy, but no inconsiderable portion of his artistic genius.

THOSE doubting Thomases who, on a well-established principle ("A prophet hath honour," &c.), have found it difficult to accept a mere Britisher as a full-blown genius worthy of comparison with the bearers of names so vastly more difficult to pronounce, may be reassured, perhaps, on learning that, in faithful conformity with tradition, Mr. Wood was (1) the child of musical parents, and (2) a prodigy of almost Mozartian precocity. At the mature age of ten, we read, he "often acted as deputy-organist of St. Mary Aldermanbury," while the organ recitals of "Master Henry J. Wood" were a feature of the Fisheries and the Inventions Exhibitions of 1883 and 1885. Mr. Wood, therefore, though not yet thirty-five, has had no lack of experience. Mrs. Newmarch analyses in a very discriminating manner the characteristics of Mr. Wood's artistic methods, and, though some might have wished, perhaps, for a larger measure of personal and anecdotic matter, has produced a very interesting volume.

THE Brahms controversy has been settled at last. Here is the final judgment on the matter which has been delivered by the critic of the "Pall Mall Gazette":

It is perfectly useless for critics who consider themselves as almost apostles of Brahms to continue their determinate epithet (sic) of certitude in regard to his career. There were some, we believe, who did not quite accept Beethoven in his Ninth Symphony; they are now wiped out of consideration, and the fact remains that Brahms does no longer appeal either to the general public, or to the critic of the time. Why should such a conclusion be, save that it realises all the points which we in these columns have emphasised now for many a long year. If Mr. Arthur Roberts were permitted to realise in his own way of thinking the influence which Brahms exercises over a somewhat ready congregation, he would be able to make more than a subtle appreciation of that which in the art of music needs occasionally the correction of parody to make it serious, and, à la Henley's phrase, unashamed.

The fact being as stated, it is clearly idle for misguided concert-givers, such as Richter, Nikisch, Richard Strauss, H. J. Wood, and the rest, to continue their vain efforts to popularise that music which "does no longer appeal either to the general public or to the critic of the time." But why drag in Mr. Arthur Roberts? And what does that wonderful last sentence mean anyway?

Art Notes

AT Clifford's Inn, off Fleet Street, may be seen an exhibition of Pewter Plate that no collector ought to miss; and that few silversmiths cannot benefit by seeing. This old pewter is designed with a breadth, a simplicity, and a feeling for beauty of form that put nearly every trading silversmith of to-day to shame. I do not mean of course the "Arts and Crafts" men who have given all their fine talents to checking the ghastly designs of the trading manufacturers. But what one has to realise is that in the old days these charming designs were the ordinary designs of things. At Liberty's, for instance, I see a strenuous attempt being made to bring back beauty to the designing of silver and pewter, but there is a tendency even at Liberty's to use meaningless contorted forms and lines which are in their way as vulgar as "manufacturer's design." I know nothing more hideous than the things that are wrought by most silversmiths for prizes and cups. Racing cups, yachting cups and the like, are horrible things, so that we shall soon say, not that such-and-such an act is as horrible as sin, but horrible as a racing cup, not that so-and-so is as ugly as the devil, but as ugly as a yachting cup, or hideous as a cruet-stand. How it is that the silversmiths of the last seventy years rest in their graves no mortal effort of thought can think; for when one considers the amount of hideousness they have put upon the world it makes one groan. That there is no need for this hideous design is shown by glancing into the windows of one or two houses, Liberty's and the like. But people go to the ugly designs, and the ugly designs make a good fight for it, against beauty. In this old pewter at Clifford's Inn is no straining after eccentricity, no willowy-wallowy extravagant line, but just fine good taste and simplicity of conception. The very hinges seem to have been lovingly wrought. The spoons are a joy to look at. There are to be four lectures delivered on the history and manufacture of pewter and all things appertaining thereto, the last three on the 9th, 16th and 23rd at half-past eight in the evening, for such as are interested in this delightful hobby.

At the Woodbury Galleries in Bond Street are shows of paintings by Miss Biddy Macdonald, Miss Colthurst, and Mr. Medlycott. Miss Macdonald's portrait of Lady Alix Egerton is an excellent piece of work, and ought to win her many commissions. Such good portraiture is all too rare amongst women. Miss Colthurst's best work is a largely handled landscape which she calls "Au Parc Monceau, Paris." Miss Colthurst gives us good paint in several of her works here, but she rarely seems able to make an interesting picture like the "Parc Monceau."

At the Ryder Gallery in Albemarle Street is a show of paintings by Mr. Stirling Dyce, and at McQueen's Gallery in the Haymarket Miss Blanche Baker and Miss Margaret Kemp-Welch hold exhibitions of their works. At the Leicester Galleries, Mr. E. T. Reed is about to have an exhibition of some hundred and twenty drawings entitled "Punch in Parliament," dealing largely with Mr. Chamberlain's Fiscal Policy and other questions of the day. Glasgow is the richer for its annual show at the galleries of the Royal Glasgow Institute.

THE points upon which I touched some weeks ago concerning the "International" have, oddly enough, been much brought to the front since, first owing to an article by Mr. D. S. MacColl in the "Saturday Review," and secondly by an article in "The Burlington Magazine." We sadly miss Whistler's bitter ink in the business. But, after all, the "International" is a more serious business than a quarrel. The point I suggested was that, as the Society had largely grown out of the New English Art Club, that club had thereby been weakened of some of its best blood, and ought to add its remaining strength to the "International." The "International" has a strength and a position such as no rival society to the Royal Academy has possessed for many a long year. And it acquired that position by gathering together the work of big men outside the Academy and, by the splendour of its achievement, putting the Academy to utter shame three several times. The effect of this upon the Academy has been electrical. To-day that body has roused in a way that seemed almost impossible. Its professorship of painting, instead of being flung to some dull fellow to send the students to sleep, has been given to a man whose lectures have been eagerly reported, and at length, in the public press. The immortals, of whom all but some half-dozen were snoring themselves into nonentities, have roused and elected Mr. Brangwyn to their body. All these things have been serious blows to the "International," in spite of their triumph in securing Rodin as president. For the "International," being assured of its position, has become almost more exclusive than the old Academy. It is needless to say that this must wreck the Society in a few years, for young blood must be poured into it, and the younger men will not love the Society for their being treated ungenerously by that Society. And it will be a bad day for artists when the International loses its strength, for the one hope of keeping the Academy alive is to have a strong rival body of men near its doors. The only way the Academy can meet such a position is by waking up and electing men such as Sargent and Abbey and Brangwyn. It is absolutely a matter of life and death for the "International," then, that the society should not only eagerly admit new blood, but that its executive committee should most energetically strive to entice into its midst the promising young fellows. If this could be managed without the fatigue of searching through stacks of canvases the job would be no difficult one; but a young and unknown man has no other means of getting his work seen than by sending it up for the selecting jury. It seems to me, then, that by far the

The Prudential Assurance Company in their fifty-fourth Annual Report, issued on Thursday last, show assets £51,217,377, being an increase of £4,062,176 over 1902. The total surplus is £2,194,981, disposed of by adding £550,000 to the Reserve Funds; £1,167,348 for distribution amongst participating policy holders and shareholders under the Company's special Act, leaving £477,633 to be carried forward.

Town & Country Houses & Grounds Photographed.
INTERIORS A SPECIALITY.

BOOKER & SULLIVAN,

67-69 CHANCERY LANE, W.C.

Telephone 9252 Central.

simplest way out of the whole trouble would be for members of the jury to visit the studios of artists and secure pictures. It would lead to a far better feeling amongst artists—a sort of guild fellowship. And it would prevent an enormous amount of anxiety and of the waste of narrow means amongst young and struggling artists.

It is, will, and must always be to the eternal shame of the Academy that Whistler and Beardsley and Caldecott and Madox Brown and a dozen others died without its gates. It is to its shame that such men as Sime and Conder and Nicholson and the like are without its gates to-day—not even exhibiting upon its walls. It is for the "International" to give such men their chance. There are several of them. And every one is an addition to its strength. No society can patronise such men; they bring honour wheresoever they go.

THE editor of "The Burlington Magazine" says that there is a finer artist than Mr. Brangwyn who ought to have been elected to the Royal Academy. I do not think this is a fair way to attack the Academy. He should at least have the courage to name names when he strikes at other names.

I HAVE received a letter from Count Gallatin, from San Remo, wherein I gather that he is not the author of "The Drawings of Aubrey Beardsley"; so I presume that the book is written by a younger member of the family.

Correspondence

Shakespeare Memorial

SIR,—The suggestions which you have made with reference to a London Shakespeare Memorial commend themselves much to my mind. But I am not in a position to form any opinion as to the scheme of a Shakespeare Theatre.—Yours, &c.

EDWARD DOWDEN.

SIR,—In answer to your communication, I am in favour of the putting up of a worthy monument to Shakespeare in London, and of the naming of our streets after men who have rendered distinguished service to art and literature. I am, in short, inclined strongly to any course which serves to turn people's ideas from sanguinary wars and the pursuit of the mean political game.

As to the shape which a memorial to Shakespeare should take, I am not at this moment prepared to express an opinion.—Yours, &c.

ARTHUR W. PINERO.

SIR,—The only suitable memorial to Shakespeare in London in my opinion would be a theatre dedicated to Shakespeare's works, so that there might always be some of his plays running in London; and the foundation of a Dramatic School for the education of those actors in whom he took so deep an interest.—Yours, &c.

W. L. COURTNEY.

SIR,—In reply to your letter, I must confess that I have no sympathy whatever with the scheme for a Shakespeare theatre, library, or museum in London. I think that it has been proved by experience that these projects have vulgarised Stratford-on-Avon, as well as helped to destroy its old-world attractiveness. No one can read a description of Stratford-on-Avon as it was thirty years ago without feeling very keenly the infinite mischief that time and the modern commercial spirit have done for that town. Libraries, museums, picture galleries and theatres would only tend to give vulgar advertisement to numbers of people other than Shakespeare. What London wants is a fine monument to the poet, in a conspicuous position in the new Kingsway, a monument on the same colossal scale as Mr. George Frampton's "St. Mungo," at Glasgow, and perhaps carried out by that accomplished sculptor. The Gambetta monument in Paris and the Frederick monument in Berlin are my ideals of how we should honour famous men.—Yours &c.,

CLEMENT SHORTER.

SIR,—I must confess that my feelings are exactly expressed by the words of a poet only less illustrious than he:

"What needs my Shakespeare for his honoured bones
The labour of an Age in piled stones,
Or that his hallow'd Reliques should be hid
Under a Star-ypointing Pyramid?
Dear Son of Memory, great Heir of Fame,
What need'st thou such dull witness to thy name?
Thou in our wonder and astonishment
Hast built thyself a lasting Monument."

To my mind the only memorial which would be in the slightest degree appropriate, or not positively objectionable, would be a State-aided theatre, where we could see some really good acting of Shakespearean plays, the subordinate parts well filled. I say State-aided, because no manager without financial help could make an institution of this kind permanently pay its way. The actual structure should be designed by the best architect of the day, in a style most suited for modern requirements. But it is highly improbable that such a building will see the light.—Yours, &c.

PHILIP NORMAN.

SIR,—In reply to yours, I am strongly in favour of Mr. Sidney Lee's proposal that the intended memorial to Shakespeare should take the form of a national theatre.—Yours, &c.,

HENRY ARTHUR JONES.

SIR,—While fully agreeing with your correspondent from Shropham Manor, I should like to suggest an extra use for the fund. It seems to me that a series of lectures on Shakespeare delivered to the poorer classes would do more to perpetuate his memory among them than a statue whose exact meaning they might possibly not comprehend. I would suggest that these lectures should treat specially of localities in London mentioned in the poet's works. It would, I believe, give the poorer classes an interest in Shakespeare if they realised what spots in London were his favourite haunts. Possibly they would not feel this as vividly as "Egomet" does, but I am sure they would in a less degree. Trusting to see many more suggestions in your paper before long.—Yours, &c.,

A LOVER OF SHAKESPEARE.

A Psychological Mystery

SIR,—I think the psychological mystery referred to by your contributor may be explained without supposing a previous existence. When we read, a curious sympathy prompts our imagination, so that we think we know what is coming. The thinking and receptive power work simultaneously in us, just as in a person who vamps an accompaniment on the piano. If we were to shut the book and try to quote the forthcoming passage we should be somewhat at a loss. Perhaps it is more natural to infer that we have read the passage elsewhere in a different form; it is astonishing to find how often the same things are said. But neither solution implies either pre-existence or atavism.

Precognition of incidents has been analysed by Mr. Punch, when he describes Mr. William Sikes in his prison cell as suddenly conscious of having been there before! More often than we realise we have all "been there before"; that is to say, if not in exactly the same, at least in very similar circumstances. Take the simple instance of a group of people talking round a fire. A good memory and a little imagination will account for the phenomenon. I do not believe that people with bad memories ever experience it.—Yours, &c.,

GERTRUDE M. SAUNDERS.

"Tolstoi and the Babies"

SIR,—Mr. C. W. Saleeby should know better than put to "Student in Holy Orders" that cheap dilemma of a First Cause either not All-Good or not All-Powerful. Can he not see that it leads straight to a mechanical universe and the crudest determinism? I thought Dr. James Martineau in his "Study of Religion" had finally disposed of that fallacy.

"Original sin" is not merely a theological doctrine, but a scientific fact—necessitated by evolutionary science and the laws of heredity. I generally enjoy Mr. Saleeby's articles, and sympathise with his outlook, but he is evidently obsessed with antagonism to some defunct mode of theological thought.—Yours, &c. S. E. KEEBLE.
Manchester.

SIR,—In connection with this controversy, it may be of interest to recall the following passage in Browning's "Gold Hair":

"The candid incline to surmise of late
That the Christian faith proves false, I find;
For our Essays-and-Reviews' debate
Begins to tell on the public mind,
And Colenso's words have weight:

I still, to suppose it true, for my part,
See reasons and reasons; this, to begin:
'Tis the faith that launched point-blank her dart
At the head of a lie—taught Original Sin,
The Corruption of Man's Heart."

Account for it as we may, the mixture of evil and good in our nature is a fact that can scarcely be gainsaid. And, when it is rightly understood, the Christian doctrine of Original Sin does something to lighten the difficulty. St. Augustine's words, uttered in the storm and stress of strife, must be read in the softening light of later theology, and qualified by the milder language of the Greek Fathers, or by his own utterances in controversy with the Manichees.

Happily the harsh views of some old divines on the future state of unbaptised children form no part of Catholic doctrine. These crude opinions may well be called "colossal nonsense." But for my part I should prefer to describe them in St. Augustine's own phrase as magna magnorum deliramenta doctorum.—Yours, &c. W. H. KENT, O.S.C.

St. Mary of the Angels, Bayswater.

Cruikshank

SIR,—I notice that Mr. Layard again seizes an opportunity of belittling Cruikshank's drawings for "The Pilgrim's Progress." He is, of course, entitled to his opinion; just as other critics are entitled to call these Bunyan illustrations "treasures" ("Studio"), "fine examples of Cruikshank's work" ("Graphic"), "curious and extremely characteristic" ("Westminster Gazette"), "all good" ("Daily Telegraph"), or to declare, with the "Athenaeum," that "Cruikshank should henceforth be recognised as the illustrator of Bunyan, a master of gravity and fancy, which the foolish suppose to be incompatible." But Mr. Layard is not justified in repeating on every possible occasion that these drawings which offend his taste were considered unworthy of publication, either by the artist or others, when executed. If I were not to notice this, some might mistake reiteration for a statement of fact.—Yours, &c.,
HENRY FROWDE.

February 29.

Shakespeare's "Measure for Measure"

SIR,—There is a curious parallel between the heroine of "Monna Vanna" as given in the review thereof at p. 218 of last week's ACADEMY, and the case of Isabella in "Measure for Measure"; both are pure-minded women and subjected to temptation through pity and affection. I need not deal further with Mr. Sutro's production than by reference to the name given to the Florentine General, which may or may not be historical; it reads Prinzi-Valle, which might well be hyphenated as Prinzi-Valle, both the component parts being good Italian. Thus "prinzi" appears in Antonini as prenze, and is equivalent to the Latin "princeps"; while Valle and Valli are patronymics found in any good biographical dictionary: Anglicé dale, dell.

But this prefix is used by Shakespeare thus: "The prenzie, Angelo?"

The "Globe" editors follow the text of the First Folio, Act iii. scene 1, l. 95. Charles Knight alters to "precise," and a contributor to this week's "Notes and Queries," 10th ser. i. p. 161, proposes to substitute "Seeming." There is a lot in old writers that is "hard to be understood," but it may be more decorous to plead ignorance rather than to alter an author's plain text.

That Shakespeare should use an Italian word is no marvel, considering his close intimacy with resolute John Florio; that worthy was a sort of librarian to Shakespeare's patron, the Earl of Southampton, and it is easy to understand what ready command the poet thus obtained of all the current literature of the day: original and translated. The Earl was himself a highly cultivated man, with degrees from both Universities, and familiar with all the court tittle-tattle then current.—Yours, &c. A. HALL.

Monna Vanna

SIR,—"And Monna Vanna comes to him clothed only in a cloak." Your reviewer thinks that it is a horrible meeting; from his artistic point of view he sees only a tawdry melodramatic spectacle in the scene of the meeting, and he, naturally, turns away with his sense of art on edge.

I wish that he had looked a little longer, as I cannot think it possible that he can know his Maeterlinck well enough just yet; had they been more intimate friends he would have better understood the meaning which in Monna Vanna is so very admirably expressed. Ask him to look closely at the important points in the character of Prinzi-Valle, and tell him to notice how these points so cleverly meet the different points in the environment of Prinzi-Valle at the time of the action of the play. Tell him to look backwards now that he has finished his study of the play, and tell him to notice carefully—this time—the true meaning of the character of Prinzi-Valle, and he will see a tragedy woven by the very finest of art fabrics, instead of that horrid, ragged melodrama which had so set his teeth on edge. Look!

A torrent of passion bursts upon the soul of Prinzi-Valle, given by the revival of his early intense love for Monna Vanna; she is only a few miles away, but she is the wife of Guido Colonna, whom he has conquered. His love for her is now the most cherished of his possessions. He is proud of it, and characteristically wishes to show how he values it to all the people of his world, forgetting in his exultation that they will question the honesty of his demonstration, and to Monna Vanna herself most of all he wishes to make it known; so, being all-powerful regarding the matter, he imposes that striking condition sprung from the native luxuriance of his imagination. And this meeting is a chaste conception of a very wise man.—Yours, &c.

F. MANNING SPROSTON.

University Extension

SIR,—Judging from the accounts you have published of the University Extension Movement, one feels that the energy, enthusiasm, and ability with which the work is being carried on promise much for the intellectual progress of our nation. If that progress should prove to be less signal than one would wish, the failure (one feels) will not be chargeable to any unprofitableness of the subjects studied or to any lack of thoroughness in the teaching as such; in those matters the movement leaves little to be desired. Such failure as there may be will but prove afresh the difficulty of making serious intellectual advance, and the consequent necessity of a higher ideal of culture than that at present prevailing.

I suppose we can all agree with the general statement that "the validity of a culture is to be measured by the light it yields to a man's path," but perhaps we do not all recognise that if that "light" is to be more than the ignis fatuus of our prejudices with their nakedness more or less cunningly hidden by learning and sophistry, there will have to be a very thorough assimilation of one's knowledge and an intense, whole-hearted application of the intelligence to the matter in hand. We need, in a word, the critical faculty—the imagination and the judgment—constantly exercised and made efficient by the knowledge of the many snares and pitfalls of the carnal element in our nature that beset the path of the student no less than that of the "practical man."

This I believe briefly indicates the ideal, and I would like to urge upon the Committee of the Central Association of U. E. students that something might be done for the realisation of that ideal by developing any means that may exist for mutual criticism among the students. To compare notes, to learn what varied significance similar knowledge has for different minds, is a valuable experience and stimulus, as many a student can testify; and if the use of such means still leaves the ideal unattained, some consolation may be found in remembering that mutual criticism is bound to produce good in proportion to the honesty and intelligence that go to the making (and receiving) of it.—Yours, &c.

Hadlow, Kent.

HORACE B. LAKEMAN.

SIR,—I have been much interested in reading of the revived enthusiasm of the University Extension Movement in London. There seems to be great hope of it being a success, if it is properly and simply organised and efforts made to overcome the weaknesses which have crippled similar ventures in other places. Up in the North, where we proverbially grasp new ideas so much in advance of the Metropolis (vide public opinion—of course not my own), this latest society of students is merely an adaptation of efforts of our own. Years ago, University Extension was a power to be reckoned with in the North Country, and the "Tyne-side Students Association"—some hundreds strong—with a well-printed and exceedingly well-written periodical "The Student," flourished for some long time. Its decay seemed to me to arise very materially from the fact that knowledge has become more and more specialised, and the very wide and general range over which University Extension courses work—from Astronomy to Philosophy—does not tend to keep together any very homogeneous mass of students. For instance; one course of lectures attracted and another repelled, and the never ceasing fluctuation finally dissipated the whole body of really working members. To-day the University Extension Movement is merely a ghost of its former self. If London can manage to steer clear of these shoals and sandbanks, she will have achieved a notable success, and the North looks with interest on the experiment.—Yours, &c.

GUY WILFRID HAYLER.

63 Rothbury Terrace, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

Sonnets from the Portuguese

SIR,—That the fossil oleo-resin amber was regarded by the poetess as a crystalline body may be reasonably doubted. The characteristics and vegetable origin of amber, well known to the Elizabethan writers (see "Hamlet," ii. 2 and "An Epitaph" in Masson's "Milton's Poetical Works," iii. 67), must have been familiar to the Miss Barrett who made them her "thoughtful study."

The "New English Dictionary" (ii. 1231, col. 2), under "Crystalline" with the sense "A crystal; a crystalline rock," has two quotations, both from Mrs. Browning, one being from the passage to which E. Dick has directed attention. As, however, a bee in a natural crystal is as unrealisable a concept as a wreck on the coast of Bohemia or "an ethereal amalgam," it seems difficult to escape the conviction that Mrs. Browning, like some more modern versifiers, may at least once in her life have committed the venial error of wandering into the inexplicable.—Yours, &c.

The Hermitage, Sutton.

FRANCIS H. BUTLER.

[This Correspondence must close.—ED.]

Shakespeare and Jane Austen

SIR,—Mr. Wilfrid Meynell, in his interesting article upon the late Sir Leslie Stephen, says, in effect, that Tennyson declared Jane Austen to be "next to Shakespeare in English literature." What authority is there for this statement? Tennyson, according to the authorised biography, considered that "the realism and lifelikeness of Miss Austen's dramatis personæ come nearest to those of Shakespeare." But he adds, "Shakespeare, however, is a sun to which Jane Austen, though a bright and true little world, is but an asteroid." Mr. Meynell impugns, by inference, the "sanity" of (his own version of) Tennyson's critical judgment; but this pronouncement is surely sane enough.

Miss Austen wrote six novels dealing with the life of the "upper middle classes" in their country homes; Shakespeare wrote thirty-eight plays dealing with most things under the sun. Clearly, therefore, they are, in range, not comparable. Yet there are but two writers in English letters who possessed the rare gift of producing, by means of an imaginative sympathy, an almost perfect illusion of reality. And these are, surely, Shakespeare and, in her smaller sphere—her "two-inch square of ivory" she calls it—Jane Austen. I, at least, would be glad to hear of a third. This, I take it, is not more than Tennyson meant.

Either Tolstoi or Tourgenief—with whom, again, Miss Austen is, in range, not comparable—might perhaps stand third. But, as I hold, at a considerable distance.—Yours, &c.

E. KNOX LINTON.

"All Round Readers"

SIR,—I have been much interested in reading your literary notes in a recent issue of THE ACADEMY, and find that you have been called to task for saying that the public in this country really fond of good literature is but small and is not increasing as it should be. This is perfectly true; to examine the cause, or causes, of a condition of things not in accordance with the advance of civilisation is desirable. Perhaps the chief reason is the democracy of the age, which renders many thousands unable to read anything but the Radical newspapers; another hindrance to the study of literature is the prevalent devotion to athletic sports: girls' schools of the day encourage in the pupils an absorbing interest in hockey. A third reason is that publishers' readers recommend the publication of works that certainly cannot be called sound literature. It was the opinion of Sir Walter Besant that good judges of books are exceedingly scarce, and he pointed out that in respect to novels it was often the case that one would be rejected by publisher after publisher sometimes even in words of contempt, while it eventually proved a masterpiece. There are those who assert that in the present day there are no big poets, no great novelists, but this is not the case. There is incomparably more literary power in the land than recognition of it.

You speak of the desirability of training the mind to enjoy solid books. Women will always prefer fiction, and there is no harm in that, provided the novels in the market are high-class works, for a thoroughly good novel is a production of genius, whereas the historian or the essayist may be a man of small talent merely. Unfortunately it is not the best novels that are most read. The works of E. Livingston Prescott display genius of a high order resembling that of George Eliot, yet she failed to get her meed of praise.

The Radical tendency of the day destroys all interest in intellectual pursuits. With the multitude democracy is an absorbing passion. I have seen men not altogether devoid of brain power, who consumed by this passion suffered the mind to degenerate. It may be argued that there are, on the contrary, members of Parliament who are democratic leaders and at the same time men of high mental endowments: scholars, scientists, authors. This is true: they are those whose ancestors have had all the education of their respective periods, they have been themselves at public schools and universities, their associates are men of birth and cultivation, or of cultivation without birth, consequently their Radicalism is little more than a political attitude—a party watchword. With some it is a half religious, half romantic sentiment. To legislate for the poor, to befriend in every possible way the working classes is their unselfish desire. Now this amount of democracy influences votes in the House of Commons and furnishes material for political speeches, but it does not interfere with the cultivation of the mental faculties; for it occupies only a small corner of the soul. The democracy of the multitude has its origin in intense egotism. "There ought to be no caste, one man is as good as another," is the creed of many. There is little interest taken now in high-class poetry, you say. Of course there isn't, for the democrat of this description has no veneration, no idealism. To enjoy the best poetry one must be able to get away from oneself, one must be humble and enjoy looking up. The man who can appreciate the great authors recognises that caste is entirely a mental thing. A distribution of wealth would in no respect make men equal. Happily so, for who would wish to see the world of mind as flat as a level country?—Yours, &c.

B. S. G.

SIR,—May I suggest that the decline of interest in higher literature which you bewail is due in part to the predominance of scientific thought and study? And that this explanation applies no less to higher art? Since Spencer has taught us in his famous work on "Education" that Science is all-important and all-embracing, the sole Empress who rules the mind of man with sovereign sway, and at whose feet Literature and Art must sit as humble and docile hand-maids—waiting for the hall-mark of her gracious approval, all my opinions, and doubtless the opinions of countless others, have undergone a radical change. There was a time when I admired the "Quoit-thrower," but since Spencer has pointed out that it violates the laws of gravity, it has become positively repulsive in my eyes. I used to marvel at the music of the "Messiah": how can I do so now, when I realise that it bolsters up the absurd doctrines of "the current theology"? Formerly, I have been lost in wonder at the "Madonna di San Sisto": what must I think of it now, when I see that it involves the physiological absurdity of birds' wings attached to a mammal's shoulders? Shakespeare seemed to me at one time the greatest of poets: but what must my opinion of a poet be who is so ignorant of the "Erdkunde" that he gives Bohemia a seaboard, and who represents Macbeth as determined in his "conduct of life" by the suggestions of witches, in defiance of psychological principles and ethical data? What possible interest can I feel in the catastrophe of Othello and Desdemona, seeing that their marriage was contracted in defiance of the biological section of the Synthetic Philosophy? "Lycidas" has for years appeared to me one of the most glorious poems of the world's literature: but the scales have fallen at last from my scientifically enlightened eyes, and I am revolted by a poet who knows so little of "First Principles" that he describes his ear as plucked by one god of an extinct mythology, and his actions as living and spreading aloft under the eyes of another, who disregards biology in bidding the flowers come to strew his friend's hearse, and outrages physiology by picturing his friend as a visitant of the "monstrous world." I used to delight in the great historians, but I delight in them no longer: for I have been taught that they do not "illustrate the right principles of political action." When Thucydides writes that "the whole earth is the sepulchre of famous men," I am intensely disgusted; and when Tacitus writes "Beneficia eo usque laeta sunt dum videntur exsolvi posse," I am unspeakably shocked. Thucydides and Tacitus have now been handed over to the dustman; and I am studying the volumes (slightly ponderous, it must be confessed, but so admirably nutritious) of the "Descriptive Sociology."

Many readers, I do not doubt, have turned their backs on the higher literature for the same reasons, and with the same vehemence as your obedient servant,

A STUDENT OF LITERATURE.

An Explanation

SIR,—I do not in any way desire to find fault with your disparagement of my "Judicial Dictionary," but would merely suggest that, as the book has been over forty years in growth, it asks for something more than that its pages be "turned over," and if you gave it that something more, I fancy you even would find it not unprofitable, as an eminent Lord Justice of Appeal testifies to its utility to the Bench, and regards the book as "one of the best productions of our time."

But my reason in writing this note is to refer to your concluding sentence, and to explain that the book—in order to secure American copyright—had to be "set up" by American typographers, their Trade Union having insisted on that protection as a condition to Congress granting copyright in the United States to any foreign book. In that way they secured an advantage over their English brethren, who have no such protection qua English copyright for American books.

Then the printing from the stereo plates had to be done in America, because of the heavy American import duty on books, which would have prevented the book getting any practical benefit from its American copyright—which benefit turns out to be important in consequence of the vogue the book is having in the United States.

Possibly, you may think this practical example (involving in itself a loss to English industries of something like £2000) not wholly uninteresting from a literary and political standpoint.—Yours, &c.
F. STROUD.

"The Stage Society and Maxim Gorki"

SIR,—I am obliged to you for kindly publishing my letter with the above heading in your last issue. Unfortunately a printer's error nullifies the point of one of my remarks. The sentence, "A scheme has been set on foot to perform it in Russian in various Russian towns" should read "in various German towns."

As a matter of fact, the performance of Gorki's "Doss House" in the Russian provincial towns was at the outset suppressed by the censor.

Trusting that you will kindly extend your hospitality to these few lines,—Yours, &c.,
ALEXANDER KINLOCH.
February 27.

[Many other letters are held over for want of space.—Ed.]

"Academy" Questions & Answers

Questions and Answers for this column must be addressed to THE EDITOR, THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, 9, East Harding Street, London, E.C. The envelope to be marked in the top left-hand corner "A.Q.A." Full name and address must be sent, not necessarily for publication. Each Question or Answer must be written on a separate sheet of paper and on only one side of the paper. The Editor will not undertake the forwarding of any correspondence. Questions must be confined to matters of Literature, History, Archaeology, Folk-lore, Art, Music and the Drama. The Editor reserves the right of deciding whether or not any Question or Answer is of sufficient interest to be published.

COMPETITION.

Until further notice, four prizes, of the value of 5s. each, will be awarded weekly for the two best Questions and the two best Answers contributed to "Academy" Questions and Answers.

The Editor's decision must be considered absolutely final and no correspondence whatever will be entered upon with regard to the awards. The prizes will go to those Questions and Answers which are deemed to be of the greatest general interest and brevity in all cases will count as a merit.

The names and addresses of prize-winners will not be published, but the winning Questions and Answers will be indicated by an asterisk (*).

Each prize will consist of 5s. worth of books to be chosen by the several prize-winners. The name and address of the booksellers where the book or books can be obtained will be given.

Each prize-winner in the United Kingdom will be advised that a credit note has been sent to a bookseller in his (or her) immediate neighbourhood and that on demand he (or she) may choose a book or books to the value of 5s. Winners outside the United Kingdom will receive a cheque for 5s. Non-adherence to the rules and regulations of "Questions and Answers" will imply disqualification.

No competitor can win a prize more than once in three months.

Questions

LITERATURE.

HETTY WESLEY.—Mr. Quiller-Couch dedicates his "Hetty Wesley" to "Andrew Lang, a good champion of Hetty," and I suppose, therefore, that Mr. Lang has also written on poor Hetty. But I cannot find what he has written, and I should be very much obliged if you could kindly tell me; and also mention any other books on the subject.—K.P. (Ealing).

BOOK TITLES.—It would save reviewers and librarians much needless trouble if an Act of Parliament were passed compelling authors to state clearly in a few words the subject and aim of each book published, say, on the leaf next the title-page. Has such an idea been suggested before?—W.P. (Bristol).

SHAKESPEARE.—In how many languages are the plays of Shakespeare now published?—A.X.B.

POEM ATTRIBUTED TO POE.—Dr. Alfred R. Wallace draws attention in the February "Fortnightly" to an unpublished poem of Edgar Allan Poe, of which the first line runs—

"Leonaina, angels nam'd her, and they took the light"

I have an impression this poem was published fifty years ago, and that it was written by one of Poe's imitators. Who was he?—H.Z.
(See Literary Notes in this issue.)

SLAV FOLKLORE.—Where can one find evidence for the worship of the Slavonic god, Zernebock, in England?—A.W.

GIPSY-LORE SOCIETY.—Is the Gipsy-lore Society still in existence, and, if not, how many volumes of its Journal were published?—I fail to find it under "Academies" in the British Museum Catalogue.—A.W. (Tonbridge).

AUTHOR WANTED.—I should like to trace these verses. I do not know which is original and which translation—

Θεός, ὁ φωνῇ βασιλεύων ἐν Ἀρείᾳ παίδων ἀρετὴν αἰεὶ παρενύθισσας τὴν δύστην τοιαύτῃ θανόντας χαίρειν.

Thou art the voice to kingly boys,
To lift them through the night;
And comfortress of unsuccess,
To give the dead good-night.

—Frederick William Rolfe.

"HYMEN'S PRAELUDIA."—Or "Love's Masterpiece," being the ninth and tenth parts of that so much admired Romance, intitled Cleopatra; by J.D., 1659.—Am I right in concluding "J.D." to be John Davies, of Hereford, and the Cleopatra to be "Le Roman de Cléopâtre," by the Sieur Gautier de Costes, Sieur de la Calprenède, published at Paris in 10 vols., October 1642-43? My copy of "Hymen's Praeludia" is a small folio; the French work I have never met with; has a copy been noticed of recent years?—K.M.

"THE NEW ATLANTIS."—H. F. Sharp states in his Dictionary of Authors the 1st edition was in 1660. Is this correct? I believe there was an edition in 1651. The actual title-page has no date in my copy, but it is bound up with the "Sylvia Sylvarum" and the "History of Life and Death" (6th editions), and these two bear the date of 1651. The publisher is the same, Dr. Rawley.—K.M.

"MEMORABILIA CANTABRIGIAE."—The author of this work, Joseph Wilson, says (the book was published in 1803) he had the intention of publishing a similar work on Oxford: As I am getting together works on Oxford, I should be glad to know if this work ever appeared.—K.M.

GENERAL.

THE HERMIT KINGDOM.—Can any reader tell me why Corea is so called, and who first gave it that name? Surely there are other nations equally, or more, inaccessible—Tibet, for instance?—E.M.A. (Sevenoaks).

GREENLAND'S ICE MOUNTAINS.—In the original edition of Heber's "Hymns," published in 1827, the second verse of "From Greenland's Icy Mountains" begins thus—

"What though the spicy breezes Blow soft o'er Java's isle."

By whom and for what reason was "Java" altered to "Ceylon," greatly to the detriment of the hymn as it stands in modern versions?—J.E. (Cardiff).

PROPHET—FIGS.—What is the source and context of the quotation, "In the name of the Prophet—Figs"?—A.W.

OLD NURSERY RHYME.—The following nursery rhyme was well known to me in childhood, and I have seen it in print in one collection, dating probably from the sixties. But I have not met with it of late years, and it seems new to most people to whom I have mentioned it—

"Ding-a-ding-ding, hear the bells ring!
The Parliament soldiers have gone to the king.
Some they did laugh, and some they did cry,
To see the Parliament soldiers pass by."

Is there reason to suppose that this has been handed down from the time of the Civil Wars?—and, if so, to what event does it refer? I am uncertain whether the end of the second line should read—"to the King," or "for the King."—A.W.

SUNDAYS IN LENT.—As a child, I had a Northumbrian nurse, who, every Lent, used to quote a couplet, supposed to be names for the Sundays in Lent (ending with Easter Sunday). It ran as follows—

Tid, Mid, Miserè,
Carlin, Palm, Pasti-egg day.

As there are five Sundays in Lent before Palm Sunday, one has got omitted. Can any one tell me the complete lines, and the meanings of the names? The only one she offered any explanation of was "Carlin," which was so called because on that Sunday, during some siege, the inhabitants of Newcastle were saved from famine by some sacks of "Carlin beans"—whatever they were. Is this correct? and can any one supply the details?—E.M.A. (Sevenoaks).

A LOST CAUSE.—Sir George Young, in addressing the boys of University College School, told those who had not won prizes that they must not be disheartened by failure; and he related an anecdote—"There were two men who had espoused a lost cause. At last their enemies put them to death. One, before he died, exclaimed, 'I have kept the bird in my bosom.' (The bird of enthusiasm, always fluttering and striving to rise and soar.)" Who were these men, and what was the cause?—J.S.M.

"TAFETY WAS A WELSHMAN."—What is the origin of these lines? Do they apply to political relations between England and Wales? and, if so, when?—E.H.W.B.

FAYNETS.—In children's games, where the ideas of combat and penalty are involved, as in "touch," when any one of the players wishes for a truce, he calls out "Faynets." Can any of your readers tell me the origin and etymology of this word? I have never seen it in print, and my spelling is phonetic.—F.P.

Answers

LITERATURE.

LAMBKINS.—As I have received no satisfactory reply regarding the use of "lambkins" by Shakespeare and Browning, I beg to offer a solution of my own. It is that "lambkins" in "Henry V." Act II., Scene 1, last line, is an example of profane swearing, equivalent to "God's lambkins," on the analogy of "God's bodykins" ("Hamlet," II. 2, 523), and "Od's pittikins" ("Cymbeline," IV. 2, 294). As to its use by Browning in the last line of "Dominus Hyacinthus de Archangelis," I submit that Browning did not realise that he was making use of a profane expression, but simply echoed the Shakespearean phrase without much reflection on its meaning.—A.T. (Edinburgh).

 ENIGMATIC DATE.—There are many editions of the "Fasciculus temporum omnes antiquorum cronica complectens," including that printed by Ratdolt of Venice in 1480 (Hain *6,926). The British Museum contains several early editions of this work, but not the one under consideration. In this no author, printer, or place is given. It should consist of 88 leaves, but the last blank one is wanting. Sig. 1, A.—P in sixes, except A in eight. P 5 and 6 are blank. It is printed in Gothic Letter, and is illustrated with woodcuts. The date as previously given is perfectly clear, not obliterated or defaced in the slightest degree.—W.P. (Bristol).

AUTHOR FOUND.—"For though the day be never so long."
[Other replies received from E. Leslie Sikes, and G. W. A. (Liverpool).]

 "MOTHER-IN-LAW."—Among others, Miss Austen, in "Emma," and Thackeray, in "The Adventures of Philip," uses "Mother-in-Law" for "Stepmother." Possibly the expressions were considered interchangeable.—S.B. (Malvern).

"TICKLE ME TOBY."—The allusion is probably to Toby and Widow Wadman in Sterne's "Tristram Shandy." The apostrophe is allied to the more cynical "Scratch my back and I'll scratch yours," and scoldingly describes the graceless confederacy of rascals.—S.C. (Hove).

AUTHOR FOUND.—The lines quoted by P.R., beginning—

"I loved—Oh, no! I mean not one of ye," will be found in Shelley's fragment, "The Zucca," written in 1822.—Edna.

[Answer also received from F. Baddeley.]

GISTING'S LAST BOOK.—I should class "The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft" with such works as Carlyle's "Sartor Resartus," Lamb's "Essays of Elia," and Montaigne's "Essays." Some librarians class it with the novels, under fiction; it is so placed in the Public Library here, and, what is more curious, so is Maeterlinck's "The Buried Temple."—W.H.P. (Bury).

TENNYSON.—The lines quoted by Tennyson to the Bishop of Ripon are by the Poet himself in the "Demeter" volume. They commence the poem. "By an Evolutionist."—E.K.L. (Birkenhead).

[Answers also received from C. Sharp (Brighton), E.W.K., L.L. (Shortlands), M.A.C. (Cambridge), and M.McL.D.]

JESSAMY BRIDE.—In the "Conclusion" of "Old Mortality," Scott makes Miss Martha Buskbody say—"I have not been more affected by any novel excepting the Tale of Jemmy and Jenny Jessamy, which is indeed pathos itself."—S.B.

CARLYLE.—The lines "So here hath been dawning," &c., are original, and may be found in Critical and Miscellaneous Essays, Vol. I., Appendix I. (p. 475, Centenary Edition), along with several other short poems by Carlyle, written between 1823 and 1833.—J.A.B.

[Answer also received from Index.]

OHNE PROSPHOR KEIN GEDANKE.—I find this referred to as "Moleschott's Formula." If it is to be met with in Goethe's Works, it must be either as a quotation or in the way of allusion.—Index.

KIPLING.—In Spring Time. Reply received from H.P.H.

GENERAL.

"THE SQUIRE AND THE APPLE PIE."—The story seems to be a variant of the famous anecdote of Lord Eldon. When Fellow of his College, he sat in judgment on a complaint of the undergraduates that the cook had sent to table an "Apple Pie that it was impossible to eat." Eldon ordered it to be brought before him to be tested, but it was found that it had already been eaten. Hence, "as it has been eaten, the plea falls to the ground, and judgment will be for the defendant cook." Afterwards Lord Eldon was accustomed to say that he wished all his cases were Apple-Pie cases.—S.C. (Hove).

"COUNTING-OUT VERSES."—I was brought up in Dublin, and the version I was taught (I presume by my mother) was the following—

"Wonery, twoery, dickory, devy,
Holloway, crackery, John o' Morevy,
Discum, dendum, American time,
Humbledom, bumbledom, twenty-nine.
O U T, out;
You are a dirty slut;
You are out!"

Index

"COUNTING-OUT VERSES."—The following are the counting-out verses with which I was familiar in my early days—

Ena, dena, dina, dust,
Cattler, wena, wina, wust,
Spit spot must be done,
Twiddle-um, twiddle-um, twenty-one.
O U T spells out;
Girls and boys must fairly be Turned out.

—M.K.P.

"AN OLD CHARADE."—I did not know the answer to the Charade when I sent it, but I have since heard from a member of the Austen family that the correct answer is believed to be "alight" (a-light).—F. (Cambridge).

"AN OLD CHARADE."—The answer evidently is—A light (Alight).—P.J.O'N. (Dublin).

AN OLD CHARADE.—

Miss Austen has surely invented a saint.
The patron of all who use powder and paint;
'Tis in concerts and ball-rooms you meet with St. Art,
And if you would get there, of course you must start.

J.A.B.

Note.—Correspondents are requested to note that each question and each answer must be written on a separate piece of paper, and each slip must be duly authenticated by name and address. If two or more questions or answers are written on the same piece of paper there is considerable risk of the first one only being used. Among the inadmissible questions and answers this week are two with initials only; one asking a purposeless Shakespearean conundrum; one repeating a question which has already appeared in a contemporary; and, finally, a long reply on an entirely irrelevant subject.

PRIZES.—The asterisks denote the two questions and two answers to which prizes have been awarded. The winners can obtain, on application at the following booksellers, Five Shillings' worth of books. Notices have been despatched to the several winners and to the four booksellers whose names follow:

Mr. John Hogg, 54, Queen Street, Cardiff.
Mr. Alfred Hills, 60, High Street, Sevenoaks.
Messrs. Wm. George's Sons, Top Corner, Park Street, Bristol.
Mr. Charles Jones, Old Bookstall, Colonnade, Malvern.

A Good Memory Means Money

The Pelman Memory System is Simple & Scientific. By its aid weak memories can be made strong and good memories perfect; its exercises teach you how to concentrate your mind. There are five lessons in the Course (taught in six languages), each of which can be mastered in a week. Five Weeks' Work secures YOU a Good Memory. Good work means money; a good memory means good work; the Pelman System means a good memory o o o

OW often do you hear the phrase, "I've forgotten!" You never hear anyone who has mastered the Pelman System of Memory Training say, "I've forgotten!"

THE BOY AT SCHOOL
THE TEACHER OF THE BOY AT SCHOOL
THE PREACHER IN CHURCH
THE LECTURER UPON THE PLATFORM
THE WRITER AT HIS DESK
THE DOCTOR IN HIS CONSULTING ROOM
THE STUDENT IN HIS STUDY
THE SCHOLAR AMONG HIS BOOKS
THE MERCHANT IN HIS OFFICE
THE CLERK UPON HIS STOOL

all these—in fact, all men and women who work—waste valuable time if they have not a GOOD MEMORY, and all and each can obtain a good memory by subscribing for the Correspondence Course of Five Lessons in the Pelman System of MEMORY TRAINING.

Subscribed for in the usual way this course will cost you £3 3s., but by availing yourself of the special "co-operation" offer made by the Proprietors of THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE you can obtain the complete course for £1 11s. 6d., being a reduction of 50 per cent.

This offer is made possible by a simple application of the commercial principle of buying in bulk and distributing in detail. We give to you the saving thus made possible; in other words, we ask you to co-operate with us.

NOTE.—This advantageous offer can only be made for a limited period; early application is therefore desirable.

SEE BELOW, AND READ THE DIRECTIONS CAREFULLY

* All communications from United Kingdom or the Continent must be addressed to "The Academy and Literature," 9 East Harding Street, London, E.C.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be made payable to "The Academy and Literature."

ENQUIRY COUPON

THIS Coupon must be sent if Post Free Prospectus is desired

"Academy," March 5, 1904.

COUPON

[No order can be accepted without this coupon.]

TO THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE,
9 East Harding Street, London, E.C.

I desire to receive Mr. PELMAN'S CORRESPONDENCE COURSE OF MEMORY TRAINING at half-price, and enclose the sum of One Pound Eleven Shillings and Sixpence. I agree not to communicate the lessons or any part of them to any other person without obtaining Mr. Pelman's written permission to do so.

[Please state whether Rev., Mr., Mrs., Miss, &c.]

Name.....

Address.....

A 2

Date.....

READERS ABROAD.—Those availing themselves of this offer in South Africa should address The Pelman School of Memory Training, Lynn Buildings, Durban; in Australasia, G.P.O. Box 402, Melbourne.

* IF YOU WISH FURTHER DETAILS WRITE FOR POST-FREE PROSPECTUS

Waterman's Ideal Fountain Pens

Best for Busy Men

DESK WORK } If the pen is not just
IS DREARY } right. And a pen can be very annoying, and often reduces a writer to desperation. A Waterman's Ideal reduces desk drudgery by freeing the writer from pen irritations. It has all the good qualities of a perfect pen and none of the bad qualities of a poor pen.

No Leakage, No Spurtings,
No Blottings, No Stoppages.

THE BUSY MAN'S RIGHT HAND

From 10/6 of Stationers and Jewellers;
In Silver and Gold for Presentation.

Send for Dainty Illustrated Brochure (post free) from
L. & C. HARDTMUTH,
2 Golden Lane, London, E.C.
(NEW YORK: 173 BROADWAY.)

NO FILLER NEEDED.

PEN COMPLETE IN ITSELF.

YOUR EYE

RIGHT HERE!

No. 1 .. 12/6
No. 2 .. 16/-
No. 3 .. 21/-

5 varieties of Nibs.

Conklin's

"THE PEN THAT FILLS ITSELF"

IF WE COULD PUT A CONKLIN SELF-FILLING PEN into your hand at this moment instead of merely telling about it; if you could press the lever and fill the pen and write with it—we know for a certainty you'd never be satisfied with any other. Will you let us prove to you that the CONKLIN is really the superior pen we say it is

A full descriptive Catalogue sent free on application

American Agencies, Ltd., 38, Shoe Lane,
London, E.C.

THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE is POSTED FREE (52 issues at 3d.) to every ANNUAL SUBSCRIBER in the United Kingdom prepaying 13/-. FOREIGN SUBSCRIBERS by a PRE-PAYMENT of 17/6 will secure it being sent Post Free to any address throughout the World for a uniform 1d. postage, though the postage payable varies from 1d. minimum to 2½d. per copy. Orders may be sent through any Bookseller or Newsvendor, or direct to the Publisher, 9 East Harding Street, E.C.

ALL SUBSCRIBERS are entitled to

FREE ADVERTISEMENTS

Of Books, Fine Art Publications, and Musical Compositions FOR SALE OR WANTED.

THE ONLY CONDITIONS ARE—

1. The Coupon on this page, filled in, must accompany the Advertisement (which must not exceed four lines or 20 words, including the address). No replies can be received at or forwarded through our Office. For every additional 5 words, 3d. must be prepaid.
2. The Book, Fine Art Publication, Print, &c., or Piece of Music to be advertised (except in the case of odd volumes or numbers of a magazine to complete a set) shall not have been issued during the last 12 months and so easily obtainable from the Publishers or through a local Bookseller.
3. The Editor retains the right to exclude any advertisement.
4. Advertisements for the week's issue must reach this Office by Wednesday morning, first post.

ACADEMY FREE ADVERTISEMENT COUPON

Insert attached advertisement on the conditions named, of (here say Book, Picture, &c.)

Name _____

(Mr, Mrs., or Miss) _____
(Being an Annual Subscriber)

Address _____

9.

Newspapers making a special feature of Reviews and Advertisements of
New Books, &c.

47 Fleet Street, & 21 Fargate, Sheffield.

THE "R.T.S." LIST

AN OPPORTUNE BOOK

160 PAGES. STIFF PAPER COVERS
ONE SHILLING.

AMONG THE TIBETANS

By ISABELLA BIRD BISHOP,
F.R.G.S.

Author of "Unbeaten Tracks in Japan," &c.

With Illustrations by EDWARD WHYMPER.

Mrs. Bishop made an adventurous journey into this almost unknown region. With her power of vivid description she enables the reader to realise much of the daily life of the people, and many of the strange scenes there to be witnessed. Mr. Whympers illustrations are from sketches by Mrs. Bishop.

A NEW SHILLING

PILGRIM'S PROGRESS

By JOHN BUNYAN.

With Eight Coloured Pictures by HAROLD COPPING.

John Bunyan made many alterations in the various Editions published during his lifetime. The Text of this Edition has been carefully collated with the one finally revised by the author, and published in the year in which he died.

320 Pages, cloth gilt, One Shilling.

One of the best and cheapest Editions ever offered to the Public.

SECOND EDITION

ARE THE CRITICS RIGHT?

An Important New Work on the Higher Criticism of the Old Testament.

By W. MÖLLER.

Translated from the German by C. H. IRWIN, M.A.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

The Guardian says: "His position is a strong one. It is not new, of course, but we know of no book in English which sets it out so well."

The Preacher's Magazine says: "It is a wise, sane, and discriminating plea for suspension of judgment on many points, and for readjustment of view on many others."

The Christian says: "To those who are tempted to entertain the conclusions of the critics it may be cordially recommended."

The Christian World says: "It is undoubtedly an able contribution to the further elucidation of the Pentateuch problem."

The Expository Times says: "The book is temperate. It is also a scholars' book."

PRESENT DAY TRACTS

GREAT REDUCTION IN PRICE

In order to meet the present strong attack against the Christian Faith, the Committee of the Religious Tract Society have decided to encourage the wider circulation of their valuable Series of Present Day Tracts by reducing the price

From 4d. each to
2d. each

All the 84 Numbers of the Series may now be obtained at 2d. each.

The 84 Tracts are also bound in
14 VOLUMES, CLOTH
A Complete Set of these Volumes
may now be had for 16s. NET.

Lists of these Tracts may be obtained from the

RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY,
4 BOUVERIE STREET, E.C.

NOW READY, with 2 Coloured Plates, 32 Illustrations, including 2 Portraits of the Author, and a Sketch Map, demy 8vo, 14s. net.

A NATURALIST IN THE GUIANAS.

By EUGÈNE ANDRÉ, F.R.G.S., M.S.A., F.Z.S.

With a Preface by Dr. J. S. OTT KELLIE, Secretary to the Royal Geographical Society.

* * * The Author is orchid hunter for the Hon. Walter Rothschild. The volume relates his perilous travels on an unexplored tributary of the Orinoco.
London: SMITH, ELDER & Co., 15 Waterloo Place, S.W.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN,

ALBEMARLE STREET, PICCADILLY, W.

Tuesday next, March 15, at Five o'clock, E. A. WALLIS BUDGE, Esq., M.A., Litt.D., D.Lit., F.S.A. First of Two Lectures on "The Doctrine of Heaven and Hell in Ancient Egypt, and the Books of the Underworld." Half a Guinea the Course.

Thursday, March 17, at Five o'clock, SIDNEY LEE, Esq., Litt.D. First of Two Lectures on "Shakespeare as Contemporaries Knew Him." Half a Guinea.

Subscription to all the Courses in the Season, Two Guineas.

Now Ready, Cloth, 4s. net, by post 4s. 4d.

THE COSMOS AND THE CREEDS

Elementary Notes on the Alleged Finality of the Christian Faith.

By CAPTAIN W. USBORNE MOORE, R.N.

"Whether the reader agrees or not with the conclusions arrived at, a careful perusal of the facts and arguments cannot fail to broaden the mind and enlarge the understanding."—Oxford Review.

"The reader will find many orthodox beliefs vigorously assailed in these papers, but the argument is well sustained in a lofty spirit."—Leicester Daily Mercury.

London: WATTS & Co., 17 Johnson's Court, Fleet St. E.C.

The Academy and Literature

SPECIAL SPRING

ANNOUNCEMENT NUMBER.

The issue for March 19 will be a double number, including a Special Supplement, which will contain, in as complete a form as possible, a Catalogue of all the New Books announced for publication during the forthcoming Season.

Considerable attention will be given to the arrangement of the lists. The books will be classified according to subject and importance, prices will be given, and each series of announcements arranged in such a way as to be most useful for future reference to Booksellers and Book-buyers.

NOTICE. This number has always rapidly ran out of print; it is therefore advisable to order at once.

Chatto & Windus PUBLISHERS

A STRIKING STORY BY OHNET.

The Money-Maker.

By GEORGES OHNET, Author of "The Ironmaster." Translated by F. ROTHWELL. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

FLORENCE WARDEN'S NEW STORY.

What ought She to do?
By FLORENCE WARDEN, Author of "The House on the Marsh." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

[March 17.]
A NEW INDIAN ROMANCE.

The Sanyasi.

By P. E. PENNY, Author of "A Mixed Marriage." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [March 24.]

V.C.: a Chronicle of Castle Barfield and of the Crimea. By CHRISTIE MURRAY, Author of "Joseph's Coat." Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"Mr. Murray is a past master in the art of constructing a readable story. . . . It is a thoroughly healthy and breezy tale throughout, and ought to attract a wide circle of readers."—Sheffield Telegraph.

PATSEY THE OMADAUN. By M. McD. BODKIN, Author of "Dora Myrl, the Lady Detective." Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"Inimitable Irish stories. . . . An altogether delightful book."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Fascinating from beginning to end."—World.

YOUNG MRS. CAUDLE. By GEORGE R. SIMS, Author of "Mary Jane's Memoirs." Fcap. 8vo, 1s. 6d.

"Young Mrs. Caudle is a charming creation."

Literary World.

WRONG SIDE OUT. By W. CLARK RUSSELL. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [May.]

THE COMMUNE. By PAUL and VICTOR MARQUETTE, Authors of "The Disaster." Translated by FREDERIC LEES. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [Shortly.]

A GREAT MAN. By ARNOLD BENNETT, Author of "The Grand Babylon Hotel." Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s. [May.]

THE PERIL OF AN EMPIRE. By R. JOHNSTON, Author of "The Old Land," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [Shortly.]

THE POET AND HIS GUARDIAN ANGEL. By SARAH TYTLER, Author of "Sir David's Visitors," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [Shortly.]

RANDAL OF RANDALHOLME. By AUSTIN CLARK, Author of "By the Rise of the River." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [Shortly.]

DR. WYNNE'S REVENGE. By WILLIAM WESTALL, Author of "With the Red Eagle." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [Shortly.]

MANY WAYS OF LOVE. By FRED WHISHAW. With 8 Illustrations by WARWICK GOBLE and B. SCHUMACHER. A New Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

WHITELADIES. By MRS. OLIPHANT. With 12 Illustrations by ARTHUR HOPKINS and HENRY WOODS. A New Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE ORANGE GIRL. By WALTER BESANT. With 8 Illustrations by F. PROGRAM. A New Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE GRAND BABYLON HOTEL. By ARNOLD BENNETT. A New Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE CAT'S PAW. By B. M. CROKER. With 12 Illustrations by FRED. PROGRAM. A New Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

Fcap. 8vo, picture cover, 1s. each; cloth, 1s. 6d. each.

ELIZA'S HUSBAND. By BARRY PAIN, Author of "Eliza," &c.

THE FOOLISH VIRGINS. By ALFRED SUTRO, Author of "Women in Love."

NEW TWO-SHILLING NOVELS.

Picture cloth, flat backs.

THE REBEL QUEEN. By SIR WALTER BESANT. [March 24.]

A NINETEENTH-CENTURY MIRACLE. By LOUIS ZANGWILL.

ZAMBRA THE DETECTIVE. By HEADON HILL. WANTED! By DICK DONOVAN.

BRITISH VIOLIN-MAKERS, Classical and Modern. By the Rev. W. MEREDITH MORRIS, B.A., A.T.S. With numerous Illustrations, Portraits, and Facsimiles. Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 10s. 6d. net.

MARSH-COUNTRY RAMBLES. By HERBERT W. TOMPKINS, Author of "Highways and Byways in Hertfordshire." With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

A CONSPIRACY UNDER THE TERROR: Marie Antoinette—Toulon—Jarlajay. By PAUL GAULOT. Translated by CHARLES LAROCHE, M.A. With Illustrations and Facsimiles. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s. [Shortly.]

LONDON. By SIR WALTER BESANT. Pott 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. net; leather, gilt edges, 3s. net. (New Volume of the ST. MARTIN'S LIBRARY.) [Shortly.]

London:

CHATTO & WINDUS, 111 St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

The Academy and Literature

No. 1662. Established 1869.

London: 12 March 1904.

Price Threepence.

* [Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17s. 6d. a year.]

Literary Notes

